David Hume.

the second son of Joseph Home (as the name was formerly spelled), laird of Ninewells, near Duns in Berwickshire, was born in Edinburgh, 26th April After attending the University of Edinburgh, he was put to the study of law, but, as he tells us himself, he was reading Cicero and Virgil when he should have been poring over Voet A post in a mercantile house in and Vinnius Bristol he found equally uncongenial, and, removing to France, be passed three years, at Rheims and La Flèche, in literary study and retirement, reading omnivorously English, Latin, French, and Italian, and living with the utmost frugality on the small allowance made him by his family He returned to London in 1737 to publish his first philosophical work, the Treatise on Human Nature, which appeared in January 1739, but, as he himself said, 'fell dead-born from the press' A third part appeared in 1740, and in 1741-42 he produced two volumes of Essays, Moral and Philosophical-some of them remarkable for research, originality, and elegance of style. 1745, after an unsuccessful candidature for the chair of moral philosophy in Edinburgh University, he undertook the charge of the Marquis of Annandale, a young nobleman who when not actually insane was morbidly excitable, and in this undignified and depressing employment the philosopher continued about a twelvemonth was more fortunate in 1746-47 as secretary to General St Clair in the expedition against L'Orient, and afterwards in the military embassy to the courts of Vienna and Turin Hume enjoyed congenial and refined society recast the first part of bis Treatise on Human Nature, which was published in London in 1748 as Philosophical Essays concerning Human Understanding, and contained the famous 'Essay on Miracles' In 1751 he produced his Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals (the third volume of the original Treatise), which he considered as incomparably his best work. His Dialogues coucerning Natural Religion he was persuaded meanwhile to withhold, they were not published till after his death In 1752, having removed to Edinburgh, he published there his Political Discourses, the only work of his which was at first successful -it even made an epoch in political literature, as containing many of the principles afterwards developed by Adam Smith Having failed to obtain the chair of logic at Glasgow vacated by Smith, he now took the office of librarian to the Faculty of Advocates, and used the opportunities it gave him for historical writing. In 1754 appeared the first volume of his History of Great Britain, containing the Reigns of James I and Charles I It was assailed by the Whigs with unusual bitterness, and Hume was so disappointed, partly from the attacks on him, and partly because of war, he said he would have settled in France and changed his name. A second volume, continuing the history to the Revolution, was published, with more success, in 1756, a third and fourth, containing the History of England under the House of Tudor, appeared in 1759, and the last two, in 1762, completed the work, with a narrative of the centuries between Julius Cresar's landing and the battle of Bosworth The book became highly popular erelong, edition followed edition, and, by universal consent, Hume was placed at the head of English historians In 1763 he accompanied the Earl of Hertford on his embassy to Paris, where he was received with marked distinction by the wits and fine ladies In 1766 he returned to Scotland, but was induced next year to accept the situation of Under-Secretary of State, which be held for two years, remaining in London till the autumn of 1769 With a revenue of £1000 a year-which he considered opulence-the historian retired to his native city, where he continued to reside in his house in St David Street, in intimate and cheerful intercourse with his literary friends, till his death, on the 25th of August 1776 In his temperament were curiously combined the ambition of the author and the calmness of the philosopher, the theoretical audacity of the revolutionary thinker and the easy good humour of the man His kindliness, his wit, his literary of the world fame, and his social standing made him an interesting and welcome companion even to those who were hostile to the scepticism which pervades his writings, philosophical and theological from the attacks on him, and partly because of the slow sale of the work, that, but for the French to the world, is a development of Locke's empiricism, and by very acute argument seeks to subvert the self-subsistence of mind or the soul as Berkeley had subverted the substantiality of Ideas are but weakened copies of impressions of the senses, mind is but a succession of ideas, and there is no necessary connection between cause and effect. Hume profoundly influenced European thought The Scottish sceptical philosopher wakened Kant (also of Scottish descent) 'from his dogmatic slumber,' and by Kant's own confession gave a new direction to his researches in speculative philosophy, Hume may be said to have moved the man that moved the universe of modern thought. Kant said that since metaphysic first took shape there had been no more pregnant contribution to it than Hume's 'skepsis' Hume was probably the keenest and most original thinker of his time his revolutionary and destructive speculations provoked a complete reconstruction of philosophy by Kant on one hand and the Scottish school on the other not Bacon, marks the change from the old to the new, and in our own time Green treated him as the most perfect exponent of empiricism ethical system was utilitarian, based mainly on unselfish sympathy, and provided Smith with the basis of his moral theory The famous argument against the credibility of miracles, which for long provoked much keener controversy than any part of his philosophical system, turned on the doctrine that miracles are incapable of proof because they rest on testimony, since no testimony can be so strong and convincing as our own experience of the uniformity of nature

The History of Hume is not a work of authority, but it is an admirably clear and well-written narrative, and fully entitled to supersede Rapin and Carte (see page 244), whose materials and collections he largely relied on He was constantly eliminating Scotticisms and otherwise subjecting it to revision in point of style, but was content to take his authorities at second hand. It has been said that up to 1750 no great historical work had appeared in any modern language, the most valuable books prior to that date being rather contemporary memoirs, biographical sketches, and the materials for history rather than history itself the temper for dealing with long periods of the past, and informed by a sense of the social progress and development of the interrelation of events, did not yet exist. To annalists and chroniclers the wide outlook, the synthetic vision, are unknown The spirit of real scientific research was yet unborn, and if it had been born, the materials to work on were not yet accessible. Manuscripts began to be edited by the antiquaries in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the great historic collections of Rymer, Leibnitz, and Muratori all date from the early eighteenth century. In France the historic spirit first awoke, and French influence told directly on Scotland Hume and Robertson were both directly influenced by the contemporary French historical methods (Voltaire's Life of Louis XIV appeared in 1751, Hume's first volume in 1754), and the earlier writers of this school, though gifted with the power of dealing with large masses of facts and wide surveys, and with the graces of style, are not yet scientific historians. They are read for pleasure, but not as authorities or for purposes of research.

The striking parts of his subject are related by Hume with picturesqueness, and it is seldom indeed that he fails so ludicrously as in the scene of the slrughter of Comyn, where he makes kirk patrick ask the hesitating Bruce, 'And is that a matter to be left to conjecture?' In his disserta tions on the state of parties and the tendency of particular events, he shows a philosophical tone and method hitherto unknown in English history He was too indifferent to sympathise hearth with any political party, and too sceptical on matters of religion to appreciate the full force of religious principles in directing the course of public events. An enemy to all turbulence and 'enthusinsm,' he naturally leaned to the side of settled government, even when it was united to arbitrary power, and though he could 'shed a generous tear for the fite of Charles I and the Earl of Strafford,' the struggles of his poor countrymen for conscience sake against the tyranny of the Stuarts excited in him no other feelings than those of ridicule or He could even forget Raleigh's ments contempt and evaggerate his faults to shelter the sordid injustice of a weak and contemptible sovereign No latred of oppression burns through his pages. The epicurean repose of the philosopher was not disturbed by visions of liberty or ardent aspira tions for the improvement of mankind 'He had early in life, said Sir James Mackintosh, 'conceived an antipathy to the Calvinistic divines, and his temperament led him at all times to regard with disgust and derision that religious enthusiasm or bigotry with which the spirit of English freedom was, in his opinion, inseparably associated. He defended the paradox that the history of the English constitution justified the despotic and absolute system of the Stuarts. Irritation at English prejudices against Scot land and Scotsmen made him become, during the progress of the History, more patriotically Scotch and Tors, more pronouncedly anti English and anti-Whig, and in altering he debated what he conceived to be concessions to 'villainous Whiggism' But Tory though he was, he wished success to the American revolution

Love of effect betrayed him into inconsistencies, exaggeration, and inaccuracies. Thus in speaking of the end of Charles I, he says that 'the height of all iniquity and fanatical extravagance yet remained—the public trial and execution of the sovereign' Yet three pages further on we find 'The pomp, the dignity, the ceremony of this transaction, corresponded to the greatest conception that is suggested in the annals of humankind, the delegates of a great people sitting in judgment upon their supreme magistrate, and trving him for his misgovernment and breach of trust.' He in one part admits, and in another denies, that Charles was insincere in dealing with his opponents illustrate his theory of the sudden elevation of Cromwell into importance, he states that about the meeting of Parliament in 1640 the name of Oliver is not to be found oftener than twice upon any committee, whereas the journals of the House of Commons show that, before the time specified, Cromwell vas on forty-five committees, and twelve special messages to the Lords. Hundreds of such errors were pointed out, no doubt Hume was careless as to facts But in judging of the History as a contribution to literature we must look at its clear and admirable narrative, the dignity of its style, the sagacity with which the views of conflicting sects and parties are estimated and developed, the large admissions which the author makes to his opponents, and the high importance he everywhere assigns to the interests of learning and literature. The critical keenness of his mind is admirably shown in the oft-quoted remark that 'an English Whig v ho asserts the reality of the Popish Plot, an Irish Catholic who denies the Massacre in 1641, and a Scotch Jacobite who maintains the innocence of Queen Mary must be considered as men beyond the reach of argument or reason, and must be left to their prejudices' Hume and Robertson both surpassed their French masters in not making their works on the past a vehicle for covertly attacking contemporary movements virtue of his History, Hume ranks with Robertson and Gibbon in the English historical triumvirate, in which Gibbon said he himself 'never presumed to take a place.' Schlegel and Gifford ranled Hume above Gibbon. Dr Johnson was hostile, and, like Jeffrey, criticised Hume's style as not English but French, Macaulay has criticised his attitude with sufficient asperity But it may safely be said that Hume was the first to give literary charm to the study of English history

The Middle Ages-Progress of Freedom

Those who cast their eye on the general revolutions of society will find that, as almost all improvements of the human mind had reached nearly to their state of perfection about the age of Augustus, there was a sensible decline from that point or period, and men thenceforth gradually relapsed into ignorance and bar barism. The unlimited extent of the Roman empire, and the consequent despotism of its monarchs, extin guished all emulation, debased the generous spirits of men, and depressed the noble flame by which all the refined arts must be cherished and enlivened. military government which soon succeeded, rendered even the lives and properties of men insecure and precarrous, and proved destructive to those vulgar and more necessary arts of agriculture manufactures, and commerce, and in the end, to the military art and genins itself, by which alone the immense fabric of the empire could be supported. The irruption of the barbarous nations which soon followed overwhelmed all himman knowledge, which was already far in its decline, and men sunk every age deeper into ignorance, stippidity, and superstition, till the light of ancient science and history had very nearly suffered a total extinction in all the Enropean nations.

But there is a point of depression as well as of exaltation, from which human affairs naturally return in a contrary direction, and beyond which they seldom pass, either in their advancement or decline The period in which the people of Christendom were the lowest sunk in ignorance, and consequently in disorders of every kind, may justly be fixed at the eleventh century, about the age of William the Conqueror, and from that era the sun of science, beginning to reascend, threw ont many gleams of light, which preceded the full morning when letters were revived in the fifteenth century The Danes and other northern people who had so long infested all the coasts, and even the inland parts of Europe, by their depredations, having now learned the arts of tillage and agriculture, found a certain subsistence at home, and were no longer tempted to desert their industry in order to seek a precamons livelihood by rapine and by the plunder of their neighbours. The fendal governments also, among the more southern nations, were reduced to a kind of system and though that strange species of civil polity was ill fitted to insure either liberty or tranquillity, it was preferable to the universal license and disorder which had everywhere preceded it But there was no event which tended farther to the improvement of the age than one which has no been much remarked, the accidental finding of a copy of Justinian's pandects, about the year 1130, in the town of Amalfi in Italy

It may appear strange that the progress of the arts, which seems, among the Greeks and Romans, to have daily increased the number of slaves, should in later times have proved so general a source of liberty, but this difference in the events proceeded from a great difference in the circumstances which attended those institutions. The ancient barons, ohliged to maintain themselves continually in a military posture, and little emulous of eloquence or splendour, employed not their villeins as domestic servants, much less as manufac thrers, but composed their retinue of freemen, whose military spirit rendered the chieftain formidable to his neighbours, and who were ready to attend him in every warlike enterprise. The villeins were entirely occu pied in the cultivation of their master's land, and paid their rents either in corn or cattle, and other produce of the farm, or in servile offices, which they performed about the baron's family, and upon the farms which he retained in his own possession. In proportion as agriculture improved and money increased, it was found that these services, though extremely hurdensome to the villein, vere of little advantage to the master, and that the produce of a large estate could be much more con veniently disposed of by the pensants themselves who raised it, than by the landlord or his bailiff who were formerly accustomed to receive it. A commutation was therefore made of rents for services, and of money rents for those in kind, and as men, in a subsequent age, discovered that farms were better cultivated where the farmer enjoyed a security in his possession, the practice of granting leases to the peasant began to prevail, which entirely broke the bonds of servitude, already much relaxed from the former practices After this manner villenage went gradually into disuse throughout the more civilised parts of Europe the interest of the master as well as that of the slave concurred in this The latest laws which we find in England alteration for enforcing or regulating this species of servitude were enacted in the reign of Henry VII And though the ancient statutes on this head remain unrepealed by parliament, it appears that, before the end of Elizabeth, the distinction of villein and freeman was totally though insensibly abolished, and that no person remained in the state to whom the former laws could be applied

Thus personal freedom became almost general in Europe, an advantage which paved the way for the increase of political or civil liberty, and which, even where it was not attended with this salitary effect, served to give the members of the community some of the most considerable advantages of it. The constitution of the Linglish government ever since the invasion of this island by the Saxons may boast of this pre eminence, that in no age the will of the monarch was ever entirely absolute and uncontrolled, but in other respects the halance of power has extremely shifted among the several orders of the state (From the History, Chap xxiii)

State of Parties at the Reformation in England

The friends of the Reformation asserted that nothing eould be more absurd than to conceal, in an unknown tongue, the word of God itself, and thus to counteract the will of Heaven, which, for the purpose of universal salvation, had published that salutary doctrine to all nations, that if this practice were not very absurd, the artifice at least was very gross, and proved a conscious ness that the glosses and traditions of the elergy stood in direct opposition to the original text dietated by Supreme intelligence, that it was now necessary for the people, so long abused by interested pretensions, to see with their own eyes, and to examine whether the claims of the ecclesiastics were founded on that charter which was on all hands acknowledged to be derived from Heaven, and that, as a spirit of research and curiosity was happily revived, and men were now obliged to make a choice among the contending doctrines of different sects, the proper materials for decision, and, above all, the Holy Scriptures, should be set before them, and the revealed will of God, which the change of language had somewhat obscured, be again by their means revealed to

The favourers of the ancient religion maintained, on the other hand, that the pretence of making the people see with their own eyes was a mere cheat, and was itself a very gross artifice, by which the new preachers hoped to obtain the guidance of them, and to seduce them from those pastors whom the laws of ancient establishments, whom Heaven itself, had appointed for their spiritual direction, that the people were, by their ignorance, their stupidity, their necessary avocations, totally unqualified to choose their own principles, and it was a mockery to set materials before them of which they could not possibly make any proper use, that even in the affairs of common life, and in their temporal concerns, which lay more within the compass of human reason, the laws had in a great measure deprived them of the right of private judgment, and had, happily for their own and the public interest, regulated their con duet and behaviour, that theological questions were placed far beyond the sphere of vulgar comprehension. and ecclesiastics themselves, though assisted by all the advantages of education, erudition, and an assiduous study of the science, could not be fully assured of a just decision, except by the promise made them in Scripture, that God would be ever present with Ilis church, and that the gates of hell should not prevail against her. that the gross errors adopted by the wisest heathens prove how unfit men were to grope their own way through this profound darkness, nor would the Scuptures, if trusted to every man's judgment, be able to remedy, on the contrary, they would much augment those fatal illusions, that Sacred Writ itself was involved in so much obscurity, gave rise to so many difficulties, contained so many appearing contradictions, that it was the most dangerous weapon that could be intrusted into the hands of the ignorant and giddy mal titude, that the poetical style in which a great part of it was composed, at the same time that it occasioned uncertainty in the sense by its multiplied tropes and figures, was sufficient to kindle the zeal of fanaticism, and thereby throw civil society into the most furious combustion, that a thousand sects must arise, which would pretend, each of them, to derive its teneis from the Scriptures, and would be able, by specious argu ments, to seduce silly women and ignorant mechanics into a belief of the most monstrous principles, and that if ever this disorder, dangerous to the magistrate himself, received a remedy, it must be from the facit acquiescence of the people in some new authority, and it was evidently better, without further contest or inquiry, to adhere peaceably to ancient, and therefore the more secure, establishments (From the History, Chap. xxx.)

Character of Queen Elizabeth.

The council being assembled, sent the keeper, admiral, and secretary to know her [the queen's] will with regard to her successor She answered with a faint voice that as she had held a regal sceptre, she desired no other than a Cecil requesting her to explain herself royal successor more particularly, she subjoined that she would have a king to succeed her; and who should that be but her nearest kinsman, the king of Scots? Being then advised by the archbishop of Canterbury to fix her thoughts upon God, she replied that she did so, nor did her mind in the least wander from Him Her voice soon after left her, her senses fulled, she fell into a lethargic slamber  $^{\prime\prime}$ which continued some hours, and she expired gently, without further struggle or convulsion (March 24, 1603), in the seventieth year of her age, and forty fifth of her

So dark a cloud overcast the evening of that day, which had shone out with a mighty lustre in the eyes of all Europe! There are few great personages in history who have been more exposed to the calming of enemies and the adulation of friends than Queen Elizabeth, and yet there is scarcely any whose reputation has been more certainly determined by the unain mous consent of posterity. The unusual length of her administration, and the strong features of her character, were able to overcome all prejudices, and obliging her detractors to abate much of their invectives, and her admirers somewhat of their panegyrics, have at last, in spite of political factions, and what is more, of religious (though suggested or influenced by Voltaire's Essai sur les Mauis) Cotter Morison affirmed that Robertson had a wider and more synthetic conception of history than either Hume or Gibbon Buckle, too, declares that what he effected with his materials was wonderful, though, as has been pointed out, his view of the Middle Ages is inevitably marked by eighteenth century prejudices and limitations The errors in Charles V and in the America have been abundantly commented on (as by Southey and Prescott), but, as Stirling-Maxwell said, his inaccuracies are more due to his lack of materials than to lack of diligence. He holds a place of his own in the history of historywriting If the 'pomp and strut' which Cowper imputes to Robertson be sometimes apparent in the orderly succession of well-balanced and flowing periods, it must be acknowledged that there is also much real dignity and power Moreover, in the development of English history he holds an honoured place. His Charles V was the earliest successful attempt in the language to treat any part of the history of Europe on broad historic lines, while his treatment of Queen Mary marks him out as the first Scotsman to write the history of his country with literary grace and liberality of

Character of Mary Queen of Scots

To all the charms of beauty, and the utmost elegance of external form, she added those accomplishments which render their impression irresistible. affable, insinnating, sprightly, and capable of speaking and of writing with equal case and dignity however, and violent in all her attachments, because her heart was warm and unsuspicious Impatient of contradiction, because slie had been accustomed from her infancy to be treated as a Queen No stranger, on some occasions, to dissimulation, which, in that perfidions court where she received her education, was reckoned among the necessary arts of government Not insensible of flattery, or unconscious of that pleasure with which almost every woman beholds the inflnence we love, not with the talents that we admire, she was an agrecable woman, rather than an illustrious Queen. The vivacity of her spirit, not sufficiently tempered with sound judgment, and the warmth of her heart, which was not at all times under the restraint of dis cretion, betrayed her both into errors and into crimes To say that she was always unfortunate, will not account for that long and almost uninterrupted succession of calamities which befel her, we must likewise add, that she was often imprudent Her passion for Darnley was rash, youthful, and excessive, and though the sudden transition to the opposite extreme, was the natural effect of her ill requited love, and of his ingratitude, insolence, and brutality, yet neither these, nor Bothwell's artful address and important services, can justify her attachment to that nobleman Even the manners of the age, licentious as they were, are no apology for this unhappy passion, nor can they induce us to look on that tragical and infamous scene which followed upon it, with less abhorrence. Humanity will draw n veil over this part of her character which it cannot approve, and may, perhaps, prompt some to impute some of her netions to her situation, more than to her dispositions, and to lament the unhappiness of the former, rather than excuse the perversences of the latter. Mary's sufferings exceed, both in degree and in duration, those trugical distresses which funcy has feigned to excite sorrow and commiseration, and while we survey them, we are apt altogether to forget her fruities, we think of her faults with less indignation, and approve of our tears, as if they were shed for a person who had attained much nearer to pure virtue.

With regard to the Queen's person, a circumstance not to be omitted in writing the history of a female reign, all contemporary authors agree in ascribing to Mary the utmost beauty of countenance, and elegance of shape, of which the human form is capable. Her hair was black, though, according to the fashion of that age, she fre quently wore borrowed locks, and of different colours Her eyes were a dark grey her complexion was exqui sitely fine, and her liands and nrms remarkably delicate, both as to shape and colour Her stnture was of an height that rose to the majestic. She danced, she walked, and rode with equal grace Her taste for music was just, and slie both sung and played upon the lute with uncommon skill Towards the end of her life, long confinement, and the coldness of the houses in which she had been imprisoned, brought on a rheuma tism, which often deprived her of the use of her limbs No man, says Brantome, ever beheld her person without admiration and love, or will read her history without NOTTOR

Martin Luther

While appearances of danger daily increased, and the tempest which had been so long a gathering was ready to break forth in all its violence against the Protestant church, Luther was saved, by a sersonable death, from feeling or beholding its destructive rage. Having gone, though in a declining state of health, and during a ngorons season, to his native city of Eysleben, in order to compose, by his authority, a dissension among the counts of Mansfield, he was seized with a violent inflam mation in his stomach, which in a few days put an end to his life, in the sixty third year of his age. As he was raised up by Providence to be the author of one of the greatest and most interesting revolutions recorded in history, there is not any person perhaps whose character has been drawn with such opposite colonrs In his own age, one party, struck with horror and inflamed with rage, when they saw with what a during hand he overturned every thing which they held to be sacred, or valued as beneficial, imputed to him not only all the defects and vices of a man, but the qualities of a dremon The other, warmed with the admiration and gratitude which they thought he merited as the restorer of light and liberty to the Christian church, ascribed to him perfections above the condition of humanity, and viewed nll his actions with a veneration bordering on that which should be paid only to those who are guided by the immediate inspiration of Heaven It is his own conduct, not the undistinguishing censure or the exaggerated praise of his contemporaries, that ought to regulate the opinions of the present age concerning him. Zeal for what he regarded as truth, undaunted intrepidity to maintain his own system, abilities, both natural and acquired, to defend his principles, and unwearied industry in propagating them,

William Robertson

was born 19th September 1721 at Borthwick in Midlothian, son of the then minister of Borth wick, who was afterwards called to Old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh The son was also educated for the Church, and in 1743 was appointed minister of the small parish of Gladsmuir in Haddingtonshire, whence he removed in 1758 to He had dis-Lady Yester's parish in Edinburgh tinguished himself in the General Assembly and in a 'Select Society' which had Adam Smith, David Hume, Adam Fergusson, and Lord Kames amongst its members, but it was not till 1759 that he became known as a historian In that year he published his History of Scotland during the Reigns of Queen Mary and of King James VI till his Accession to the Crown of England (begun in 1753), for the copyright of which he received £600 No first work was ever more successful. The author was congratulated by Hume, Burke, Gibbon, Horace Walpole, Chesterfield, and the most conspicuous of his contemporaries-though Dr Johnson did not join in the chorus He was appointed chaplain of Stirling Castle and one of His Majesty's chaplains in ordinary for Scotland, and he was successively made minister of Old Greyfriars, Principal of the University of Edin burgh, and historiographer for Scotland lated by such success, and undeterred by the dissuasions of Hume, in 1769 he produced his History of the Reign of Charles V in three volumes quarto, for which he received from the booksellers the princely sum of £4500. It was equally well received with his former work, made his fame European, and ranked Voltaire and Catherine II of Russia amongst his admirers In 1777 he published his History of America, which (just at the time of the war) was at least as popular as the earlier works, but, because of the war, was left unfinished His Historical Disquisition about ancient India (1791) is a slight work, to which he had been led by Major Rennell's Memoirs of a Map of Hindostan (1783) For many years Dr Robertson was leader of the moderate party in the Church of Scotland, exhibiting in the General Assembly an extraordinary readiness and eloquence. He died on the 11th of June 1793, in the seventy-second year of his age.

The History of Scotland has all the interest of a memoir of Mary Queen of Scots Though Robertson is not among the number of her indiscriminate admirers and apologists, he labours—rather with the writer's art to produce a romantic narrative than with the historian's zeal to establish truth—to awaken the sympathies of the reader strongly in her behalf Walpole and Hume thought him partial to Mary, Tytler charged him with unfairness to her As histories all Robertson's works have been superseded, in his day the materials available were comparatively slender, and the modern conception of the scope of history had not vet dawned He philosophised on defective data with all the complicency, dignity, and elegance of the eighteenth century But as literature his histories are still excellent reading. His English style surprised his southern contemporanes, and Horace Walpole, in a letter to the author, ex presses the feeling with his usual point and wracity Before I read your History, I should probably have been glad to dictate to you, and (I will venture to say it-it satirises nobody but myself) should have thought I did honour to an obscure Scotch clergyman by directing his studies by my supenor lights and abilities How you have saved me, sr, from making a ridiculous figure, by making so great a one yourself! But could I suspect that a man I believe much younger, and whose dialect l scarce understood, and who came to me with all the diffidence and modesty of a very middling author, and who I was told had passed his life m a small living near Edinburgh—could I then suspect that he had not only written what all the world now allows the best modern history, but that he had written it in the purest English, and with as much seeming knowledge of men and courts as if he had passed all his life in important embassies? This condescending eulogy was perhaps a little out of place. Hume had already proved by his Essays, his Inquiry, his Political Discourses, and the first two volumes of his History that an Edin burgh-bred man could write English to some purpose, and the intimate of Hume and Adam Smith had not lived heretofore amongst boors

Robertson has few salient points and no careless beauties, his style is clear but formal and monotonous, somewhat laboured and Latinised, and without idiomatic vigour or variety. Yet it was of him that Johnson quoted the tutor's advice, 'Read over your compositions, and wherever von meet with a passage which you think is particularly fine stril e it out.' His pompous manner at times becomes ridiculous, as when he apologises for the introduction of Rizzio, whose 'low birth and in digent condition placed him in a station in which he ought naturally to have remained unknown to posterity,' but whose fortune and sufferings oblige 'lustory to descend from its dignity and to record his adventures' When he sums up the character of a sovereign, or traces the progress of society and the influence of laws and government, we recognise the mind and language of a master in The artificial graces of historical composition his style are also largely displayed in scenes of tenderness and pathos, or in picturesque description, as in his story of the beauty and sufferings of Mary, or the account of Columbus's first glimpscs of the New World His History of the Reign of Charles I' is undoubtedly his masterpiece. The prefixed 'View of the State of Society in Europe from the subversion of the Roman Empire to the beginning of the Sixteenth Century, impressed Hallam and amazed Carlyle by its sagaciousness and broad generalisation, and in virtue of it though suggested or influenced by Voltaire's Essai sur les Mæurs) Cotter Morison affirmed that Robertson had a vider and more synthetic conception of history than either Hume or Gibbon Buckle, too declares that what he effected with his materials was wonderful, though, as has been pointed out, his view of the Middle Ages is inevitably marked by eighteenth century prejudices and limitations The errors in Clarles I' and in the An crica have been abundantly commented on (as by Souther and Prescott), but, as Stirling-Maxwell said, his inaccuracies are more due to his lack of materials than to lack of diligence. He holds a place of his own in the history of history-If the 'pomp and strut' which Cowper imputes to Robertson be sometimes apparent in the orderly succession of well balanced and flowing periods, it must be acknowledged that there is also much real dignity and power Moreover, in the development of English history he holds an honoured place. His Charles V was the earliest successful attempt in the language to treat any part of the history of Europe on broad historic lines, while his treatment of Queen Mary marks him out as the first Scotsman to write the history of his country with literary grace and liberality of

To all the charms of beauty, and the utmost elegance of external form, she added those accomplishments which render their impression irresistible. Polite, affable, insinuating, sprightly, and capable of spealing and of writing with equal case and dignity hove er, and violent in all her attachments, because her heart was varm and unsuspicious Impatient of contradiction, because she had been accustomed from her infancy to be treated as a Queen No stranger, on some occasions, to dissimulation, which, in that perfidious court where she received her education, was reckoned among the necessary arts of government. Not insensible of flattery, or nuconscious of that pleasure with which almost every woman beholds the influence of her own beanty Formed with the qualities which we love, not with the talents that we admire, she was an agreeable woman, rather than an illustrious Queen. The vivacity of her spirit, not sufficiently tempered with sound judgment, and the warmth of her heart, which vas not at all times under the restraint of dis cretion, betrayed her both into errors and into crimes To say that she was always unfortunate, will not account for that long and almost uninterrupted succession of calamities which befel her, we must likewise add, that she was often imprudent. Her passion for Damley was rash, vouthful, and excessive, and though the sudden transition to the opposite extreme, was the natural effect of her ill requited love, and of his ingratitude, insolence, and brutality, yet neither these, nor Bothwell's artful address and important services, can justify her attachment to that nobleman. Even the manners of the age, licentious as they were, are no apology for this unhappy passion, nor can they induce us to look on that tragical and infamous scene which followed upon it, with less abhorrence. Humanity will draw a veil over this part of her character which it cannot approve, and may, perhaps, prompt some to impute some of her actions to her situation, more than to her dispositions, and to lament the unhappiness of the former, rather than excuse the perverseness of the latter. Mary's sufferings exceed, both in degree and in duration, those tragical distresses which fancy has feigned to excite sorrow and commiseration, and while we survey them, we are apt altogether to forget her frailties, we think of her faults with less indignation, and approve of our tears, as if they were shed for a person who had attained much nearer to pure virtue.

With regard to the Queen's person, a circumstance not to be omitted in writing the history of a female reign, all contemporary authors agree in ascribing to Mary the utmost beauty of countenance, and elegance of shape, of which the human form is capable. Her hair was black, though, according to the fashion of that age, she fre quently wore borrowed locks, and of different colonrs Her eyes were a dark grey, her complexion vas exqui sitely fine, and her hands and arms remarkably delicate, both as to shape and colour Her stature was of an height that rose to the majestic. She danced, she walked, and rode with equal grace Her taste for music was just, and she both sung and played upon the lute with uncommon skill Towards the end of her life. long confinement, and the coldness of the houses in which she had been imprisoned, brought on a rheuma tism, which often deprived her of the use of her limbs No man, says Brantome, ever beheld her person without admiration and love, or will read her history without sorrow

Martin Luther

While appearances of danger daily increased, and the tempest which had been so long a gathering was ready to break forth in all its violence against the Protestant ehurch, Luther was saved, by a seasonable death, from feeling or beholding its destructive rage. Having gone, though in a declining state of health, and during a rigorous season, to his native city of Eysleben, in order to compose, by his authority, a dissension among the counts of Mansfield, he was seized with a violent inflammation in his stomach, which in a few days put an end to his life, in the sixty third year of his age. As he was raised up by Providence to be the author of one of the greatest and most interesting revolutions recorded in history, there is not any person perhaps whose character has been drawn with such opposite colours In his own age, one party, struck with horror and inflamed with rage, when they saw with what a daring hand he overturned every thing which they held to be sacred, or valued as beneficial, imputed to him not only all the defects and vices of a man, but the qualities of a demon. The other, warmed with the admiration and gratitude which they thought he merited as the restorer of light and liberty to the Christian church, ascribed to him perfections above the condition of humanity, and viewed all his actions with a veneration bordering on that which should be paid only to those who are guided by the immediate inspiration of Heaven It is his own conduct, not the undistinguishing censure or the exaggerated praise of his contemporaries, that onght to regulate the opinious of the present age concerning him. Zeal for what he regarded as truth, undaunted intrepidity to maintain his own system, abilities, both natural and acquired, to defend his principles, and unweared industry in propagating them, are virtues which shine so conspicuously in every part of his behaviour, that even his enemies must allow him to have possessed them in an eminent degree. To these may be added, with equal justice, such purity and even austerity of manners, as became one who assumed the character of a Keformer, such sanctity of life as suited the doctrine which he delivered, and such perfect disinterestedness as affords no slight presumption of Superior to all selfish considerations, a stranger to the elegancies of life, and despising its pleasures, he left the honours and emoluments of the church to his disciples, remaining satisfied himself in his original state of professor in the university, and pastor of the town of Wittemberg, with the moderate appointments annexed to these offices dinary qualities were allayed with no inconsiderable mixture of human frailty and human passions however, were of such a nature, that they cannot be imputed to milevolence or corruption of heart, but seem to have taken their rise from the same source with many of his virtues His mind, forcible and vehement in all its operations, roused by great objects, or agitated by violent passions, broke out, on many occasions, with an impetuosity which astonishes men of feebler spirits, or such as are placed in a more tranquil situation By carrying some praise worthy dispositions to excess, he bordered sometimes on what was culpable, and was often betrayed into actions which exposed him to censure. His confidence that his own opinions were well founded, approached to arrogance, his courage in asserting them, to rashness, this firmness in adhering to them, to obstinacy, and his zeal in confuting his adversuries, to rage and scurrility Accustomed himself to consider every thing as subordinate to truth, he ex pected the same deference for it from other men, and, without making any allowances for their timidity or prejudices, he poured forth against such as disappointed him in this particular, a torrent of invective mingled with contempt Regardless of any distinction of rank or character when his doctrimes were attacked, he chas tised all his adversaries indiscriminately, with the same rough hand, neither the royal dignity of Henry VIII nor the eminent learning and abilities of Erasmus, screened them from the same gross abuse with which he treated Tetzel or Eccus

But these indecencies of which Luther was guilty, must not be imputed wholly to the violence of his temper They ought to be charged in part on the man ners of the age Among a rude people, unacquainted with those maxims, which by putting continual restraint on the passions of individuals, have polished society and rendered it agreeable, disputes of every kind were managed with heat, and strong emotions were uttered in their natural language, without reserve or delicacy At the same time, the works of learned men were all composed in Latin, and they were not only authorized, by the example of eminent writers in that language, to use their antagonists with the most illiberal scurnlity, but, in a dead tongue, indecencies of every kind appear less shocking than in a living language, whose idioms and phrases seem gross, because they are familiar

In passing judgment upon the characters of men, we ought to try them by the principles and maxims of their own age, not by those of another For, although vutue and vice are at all times the same, manners and customs Some parts of Luther's behaviour, vary continually which to us appear most culpable, gave no disgust to his contemporaries. It was even by some of those qualities, which we are now apt to blame that he was fitted for accomplishing the great work which he under To rouse mankind, when sunk in ignorance or superstition, and to encounter the rage of bigotr, armed with power, required the utmost vehemence of zeal, as A gentle call would well as a temper during to excess neither have reached, nor have excited those to whom it must have been addressed A spirit more amiable, but less vigorous than Luther's, would have shrunk back from the dangers which he brived and surmounted

Discovery of America.

Next morning, being Friday the third day of August, in the year one thousand four hundred and ninety two, Columbus set sail, a little before sun rise, in presence of a vast crowd of spectators, who sent up their supplications to Heaven for the prosperous issue of the voyage, which they wished rather than expected Steered directly for the Canary Islands, and arrived there [Aug 13] without any occurrence that would have deserved notice on any other occasion But, in a voyage of such expectation and importance, every circumstance was the object of attention

Upon the first of October they were, according to the admiral's reckoning, seven hundred and seventy leagues to the west of the Canaries, but lest his men should be intimidated by the prodigious length of the navigation, he gave out that they had proceeded only five hundred and eighty four leagues, and, fortunately for Columbus, neither his own pilot, nor those of the other ships, had skill sufficient to correct this error, and discover the deceit. They had now been above three weeks at sea, they had proceeded far beyond what former navigators had attempted or deemed possible, all their prognostics of discovery, drawn from the flight of birds and other circumstances, had proved fallacious, the appearances of land, with which their own credulity or the artifice of their commander had from time to time flattered and amused them, had been altogether illusive, and their prospect of success seemed now to be as distant as ever These reflections occurred often to men who had no other object or occupation than to reason and discourse concerning the intention and circumstances of their expedition. They made impression, at first, upon the ignorant and timid, and, extending by degrees, to such as were better informed or more resolnte, the contagion spread at length from ship to From secret whispers or marmurings, they proceeded to open cabals and public complaints. They taxed their sovereign with inconsiderate credulity, in paying such regard to the vain promises and rash con jectures of an indigent foreigner, as to hazard the lives of so many of her own subjects in prosecuting a chimerical scheme. They affirmed that they had fully performed their duty, by venturing so far in an uuknown and hopeless course, and could incur no blame for refusing to follow, any longer, a desperate adventurer to certain destruction

Columbus was fully sensible of his perilous situation. He had observed, with great uneasiness, the fatal opera tion of ignorance and of fear in producing disaffection among his crew, and saw that it was now ready to barst out into open mutiny He retained, however, perfect presence of mind He affected to seem ignorant of their machinatious Notwithstanding the agitation and solici tude of his own mind, he appeared with a cheerful countenance, like a man satisfied with the progress he had made, and confident of success Sometimes he employed all the arts of insinuation to soothe his men. Sometimes he endeavoured to work upon their ambition or avarice, by magnificent descriptions of the fame and wealth which they were about to acquire. On other occasions, he assumed a tone of authority, and threatened them with vengeance from their sovereign, if, by their dastardly behaviour, they should defeat this noble effort to promote the glory of God, and to exalt the Spanish name above that of every other nation Even with seditions sailors, the words of a man whom they had been accustomed to reverence, were weighty and persuasive, and not only restrained them from those violent excesses which they meditated, but prevailed with them to accompany their admiral for some time longer

As they proceeded, the indications of approaching land seemed to be more certain, and excited hope in proportion. The birds began to appear in flocks, making towards the southwest Colambus, in imitation of the Portuguese navigators, who had been guided, in several of their discoveries, by the motion of birds, altered his course from the duc west towards that quarter whither they pointed their flight. Bat, after holding on for several days in this new direction, without any better success than formerly, having seen no object, during thirty days, hut the sea and the sky, the hopes of his companions subsided faster than they had risen, their fears revived with additional force, impatience, rage, and despair, appeared in every countenance. All sense of subordi nation was lost the officers, who had hitherto con curred with Columbus in opinion, and supported his authority, now took part with the private men, thes assembled tumultnously on the deck, expostulated with their commander, mingled threats with their expostu lations, and required him instantly to tack about and to return to Europe. Columbus perceived that it would be of no avail to have recourse to any of his former arts, which having been tried so often had lost their effect, and that it was impossible to rekindle any zeal for the success of the expedition among men, in whose breasts fear had extinguished every generous sentiment. He saw that it was no less vain to think of employing either gentle or severe measures to quell a mutiny so general and so violent. It was necessary, on all these accounts, to soothe passions which he could no longer command, and to give way to a torrent too impetuous to be checked. He promised solemnly to his men that he would comply with their request, provided they would accompany him, and obey his command for three days longer, and if, during that time, land were not discovered, he would then abandon the enterprise, and direct his course towards Spain

Enraged as the sailors were, and impatient to turn their faces again towards their native country, this proposition did not appear to them intreasonable. Nor did Columbus hazard much in confining himself to a term so short. The presages of discovering land were now so numerous and promising, that lie deemed them infallible. For some days the sounding line reached the bottom, and the soil which it brought up indicated land to be at no great distance The flocks of birds increased, and were composed not only of sea fowl, but of such land birds as could not be supposed to fly far from the shore. The crew of the Pinta observed a cane floating, which seemed to have been newly cut, and likewise a piece of timber artificially carved sailors aboard the Nigna took up the branch of a tree with red berries, perfectly fresh. The clouds around the setting sun assumed a new appearance, the air was more mild and warm, and, during night, the wind became unequal and variable. From all these symptoms, Columbus was so confident of being near land, that on the evening of the eleventh of October, after public prayers for success, he ordered the sails to be furled, and the ships to lie to, keeping strict watch, lest they should be driven ashore in the night. During this interval of suspense and expectation, no man shut his eyes, all kept upon deck, gazing intently towards that quarter where they expected to discover the land, which had been so long the object of their wishes

About two hours before midnight, Columbus, standing on the forecastle, observed a light at a distance, and privately pointed it out to Pedro Guttierez, a page of the Queen's wardrobe. Gattierez perceived it, and calling to Salcedo, comptroller of the fleet, all three saw it in motion, as if it were carried from place to place. A little after midnight the joyful sound of land ! land ! was heard from the Pinta, which kept always ahead of the other ships But, having beca so often deceived by fallacious appearances, every man was now become slow of belief, and waited in all the anguish of uncertainty and line patience for the return of day. As soon as morning dawned [Oct 12], all doabts and fears were dispelled From every ship an island was seen about two leagues to the north, whose flat and verdaat fields, well stored with wood, and watered with many rivulets, presented the aspect of a delightful country The crew of the Pinta instantly began the Te Deum, as a hymn of thanksgiving to God, and were joined by those of the other ships, with tears of joy and transports of eongratulation. This office of gratitude to Heaven was followed by an act of justice to their commander. They threw themselves at the feet of Columbus, with feelings of self condemnation mingled with reverence. They implored him to pardon their ignorance, incredulity, and insolence, which had created him so much unnecessary disquiet, and had so often obstructed the prosecution of his well concerted plan, and passing, in the warmth of their admiration, from one extreme to another, they now pronounced the man, whom they had so lately reviled and threatened, to be a person inspired by Heaven with sagaeity and fortitude more than human, in order to accomplish a design so far beyond the ideas and conception of all former ages.

As soon as the sun arose, all their boats were manned They rowed towards the island with their and armed colours displayed, with warlike music, and other martial pomp As they approached the coast, they saw it covered with a multitude of people, whom the novelty of the speciacle had drawn together, whose attitudes and ges tures expressed wonder and astonishment at the strange objects which presented themselves to their view Columbus was the first European who set foot in the New World which he had discovered He landed in a rich dress, and with a naked sword in his hand. men followed, and kneeling down, they all kissed the ground which they had so long desired to see. They next erected a crucifix, and prostrating themselves before it, returned thanks to God for conducting their voyage to such a happy issue. They then took solemn possession of the country for the crown of Castile and Leon, with all the formulaties which the Portuguese were accustomed to observe in acts of this kind, in their new discoveries

The Spaniards, while thus employed, were surrounded by many of the natives, who gazed, in silent admiration, upon actions which they could not comprehend, and of which they did not foresee the consequences. The dress of the Spaniards, the whiteness of their skins, their beards, their arms, appeared strange and surprising The vast machines in which they had traversed the ocean, that seemed to move upon the waters with wings, and nitered a dreadful sound resembling thunder, ac companied with lightning and smoke, struck them with such terror, that they began to respect their new guests as a superior order of beings, and concluded that they were children from the Sun, who had descended to visit the earth.

The Europeans were hardly less amazed at the scene now before them Every herb, and shrub, and tree, was different from those which flourished in Europe. soil seemed to be rich, but bore few marks of cultivation. The climate, even to the Spaniards, felt warm, though extremely delightful. The inhabitants appeared in the simple innocence of nature, entirely naked. Their black hur, long and uncurled, floated upon their shoulders, or was bound in tresses around their heads They had no beards, and every part of their bodies was perfectly smooth Their complexion was of a dusky copper colonr, their features singular, rather than disagreeable, their aspect gentle and timid Though not tall, they were well shaped and active Their faces, and several parts of their body, were fantastically painted with glaring colours They were shy at first through fear, but soon became familiar with the Spaniards, and with transports of joy received from them hawks bells, glass beads, or other baubles, in return for which they gave such provisions as they had, and some cotton yam, the only commodity of value that they could produce. Towards evening, Columbus returned to his ship, accompanied by many of the islanders in their boats, which they called cances, and though rudely formed out of the trunk of a single tree, they rowed them with surprising dexterity. Thus, in the first interview between the inhabitants of the old and new worlds, every thing was conducted amicably, and to their mutual satisfaction. The former, enlightened and ambitious, formed already vast ideas with respect to the advantages which they might denve from the regions that began to open to their view. The latter, simple and undiscerning, had no foresight to the calamities and desolation which were approaching their country.

Chivalry

The feudal state was a state of almost perpetual war, rapine, and anarchy, during which the weak and un armed were exposed to insults or injuries. The power of the sovereign was too limited to prevent these wrongs, and the administration of justice too feeble to redress The most effectual protection against violence and oppression, was often found to be that which the valour and generosity of private persons afforded. The same spirit of enterprise which had prompted so many gentlemen to take arms in defence of the oppressed pilgrims in Palestine, incited others to declare themselves the patrons and avengers of injured innocence at home. When the final reduction of the Holy Land under the dominion of infidels put an end to these foreign expedi tions, the latter was the only employment left for the activity and courage of adventurers . To check the insolence of overgrown oppressors, to rescue the helpless from captivity, to protect, or to avenge women, orphans, and ecclesiastics, who could not bear arms in their own defence, to redress wrongs, and to remove grievances, were deemed acts of the highest prowess and ment. Valour, humanity, courtesy, justice, honour, were the characteristic qualities of chivalry To these were added religion, which mingled itself with every passion and institution during the middle ages, and by infusing a large proportion of enthusiastic zeal, gave them such forec, as carried them to romantie excess. Men were trained to knighthood by a long previous discipline, they were admitted into the order by solemnites no less devout than pompons, every person of noble birth courted that honour it was deemed a distinction superior to royalty, and monarchs were proud to receive it from the hands of private gentlemen

This singular institution, in which valour, gallantry, and religion were so strangely blended, was wonderfully adapted to the taste and genius of martial nobles, and its effects were soon visible in their manners. War was carried on with less ferocity, when humanity came to be deemed the ornament of knighthood no less than courage More gentle and polished manners were introduced, when courtesy was recommended as the most amiable of knightly virtues. Violence and oppres sion decreased, when it was reckoned mentorious to check and to pnnish them A scrupnlous adherence to truth, with the most religious attention to fulfil every engagement, became the distinguishing characteristic of a gentleman, because chivalry was regarded as the school of honour, and inculcated the most delicate sensibility with respect to those points. admiration of these qualities, together with the high distinctions and prerogatives conferred on knighthood in every part of Europe, inspired persons of noble birth on some occasions with a species of military fana ticism, and led them to extravagant enterprises. But they deeply imprinted on their minds the principles of generosity and honour. These were strengthened by every thing that can affect the senses or touch the heart. The wild exploits of those romantic knights who sallied forth in quest of adventures are well known, and have been treated with proper ridicule. The political and permanent effects of the spirit of chivalry have been less observed Perhaps, the humanity which ae companies all the operations of war, the refinements of gallantry, and the point of bonour, the three chief circumstances which distinguish modern from ancient manuers, may be ascribed in a great measure to this institution, which has appeared whimsical to superficial observers, but by its effects has proved of great benefit to mankind The sentiments which chivalry inspired, had a wonderful influence on manners and conduct during the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries They were so deeply rooted, that they con tinned to operate after the vigour and reputation of the institution itself began to decline.

Francis I. and Charles V

During twenty-eight years of that time, an avowed rivalship subsisted between him and the Emperor, which involved not only their own dominions, but the greater part of Europe, in wars, which were prosecuted with more violent animosity, and drawn out to a greater length, than had been known in any former period. Many circumstances contributed to this Their ani mosity was founded in opposition of interest, heightened by personal emulation, and exasperated not only by mutual injuries, but by reciprocal insults. At the same time, whatever advantage one seemed to possess to wards guining the ascendant, was wonderfully balanced by some favourable circumstance peculiar to the other The Emperor's dominions were of great extent, the French King's lay more compact, Francis governed lns kingdom with absolute power, that of Charles was limited, but he supplied the want of authority by address the troops of the former were more impetuous and enterprising, those of the latter better disciplined, and more patient of fatigue. The talents and abilities of the two Monarchs were as different as the advantages which they possessed, and contributed no less to prolong the contest between them Francis took his resolutions suddenly, prosecuted them at first with warmth, and pushed them into execution with a most adventurous courage, but being destitute of the perseverance neces sary to surmount difficulties, he often abandoned his designs, or relaxed the vigour of pursuit, from impatienee, and sometimes from levity. Charles deliberated long, and determined with coolness, but having once fixed his plan, he adhered to it with inflexible obstinacy, and neither danger nor discouragement could turn him aside from the execution of it. The success of their enterprises was as different as their characters, and was uniformly influenced by them Francis, by his impetuous activity, often disconcerted the Emperor's best laid schemes; Charles, by a more calm but steady prosecution of his designs, cheeked the rapidity of his rival's career, and buffled or repulsed his most vigorous efforts. The former, at the opening of a war or of a campaign, broke in upon his enemy with the violence of a torrent, and carried all before him, the latter, warting until he saw the force of his rival begin to abate, recovered in the end not only all that he had lost, but made new acquisitions. Few of the French Monarch's attempts towards conquest, whatever promising aspect they might wear at first, were conducted to an happy issue, many of the Emperor's enterprises, even after they appeared desperate and impracticable, terminated in the most prosperous manner. Francis was dazzled with the splendour of an undertaking, Charles was allured by the prospect of its turning to his advantage.

Robertson's historical works appeared in more than twenty collective editions or reprints, including those of 1800-2 and of 1865 and were translated into French and German. There are Lives of him by Dugald Stewart (1801) and Bishop Gleig (1812) as well as by his grand nephew Brougham in his Men of Letters and there is much interesting matter about him in 'Jupiter Carlyle's Auto-biography and Cockburn's Memorials

Minor Historians.

Abel Boyer (1667-1729), a Protestant refugee from Languedoc, wrote histories of William III and of Queen Anne, a Life of Sir William Temple, and other historical and miscellaneous works filling nearly four folio pages in the British Museum catalogue. It was he who founded the Political State of Great Britain, a monthly magazine that ran to thirty-eight volumes (1711-29), he earned the hatred of Swift by his whiggery, and secured a place in the Duncial Archibald Bower (1686-1766), born near Dundee and bred at Douay and Rome, became a Jesuit and a professor in Italy, but broke his yows and became a Protestant, and having again become a Jesuit and again left the Roman communion, was not unnaturally charged with duplicity and worse by controversialists on both sides was one of the contributors to the huge Universal History, projected by the booksellers, of which the ancient part (1736-44) filled seven volumes folio, the modern part (1759-65) sixteen folios His History of the Popes (5 vols 1748-61) is illproportioned and far from authoritative. Another contributor to the Universal History was Dr John campbell of Glenlyon (1708-75), who wrote also a Life of Prince Eugene, the Lives of the Admirals, a political survey of Great Britain, a novel, and other works Equally industrious was william Guille (1708-70), son of an Episcopalian minister at Brechia, who compiled histories of England and of Scotland, a general history of the world, and a geographical, historical, and commercial A very important collaborator on geography the Universal History was the otherwise notori ous George Psalmanazar, 'the Formosan,' born presumably in Languedoc about 1680, who, after a vagabond life in Germany and the Low Countries, came to London in 1703 and gave himself out for a native of Formosa, issued a partly com piled, partly concocted, history of the island, and translated the Church Catechism into what he pretended was the regular and sonorous Formosan

After a spell of tutoring, fan painting, &c, he finally settled do in to honest and credit-3b's linekwork till his death in 1763. Another of the company of collaborators was George Sate (1697-1776), Oriental scholar, born in Kent and bred to the law Besides lielping with the Universal History, he was author of the General Dictionary, but is best known by his unri alled translation of the Koran, with notes and introduction (1734, new ed 1882-86) Cranger (1723-76), out of whose name has been coined the term for a collectors' fad, was born at Shaftesbury, and died vicar of Shiplake, Oxfordshire. He published a Biographical History of England (1769, 5th ed 1824), and insisted much 'on the utility of a collection of engraved portruits? His advice led to extraordinary zeal in collecting portraits, and 'grangerised copies' of books of biography, history, topography, &c. were 'embellished' with engravings gathered from all quarters william Triler (1711-92) of Woodhouselee, an Edmburgh Writer to the Signet, combitted Robertson's views on Queen Mary in lus Irquiry into the Evidence against Mary It was a son of this Tytler (1747-Queen of Scots 1813), another lawyer, raised to the Bench as Lord Woodhouselee, who compiled a general history of the world, and his grandson was author of the well known History of Scotland Robert Henry (1718-90) was an Edinburgh minister who produced a history of England 'on a new plan' (6 sols 1771-93), including sections on the constitution, learning, commerce, and social aspects of the period Robert Watson (1730?-81), Principal of St Silvators College at St Andrews, prepared a history of Philip II of Spain that was long a standard work. Citiert Stunet (1742-86), son of an Edinburgh professor, became notorious as an unscrupulous reviewer, and a rote a history of the Reformation in Scotland, and a history of Scotland from the Reformation to the death of Queen Mary, well written but not trustworthy William Russell (1741-93), a Selkirk farmer's son. made a name for himself in London as author of a history of America, and of an unfinished but mentarious listery of modern Europe (1779-84)

Thomas Reld (1710-96), the principal light of the Scottish school of philosophy, was born at the manse of Struchan in Kincardineshire, studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and became minister of New Machar, Aberdeenshire. In 1752 he was appointed Professor of Moral Philosophy in Kings College, Aberdeen, a post Le quitted in 1763 for the chair of moral philosophy in Glasgos. His Inquiry into the Human Mirel, published in 1764, was an attack on the fileal theory, of Berkeley, and on the sceptical conclusions which Hume deduced from it. The airlor had the candour to submit it to Hume before publication, and Hume, with his usual complacency and good nature, acknowledged its

In 1785 Reid published his Estats on the Intellectual Powers of Man, and in 1788 those on The ideal theory which he the Active Powers combated taught that 'nothing is perceived but what is in the mind which percenes it, that we really do not perceive things that are external, but only certain images and pictures of them imprinted upon the mind, which are called impressions and ideas' This doctrine Reid had him self believed, till, finding it led to alarmingly negative consequences in Hume's hands, he was startled as Kant also was, and asked himself the question 'What evidence have I for this doctrine, that all the objects of my knowledge are ideas in my own mind?" He set about an inquiry, but could find no evidence for the principle, he says, excepting the authority of philosophers He took refuge in the verdict of what he called, rither unfortunately, common sense. For it was not to the summary conclusions of ordinary unreasoned consciousness that he appealed, but to the common reason of mankind as constituted by a series of fundamental judgments expressed in the very struc ture of human language and intuitively recognised by the mind as true. His successor at the head of the Scottish school, Dugald Stewart, said of Reid, that it was by the logical rigour of his method of investigating metaphysical subjectsimperfectly understood even by the disciples of Locke-still more than by the importance of his particular conclusions, that he stood conspicuously distinguished among those who had litherto prosecuted analytically the study of man

Hamilton shared Stewart's high opinion of Reid, and product the standard edition of his works (1846-53, completed by Manch 1863) which became known in France through Royer Collindard Cousin, and were translated into French by Jouffroy There is a monograph on Reid by Professor Campbell Fraser (1898).

Alexander Gerard (1728-95), horn at the manse of Chapel of Garroch in Aberdeenshite, who from 1750 was professor in Marischal or in King's College, Aberdeen, deserves a place little as having influenced many subsequent writers on aesthetics, taste, and criticism at home and abroad. In 1759 he published an essay to which the Philosophical Society of Edinburgh had given a prize, its main contention being that taste consists chiefly in the improvement of those principles which are commonly called the powers of imagination, including the sense of novelty, heauty, sublimity, imitation, harmony, ridicule, virtue, and giving scope to the principle of association, further followed out by Alison

Lord Kames, Henry Home (1696-1782), was the son of George Home of Kames in Berwickshire, was called to the Bar in 1723, in 1752 was rused to the Bench, assuming the title of Lord Kames and in 1763 he was made one of the Lords of Justiciary. In 1728 he published Remarkalle Decisions of the Court of Session. In his Liange on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion (1751), he combated those theories of human nature which deduce all actions from some single principle, and attempted to establish several principles of action He maintained philosophical necessity in support of morality and religion, and, like so many others, was directly or indirectly writing against Hume-yet he narrowly escaped a citation before the Edinburgh Presbyter, on account of this book. In 1762 appeared his most notable work, The Elements of Criticism, in three volumes, which, discarding all arbitrary rules of literary criticism derived from authority, sought for rules in the fundamental principles of human nature itself Dugald Stewart held this to be the first systematic attempt to investigate the metaphysical principles of the fine arts, and declared that it had, 'in spite of numerous defects both in point of taste and philosophy, infinite merits' Its style was heavy and crabbed, Dr Johnson pooh-poohed it, and it was superseded by Campbell's book. When near eighty years of age Kames published Sketches of the History of Man (2 vols 4to, 1774), containing many curious disquisitions on society In Loose Hints on Education (1781) he anticipates some doctrines which have since been popular, and he was a copious writer on law and constitutional As an amateur agriculturist and improver of land, he was moved to produce The Gentleman Farmer (1777), which he described as 'an attempt to improve agriculture by subjecting it to the test of rational principles?

Walter Goodall (1706?-66), a Banffshire man, educated at King's College, Aberdeen, became assistant librarian to the advocates at Edinburgh under Ruddiman and Hume, and published in 1754 an Examination of the Letters said to have been written by Mary Queen of Scots, which has the distinction of starting one of the most lively and inveterate of Scottish historical controversies It embodies the first systematic attempt to prove the spuriousness of the famous Casket Letters, and it was so far successful as to show that the published French versions were not originals but merely translations An imperfect scholar and a truculent controversialist, Goodall was yet a man of some ability and acuteness, although Mr Skelton was guilty of ridiculous extravagance in comparing his work with that of Scaliger and His edition of the chronicles of Fordun and Walter Bower, published in 1759, was a great improvement on that of Hearne.

Robert Lowth (1710-87), born at Winchester, was educated there and at New College, Oxford, where in 1741 he became Professor of Poetry Appointed successively Archdeacon of Winchester, rector of East Woodhay, prebendary of Durham, and rector of Sedgefield, he was in 1766 called to fill the see first of St Davids and then of Oxford, and in 1777 that of London. He published a long and widely famous treatise, De Sacra Poesi Hebraorum (1753), a Life of William of Wykeham, and a new translation of Isaiah A Fellow of the Royal Society from 1765 on, he was one of the first to treat the Bible poetry as literature.

The Earl of Chatham, William 'the elder' (1708-78), was the younger son of Robert Pitt of Boconnoc in Cornwall Educated at Eton and Trinity College, Oxford, he obtained a cornetcy in the Blues, and in 1735 entered Parliament for the family borough Old Sarum His talents for debate were soon conspicuous, and erelong, as leader of the young 'Patriot' Whigs, he joined in the opposition to Walpole. In 1756 Pitt was made Secretary of State, a position which, next year, under the nominal leadership of the Duke of Newcastle, became virtually that of Premier, and henceforward his life is part of the history of Britain His war policy was characterised by unusual vigour, sagacity, and success French armies were beaten everywhere by Britain and her allies-in India, in Africa, in Canada, on the Rhine-and British fleets drove the few French ships they did not capture or destroy from almost every sea Driven from office after the accession of George III, Pitt again became a Minister in 1766 in the Duke of Grafton's Cabinet, but in 1768 he resigned to hold office no more He spoke strongly against the arbitrary and harsh policy towards the American colonies, and warmly urged an amicable settlement of the differences But when it was proposed to make peace on any terms, ill though he was, Chatham came down to the House of Lords (2nd April 1778), and by a powerful address secured a majority against the motion hausted by speaking, on rising again to reply to a question, he fell back into the arms of his friends, and died in the following month His imposing appearance and his magnificent voice added greatly to the attractions of his oratory, his haughtiness irritated even his friends he made a memorable reply to the elder Horatio Walpole (brother of Sir Robert), who had taunted him for his youth, a reply quoted on the authority of Dr Johnson, who then reported the parhamentary debates for the Gentleman's Magazine The substance of the speech may be Chatham's, the form is obviously in large measure Johnson's But the speech is too famous a fragment in literature to be omitted, though the contrast to Chatham's own style, as illustrated in the next extract, is marked enough

Reply to the Charge of being Young

Sir—The atrocious crime of being a young man, which the honourable gentleman has, with such spirit and decency, charged upon me, I shall neither attempt to palliate nor deny, but content myself with wishing that I may be one of those whose follies may cease with their youth, and not of that number who are ignorant in spite of experience. Whether youth can be imputed to any man as a reproach, I will not, sir, assume the province of determining, but surely age may become justly contemptible, if the opportunities which it brings have

The wretch who wer having ean the consequences of a thousand error example will to blunder, and whose age has and which observes to stoppdity, is surely the object cultinonal prence or contempt and deserves not that ha gray hars should secure him from insult m to sir, is he to be abhorred who, as he has advanced in the has receded from virtue and become more wicked and less temp at on who prostitutes himself for money which he cannot enjoy and spends the remains of his If in the run of his country But youth, sir, is not my this crime. I have been accused of acting a theatrical A theatrical part may either imply some peculiari to of gettire or a distinuiation of my real sentiments, and an adoption of the opinions and language of another

In the first case sir the charge is too trifling to be co fitted and deserves only to be mentioned that it may be do pixed. I am at liberty, like every other man, to the my own language and though, perhaps, I may have some ambition to please this gentleman, I shall not by myself under any restruint, nor very solicitously coor his diction or his mien, however matured by age, or modelled by experience. But if any man shall, by charging m, with theatrical behaviour, imply that I is 'er any sentiments but my own, I shall treat him in

The desperate state of our army abroad No man more highly esteems and is in part known honours the English troops than I do, I know their virtues and their valour, I know they can achieve any thing but impossibilities, and I know that the conquest of English America is an impossibility You cannot, my lords, you cannot conquer America. What is your present situation there? We do not know the worst but we know that in three eampaigns we have done nothing and suffered much You may swell every expense, recumulate every assistance, and extend your traffic to the shambles of every German despot, your attempts will be for ever vain and impotent-doubly so, indeed, from this increenary aid on which you tely, for it irritates, to an incumble resentment, the minds of your adversaries, to overrun them with the mercenary sons of rapine and plunder, devoting them and their possessions to the rapacity of hireling cruelty. If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my nrms Never, never, never! But, mi lords, who is the man that, in addition to the disgraces and mischiefs of the war, has dured to authorise and associate to our arms the tomahank and scalping knife of the savage, to call into civilised alliance the wild and inhuman inhabitant of the woods, to delegate to the merciless Indian the defence of disputed rights, and to wage the horrors of his barbarous war against cut brethren? My lords, these enormities ery aloud for redress and punishment But, my lords, this barbarous measure has been defended, not only on the principles of policy and necessity, but also on those of morality, 'for it is perfectly allowable,' says I and Suffolk, 'to use all the means which God and nature have put into our liands. I nin astonished, I am shocked, to have such principles confessed, to hear them wowed in this house or in this country. My lords, I did not intend to enerotch so much on your attention, but I cannot refrest my indignation-I feel myself impelled to speak Mi lords, we are called upon as members of this house, as men, as Christians, to protest against such homble barbarity! That God and nature have put into our hands! What ideas of God and nature that noble lord may entertain, I know not, but I know that such detestable principles are equally abhorrent to religion and humanity. What to attribute the sacred sanction of God and nature to the massacrus of the Indian scalping knife! to the cannibal savage, fortuing, mur dering, devouring drinking the blood of his mangled victims! Such notions shock every precept of motality every feeling of humanity, every sentiment of honour These abominable principles, and this more abominable avowal of them, demand the most decisive indignation I call upon that right reverend, and this most learned bench, to sindicate the religion of their God, to support the justice of their country. I call upon the bi heps to interpose the unsulfied sanctity of their lawn upon the judges to Interpo e the purity of their emine to este us from this pollution I call upon the honour of you lord lups to reverence the dign ty of your ance in and to maintain your own I call upon the spint and humanity of my country to vindicate the national

I invoke the Genius of the Constitution. From the tapestry that adorns these walls, the immortal ancestor of this noble lord frowns with indignation at the disgrace of his country. In vain did he defend the liberty and establish the religion of Britain against the tyranny of Rome, if these worse than Popish cruelties and inquestional practices are endured among us To send forth the mercile s cannibal, thirsting for blood! against whom? your Protestant brethren! to lay waste their country, to desolate their dwellings, and extirpate their race and name by the aid and instrumentality of these horrible hell hounds of war! Spain can no longer boast pre eminence in barbanty She armed herself with blood hounds to extirpate the wretched natives of Mexico, we, more ruthless, loose these dogs of war against our countrymen in America, endeared to us by every tie that can sanctify humanity I solemnly call upon your lordships, and upon every order of men in the state, to stamp upon this infamous procedure the indelible stigma of the public abhorrence. More par ticularly I call upon the holv prelates of our religion to do away this iniquity, let them perform a lustration, to purify the country from this deep and deadly sin. My lords, I am old and weak, and at present unable to say more, but my feelings and indignation were too strong to have said less. I could not have slept this night in my bed, nor even reposed my head upon my pillow, without giving vent to my eternal abhorrence of such enormous and preposterous principles

At his last tragic appearance in the House of Lords, emaciated and swathed to the knees in flannel, Chatham on rising lamented that his bodily infirmities had so long and at so important a crisis prevented his attendance on the duties of Parliament. He declared that he had made an effort almost beyond the powers of his constitution to come down to the House on this day, perhaps the last time he should ever be able to enter its walls, to express the indignation lie felt at the idea which he understood was gone forth of yielding up the sovereighty of America.

'My lords,' continued he, 'I rejoice that the grave has not closed upon me, that I am still alive to lift np my voice against the dismemberment of this ancient and noble monarchy Pressed down as I am by the load of infirmity, I am little able to assist my country in this most perilous conjuncture, but, my lords, while I have sense and memory, I never will consent to tarnish the lustre of this nation by an ignomimous surrender of its rights and fairest possessions a people so lately the terror of the world, now fall prostrate before the house of Bourbon? It is impossible! In God's name, if it is absolutely necessary to declare either for peace or war, and if peace canuot be preserved with honour, why is not war commenced without hesitation? I am not, I confess, well informed of the resources of this kingdom, but I trust it has still sufficient to maintain its just rights, though I know them not. Any state, my lords, is better than despair Let us at least make one effort, and if we must fall, let us fall like men '

Chatham's Life by F Thacleray appeared in 1827 (2 vols) and his Correspondence in 1838-48 (4 vols.). Wore attractive and accessible are Macaulay s two brilliant essays and the monograph by W D Green (1901)

William Melmoth (1710-99), the son of William Melmoth the elder (1666-1743), a lawyer who wrote a book on A Religious Life, is chiefly known as author of an exceptionally graceful and accurate translation of Pliny's Letters Under the name of 'Sir Thomas Fitzosborne,' Melmoth also published a volume of Letters on Several Subjects, remarkable for elegance of style (1742, and often reprinted, best edition 1805) He also translated Cicero's Letters and the treatises De Oratoribus, De Amicutia, and De Senectute His style, though sometimes feeble from excess of polish and ornament, is generally correct, perspicuous, and musical

Jacob Bryant (1715-1804) engaged the attention of the learned world throughout a long life by his erudition, inventive fancy, and love of paradox. His most celebrated works are  $A \wedge w$ System or Analysis of Ancient My thology (1774-76), Observations on the Plain of Troj (1795), and a Dissertation concerning the War of Troy (1796). The object of Bryant was to show that the expedition of the Greeks as described by Homer is fabulous, and that no such city as Troy existed A host of adversaries rose up against him, and his theory never obtained any considerable support-though comparatively modern attempts were made to resolve Homeric incidents and persons into solar mythology Bryant also wrote theological treatises, papers on classical subjects, books against Tom Paine, on the Land of Goshen, and the gypsies Though this able and amiable man doubted and denied concerning Homer, he was so confident a believer in Chatterton's fabrications that he took up his pen to prove the authenticity of the Rowley poems

John Brown (1715-66), son of the curate of Rothbury, became minor canon of Carlisle and chaplain to the Bishop, and held livings near Colchester and in Newcastle. He was popular in his own day as author of Essays on the Characteristics of the Earl of Shaftesbury (1751), and of an Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times (1757), written when there was general dissatisfaction with public men and measures, which by its caustic severity and animated appeals excited much attention.

The mestimable Estimate of Brown Rose like a paper kite, and charmed the town

But Pitt was called to the helm, things looked brighter, and down came the paper Estimate

For measures planned and executed well, Shifted the wind that raised it, and it fell

Brown wrote also on The Union of Poetry and Music and The Progress of Poetry, and had early in life shown his command of verse by a poem on Honour (1743) and by an Essay on Satire, addressed to Warburton, and prefixed by Warburton to his edition of Pope. From this Essay comes the famous line, 'And coxcombs vanquish Berkeley with a grin,' as also the couplet

Dauntless pursues the path Spinoza trod, To man a coward and a brave to God, quoted imperfectly from memory by Burns ('the daring path Spinoza trod') in an autobiographical letter In almost every department of literature this versatile and indefatigable writer ventured with tolerable success His two tragedies, Barbarossa and Athelstane (1754 and 1756), were brought out by Garrick, and he himself was prused by Wordsworth as one of the first in leading the way to a worthy admiration of the scenery of the English Lakes This was in 1753, Gray, usually ranked amongst the earliest explorers of our romantic districts, did not visit the Lake country Some suggestions of Brown's on a school tıll 1769 system for Russia were submitted to the Empress Catharine, who straightway summoned him to St Petersburg, paying his expenses beforehand his health was broken, his friends and his doctor protested, and in his disgust at the collapse of his scheme Brown committed suicide. He had long been known to be verging on insanity

The Vale of Keswick.

In my way to the north from Hagley, I pussed through Dovedale, and, to say the truth, was disappointed in it. When I came to Buxton, I visited another or two of their romantic scenes, but these are inferior to Dovedale. They are all but poor miniatures of Keswick, which exceeds them more in grandeur than you can imagine, and more, if possible, in beauty than in grandeur

Instead of the narrow slip of valley which is seen at Dovedale, you have at Keswick a vast amphithertre, in circumference about twenty miles Instead of a meagre rivulet, a noble living lake, ten miles round, of an oblong form, adorned with a variety of wooded islands The rocks indeed of Dovedale are finely wild, pointed, and irregular, but the hills are both little and unani mated, and the margin of the brook is poorly edged with weeds, morass, and brushwood But at Keswick, you will, on one side of the lake, see a rich and beau tiful landscape of cultivated fields, rising to the eye in fine inequalities, with noble groves of oak happily dis persed and climbing the adjacent hills, shade above slinde, in the most various and picturesque forms. On the opposite shore, you will find rocks and cliffs of stupendous height, hanging broken over the lake in horrible grandeur, some of them a thousand feet high, the woods climbing up their steep and shaggy sides, where mortal foot never yet approached dreadful heights the eagles build their nests a variety of waterfalls are seen pouring from their summits, and tumbling in vast sheets from rock to rock in rude and terrible magnificence, while, on all sides of this immense amphitheatre, the lofty mountains rise round, piercing the clonds in shapes as spiry and fantastic as the very rocks of Dovedale To this I must add the frequent and bold projection of the cliffs into the lake, forming noble bays and promontories, in other parts, they finely retire from it, and often open in abrupt chasms or clefts, through which at hand you see rich and uncultivated vales, and beyond these, at various distance, mountain rising over mountain, among which new prospects present themselves in mist, till the eye is lost in an agreeable perplexity

'Where active fancy travels beyond sense, And pictures things unseen'

Were I to analyse the two places into their constituent principles, I should tell you that the full perfection of Keswick consists of three circumstances-beauty, horror, and immensity united—the second of which alone is Of beauty it hath little, nature found in Dovedale having left it almost a desert, neither its small extent, nor the diminutive and lifeless form of the hills, admit magnificence But to give you a complete idea of these three perfections, as they are joined in Keswick, would require the united powers of Claude, Salvator, and The first should throw his delicate sunshine over the cultivated vales, the scattered cots, the groves, the lake, and wooded islands, the second should dash out the horror of the rugged cliffs, the steeps, the hanging woods, and foaming waterfalls, while the grand pencil of Poussin should crown the whole with the majesty of the impending mountains

So much for what I would call the permanent beauties of this astonishing scene Were I not afraid of being tiresome, I could now dwell as long on its varying or accidental beauties I would sail round the lake, anchor in every bay, and land you on every promontory and I would point out the perpetual change of prospect the woods, rocks, cliffs, and mountains, by turns vanishing or rising into view now gaining on the sight, hanging over our heads in their full dimensions, beautifully dreadful and now, by a change of situation, assuming new romantic shapes, retiring and lessening on the eve, and insensibly losing themselves in an anne I would remark the construst of light and shade, produced by the morning and evening sun, the one gilding the western, the other the eastern, side of this immense amphitheatre, while the vast shidow projected by the mountains, buries the opposite part in a deep and purple gloom, which the eye can hardly penetrate. The natural variety of colouring which the several objects produce is no less wonderful and pleasing the ruling tints in the valley being those of azure, green, and gold, yet ever various, arising from an intermixture of the lake, the woods, the grass, and com fields, these are finely contristed by the gray rocks and cliffs, and the whole heightened by the yellow streams of light, the purple hues and misty azure of the mountains Sometimes a serene air and clear sky disclose the tops of the highest hills, at other times, you see the clouds involving their summits, resting on their sides, or descending to their base, and rolling among the valleys, as in a vast furnace When the winds are high, they roar among the cliffs and caverns like peals of thunder, then, too, the clouds are seen in vast bodies sweeping along the hills in gloomy greatness, while the lake joins the tunink, and tosses like a sea. But in calm weather, the whole scene becomes new, the lake is a perfect mirror, and the landscape in all its beauty, islands, fields, woods, rocks, and moun tains are seen inverted and floating on its surface. By still moonlight (at which time the distant water falls are heard in all their variety of sound), a walk among these enchanting dales opens such scenes of delicate beauty, repose, and solemnity, as exceed all (From a Letter ) description

Robert Paltock (1697-1767), of Clement's Inn, attorney, was author of the famous story Peter Wilkins His authorship was long unknown, but in 1835, at a sale by auction of books and manuscripts which had belonged to Dodsley the publisher, the original agreement for the copyright of the work was found. The tale was dedicated to the same Countess of Northumberland to whom Percy inscribed his Reliques, and Goldsmith the first printed copy of his Edwin and Angelina. Dates of different editions are 1750, 1751, 1783, 1784, 1816, 1839, 1884. To the countess Paltock had been indebted for 'a late instance of benignity,' and it was after the pattern of her virtues that he drew the mind of his heroine Youwarkee. Little more is known of Paltock except that he was married, and left two sons and two daughters, that he was buried at Ryme Intrinsica near Sherborne, Dorset, and that he was perhaps the author of another work-a dull one-Memoirs of the Life of Parnese, a Spanish Lady Translated from the Spanish MS by R P Gent (1751) The title of Paltock's masterpiece may serve for an index to its nature and incidents The Life and Adventures of Peter Wilkins, a Cornish Man 'relating particularly, his Shipwreck near the South Pole, his wonderful Passage thro' a subterraneous Cavern into a kind of new World, his there meeting with a Gawry, or flying woman, whose Life he preserv'd, and afterwards married her, his extraordinary Conveyance to the Country of Glumms and Gawrys, or Men and Women that fly Likewise a Description of this strange Country, with the Law, Customs, and Manners of its Inhabitants, and the Author's remarkable Transactions among them Taken from his own Mouth, in his Passage to England from off Cape Horn in America, in the Ship Hector With an Introduction, giving an Account of the surprising Manner of his coming on board that Vessel, and his Death on his landing at Plymouth in the year 1739 By R S, a Passenger in the Hector' The name of the hero and the germinal idea would seem to have been suggested by Bishop Wilkins's Discovery of a New World (see Vol. I p 685), in which there are speculations on the possibility of a man being able to fly by help of wings For the rest, Paltock modelled his story on Robinson Crusoe, making his hero a shipwrecked voyager cast upon a solitary shore, of which he was for a time the sole inhabitant, the same virtues of fortitude, resignation, and patient ingenuity are assigned to both Peter is more devout even than Robinson Paltock's romance might be described as the first of the long series of what the Germans call Robinsonades, to which The Swiss Family Robinson belongs The literal, minute, matter of fact style of Defoe is copied with success, but save in his description of the flying herome, Paltock is greatly inferior. At least half of the tale is utterly tedious, when Wilkins describes the flying nation, their family alliances, laws, customs, and mechanic arts, romance disappears, and we see only a poor imitation of the manner of Swift. The name of the country, Nosmnbdsgrsutt, was doubtless chosen as being entirely unpronounceable, and glumm and gawry, man and woman, have little to recommend them. Wilkins makes a grotto in a grassy plain by the side of a lake, surrounded by a woody amphitheatre, behind which rises a towering rock. Here with fruits and fish he subsists pleasantly during the sum-One evening at the approach of winter he hears strange voices, and sallying forth, finds a beautiful woman near his door, Youwarkee. With other youths and maidens of the flying nation on the other side of the great rock, she had been merrily flying about, when, falling among the branches of a tree, her graundee, or flying apparatus, became useless, and she sank to the ground stunned and senseless Leigh Hunt in The Scer asks his readers to think of 'a lovely woman, set in front of an ethereal shell, and wafted about like a Venus This is perhaps the best general idea that can be given of Peter Wilkins's bride.' Southey said he got the idea of the lovely Glendoveers in his Curse of Kehama from Paltock's romance—and accordingly not from Hindu or any other mythology

Peter Wilkins and his Flying Bride

I passed the summer-though I had never yet seen the sun's body-very much to my satisfaction, partly in the work I have been describing-for I had taken two more of the beast fish, and had a great quantity of oil from them-partly in building me a chimney in my ante chamber, of mud and earth burnt on my own hearth into a sort of brick, in making a window at one end of the above said chamber, to let in what little light would come through the trees, when I did not choose to open my door, in moulding an earthen lamp for my oil, and, finally, in providing and laying in stores, fresh and salt-for I had now cured and dried many more fish-against winter These, I say, were my summer employments at home, intermixed with many agrecable excursions. But now the winter coming on, and the days growing very short, or indeed, there being no day, properly speaking, but a kind of twilight, I kept mostly in my habitation

An indifferent person would now be apt to ask, what would this man desire more than he had? To this I answer, that I was contented while my condition was such as I have been describing, but a little while after the darkness or twilight came on, I frequently heard voices again, sometimes a few only at a time, as it seemed, and then again in great numbers.

In the height of my distress I had recourse to prayer, with no small benefit, begging that if it pleased not the Almighty Power to remove the object of my fears, at least to resolve my donbts about them, and to render them rather helpful than hurtful to me. I herenpon, as I always did on such occasions, found myself much more placid and easy, and began to hope the best, till I had almost persuaded myself that I was out of danger, and then laying myself down, I rested very sweetly till I was awakened by the impulse of the following dream

Methought I was in Cornwall, at my wife's aunt's, and inquiring after her and my children, the old gentlewoman informed me both my wife and children had been dead some time, and that my wife, before her departure, desired her—that is, her aunt—immediately upon my arrival to tell me she was only gone to the lake, where I should be sure to see her, and be happy with her ever after—I then, as I fancied, ran to the lake to find her—In my passage she stopped me, erying 'Whither so fast, Peter? I am your wife, your Patty' Methought I did not know her, she was so altered, hut observing her voice, and looking more wistfully at her, she appeared to me as the most beautiful creature I ever beheld—I then went to seize her in my arms, but the hurry of my spirits awakened me.

I then heard a sort of shrick, and a rustle near the door of my apartment, all which together seemed very terrible. But I, having before determined to see what and who it was, resolutely opened my door and leaped out. I saw nobody, all was quite silent, and nothing that I could perceive but my own fears a moving went then softly to the corner of the building, and there, looking down by the glimmer of my lamp, which stood in the window, I saw something in human shape lying at my feet I gave the word 'Who is there?' Still no one answered My heart was ready to force a way through my side I was for a while fixed to the earth like a statue At length recovering, I stepped in, fetched my lamp, and returning, saw the very beautiful face my Patty appeared under in my dream, and not considering that it was only a dream, I verily thought I had my Patty before me, but she seemed to be stone Upon viewing her other parts, for I had never yet removed my eyes from her face, I found she had a sort of brown chaplet, like lace, round her head, under and about which her hair was tucked up and twined, and she seemed to me to be clothed in a thin hair coloured silk garment, which, upon trying to ruse her, I found to be quite warm, and therefore hoped there was life in the body it contained. I then took her into my arms, and treading a step backwards with her, I put out my lamp, however, having her in my arms, I conveyed her through the doorway, in the dark, into my grotto

I thought I saw her eyes stir a little. I then set the lamp further off, for fear of offending them if she should look up, and warming the last glass I had reserved of my Madeira, I carried it to her, but she never stirred I now supposed the fall had absolutely killed her, and was prodigiously grieved, when laying my hand on her breast, I perceived the fountain of life had some motion. This give me infinite pleasure, so, not despairing, I dipped my finger in the wine, and moistened her hips with it two or three times, and I imagined they opened a little. Upon this I bethought me, and taking a tea-spoon, I gently poured a few drops of the wine by that means into her mouth. Finding she swallowed it, I poured in another spoonful, and another, till I brought her to herself so well as to be able to sit up

I then spoke to her, and asked divers questions, as if she had really been Patty, and understood me, in return of which, she uttered a language I had no idea of, though, in the most musical tone, and with the sweetest accent I ever heard. It grieved me I could not understand her. However, thinking she might like to be upon her feet, I went to lift her off the bed, when she felt to my touch in the oddest manner imaginable, for while in one respect it was as though she had been cased in whalebone, it was at the same time as soft and warm as if she had been naked

You may imagine we stared heartily at each other, and I doubted not but she wondered as much as I by what means we came so hear each other. I offered her everything in my grotto which I thought might please her, some of which she gratefully received, as appeared by her looks and behaviour. But she avoided my lamp, and always placed her back toward it. I observing that, and ascribing it to her modesty in my company, let her have her will, and took care to set it in such a position myself as seemed agreeable to her, though it deprived me of a prospect I very much admired.

After we had sat a good while, now and then, I may say, chattering to one another, she got up and took a turn or two about the room. When I saw her in that attitude, her grace and motion perfectly charmed me, and her shape was incomparable.

I treated her for some time with all the respect imaginable, and never suffered her to do the least part of my work. It was very inconvenient to both of us only to know each other's meaning by signs, but I could not be otherwise than pleased to see that she endeavoured all in her power to learn to talk like me. Indeed I was not behindlight with her in that respect, striving all I could to imitate her. What I all the while wondered at was, she never showed the least disquet at her confinement, for I kept my door shut at first, through fear of losing her, thinking she would have taken an opportunity to run away from me, for little did I then think she could fly

After my new love had been with me a fortnight, finding my water run low, I was greatly troubled at the thought of quitting her any time to go for more, and having hinted it to lier, with seeming uneasiness, she could not for a while fathom my meaning, but when she saw me much confused, she came at length, by the many signs I made, to imagine it was my concern for her which made me so, whereupon she expressively enough signified I might be easy, for she did not fear anything happening to her in my absence. On this, as well as I could declare my meaning, I entreated her not to go away before my return. As soon as she under stood what I signified to her by actions, she sat down with her arms across, leaning her head against the wall, to assure me she would not stir.

I took my boat, net, and water cask as usual, desirous of bringing her home a fresh fish-dinner, and succeeded so well as to catch enough for several good meals and to spare. What remained I salted, and found she liked that better than the fresh, after a few days' saling As my salt grew very low, though I had been as spanng of it as possible, I now resolved to try making some, and the next summer I effected it

Thus we spent the remainder of the winter together, till the days began to be light enough for me to wilk abroad a little in the middle of them, for I was now under no apprehensions of her leaving me, as she had before this time had so many opportunities of doing so, but never once attempted it I did not even then know that the covering she wore was not the work of art but the work of nature, for I really took it for silk, though it must be premised, that I had never seen it by any other light than of my lamp Indeed, the modesty of her carriage, and sweetness of her behaviour to me, had struck into me a dread of offending her

When the weather cleared up a little, by the lengthening of daylight, I took courage one afternoon to invite her to walk with me to the lake, but she sweetly excused herself from it, whilst there was such a fright ful glare of light as slic said, but, looking ont at the door, told me if I would not go out of the wood, she. would accompany me, so we agreed to take a turn only I first went myself over the stile of the door, and thinking it rather too high for her, I took her in my arms, and lifted her over But even when I had her in this manner, I knew not what to make of her clothing, it sat so true and close, but seeing her by a steadier and truer light in the grove, though a heavy gloomy one, than my lamp had afforded, I begged she would let me know of what silk or other composition her garment was made. She smiled, and asked me if mine was not the same under my jacket. 'No, lady,' says I, 'I have nothing but my skin under my clothes' 'Why, what do you mean?' replies slie, somewhat tartly, 'but, indeed, I was afraid something was the matter, by that nasty covering you wear, that you might not be seen Are you not a glumm?' (a man) 'Yes,' says I, 'fair creature.' (Here, though you may conceive she spoke part English, part her own tongue, and I the same, as we best understood each other, yet I shall give you our discourse, word for word, in plain English ) 'Then,' says she, 'I am afraid you must have been a very bad man, and have been erashee, which I should be very sorry to hear' I told her I believed we were none of us so good as we might be, but I hoped my faults had not at most exceeded other men's, but I had suffered abundance of hardships in my time, and that at last Providence having settled me in this spot, from whence I had no prospect of ever departing, it was none of the least of its mercies to bring to my knowledge and company the most exquisite piece of all his works in her, which I should acknowledge as long

'Sir,' says she, 'pray, answer me first how you came here?' 'Madam,' replied I, 'will you please to take a walk to the verge of the wood, and I will shew you the very passage?' 'Sir,' says she, 'I perfectly know the range of the rocks all round, and by the least description, without going to see them, can tell from which you descended ' 'In truth,' said I, 'most charming lady, I descended from no rock at all nor would I, for a thou sand worlds, attempt what could not he accomplished but by my destruction' 'Sir,' says she in some anger, 'it is false, and you impose upon me.' 'I declare to you,' says I, 'madam, what I tell you is strictly true, I never was near the summit of any of the surrounding rocks, or anything like it. But as you are not far from the verge of the wood, be so good as to step a little further, and I will shew you my entrance in lither' 'Well,' says she, 'now this odious duzzle of light is lessened, I do not care if I do go with you'

When we came far enough to see the hridge, 'There, madam,' says I, 'there is my entrance, where the sea pours into this lake from yonder cavern.' We arrived at the lake, and going to my wet dock, 'Now, madam,' says I, 'pray satisfy yourself whether I spake true or no' She looked at my boat, but could not yet frame a proper notion of it. Says I 'Madam, in this very boat I sailed from the main ocean through that cavern into this lake, and shall at last think myself the happiest of all men if you continue with me, love me, and credit me, and I promise you I will never deceive you, but think my life happily spent in your service? I found she was hardly content yet to believe what I told her of my bout to be true, until I stepped into it, and pushing from the shore, took my oars in my hand, and sailed along the lake by her as she walked on the sbore. At last she seemed so well reconciled to me and my boat that she desired I would take her in. I immediately did so, and we sailed a good way, and as we returned to my dock, I described to her how I procured the water we drank, and brought it to shore in that vessel

'Well,' says she, 'I have sailed, as you call it, many a mile in my lifetime, but never in such a thing as this I own it will serve very well where one has a great many things to carry from place to place, but to be labouring thus at in oar, when one intends pleasure in sailing, is, in iny mind, a most ridiculous piece of slavery'

'Why, pray, madam, how would you have me sail? for getting into the boat only will not carry us this way or that, without using some force.' 'But,' says she, 'pray, where did you get this boat, as you call it?' 'O madam,' says I, 'that is too long and fatal a story to begin upon now, this boat was made many thousand miles from hence, among a people coal black, a quite different sort from us, and when I first had it, I little thought of seeing this country, but I will make a faithful relation of all to you when we come home'

As we talked, and walked by the lake, she made a little run before me, and sprang into it Perceiving this, I cried out, whereupon she merrily called on me to follow her The light was then so dim as prevented my having more than a confused sight of her when slie jumped in, and looking carnestly after her, I could discern nothing more than a small boat on the water, which slimmed along at so great a rate that I almost lost sight of it presently, but running along the shore, for fear of losing her, I met her gravely walking to meet me, and then had entirely lost sight of the boat upon the lake 'This,' says she, accosting me with a smile, 'is my way of sailing, which, I perceive, by the fright you were in, you are altogether unaequainted with, and as you tell me you came from so many thousand miles off, it is possible you may be made differently from me, hut surely we are the part of the creation which has had most care bestowed upon it, and I suspect from all your discourse, to which I have been very attentive, it is possible you may no more be able to fly than to sail as I do ' 'No, charming creature,' says I, 'that I cannot, I will assure you' She then, stepping to the edge of the lake, for the advantage of a descent before her. sprang np into the air, and away she went, further than my eyes could follow her

I was quite astonished So, says I, then all is over, all a delusion which I have so long been in, a mere phantom I better had it been for me never to have seen ber, than thus to lose her again! I had hut very little time for reflection, for in about ten minutes after she had left me in this mixture of grief and amazement, she alighted just by me on her fect

Her return, as she plainly saw, filled me with a trans port not to be concealed, and which, as she afterwards told me, was very agreeable to her , Indeed, I was some moments in such an agitation of mind, from these unparalleled meidents, that I was like one thunder struck, but coming presently to my self, and clasping her in my nrms, with as much love and passion as I was eapable of expressing, 'Are you returned again, kind angel,' said I, to bless a wretch who can only be happy in adoring you? Can it be that you, who have so many advantages over me, should quit all the pleasures that nature has formed you for, and all your friends and relation to take an asylum in my arms? But I here male you a tender of all I mn able to bestow, my love and constancy 'Come, come,' says slic, 'no more raptures, I find you are a worther man than I thought I had reason to take you for, and I beg your pardon for my distrust while I was ignorant of your imperfections, but now, I verily believe all you have said is true, and I promise you, as you have seemed so much to delight In me, I will never quit vou till death or other as fatal accident shall part us But we will now, if you choo e, to home, for I know you have been some time nnersy in this gloom, though agreeable to me 1 or, giving niv eves the pleasure of looking eagerly on you, it concerls my blushes from your sight?

In this manner, exchanging mutual cuderrments and soft speeches, hand in hand, we arrived at the grotto

Louwarkee's discomfort at the glate of light is explained by the fact that in the regions of the flying people it was always twilight. Crashee means shi in the language of the flying regions where criminals were punished by having their wings shi and so made useless for flight.

Henry Brooke (1703?-83), born at Rantavan in County Cavan, the son of a wealthy clergin in, went (1724) from Trunts College, Dublin, to study law in London, and there became the chosen friend of Pope and Lyttelton From the heart of this brilliant literary society he was recalled to Ireland by a dving aunt, who left him guardian of her child, a girl of twelve, whom he sent to school, and two years afterwards, to the consterna tion of his friends, secretly married His child wife brought him three children before she was eighteen, but of the large family of twents two only one survived the fither Brooke's first notable work, the poem Universal Beauty (1735), 'n sort of Bridgewater Trentise in rhyme,' was said to lince been revised by Pope, and is supposed to have supplied the foundation for Erismus Darwin's Botanic Garden In 1739 he published his play, Gustavus Vasa, full of the noblest senti ments and the most inconceivable characters, the acting of which was prohibited at Drury Lane on political grounds, Sir Robert Walpole suspecting lumself to be the prototype of a very unamable character in the play Dr Johnson wrote an ironical vindication of the licensers of the stage, but on its publication in book form the play was bought in large numbers, and it was afterwards produced in Dublin as The Patriot translated part of Tasso, projected a series of old Irish tales and an Irish history, wrote an Irish historic fragment in a style closely resembling that afterwards adopted by Ossian Macpherson, and having finally returned to Ireland, was given a post as barrack master of Mullingar by Lord Chesterfield, largely in consideration of his Farmer's Letters to the Protestants of Ireland The I art of Liser, a tragedy, was produced both at Dublin and in London, from this play fand not, as Kingsley said, from Cristavius) came the line not too correctly quoted by Boswell as 'Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free,' purched by Johnson in 'Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat.' Near the close of the first art of Liser, Queen Elizabeth says

I shall henceforth seek For other lights to truth, for righteous monarchs, Justly to judge, with their own eyes of ould see, To rule o'er freemen, should themselves be free

Philanthropy and igricultural experiments compelled Brooke to sell his property, and he scaled m Kildare (1763) Here he wrote the best re membered of all his books—the only one, indeed, not utterly dead-The Fool of Quality, or the History of the Last of Mercland (5 vols 1766-70 His first political pumphlets had been strongly anti Citholic, later he wrote pleas for the fairer treatment of the Catholics and the relaxation of the penal laws. In 1774 he issued a poor notes. Juliet Green ille, or the History of the Human Several years before his death, when Heartliving at Dublin he sank into a condition of His devoted daughter increasing mental debility Charlotte (died 1703), who had seen the decay of her fathers intellect in the last part of the Forl of Quality, was herself an authoress, and published m 1789 The Reliques of Irish Peetry

The I vol of Quality so commended itself to John Wesley that anidst his multitudinous labours he found time to prepare an abridged edition of it (1780), and in 1859 Charles Kingsley, who was no Methodist, published a complete edition with an enthusiastic preface and sketch of Brookes life. Of the story he has recorded this opinion

In it we have the whole man the education of an ideal nobleman la an ideal merchant prince has giren him room for all his speculations on theology, political economy, the relations of sex and family and the train ing, moral and physical, of a Christian gentleman, and to them plot and probability are too often sacrificed. Its pathos is, perhaps, of too healthy and simple a kind to be considered very touching by a public whose taste has been palled by the 'asthetic brandy and carenne Vevertheless overmuch striving of I reneli novels The cause for pathos is the defect of the book is patent. The plot is extraorgant of its failure as well as ill woven and broken, besides, by epi odes, as extravagunt as itself. The morality is Quixotic, and practically impossible. The scrinonising, whether theological or social, is equally clumsy and olitrusive By that time also one may hope the earnest reader will have begun to guess at the cruses which have made this book forgotten for a while, and perhaps to find them not in its defects but in its excellences, in its deep and grand ethics, in its broad and genial humanity, in the divine value which it attaches to the relations of hashand and wife, father and child, and to the utter absence both of that sentimentalism and that superstition which have been alternately debauching of late years the minds of the young. And if he shall have arrived at this discovery, he will be able possibly to regard at least with patience those who are rash enough to affirm that they have learnt from this book more which is pure, sacred, and eternal, than from any which has been published since Spenser's Fairy Queen.

Few will give the book this high praise, but if it is odd, it is a remarkable book. Some of its digressions are as surprising, if not quite as amusing, as Sterne's, the heroic fist battles are described with the zest of Borrow, the venerable man who 'drops the tear of generosity' on the smallest provocation, like Mackenzie's 'Man of Feeling,' nevertheless cheers and regales the afflicted and the destitute with a brimming cup (or several cups) of good ale and a hearty meal, as Borrow might have done, and many of the scattered thoughts are sagacious and suggestive as Meredith's Again one is reminded of Borrow's highly muscular Christianity when we find that, with the author's entire approbation, the philanthropical protector, Mr Fenton, 'had already provided his favourite with a dancing-master, the most approved for skill in his profession, as also with a noted fencing-master, who further taught him the noble science of the cudgel and quarter-He was now on the search for the most distinguished champion of the Bear-garden, in order to accomplish our hero in the mysteries of bruising, of wrestling, and of tripping' There is many a Borrovian touch in the dialogues, and the good man takes a very lenient view of all the mischievous tricks played off by his protégés on a cruel and pedantic schoolmaster the story are many stories—the earlier adventures of the minor characters, classical and historical stories dramatically retold, and moral apologues or allegories At the end of many of the chapters Brooke provides a curious kind of Greek chorus Without warning, the reader finds himself listening to an animated debate between 'Author' and 'Friend,' many of the most interesting things coming in as defence by 'Author' against the criticisms of 'Friend,' who is a sort of Advocatus The humour is genuine if sometimes Diaboli a little obvious, and the satire trenchant and The style frequently combines simplicity, vigour, and point in singular degree. The prose extracts are all from the Fool of Quality

From 'Universal Beauty'

Emergent from the deep view nature's face,
And o'er the surface deepest wisdom trace,
The verdinous beanties charm our cherished eyes—
But who'll unfold the root from whence they rise?
Infinity within the sprouting bower!
Next to ænigma in Almighty power,
Who only could infinitude confine,
And dwell immense within the minim shrine,
The eternal species in an instant mould,
And endless worlds in seeming utoms hold

Plant within plant, and seed enfolding seed,
For ever—to end never—still proceed,
In forms complete, essentially retain
The future semen, alimental grain,
And these again, the tree, the trunk, the root,
The plant, the leaf, the blossom, and the fruit,
Again the fruit and flower the seed enclose,
Again the seed perpetuated grows,
And beauty to perennial ages flows.

The Fool's Outset in Life

With his lady, he again retreated to the country, where, in less than a year, she made him the exulting father of a fine boy, whom he called Richard speedily became the sole centre of all his mother's solicitudes and affections. And though within the space of the two succeeding years she was delivered of a second boy, yet, as his infant aspect was less promising and more uninformed than his brother's, she sent him forth to be nursed by the robust wife of a neighbouring farmer, where, for the space of upwards of four years, he was honoured with no token from father or mother, save some casual messages to know from time to time if the child was in health. This boy was called Henry, after his uncle by the futher's side. The earl had lately sent to London to make inquiry after his brother, but could learn no manner of tidings concerning him Mean while, the education of the two children was extremely contrasted Richard, who was already entitled my little lord, was not permitted to breathe the rudeness of the On his slightest indisposition, the whole house was in alarms, his passions had full scope in all their Infant irregularities, his genius was put into a hotbed, by the warmth of applauses given to every flight of his opening fancy, and the whole family conspired, from the highest to the lowest, to the ruin of promising talents and a benevolent heart. Young Harry, on the other hand, had every member as well as feature exposed to all weathers, would run about, mother naked, for near an hour, in a frosty morning, was neither physicked into delicacy, nor flattered into pride, scarce felt the convenience, and much less understood the vanity of clothing, and was daily occupied in playing and wrest ling with the pigs and two mongrel spaniels on the common, or in kissing, scratching, or boxing with the children of the village. When Harry hud passed his fifth year, his father, on u festival day, humbly proposed to send for him to his nurse, in order to observe how the boy might turn out, and my lady, in u fit of good humour, assented Nurse, accordingly, decked him out in his holiday petticoats, and walked with our hero to the great house, as they called it. A hrilliant concourse of the neighbouring gentry were met in a vast parlour, that appeared to be executed after the model of West-These were the principal characters. minster Hall The rest could not be said to be of uny character at all. The cloth had been lutely removed, and a host of glasses and decanters glowed on the tuble, when in comes young Harry, escorted by his nurse. All the eyes of the company were instantly drawn upon him, but he advanced, with a vacant and unobserving physiognomy, and thought no higher of the assembly than as of so many peasants at a country wake.

Dicky, my dear, says my lady, go and welcome your brother, whereat Dick went up, took Harry by the hand, and kissed him with much affection. Harry, thereupon, having eyed his brother-I don't know you, end he, bluntly, but at the same time held up his little mouth to kiss him again. Dick, says my lady, put your laced hat upon Harry, that we may see how it becomes him which he immediately did, but Harry, feeling an unusual on cumbrance on his head, took off the hat, and, ha ing for some time looked contemptionsly at it, he cast it from him with a sudden and agale jert, as he used to cast flat stones to make duels and drales in the null pond The hat took the glasses and decenters in full eareer, smash go the gla ses, abroad pour the a me on circling laces, Dresden aprons, silvered sill's, and rich brocade, female screams filled the parlour, the rout is equal to the uproar, and it was long ere most of them could be composed to their place. In the meanwhile Harry took no land of interest in their outcries or distre so but spying a large Spanish pointer, that just then came from under the table he spring at him hie lightning, seized him by the collar, and vaulted on his back well The dog, wholly disconcerted by inconcervable agility so unrecustomed a burden experted and plun oil about in a violent manner but Harry was a better horse man than to be so easily disnounted whereon the dog grew outrageous, and, rushing into a group of little misses and masters, the children of the visi anis, he over threw them like nine pins, thence proceedings ith e malrapidity between the legs of Mrs Dowdy, a very fat and clderly Indy, she instantly fell bael with a vaolent shriel, and, in her fall, unfortunately overthrew I rank the fox hunter, who overthrew Andrew the angler, who over threw Bob the bean who closed the catastrophe hero, meantime, was happily dismounted by the intercepting petticonts, and fairly laid without damage, in the fallen Indy's Inp. When matters were once more, in some measure, set to rights-My heavens' exclained my lady. I shall faint! The box is positively in idiot, he has no apprehension or conception of places or things. Come hither, sirrali, she cried, with an angra tone, but, instead of complying, Harry cast on her a look of resentment, and sidled over toward his nurse. Diely, my dear, said my lady, go and pretend to heat like faster mother, that we may try if the child has any kind Here her ladyship, by ill fortune, vas as much unadvised as her favourite was unhappy in the execution of her orders, for while Diek struck at the nurse with a counterfeited passion, Harry instantly reddened, and gave his brother such a sudden push in the face, that his nose and mouth gushed out with blood. Diel set up the roar, my lady screamed ont, and, rising and running at Harry with all imaginable fury, she eaught him up as a falcon would truss a robin, turned over his pettieoats, and chastised him with all the violence of whileh her delicacy was capable. Our hero, however, neither uttered ery nor dropped a tear, but, being set down, he turned round on the company an eye of indignation, then eried -Come away, mammy, and issued from the assembly Harry had scarce made his exit when his mother ex elaimed after him-A3, 13, take him away, nurse I take him away, the little wretch, and never let me see his free more 1

The Gentleman

Friend This, I presume must be some very respectable personner of the extraordinary for a title of yours, voice, a thin a few lines, you tyle I in three or four times to your 'most venerable of all titles, the title of a genterman'.

duterer. Sir, I would not hold three words of economic with any open who did not deserte the appealates of pentleman by many degrees before than this run dozen

Irrent Wh, then, do was write or speak not see acknowledged impropriety?

Inther I think for moself, but I speak for the percet I may think as I please, for I understand me own thoughts, but, would I be nulers ost ulen I speak to o her allo, I mis speak with the people. I me topeak in comm in terms, according to their common orgental neceptation. There is no term in our language more common than that of gentleman and, whenever i is heard, all agree in the general plea of a man some war elevated above the vulgar. But, perhaps no two lung are precisely agreed respecting the qualities they thak requisite for constituting this character. When we have the epithets of a fine pentleman, a pretti ger leman much of a gentleman, pen leman like, something of a gentleman, nothing of a gentleman,' and so forth all these different appellations must intend a peculiary annexed to the ideas of those who express them thee, a no two of them, as I said, may agree in the constinct qualities of the character they have formed in their oun mind. There have been ladies who deemed a beg vig a tasselled wristcoat, new fashioned snuff box, and sword knot, very capital ingredients in the composition of-a gentleman A certain easy impudence acquired by low people, by being easually conversant in high life, has passed a man through many companies for-a gentleman-In the country a laced but and long whip make-a gentleman. With heralds, evers esquire is indisputably -1 gentleman And the highwayman, in his manner of tal ing your purse, may, however, be allowed to have much-of the gentleman Friend As you say, my friend, our ideas of this matter are very various and adverse perhaps, they are also undetermined, and I question if any man has formed to himself a conception of this character with sufficient precision. Pray—was there any such character among the philosophers?

Author Plato, among the philosophers, was 'the most of a man of fashion ' and therefore allowed at the court of Syracuse to be-the most of a gentleman But, senously, I apprehend that this character is pretty much upon the modern In all ancient or dead languages we have no term any way adequate wherehy we may express it. In the habits, manners, and characters of old Sparta and old Rome, we find an antipathy to all the elements of modern gentility. Among those rude and unpolished people, you read of philosophers, of orator, patriots, heroes, and demigods, hat you never hear of any character so elegant as that of-a pretty When those nations, however, became gentleman refined into what their ancestors would have called corruption, when luxury introduced, and fashion gave a sanction to certain sciences, which cynics would have branded with the ill mannered appellations of debauchery, drunkenness, gambling, cheating, lying, &c., the practitioners assumed the new title of gentlemen, till such gentlemen became as plenteous as stars in the milky way, and lost distinction merely by the confluence of their lustre. Wherefore, as the said qualities were found to be of ready acquisition, and of easy descent to the popu lace from their betters, ambition judged it necessary to add further marks and criterions for severing the general herd from the nobler species-of gentlemen Accordingly, if the commonalty were observed to have a propensity to religion, their superiors affected a disdain of such vulgar prejudices, and a freedom that cast off the restraints of morality, and a courage that spurned at the fear of God, were accounted the distinguishing characteristics of-a gentleman If the populace, as in China, were industrious and ingenious, the grandees, by the length of their nails and the cramping of their limbs, gave evidence that true dignity was above labour or utility, and that to be born to no end was the prerogative of—a gentleman. If the common sort by their conduct declare a respect for the institutions of civil society and good government, their betters despise such pusillani mous conformity, and the magistrates pay becoming regard to the distinction, and allow of the superior liberties and privileges of-a gentleman. If the lower set show a sense of common honesty and common order, those who would figure in the world think it incumbent to demonstrate that complaisance to inferiors, common manners, common equity, or any thing common, is quite beneath the attention or sphere of-a gentleman. Now, as underlings are ever ambitions of imitating and usurp ing the manners of their superiors, and as this state of mortality is incident to perpetual change and revolution, it may happen, that when the populace, by encroaching on the province of gentility, have arrived to their ne plus ultra of insolence, debauchers, irreligion, &c., the gentry, in order to be again distinguished, may assume the station that their inferiors liad forsaken, and, how ever ridiculous the supposition may appear at present, humanity, equity, utility, complaisance and piety, may in time come to be the distinguishing characteristics of -a gentleman

Friend From what yon have said, it appears that the most general idea which people have formed of a gentleman is that of a person of fortune, above the vulgar, and embellished by manners that are fashionable in high life. In this case, fortune and fashion are the two constituent tagredients in the composition of modern gentlemen, for, whatever the fashion may be, whether moral or immoral, for or against reason, right or wrong, it is equally the duty of a gentleman to conform.

Author And yet I apprehend that true gentility is altogether independent of fortune or fashion, of time, customs, or opinions of any kind. The very same qualities that constituted a gentleman in the first age of the world, are permanently, invariably, and indispensably necessary to the constitution of the same character to the end of time

The Lawyer

It is greatly to be lamented that the learned in our laws are not as immortal as the suits for which they are retained It were therefore to be wished that an act of parliament might be especially passed for that purpose, a matter no way impracticable, considering the great interest those gentlemen have in the House. In truth, it seems highly expedient that an infinity of years should be assigned to each student of the belles lettres of our laws, to enable them to read over that infinity of volumes which have already been published, to say nothing of the infinity that are yet to come, which will be held equally necessary for understanding the profession, of critically distinguishing and oratorically expatiating on law against law, case against case, authority against authority, precedent against precedent, statute against statute, and argument against reason. In matters of no greater moment than life and death, juries, as at the beginning, are still permitted to enter directly on the hearing and decision, but in matters so sacred as that of property, our courts are extremely cautious of too early an error in judgment. In order, therefore, to sift and boalt them to the very bran, they are delivered over to the lawyers, who are equally the affirmers and disputers, the pleaders and impleaders, representers and misrepresenters, explainers and confounders of our laws, our lawyers, therefore, maintain their right of being paid for their ingenuity in putting and holding all properties in debate. Debated properties consequently become the properties of the lawyers, as long as answers can be given to bills, or replies to answers, or rejoinders to replies, or rebutters to rejoinders, as long as the battledores can strike and bandy, and till the shuttlecock falls of itself to the ground. Soberly and seriously speaking, English property, when once debated, is merely a carcase of contention, upon which interposing lawyers fall as customary prize and prey during the combat of the claimants. While any flesh remains on a bone, it continues a bone of contention but so soon as the learned practitioners have picked it quite clean, the battle is over, and all again is peace and settled neighbonrhood

It is worthy of much pleasantry and shaking of sides to observe that, in intricate, knotty, and extremely per plexing cases, where the sages of the gown and coif are so puzzled as not to know what to make of the matter, they then bequeath it to the arbitration and award of two or three plain men, or, by record, to the judgment of twelve simple honest fellows, who, casting aside all regard to the form of writs and declarations, to the lapse of monosyllables, verbal mistakes and misnomers, enter at once upon the pith and marrow of the business, and in three hours determine, according to equity and truth. what had been suspending in the dubious scales of ratiocination, quotation, altercation, and pecuniary consideration, for three and twenty years Neither do I see any period to the progress of this evil, the avenue still opens, and leads on to Inrther mischiefs, for the distinctions in law are, like the Newtonian particles of matter, divisible ad infinitum. They have been dividing and subdividing for some centuries past, and the subdivisions are as likely to be subdividing for ever, insomuch that law, thus divisible, debateable, and delayable, is become a greater greevance than all that it was intended to redress. I lately asked a pleasant pentleman of the eoif if he thought it possible for a poor man to obtain a decree, in matter of property, against a rich man. He smiled, and answered according to scripture, that 'with man it was impossible, but that all things were possible to God'. I suppose he meant that the decrees of the courts of Westminster were hereafter to be reversed.

Edward Moore (1712-57), author of Lables for the Temale Sex, was a native of Abingdon in Berkshire, son of a Dissenting minister He was for some years a linen draper, but living fuled in business, adopted literature as a profession He wrote several plays, of which The Foundling (1748) and Gil Blas (1751) were not successes whereas The Gamester (1753) was translated into I rench, Dutch, and German, and is still some-The prologue and some of the times performed best parts of it were by Garrick, who placed in it Moore, under the name of Adam Fitz idam, edited a series of essays called The 11 orld (1753-56), for which he lumself wrote only some sixty out of two hundred and ten numbers, the rest being by patrons and was such as Lyttelton, Chesterfield, Sorme Jenyns, and Horace Walpole poem, The Irial of Selim the Persian, is largely flattery of Lyttelton The Lables of Moore rank next to those of Gay, but are inferior to them both in choice of subject and in poetical merit, they are rather didactic. The three last are by Henry Brooke. Goldsmith thought that justice had not been done to Moore as a poet 'It was upon his Fables he founded his reputation, but they are by no means his best production? Ilis (prosc) tragedy of the Gamester, even apart from Garrick's additions, is a much better bit of work, and some of his verses-such as the following-are finished with greater care.

The Happy Marriage.

How blest has my time been, what joys have I known, Since wedlock's soft bondage made Jesse my own! So joyful my heart is, so easy my chain, That freedom is tasteless, and roving a pain

Through walks grown with woodbines, as often we stray, Around us our boys and girls frolie and play. How pleasing their sport is 1. The wanton ones see, And borrow their looks from my Jesse and me

To try her sweet temper sometimes am I seen, In revels all day with the nymphs on the green Though painful my absence, my doubts slie beguiles, And meets me at night with complaisance and smiles

What though on her cheek the rose loses its hue, Her wit and good humour bloom all the year through, Time still as he flies brings increase to her truth, And gives to her mind what he steals from her youth Ye shepherds so gay, y ho make love to enmare And cheat with false your the too credulous fair, In search of true pleasure, how yamly you roam! Fo hold it for life, you must find it at home.

As a jett d'esprit, the following is sprightly enough, and not without some basis in truth

It is a currous fact that Moore died while the last number of the collected edition of his periodical the Horld, which described the fatal but imaginary illness of the author, was passing through the press.

Isane Bickerstaffe, play writer, was born in Ireland about 1735, and at cleven became page to I ord Chesterheld, the I ord-Lieutenant. He was afterwards an officer of inarines, but was dismised the service, and in 1772 had to flee the country on a capital charge. Nothing is certainly known regarding his after life, but he is supposed to have died on the Continent in or soon after 1812. Of his numerous pieces, produced between 1766 and 1771, the best known is The Ma d of the Mill He constantly works into his plays all manner of proverbial savings, familiar scraps from the poets, and tags of every kind. In Tie Sultan we have

'We all love a pretty girl-under the rose' is a song in Love in a lillage -There is no known connection between this play wright, odd though the seems, and the nom de-guerre of Isaac Bicker staffe' used by Swift in his attacks on Partiage the bookseller and quack concoctor of prophecy Swift took the name, he said, nlmnnncs (1707–9) from a locksmith's sign in Longacre, and with Swift's assent Steele adopted the pseudonym for the eponymous hero of his Tatler, started in 1709 while the paniphlet war was still being waged. It is of course quite natural to suppose that in any Dublin family of the name of Bickerstaffe the Taller's Christian name might have been given to a boy born a few years after Steele's death

Laurence Sterne,

a clergyman of most unclerical disposition, followed in his profession the most notable recent members of his family, though not his father, who was a captain in the army. The Sternes were a family of good antiquity, who bore as crest the bird celebrated by their son, the starling, and Sterne's great grandfather Richard, a strong Cavalier, was first Master of Jesus College, Cambridge, then

Bishop of Carlisle, and Archbishop of York from 1664 till his death in 1683 His sons obtained establishments as squires and ecclesiastics the district, and the third son married an heiress, Mary Jaques of Elvington near York. This pair had a large family, of which Roger was the second He married Agnes, the daughter or step-daughter of a sutler named Nuttle (NB -'He was in debt to him,' says the graceless offspring of this union), and Laurence, their eldest son, was born at Clonmel in Ireland on the 24th of November 1713. The Peace of Utrecht (1713) for a time deprived

Captain Sterne of his occupation, but he was soon put on the establishment again, and the family 'followed the drum' in divers parts of England and Ireland for years, many children being born but few surviving, till at last (1731) Captain Roger died in Jamaica of the effects of fever following upon a duel-wound Sterne had been sent to school at at Gibraltar Halifax in Yorkshire, and though his father's means were always small, and perished with him, his cousin, Sterne of Elvington, and his uncle, Jaques Sterne, who became a powerful pluralist in the archdiocese of York, behaved to the boy with a kindness which was either more amiably given or more amiably taken than in the similar case of Swift. He was admitted to Jesus College (where his relationship to the Archbishop procured him a scholarship) in July 1733, and took his degrees—B A. (1736) and M A (1740)—at the usual time, though he does not seem to have resided, as was still not uncommon, for the whole seven years. He was ordained deacon in the same year in which he took his degree, and priest in 1738, being immediately appointed by his uncle to the benefice of Sutton-in the-Forest, a few miles from York. Hardly the slightest fact or anecdote exists in reference to his Cambridge sojourn, except that he there made the acquaintance (an agreeable if not wholly profitable one) of the future 'Eugenius' -John Hall, who had not yet taken the additional name of Stevenson -a member of the same college and a distant connection of the Sternes Before he obtained his living he had begun to court, and on Easter Monday 1741 he married, Elizabeth Lumley, who had very good blood, a small fortune, and family ınfluence sufficient to procure her husband the additional living of Stillington His uncle, whose favour he retained till much later, was able also to give him divers prebendal and other appointments in or connected with the chapter of York. these endowments was of much value, but, taken together, their income must have been comfortable. It might have been supposed that a man of such intense literary idiosyncrasy as Sterne would have soon turned to writing in the vacant hours of which he must have had so many For the 'duty' which he says (and doubtless truly) he did was, in the first half of the eighteenth century, of the least exhausting or absorbing kind. But no one of the very few and by no means certain fragments that we have of his is early (putting a sermon or two out of the question), and his own brief account, which there is no reason to question, is that 'he spent near twenty years' doing the said duty, with 'books, painting, fiddling, and shooting' for his amusements It is pretty certain that we may add 'flirting,' but even of this we have no certain record till close upon the year 1760, when he 'broke out ten thousand strong' with Tristram Hardly the slightest information is available as to the reasons which made a man of nearly fifty thus suddenly become an author, lle tells us that he and one of the first rink wanted money to repair some losses by unfuely farming experiments, we know that for some time he had had access, in the library of Hall Stevenson at Skelton ('Crizv') Custle, to a large collection of out of the way books, especially French of the sixteenth century, and we know further that the success of Richardson, Liekhnig, and Smollett had for some little time past estab lished the novel in something like the old place of the drama, as in appeal to public fixour it once fishionable and protitable.

The first two volumes of the book were published simultaneously in York and London on New Years Day 1760, their extraordinary outsimility (partly genuine, partly artificial) took the town at once, and Sterne, who had gone up to see after the publication, was 'housed' by society in a mainer which a was probably as welcome to him as either fime > or profit. The pompous and orthodox Warburton grie him (with some not superfluous criticons) a present of money, Lord I deenbridge have him yet another Yorkshire hang-Coswold, everybody asked him to dinner. He was encouraged to print some sermons of a tolerably serious I ind, and when summer came he returned to Yorkshire determined to repeat his success at the opening of the next year. With rather unusual luck he did so sold the third and fourth volumes for nearly £400 to Dodsley, and had another season of glory in I on don as a bachelor. In the third winter, 1701-62, he published the third pair rather earlier (in December), and, obtaining leave of absence from his dutics, took his wife and daughter Lydia to France. Here they spent the rest of the winter and the spring in Paris, and nearly two vears in the south at Toulouse and elsewhere. Mrs. and Miss Sterne, indeed, remained in France for several years, but Sterne came back in the middle of 1764, and got a fourth pair of volumes ready for January 1765, when he repeated his old enjoyment of success in London, besides drawing sub scriptions for a fresh batch of sermons, more in In October of this year he went abroad again, extending his journey to Rome and even Naples, and meeting his family in France, but still not bringing them home with him. In the latter part of 1766 and the early part of 1767 he once more followed his old order of writing, publishing, and going up to London to enjoy the success of an instalment of Iristiam-in this case one volume only, the ninth and last. And he then carried on his once admired, now slightly ridiculous, philandering with 'Eliza,' the 'Bramine'-in other words, Mrs Draper, the 'grass widow' of an Indian functionary By this time Sterne's health-which in early manhood had been, he says, very good, but | about the time of his first successed had broken so is to give more than pretext for his journers to the South-was very scriously impaired. His wife and daughter spent the vinter with him at Youl, and he then made alone, his usua publiching and merry maling expedition to London with the Sentemental fournes in Tristran's place. It was published on 28th Lebruary 1768, and Steme alm distribution or teth Mich als Bond Street Jodgnigs, without any relation, freed, or person of his own degree to look after him. His dead body is said to have been roubed, hich is not it all improbable, and his grave in the burnel (round of 5 George's at Padd raton, to little been violated by body snatchers, theh is not at all impossible. But unluckily these phil inderings though they are free from the callons brutality which simirches the love making of the Restora tion, are made almost more distasteful to moderns by the sickly sentimentality and the sniggering prurience which pervade both his published and his private writings.

These writings themselves, however are very remarkable things, and may even be called great, though they are by no means faultless. Among their faults, that ugh one which has just been glanced at needs no further mention and admits of no defence, but some others of their characteristics present an interesting though difficult mixture of the attractive and the irritating Inform the two main works (the Sermons and the few minor pieces need little notice, and the interest of the Letters, though great, is wholly biographical) are, as has been said, novels, but novels of a very peculiar kind. The consecutive narrative interest of Tristram Shamily is almost nil. The book purports to give an account of the hero's life and opinions, but as a matter of fact he rarely appears at all in propria persona, though his birth and the events directly preceding and succeeding it are dealt with at great length three principal actors of this comedy are Walter Shandy, Tristram's father, a whimsical humourist and eccentric philosopher of the type which, rightly or wrongly, was already accepted all over Europe as specially English, his wife, a lady as matter-of-fact as her husband is eccentric, and his brother Toby, a veteran of Marlborough's wars, a gentleman to his finger-ends, amiable almost to the angelic, and guileless to a point which is sometimes rather dangerously near the imbecile. Round these gather or disperse, in groupings now vivid, now shadowy, the servants of the Shandy household Dr Slop, a Papist practitioner, Corporal Trim, one of the greatest of the whole company, Uncle Toby's body-servant, admirer, and shrewder analogue, and Mrs Wadman, a will widow with designs on Toby But though certain portions, or at least episodes of the action which the whole company of performers may be easily supposed to work out, do actually make their appearance, they are very rarely of much substantive importance, and generally mere becasions for endless digression and rigmarolehumorous, sentimental, pathetic, purely nonsensical, as the thing may strike the writer's fancy and as he conceives it likely to satisfy or merely to ruse the reader's appetite.

The Sentimental Journey, on the other hand, though the general characteristics of its method are much the same, consists of rather more uniform beads strung much more closely on a thread which, though shorter, is far more continuous and of stouter texture. Much of it certainly is an embellished and fancifully coloured narrative of Sterne's actual experiences in his two foreign tourneys, it can hardly be said that any of the actual incidents is impossible or even highly improbable in itself, and the central figure, subject and object at once, is not merely a pretty obvious portrait of Sterne partly as he was, partly as he would have liked to be, but also one of the most authentic and carefully worked out personages of the world of fiction The solidity, light as it seems, of the frame of the book is best proved by the scores and hundreds of subsequent books which have been modelled upon it, with a success varying only with the extent of the writer's talent

In both books, however, and especially in Tristram, the very last thing that the author has wished, or has been contented to do, is to follow any single and simple scheme. A constant flicker of variety, not a steady glow of illustration, is what he aims at, and no means are too odd too apparently childish, too merely mechanical for him In the original editions of Tristram Shandi one page, instead of being printed, is marbled like the end-papers of a bound book, and another is simply blacked all over. Blanks of various dimensions abound, asterisks and points are constant dashes come at almost every line. Immediately above this mere machinery come the contortions and oddities of the style itself, a very admirable and, when the author chooses, a very pure style at its best, but constantly fretted by breaks and aposiopeses—now conversational, now grandiloquent, now positively vulgar, lapsing now into regular dialogue with the supposed reader, now into soliloquy, in short, into anything that may sufficiently twist and vary the thread of humdrum narration or exposition.

As a yet further means of securing variety and attraction, Sterne resorted to a practice which for some time escaped notice to a large extent, but which, when it was fully exposed many years after his death by the investigations of a Manchester physician, Dr Ferrier, became for a time, and has not altogether ceased to be, the occasion of rather unintelligent censure. Lither because, in the long interval between his youth and the publication of his first book, he had so packed his mind with reading that relief was natural, or from the scarcely less natural diffidence which a late writing author might feel in his power to interest 'out of his own head, ' or (most probable of all) from a certain impishiness which took delight in passing oft other people's property as his own, Sterne, while by no means stingy of actual quotation and reference, sometimes real, sometimes imaginary, was exceedingly free in borrowing from other writers without any acknowledgment. His chief creditor was Rabelais-a case in which there could be no disguise. But he was also largely indebted to Burton's Anatomy, a treasure which, after being well appreciated for nearly the whole of the seven teenth century, had become one of those neglected by the eighteenth. And he also conveyed from a host of obscurer writers of different times-authors of French fatrasic, like the Moyen de Parvenir, Latin canonists and schoolmen, miscellanists of all kinds from whom something odd could be obtained. Although there may have been unnecessary mystification in his manner of executing these conveyances, it is in his case, as in some if not most others, only those ignorant enough not to suspect or recognise the borrowing who will be ill judging enough to use harsh language about it As has been often and most justly said, a writer of Sterne's genius simply cannot steal—because he cannot help making the stolen things his own in the process He does not kidnap, he adopts, and, in adopting, endows what is adopted with his own position and wealth

Certain limitations, however, are of necessity imposed on a mosaic of this kind first of all a certain artificiality, and secondly, the exclusion of at least some sources of the touches of nature by which the author succeeds in enlivening the artificial. Sterne could hardly be—he certainly never is-sublime, he is never passion ite he is never profound. Pathos and humour are the two great springs upon which he works real, but the first is to modern tistes perhaps of a more dubious kind than the last can be purely pathetic-of that there is no doubt, but his pathos constantly passes into the singular variety of emotion called 'sentiment' or-generally in the country which invented it, and sometimes in England while it was popular-'sensibility' may best be described as a cultivated pathos, extremely self-conscious, and working itself up and out according to an elaborate and rather conventional set of rules. It has much to do with the artificial gallantry and bravado of the 'beroic' plays and romances of the previous century, from which, indeed, it was an almost direct offshoot. It had been practised in France for nearly a hundred years before Sterne's time, but he himself was by fir its greatest artist, and his popularity in I rance itself was almost as great as in Ingland, while his direct influence there was almost greater France there was also growing up, with Rousseau as its prophet, a new kind of sentiment crossed and heightened with the new nature worship. Of this last, though contemporaries in England like Griv display it, we find scarcely a trace in Sterne whose donkeys and sturlings are brought into direct relation with human sentiment, while the scenes which serve as backgrounds for all the figures are backgrounds and decorations merely therefore his sentiment always, and even his pathos. where he transcends sentiment sometimes, smells too much of the limp. To no one perhaps does a celebrated caution of Professor Bain's better apply -that both with the embrace and the lachrymal flow the occasion should be adequate and the actuality rare? It is a question whether even the world famous deathbed of Le Fèvre does not now require something of distinct effort and preparation in order fully to enjoy it. The great companion scene of the dead donkey is given up even by some who hold to Le Fevre, and Maria of Moulins (the 'young 'ooman as kept a goat') can at best hold a place between Only the starling passage perhaps can completely pass muster, and Sterne has by no means improved it by crossing the t's and dotting the t's sentimentally in the subsequent application to the human captive

His humour is safer for those who can appreciate humour—not perhaps a very large class. Some foreign crities, not to the manner born, have even gone so far as to see in Sterne the humourist par excellence, the typical example or exponent of this specially. English product. This is of course a mistake, though not an inexcusable one. We have at least half a dozen humourists, from Chaucer to Carlyle, who are greater examples of the quality But Sterne is undoubtedly the chief of no small province in the great kingdom of Humour. What has been said above of his general will apply capitally here to his particular meris and draw backs. His humour is usually a little, and often extremely, artificial, and he is distinguished from most of the greater humourists (not perhaps from Carlyle, who owed him more than is always recognised) by being unable to let his humorous stroles produce their effect without meddling. He seems to watch himself in the performance of the trick, to introduce fresh twists and touches in the very doing of it. In other words, he is intensely, nervously, feverishly self-conscious, he cannot were his mask or his mother steadily, but is always shifting the one to peep from behind it, and fiddling with the other to nick it set more becomingly and show its colours better

Hence it is possible for Sterne to be, to some moods, a rither teasing writer, but in these moods it is best simply to by him do in. Other things being equal, and the reider well disposed, there is no fear of his fuling to give satisfaction by the restless glancing play of his intellect, while the contristed introduction of feeling supplies again furth a cert in allowance) i nor disagrecable sct-of and escapcinent Nor, for those who want some what more of the psychological interest in hera ture are the shadowings forth of Toby and Tim and the rest in Tristi im, of Sterne himself in the Journey, negligible things. The gentleman in the black silk smills' is for thoughts that are not He is, however, no an ear soon extrausted writer to understand by specimens, nor is he in all respects easy to select from. In one sease no doubt be is 'made up of extracts'. But these extracts are by no means always so separable as they look they constantly require the knowledge of a not always continuous context, and, in the more humorous passages especially, there is always the danger of slipping into one of Stemes puddles of dirty water, which do not allow themselves to be filled up or blocked out without risk to the corprehension of the whole. More especially is the the case in Pristram Standy, where the inciders attending the author hero's birth, and the eccen tricities and misfortunes of Dr Slop, and my unde Toby's wound, and the siege of Namur where it was inflicted, and the fancy sieces in little with which lie and Corporal Trun beguiled their half pay, and the far more formed the stege laid by Widow Wadman to my uncle Toby himself and the first sketch of the Sentimental Journey supposed to be made by Tristram and occupying an entire volume-not to mention such pure extra vagances as the curse of Ernulphus, and the humours of Yorick and Eugenius and the chapter, and the story of Diego, and a dozen other things -have a genuine metaphysical connection for all their apparent desultoriness and deviation. Sentimental Journey, much shorter, is also still and the successive more closely connected tableaux have a real periodic bond like that of an elaborate sentence. Thus it is rather Sterne's manner as a writer, than the complete nature of his writing, that can be judged from specimens. Those, however, which follow have been carefully selected with a view to obtain as much diversity as possible, and they will therefore all the better illustrate the singular unity of character which underlies this apparent diversity. The only characteristics of importance which remain unillustrated are those which it is in the circumstances impossible to illustrate.

Trim and Toby Planning the Fortifications

When a man gives himself up to the government of a ruling passion, in other words, when his Hobbi Horse grows head strong,——farewell cool reason and fair discretion.

My uncle Toby's wound was near well, and as soon as the surgeon recovered his surprise, and could get leave to say as much-he told him 'twas just beginning to incarnate, and that if no fresh exfoliation happened, which there was no sign of,-it would be dried up in five or six weeks. The sound of as many Olympiads, twelve hours before, vould have conveyed an idea of shorter duration to my nucle Toby's mind The succession of his ideas was now rapid, he broiled with impatience to put his design in execution, ---- and so, without con sulting further with any soul living,-which, by the bye, I think is right when you are predetermined to take no one soul's advice, -he privately ordered Trini, his man, to pack up a bundle of lint and dressings, and lire a chariot and four, to be at the door exactly by twelve o clock that day, when he knew my father would be So, leaving a bank note upon the apon 'Change table, for the surgeon's care of him, and a letter of thanks for his brothers,-he packed up his maps, his bools of fortification, his instruments, &c., and, by the help of a crutch on one side, and Trim on the other, my nucle Toby embarked for Shandy Hall.

The reason, or rather the rise, of this sudden emigration was as follows -

The table in my nucle Tolms room, and at which, the night before this change happened, he was sitting, with his maps, &c, about him,—being somewhat of the smallest, for that infinity of great and small instruments of knowledge which usually lay crowded upon it,—he had the accident, in reaching over for his tobacco box, to throw do vin his compasses, and, in stooping to take the compasses up with his sleeve he threw down his case of instruments and snuffers,—and as the dice tool a run against him, in his endeavouring to catch the snuffers in falling,—he thrust Monsieur Blondel off the table, and Count de Pagin o top of him

It was to no purpose for a man, lame as my uncle Toby was, to think of redressing these evils by himself he rung his bell for his man Trim! Irim, quoth my uncle Toby, pri thee see what confusion I have here been making—I must have some better contrivance,—Trim.—Can'st not thou take my rule, and measure the length and breadth of this table, and then go and bespeak me one as big again? Yes, an' please your Honour, replied Trim, making a bow,—but I hope your Honour will be soon well enough to get down to your country seat, where,—as your Honour takes so much pleasure in fortification,—we could manage this matter to a T

I must here inform you that this servant of my uncle

Toly s, who went by the name of Trim, had been a corporal in my uncle's own company ——his real name was James Butler,—but having got the nick name of Trim in the regiment, my uncle Toby, unless when he happened to be very angry with him, would never call him by any other name.

The poor fellow had been disabled for the service by a wound on his left knee by a musket bullet, at the battle of Landen, which was two years before the affair of \ample amurand as the fellow was well beloved in the regiment, and a handy fellow into the bargain, my nucle Toby took him for his servant, and of an excellent use was he, attending my uncle Toby in the camp and in his quarters, as a valet, groom, burber, cook, sempsier, and nurse, and, indeed, from first to last, waited upon him and served him with great fidelity and affection

My uncle Toby loved the man in return, and what attached him more to him still was the similitude of their knowledge. For Corporal Trim (for so, for the future, I shall call him), by four years' occasional attention to his masters discourse upon fortified towns, and the advantages of prying and peeping continually into his Master's plans, &c, exclusive and besides what he gained HOBPL HORSICALLY as a body servant (non Holby horsical fer se), had become no mean proficient in the science and was thought, by the cook and chamber maid, to know as much of the nature of strongholds as my nucle Toby himself

I have but one more stroke to give to finish Corporal Tram's character,—and it is the only dark line in it The fellow loved to advise,-or rather to hear himself talk, his carriage, however, was so perfectly respectful twas easy to keep him silent when you had him so,, but set his tongue a going,-you had no hold of him, he was voluble, -the eternal interlardings of your Honour, with the respectfulness of Corporal Trim's manner, in terceding so strongly in behalf of his elecution-that, though you might have been incommoded,-you could not well be angry. My uncle Toby was seldom either the one or the other with him, -or, at least, this fault in Trim broke no squares with 'cm My uncle Toby, as I said, loved the man, ---- and, besides, as he ever looked upon a faithful servant as an humble friend-he could not bear to stop his mouth ---- Such was Corporal

If I durst presume, continued Trim, to give your Honour my advice, and speak my opinion in this Thou art welcome, Trim, quoth my uncle Toby, ---- speak, -- speak what thou thinkest upon the subject, man, without fear Why, then, replied Trim, not hanging his ears, and scratching his head, like a country lout, but stroking his hair back from his forehead. and standing erect as before his division quoth Trim, advancing his left, which was his lame leg, a little forwards,-and pointing with his right hand open towards a map of Dunkirk, which was pinned against the hangings,-I think, quoth Corporal Trim, with humble submission to your Honour's better judgment, that these ravelins, bastions, curtains, and horn works, make but a poor, contemptible, fiddle faddle piece of work of it here upon paper, compared to what your Honour and I could make of it were we in the country by ourselves, and had but a rood, or a rood and a half of ground to do what we pleased with As summer is coming on, con tinued Trim, your Honour might sit out of doors, and

[Call it ichnography, quoth give me the nography of the town or citadel your Honour was my uncle] pleased to sit down before, -ind I will be shot by your Honour upon the glacis of it, if I do not fortify it to I dare say thou would'st, Trim, your Honour's mind For if your Honour, continued the quoth my uncle Corporal, could but mark me the polygon, with its exact That I could do very well, quoth my lines and angles I would begin with the fosse, and if your Honour could tell me the proper depth and breadth I can to a hair's breadth, Trim, replied my uncle would throw out the earth upon this hand towards the town for the scarp, -and on that hand towards the campaign for the counter scarp Very right, Trim, And when I had sloped them quoth my uncle Toby to your mind, -an' please your Honour, I would face the glacis, as the finest fortifications are done in Flanders, with sods,—and as your Honour knows they should be, -and I would make the walls and parapets with sods The best engineers call them gazons, Trim, said my uncle Toby Whether they are gazons or sods, is not much matter, replied Trim, your Honour knows they are ten times beyond a facing either of brick or I know they are, Trim, in some respects,quoth my uncle Toby, nodding his head, --- for a cannon ball enters into the gazon right onwards, without bringing any rubbish down with it, which might fill the fosse (as was the case at St Nicholas's Gate) and facilitate the passage over it

Tour Honour understands these matters, replied Corporal Trim, better than any officer in his Majesty's service—but would your Honour please to let the be speaking of the table alone, and let us but go into the country, I would work, under your Honour's directions, like a horse, and make fortifications for you something like a tansy, with all their batteries, saps, ditches, and pulsadoes, that it should be worth all the world's riding twenty miles to go and see it

My uncle Toby blushed as red as scarlet, as Trim went on, --- but it was not a blush of guilt, of modesty, or of anger, ---- it was a blush of joy, ---- he was fired with Corporal Trim's project and descrip Trim! said my uncle Toby, thon hast said We might begin the campaign, continued I'mm, on the very day that his Majesty and the Allies take the field, and demolish 'em, town for town, Trim, quoth my uncle Toby, say no Your Honour, continued Trim, might sit in your arm chair (pointing to it) this fine weather, giving me your orders, and I would Say no more, Trim, quoth my uncle Foby Besides, your Honour would get not only pleasure and good pastime, but good nir, and good exercise, and good health, and your Honour's wound would be well in a month Thou hast said enough, Trim, quoth my uncle Toby (putting his hand into his breeches pocket)-I like thy project mightily

And, if your Hononr pleases, I'll this moment go and buy a pioneer's spade to take down with us, and I'll bespeak a shovel and a pick axe, and a couple of Say no more, Trim, quoth my uncle Toby, leap mg up upon one leg, quite overcome with rapture,—and thrusting a guinea into Trim's hand Trim, said my uncle Toby, say no more;—but go down, Trim, this moment, my lad, and bring up my supper this instant

Trim ran down and brought up his master's supper,—to no purpose,——frim's plan of operation ran so much in my uncle Toby's head, he could not taste it Trim, quoth my uncle Toby, get me to bed ——'twas all one Corporal Trim's description had so fired his imagination—my uncle Toby could not shut his eyes.

The more he considered it, the more bewitching the scene appeared to him,—so that, two full hours before daylight, he had come to a final determination, and had concerted the whole plan of his and Corporal Trim's decampment

My uncle Toby had a neat little country house of his own, in the village where my father's estate lay at Shandy, which had been left him by an old uncle, with a small estate of about one hundred pounds a year Behind this house, and contiguous to it, was a kitchen garden of about half an acre, --- and at the bottom of the garden, and cut off from it by a tall yen hedge, was a bowling green containing just about as much ground as Corporal Trim wished for ---- so that as Tim uttered the words, 'A rood and a half of ground to do what they would with '-this identical bowling-green instantly presented itself, and became curiously painted, all at once, upon the retina of my uncle Toby's fancy,which was the physical cruse of making him change colour, or, at least, of heightening his blush to that immoderate degree I spoke of

Never did lover post down to a beloved mistress with more heat and expectation than my uncle Toby did to enjoy this self same thing in private I say private for it was sheltered from the house, as I told you, by a thill yew hedge, and was covered on the other three sides from mortal sight, by rough holly, and thick set flowering shrubs—so that the idea of not being seen did not a little contribute to the idea of pleasure preconceived in my uncle Toby's mind—Vain thought' however thick it was planted about,—or private soever it might seem,—to think, dear uncle Toby, of enjoying a thing which took up a whole rood and a half of ground,—and not have it known.

How my uncle Toby and Corporal Trim managed this matter,—with the history of their campaigns, which were no way burren of events,—may make no uninterest ing under plot in the epitasis and working up of this druma. At present the scene must drop,—and change for the parlour fire-side (From Tristram Shandy, il 5).

Mr Shandy on his Son's Death.

And a chapter it shall have, and a devil of a one too,—so look to yourselves.

'Tis either Plato, or Pluturch, or Seneca, or Lenophon, or Epictetus, or Theophrastus, or Lucian,—or some one, perhaps, of later date, either Cardan or Budæas, or Petrurch, or Stella,—or, possibly, it may be some divine or father of the church, St Austin, or St Cyprian, or Barnard—who affirms that it is an irresistible and natural pussion to weep for the loss of our friends or children,—and Seneca (I'm positive) tells us somewhere that such griefs evacuate themselves best by that particular channel and, accordingly, we find that David wept for his con Absalom, Adrian for his Antinous, Niobe for her children, and that Apollodorus and Crito both shed tears for Socrates before his death

My father managed his affliction otherwise, and indeed differently from most men, either ancient or modern, for he neither wept it away, as the Hebrens and the Romans,—nor slept it off, as the Laplanders,—nor hard it a ticles is not desired it on he Germana — for did for the relation it, it recomes in montes, nor object to he had to be

this?—'Twas no year of our Lord, replied my father That's impossible, cried my uncle Tohy Simpleton I said my father,—'twas forty years before Christ was born

My uncle Toby had but two things for it, either to suppose his brother to be the Wandering Jew,—or that his misfortunes had disordered his bruin — 'May the Lord God of heaven and earth protect him and restore him,' said my uncle Toby, praying silently for my father, and with tears in his eyes.—

My father placed the tears to n proper necount, and went on with his hirangue with great spirit

'There is not such great odds, brother Toby, betwist good and evil, as the world imagines' (This way of setting off, by the bye, was not likely to cure my unele Toby's suspicions)—'Labour, sorrow, grief, sickness, want, and woe, are the sauces of life' Much good may it do them,—said my unele Toby to himself—

'My son is dead 1'-so much the better, -'tis n shame, in such a tempest, to have but one nnehor

'But he is gone for ever from us' be it so—He is got from under the hands of his barber before he was bald,—he is but risen from a feast before he was surfeited,—from a banquet before he hand got drunken

'The Threenns wept when a child was born,'
(And we were very near it, quoth my ninele Toby)
'and feasted and made merry when a man went out of the world, and with reason—Death opens the gate of fame, and shuts the gate of Envy after it,—it unlooses the chain of the captive,—and puts the bondsman's task into another man's hands.

'Shew me the man, who knows what life is, who dreads it,—and I'll show thee a prisoner who dreads his liberty'—

Is it not better, my dear brother Toby—(for mark—our appetites are but diseases)—is it not better not to hunger at all, than to eat?—not to thirst, than to take physic to cure it?

Is it not better to be freed from cares and agues,—from love and melancholy,—and the other hot and cold fits of life, than, like n galled traveller who comes weary to lis inn, to be bound to begin his journey nfresh?

There is no terror, brother Toby, in its looks but what it horrows from grouns and convulsions-and the blowing of noses and the wiping away of tears with the bottoms of curtains in a dying man's room -Strip it of these, -What is it? 'Tis better in battle than in bed, said my uncle Toby -Take away its hearses, its mites, and its mourning, its plumes, escutcheons, and other Better in battle? con mechanic aids-What is it? tinued my father, smiling, for he had absolutely forgot my brother Bobby—it is terrible no way—for consider, brother Toby, - when we are-death is not, -- and when death is—we are not --- My uncle Toby Ind down his pipe, to consider the proposition, my father's eloquence was too rapid to stay for any man, -away it went-and hurried my uncle Toby's ideas along with

For this reason, continued my father, 'tis worthy to recollect how little alteration, in great men, the approaches of death have made—Vespasian died in a jest upon his close stool—Galba with a sentence,—Septimus Severus in a despatch,—Tiberius in dissimulation,—and Cæsar Augustus in a compliment I hope 'twas a sincere one,—quoth my uncle Toby—

'I was to his wife, -said my father

The Kitchen Sorrowing

— My young master in London is dead! said Obadiali

A green satin night gown of my mother's, which had been twice seoured, was the first idea which Obadiah's exclamation brought into Susannah's head — Well might Locke write a chapter upon the imperfections of words — Then, quoth Susannah, we must all go mid mourning — But note a second time—the word mourning, not withstanding Susannah made use of it herelffailed also of doing its office, it excited not one single idea, tinged either with grey or black,—all was green.—The green satin night gown hung there still —

—Oh! 'twill be the death of my poor mistress, end Susannah —My mother's whole wardrobe followed.—What a procession! her red damask,—her orange tawny,—her white and yellow lute strings,—her brown taffeta,—her bone laced caps, her bed gowns, and comfortable under petticoats—Not a rag was left behind.—'No —she will never lock up again!' said Susannah.

We had a fat foolish scullion,—my father, I think, kept her for her simplicity,—she had been all autumn stringgling with n dropsy——He is dead! said Obadiah,—he is certainly dead! So am not I, said the foolish scullion

Here is sad news, Trim! cried Susannah, wiping her eyes as Trim stepped into the kitchen,—master Bobby is dead and buried—the funeral was an interpolation of Susannah s—we shall have all to go into morning, said Susannah

I hope not, said Trim You hope not! ened Sissa nah, earnestly —— I he mourning ran not in Trim's head, whatever it did in Susannah's. I hope,—said Trim, explaining lumself, I hope in God the news is not true. I heard the letter read with my own ears, an swered Obadiah, and we shall have a terrible piece of work of it in stubbing the Ox moor Oh he's dead, said Susannah As sure, said the scullion, as I'm alive.

I lament for him from my heart and my soul, said Trim, fetching a sigh—Poor creature'—poor boy' poor gentleman'

---Ile was alive last Whitsuntide' said the coach Whitsuutide l-nlas t cried Trim, extending his nght arm, and falling instantly into the same attitude In which he read the sermon,-what is Whitsuntide, Jonathan (for that was the coachman's name), or Shrovetide, or any tide or time past, to this! Are we not here now, continued the Corporal (striking the end of his stick perpendicularly upon the floor, so as to give an idea of health and stability), - and are we not-(drop ping his hat on the ground) gone! In a moment!-Twas infinitely striking-Susannah burst into a flood of tears.—We are not stocks and stones.—Jonathan, Obadiah, the cook maid, all melted -The foolish fat scullion herself, who was scouring a fish kettle upon her knees, was roused with it -The whole kitchen crowded about the Corporal

Now, as I perceive plainly that the preservation of our constitution in church and state, and, possibly, the preservation of the whole world,—or, what is the same thing, the distribution and balance of its property and power, may in time to come depend greatly upon the right understanding of this stroke of the Corporal's eloquence,—I do demand your attention—your Worships and Reverences, for any ten pages together, take them where you will in any other part of the work, shall sleep for it at your ease.

I said, 'We are not stocks and stones'—'tis very well. I should have added, nor are we angels,—I wish we were,—but men clothed with bodies, and governed by our imaginations—and what a junketing piece of work of it there is betwirt these and our seven senses, especially some of them, for my own part, I own it, I am ashamed to confess. Let it suffice to affirm that, of all the senses, the eye (for I absolutely deny the touch, tho' most of your Barbati, I know, are for it) has the quickest commerce with the soul,—gives a smarter stroke, and leaves something more inexpressible upon the fancy than words can either convey—or sometimes get rid of

—I've gone a little about,—no matter, 'tis for health,—let us only carry it lack in our mind, to the mortality of Trim's hat—'Are we not here now,—and gone in a moment?'—There was nothing in the sentence,—'twas one of your self evident truths we have the advantage of hearing every day, and if Trim had not trusted more to his hat than his head, he had made nothing at all of it.

— 'Are we not here now,' continued the Corporal, and are we not'—dropping his hat plump upon the ground,—and pausing before he pronounced the word—'gone' in a moment?' The descent of the hat was as if a heavy lump of elay had been kneaded into the crown of it. Nothing could have expressed the sentiment of mortality, of which it was the type and forerunner, like it,—his hand seemed to vanish from under it,—it fell dead,—the Corporals eye fixed upon it as upon a corpse,—and Susannah burst into a flood of tears.

Now,—ten thousand, and ten thousand times ten thousand (for matter and motion are infinite) are the ways by which a hat may be dropped upon the ground without any effect.—Had he flung it, or thrown it, or east it, or skimmed it, or equirted it, or let it slip or fall in any possible direction under Heaven,—or in the best direction that could be given to it—had he dropped it like a goose,—like a puppy,—like an ass,—or in doing it, or even after he had done it, had he looked like a fool,—like a ninny,—like a nincompoop,—it had failed, and the effect upon the heart had been lost

To who govern this mighty world and its mighty concerns with the engines of eloquence,—who heat it, and cool it, and melt it, and mollify it,—and then harden it again to your purpose,———

Ye who wind and turn the passions with this great windlass, and having done it, lead the owners of them whither ye think meet

Ye, lastly, who drive—, and why not? Ye also who are driven like turkers to market, with a stick and a red clout,—meditate—meditate, I beseech you, upon Trim's liat.

(From Triutam Skandy v. 7)

The Starling

Tugenius knowing that I was as little subject to be overburthened with money as thought, had driwn me aside to interrogate me how much I had taken care for? Upon telling him the exact sum Fugenius shook his head and said it would not do so pulled out his purse in order to empty it into mine. I we enough m conscence, Fugenius, said I. Indeed Yorck, you have not replied Eu, enius, I know France and Itals better than you. But you don't consider I ugenius, said I, refusing his offer that before I have been three days in Paris, I shall take care to say or do something or other for which I shall get clapped up into the Bastile, and that I shall live there a couple of months entirely at the King of France's expense. I beg pirdou, said Eugenius, drily, really, I had forgot that resource.

Now the event I had treated gaily came seriously to my door

Is it folly, or nonchalance, or philosophy, or pertinacity,—or what is it in me, that after all, when La Fleur had gone down stairs, and I was quite alone, I could not bring down my mind to think of it otherwise than I had then spoken of it to Eugenius?

—And as for the Bastile—the terror is in the word — Make the most of it you can, said I to myself, the Bastile is but another word for a tower,—and a tower is but another word for a house you can't get out of — Mercy on the gouty 1 for they are in it twice a year — But with nine livres a day, and pen and ink and paper and patience, albeit a man can't get out, he may do very well within,—at least for a month or six weeks, at the end of which, if he is a harmless fellow, his innocence appears, and he comes out a better and wiser man than he went in.

I had some occasion (I forget what) to step into the court yard, as I settled this account, and remember I walked down stairs in no small triumph with the conceit of my reasoning—Beshrew the sombre pencil said I, vauntingly—for I envi not its power, which paints the evils of life with so hard and deadly a colouring. The mind sits terrified at the objects she has magnified herself, and blackened, reduce them to their proper size and hue, she overlooks them—'Tis true, said I, correcting the proposition—the Bastile is not an evil to be despised—But strip it of its towers—fill up the foss—unburricade the doors—call it simply a confinement, and suppose 'tis some tyrint of a distemper—and not of a man, which holds you in it—the evil vanishes, and you bear the other half without complaint

I was interrupted in the hey-day of this soliloquy, with a voice which I took to be of a child, which complained 'it could not get out '—I lool'd up and down the passage, and, seeing neither man, woman nor child, I went out without further attention

In my return back through the passage, I heard the same words repeated twice over, and looking up, I saw it was a starling liung in a little cage.—'I can't get ou'—I can't get out,' said the starling

I stood looking at the bird and to every person who came through the passage, it ran fluttering to the side towards which they approached it, with the same Ismen tation of its captivity,—'I can t get out, said the starling—God help thee! said I,—but I'll let thee out, cost what it will so I turned about the cage to get the door it was twisted and double twisted so fast with wire there was no getting it open without pulling the cage to pieces—I took both hands to it

The bird flew to the place where I was attempting his deliverance, and, thrusting his head through the trellis, pressed his breast against it, as if impatient,—I fear, poor creature said I I cannot set thee at liberty—"No said the starling "I can't get out—I can't get out."

I sow I never had any affections more tender's awak ened nor do I remember an inciden in my life where the dissipated spirit, to which my reason had been a hubble, were so suddenly called home. Mechanical as the notes were we' so true in tune to nature were they chanted, that in one moment they overthrew all my systematic reasonings upon the Bastile, and I heavily walked up stairs, unsaying every word I had said in going down them.

Disguise thyself as thou wilt, still, Slavery, said I, still thou art a bitter draught 1 and, though thousands m all ages have been made to drink of thee, thou art no less bitter on that account -'Tis thou, thrice sweet and gracious goddess, addressing miself to Liberty, whom all, in public or in private, worship, whose taste is grateful, and ever will be so, till Nature herself shall No tint of words can spot thy snowy mantle, nor chymic power turn thy sceptre into iron ,-with thee, to smile upon him as he eats his erust, the swain is happier than his monarch, from whose Court thou art exiled -Gracious Heaven 1 cried I, kneeling down upon the last step but one in my ascent, grunt me but health, thou great Bestoner of it, and give me but this fair goddess as my companion,-and shower down thy mitres, if it seem good unto thy Divine Providence, upon those heads which are aching for them !

The bird in his cage pursued me into my room I sat down close by my table, and, leaning my head upon my hand, I began to figure to myself the miseries of eon finement I was in a right frame for it, and so I gave full scope to my imagination

I was going to begin with the nullions of my fellow creatures born to no inheritance but slavery—but finding, however affecting the picture was, that I could not bring it near me, and that the multitude of sad groups in it did but distract me,

—I took a single captive, and, having first shut him up in his dungeon, I then looked through the twilight of his grited door to take his picture

I beheld his body half wasted away with long expectation and confinement, and felt what kind of siekness of the heart it was which arises from hope deferred. Upon looking nearer, I saw him pale and feverish, in thirty years the western breeze had not once fanned his blood,—he had seen no sun, no moon, in all that time,—nor had the voice of friend or kinsman breathed through his lattice!—His children!—

But here my heart began to bleed, and I was forced to go on with another part of the portrait

He was sitting upon the ground upon a little straw, in the furthest corner of his dungeon, which was alternately his chair and bed a little calender of small sticks was laid at the head, notched all over with the dismal days and nights he had passed there—he had one of these little sticks in his hand, and, with a rusty nail, he was etching another day of misery to add to the heap. As I darkened the little light he had, he lifted up a hopeless eye towards the door, then cast it down,—shook his head, and went on with his work of affliction. I heard his chains upon his legs, as he turned his body to lay his little stick upon the bundle—He gave a deep sigh.—I saw the iron enter into his soul!—I burst into tears—I could not sustain the picture of confinement which my fancy had drawn.

(From A Sentimental Journey)

There is an edition of Sterne's works by the present writer (with the letters and sermons, 6 vols 1894) of Tristram Shandy by Messrs Henley and Whibley (1894) and of Tristram Shand) and the Sentimental Journey to Macmillan Elibrary of English Classics (1900) For the biography consult Ferriars Illustrations of Sterne (1812), Percy Fitzgerald's Life of Sterne (new ed. 1896), H D Traill's monograph in the English Men of Letters Series (1882), the French Life by Paul Stapfer (1881), Scherer's Essay (trans. 1291), and Mr Sidney Lee's article in the Dictionary of National Biography It ought, perhaps, to be said that this last adds very largely, from sources mostly unpublished and sometimes access like with great difficulty, to our previous information. The particular, however, though sometimes interesting, are to no single instance of great importance, and in a good many cases probably represent merely the gossip to which, unluckily, Sterne seems to have given more than sufficient handles. But on the whole they may be said materially to confirm and enliven, without many way altering, the portrait of the author of Tristram Shandy that we derive from his own books and his long known letters.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY

James Townley (1714-78) was author of High Life below Stairs, a burlesque on the ex travagance and affectation of servants in aping the manners of their masters, ultimately detected by the master in disguise. The play was said actually to have had some effect in correcting this abuse, at all events it provoked organised and violent protest from all the liveried servants in the gallen when it was produced in the Edinburgh theatre. Townley, son of a wealthy London merchant and brother of Sir Charles Townley, Garter King of Arms, was born at Barking and bred at St John's, Cambridge From 1760 he was head master of Merchant Taylors' School, and latterly he also held clerical preferments Other two farces of his were But it was said that from one of them came much of a piece produced by Garrick and Colman, and that many of the best things by Garrick, Townley's intimate, benefited greatly by Townley's suggestion and revision

John Hawkesworth (c. 1715-73), born in London, in 1744 succeeded Dr Johnson on the Gentleman's Magazine, and in 1752 started, with Johnson and others, The Adventurer, half of whose 140 numbers were from Hawkesworth's pen, and show a not wholly unsuccessful imitation of the Johnsonian manner Hawkesworth, who became LLD, published a volume of fairy tales (1761), edited Swift, and prepared the account of Captain Cook's first voyage, which formed vols it and it of Hawkesworth's Voyages (3 vols 1773)

Charles Johnstone (c. 1719-1800) amused the town in 1760-65 by the clever contemporary saure of his Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea Born of Annandale ancestry in County Limerick, Johnstone studied at Dublin, and was debarred by deafness from success as a lawyer He went to India in 1782, was a proprietor of one of the Bengal newspapers, and died at Calcutta. Several other novels from his pen are now even more completely forgotten than Chrysal Johnson-to whom the manuscript was shown by the bookseller—advised the publication of Chrysal, whose author, Sir Walter Scott after wards said, might safely be ranked as a prose Juvenal The adventures are related somewhat in the style of Le Sage and of Smollett, but the saturical portraits are overcharged, the author exaggerated the vices of his age and of its public men, and his book was not altogether unjustly called the best scandalous chronicle of the day

Horace Walpole (formally HORATIO), fourth Earl of Orford, was born 24th September 1717 (0 s) in London, the third son of Sir Robert Walpole. At Eton and at King's College, Cambridge, he had Gray the poet as a friend, and while still at the university was appointed by his father to sinecures worth £1200 a year He and Gray set out together on the grand tour, but after two years quarrelled and parted at Reggio, where Walpole fell ill Returning to England (1741), he took his seat for Callington in Cornwall, but although he interested himself in cases like the Byng trial of 1757, his function in politics was that of the chronicling spectator rather than the energetic actor He exchanged his Cornish seat in 1754 for the family borough of Castle Rising, and this in 1757 for that of King's Lynn In 1745 his father died, leaving him with ample means, and he continued to live the life of collector and connoisseur, dabbling lightly in familiar verse and jeux d'esprit, trifling with history and art criticism, and corresponding voluminously In 1747 he purchased, near Twickenham, the cottage which he gradually elaborated into the well known 'Gothic Castle' and 'curiosity shop' of Strawberry Hill This transformation, authorship, visits to Paris (1765, 1767, 1775, where he came to know Madame du Deffand), the establishment of a private press (1757), and correspondence with Sir Horace Mann and others constituted the occupations of his life. His acquaintance with the two Misses Berry, his 'twin wives,' dated from 1788, he died in London 2nd March 1797, and was buried at Houghton, the Norfolk seat of his family In 1791, by the death of his eldest brother's son. he had become fourth Earl of Orford, he was never His essays in Moore's World exhibit a deft hand, and he had gifts as a verse writer such squibs as the Letter from Xo Ho to his friend Lien Chi at Pekin (1757), in which he follows Montesquieu and Lyttelton and anticipates Goldsmith, he is at his best. His Castle of Otranto (1764), professedly a translation from the MS of an Italian cleric, was, with its medieval and supernatural machinery, a forerunner of the romantic movement. Lauded by Sir Walter Scott and denounced by Hazlitt, this romance had undoubtedly the honour, such as it is, of leading up to the 'School of Terror,' to Clara Reeve and Mrs Radcliffe, to Beckford and Monk Lewis and Maturin. Walpole's tragedy of The Mysterious Mother (1768), pronounced 'of the highest order' by Byron, is 'strong' but gruesome. Other works often quoted are the Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors (1758, best ed 1806), Ingitive Pieces in Verse and Prose (1758), Anecdotes of Painting in England (1761-71, a standard work for more than a century), a Catalogue of Engra-ers (1763), Historic Doubts on Richard III (1768) an Essai on Moderi Gardening (1785), Memoirs of the Last Ten Years of George II (1822), Memoirs of the Reign of George III (1845, good ed by G F Russell Barker 1892), &c He also printed at the Stranberra Hill Press the Odes of Gray (1757), Grammont's Afenoires (1772), Life of Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1764), Lucan's Pharsalia, with Bentley's notes (1760), &c Walpole's literary reputation rests chiefly upon his published letters, which, nearly 2700 in number, rival in interest those of his friend Griv, and deal in the most vivacious way with party politics, foreign affairs, literature, art, and personal gossip His criticisms, frequently caustic, at times merely capricious, often show real literary insight.

Strawberry Hill

You perceive by my date [1747] that I am got into a new camp, and have left my tub at Windsor. It is a little plaything house that I got out of Mrs Chenevin's shop [the place was snb let to him by Mrs Chenevix, a toy woman], and is the prettiest bauble you ever saw. It is set in chamelled meadows, with filigree hedges—

A small Euphrates through the piece is roll d, And little finches wave their wings of gold

Two delightful roads, that you would call dusty, supply me continually with coaches and chaises, barges as solemn as Barons of the Exchequer inove under my window, Richmond Hill and Ham Walks bound my prospects, but, thank God' the Thames is between me and the Duchess of Queensberry Dowagers, as plenty as flounders, inhabit all around, and Pope's gliost is just now skimming under my window by a most poetical moonlight

The Scottish Rebellion.

I told you in my last what disturbance there had been about the new regiments, the affair of rank was again disputed on the report till ten at night, and carried by a majority of twenty three. The king had been per suaded to appear for it, though Lord Grunville made it a party point against Mr Pelham. Winnington did not speak. I was not there, for I could not vote for it, and yielded not to give any hindrance to a public measure (or at least what was called so) just now. The Prince acted openly, and influenced his people against it, but it only served to let Mr Pelham see, what, like every thing else, he did not know, how strong he is. The king will scarce speak to him, and he cannot yet get Pitt into place.

The Rebels are come into England for two days we believed them near Lancaster, but the Ministry now own that they don't know if they have passed Carlisle Some think they will besiege that town, which has an old wall, and all the militia in it of Comberland and Westmoreland, but as they can pass by it, I don't see why they should take it, for they are not strong enough to leave garrisons Several desert them as they advance south, and altogether, good men and bad, nobody believes them ten thousand. By their marching west ward to avoid Wade, it is evident that they are not strong enough to fight him. They may vet retire back into their mountains, but if once they get to Lancaster, their retreat is cut off, for Wade will not stir from Newcastle till he has embarked them deep into England, and then he will be behind them. He has sent General Handasyde from Berwick with two regiments to take possession of Edinburgh. The Rebels are certainly in a very desperate situation they dared not meet Wade and if they had writed for him, their troops would have descried. Unless they meet with great risings in their favour in Laucashire, I don't see what they can hope, except from a continuation of our neglect indeed, has nobly exerted itself for them They were suffered to murch the whole length of Scotland, and take possession of the capital, without a man appearing Then two thousand men sailed to them, against them to run from them Till the flight of Cope's army, Wade was not sent Two roads still lay into England, and till they had chosen that which Wade had not taken, no army was thought of being sent to secure the other Non Ligonier, with seven old regiments, and six of the new, is ordered to Lancashire before this first division of the army could get to Coventry, they are forced to order it to lialt, for fear the enemy should be up with it before it was all assembled It is uncertain if the Rebels will march to the north of Wales, to Bristol, or towards If to the latter, Ligonier must fight them if to either of the other, which I hope, the two armies may join and drive them into a corner, where they must all perish. They cannot subsist in Wales but by being supplied by the papists in Ireland The best is, that we are in no fear from France, there is no preparation for invasions in any of their ports Lord Clanearty, a Scotchman [not so, he was Irish] of great parts, but mad and drunken, and whose family forfeited £90,000 a year for king James, is made vice admiral at Brest The Duke of Bedford goes in his little round person with his regiment, he now takes to the land, and says he is tired of being n pen and ink man Lord Gower insisted too upon going with his regiment, but is laid up with the gout

With the Rebels in England, you may imagine we have no private news, nor think of foreign. From this account you may judge that our cause is far from des perate, though disagreeable

The Prince [Frederick, Prince of Wales], while the Princess lies in, has taken to give dinners, to which he asks two of the ladies of the bed chamber, two of the maids of honour, &c. by turns, and five or six others. He sits at the head of the table, drinks and harngues to all this medley till nine at night, and the other day, after the affair of the regiments, drank Mr Fox's health in a bumper, with three luzzas, for opposing Mr Pelham

'Si qua fata aspera rumpas, Tu Marcellus eris!'

You put me in pun for my'eagle, and in more for the Chutes, whose real is very herore, but very ill placed I long to hear that all my Chutes and eagles are safe out of the Pope's hands! Pray, wish the Suareses joy of all their espousals. Does the Princess pray abundantly for her friend the Pretender? Is she extremely abattue with her devotion, and does she fast till she has got a violent appetite for supper? And then, does she cat so long, that old Sarrasin is quite impatient to go to cards again? Good night! I intend you shall still be Resident from king George.

P.S.—I forgot to tell you that the other day I con claded the Ministry I new the danger was all over, for the Duke of Newcastle ventured to have the Pretender's deslivation barn' at the Royal Exchange

The Cipies were an English family of Walpole's acquaintance at Proces. The eagle was the antique found near the Baths of Concala at Rome in 1742 and purchased in 1745 by Walpole 18, 195 the agreey of Chute. It formed part of his collection at 5 awterry Hill.

For these two days we have been expecting news of a Wade marched last Saturday from Newcastle, and must have got up with the Rebels if they stayed for him, though the roads are exceedingly bail and great quantities of snow have fallen. But last night there was some notice of a body of Rebels being advanced to We were put into great spirits by an heroic letter from the Mayor of Carlisle, who had fired on the Rebels and made them retire, he concluded with saying, 'And so I think the town of Carlisle has done his Najesty more service than the great city of Edinburgh, or than all Scotland together' But this hero, who was grown the whole fashion for four and twenty hours, had chosen to stop all other letters. The King spoke of him at his levee with great encomiums, Lord Stair said 'Yes, su, Mr Paterson has behaved very bravely ' The Dake of Bedford interrupted him-'My Lord, his name is not Paterson, that is a Scotch name, his name is Pattinson." But alack! the next day the Rebels returned, having placed the women and children of the country in waggons in front of their army, and forcing the peasants to fix the scaling ladders. The great Mr Pattinson, or Paterson (for now his name may be which one pleases), instantly surrendered the town, and agreed to pay two thousand pounds to save it from pillinge. Aug 1, 1746.

I am this moment come from the conclusion of the greatest and most melancholy seene I ever yet saw! you will easily guess it was the trials of the rebel Lords As it was the most interesting sight, it was the most solema and fine a coronation is a puppet show, and all the splendour of it, idle, but this sight at once feasted ones eyes and engaged all one's passions. It began last Monday, three parts of Westminster hall were inclosed with galleries, and hung with scarlet, and the whole ceremony was conducted with the most awful solemany and deceney, except in the one point of leaving the prisoners at the bar, amidst the idle euriosity of some crowd, and even with the witnesses who had swom against them, while the Lords adjourned to their own No part of the Royal Family was house to consult there, which was a proper regard to the unhappy men, One hundred and who were become their victims thirty nine Lords were present, and made a noble sight on their benches frequent and full! The Chancellor was Lord High Steward, but though a most comely person age with a fine volce, his behaviour was mean, curiously searching for occasion to bow to the Minister that is no peer, and consequently applying to the other Ministers, in a manner, for their order, and not even ready at the ceremonial. To the prisoners he was pecvish, and instead of keeping up to the humane dignity of the law of England, whose character it is to point out favour to the eriminal, he crossed them, and almost scolded at any I had armed myself offer they made towards defence with all the resolution I could, with the thought of their crimes and of the danger past, and was assisted by the sight of the Marquis of Lothian in weepers for his son who fell at Culloden-but the first appearance of the prisoners shocked me! their behaviour melted me! I ord Kilmarnock and Lord Cromartic are both part forty, but look younger Lord Kilmarnock is tall and slender, with an extreme fine person his behaviour most just mixture between dignity and submission if in anything to be reprehended, a little affected, and his hair too exactly dressed for a man in his situation, but when I say this, it is not to find fault with him, but to shew how little fault there was to be found Lord Cromartie is an indifferent figure, appeared much dejected, and rather sullen he dropped a few tears the first day, and swooned as soon as he got back to his cell For Lord Balmerino, he is the most natural brave old fellow I ever saw the highest intrepidity, even to in difference At the bar he behaved like a soldier and a man, in the intervals of form, with carelessness and humour Hc pressed extremely to have his wife, his pretty Peggy, with him in the Tower Lady Cromartie only sees her husband through the grate, not choosing to be shut up with him, as she thinks she can serve him better by her intercession without When they were to be brought from the Tower in separate coaches, there was some dispute in which the axe must go-old Bal merino cried, 'Come, come, put it with me.' At the bar, he plays with his fingers upon the axe, while he talks to the gentleman gaoler, and one day, somebody coming up to listen, he took the blade and held it like a fan between their faces During the trial, a little boy was near him, but not tall enough to see, he made room for the child and placed him near himself

When the peers were going to vote, Lord Fole, with drew, as too well a wisher, Lord Moray, as nephew of Lord Balmenno-and Lord Stair, as, I believe, uncle to his great grandfather Lord Windsor, very affectedly, said, 'I am sorry I must say, guilty upon my honour' Lord Stamford would not answer to the name of Henry, having been christened Harry—what a great way of thinking on such an occasion! I was diverted too with old Norsa, an old Jew that kept a tavern Mv brother, as Auditor of the Exchequer, has a gallery along one whole side of the court. I said, 'I really feel for the prisoners!' Old Issachar replied, 'Feel for them! pray, if they had succeeded, what would have become of all us?' When my Lady Townshend heard her husband vote, she said, 'I always knew my lord was guilts, but I never thought he would own it upon his honour' Lord Balmerino said, that one of his reasons for pleading not guilty, was, that so many ladies might not be disappointed of their show said, 'They call me Jacobite, I am no more a Jacobite than any that tried me but if the Great Mogul had set up his standard, I should have followed it, for I could not starve '

London Earthquakes and London Gossip

Mar 11, 1750.

Portents and produgies are grown so frequent, That they have lost their name.

-DRYDEN 5 All for Love

My text as not literally true, but as far as earthquakes go towards lowering the price of wonderful commodities, to be sure we are overstocked. We have had a second, much more violent than the first, and you must not be surprised if by next post you hear of a burning moun tain sprung up in Smithfield. In the night between Wednesday and Thursday last (exactly a month since the first shock) the earth had a shivering fit between one and two, but so slight, that if no more had followed, I don't believe it would have been noticed. I had been awake, and had scarce dozed again—on a sudden I felt my bolster lift up my head, I thought somebody was getting from under my bed, but soon found it was a strong earthquake, that lasted near half a minute, with a violent vibration and great roaring. I rung my bell, my servant came in, frightened out of his senses in an instant we heard all the windows in the neighbourhood flung up I got up and found people running into the street, but saw no mischief done there has been some, two old houses flung down, several chimneys, and much china ware. The bells rung in several houses Admiral Knowles, who has lived long in Jamaica, and felt seven there, says this was more violent than any of them Francesco prefers it to the dreadful one at Leghorn The wise say, that if we have not rain soon, we shall certainly have more. Several people are going out of town, for it has nowhere reached above ten miles from London they say they are not frightened, but that it is such fine weather, 'Lord! one can t help going into the country! A parson, who came into White's the morning of earthquake the first, and heard bets laid on whether it was an earthquake or the blowing up of powder mills, went away exceedingly scan dalised, and said 'I protest they are such an impious set of people, that I believe if the last trumpet was to sound, they would bet puppet show against Judgment.'

The Middlesex election is carried against the Court the Prince, in a green frock (and I won't swear but in a Scotch plaid waistcoat), sat under the park wall in his cliair, and hallooed the voters on to Brentford. The Jacobites are so transported, that they are opening subscriptions for all boroughs that shall be vacant.

The Round of London Life.

Dec. 29 1763.

We are a very absurd nation (though the French are so good at present as to think us a very wise one, only because they themselves are now a very weak one), but then that absurdity depends upon the almanac. Posterity, who will know nothing of our intervals, will conclude that this age was a succession of events I could tell them that we know as well when an event, as when Easter, will happen Do but recollect these last ten The beginning of October, one is certain that everyhody will be at Newmarket, and the Duke of Cumberland will lose, and Shafto win, two or three After that, while people are prethousand pounds paring to come to town for the winter, the Ministry is suddenly changed, and all the world comes to learn how it happened, a fortnight sooner than they intended, and fully persuaded that the new arrangement cannot last a month. The Parliament opens everybody is bribed, and the new establishment is perceived to be composed of adamant. November passes, with two or three self murders, and a new play Christmas arrives, everybody goes out of town, and a not happens in one of the The Parliament meets again warmly opposed, and some citizen makes his fortune by a subscription The Opposition languishes balls and assemblies begin some master and miss begin to get together, are talked of, and give occasion to forty more matches being invented, an unexpected debate starts up at the end of the session, that makes more noise than anything that was designed to make a noise, and subsides again in a new peerage or two Ranelagh opens and Vauxhall, one produces scandal, and t'other a drunken quarrel People separate, some to Tunbridge, and some to all the horse races in England, and so the year comes again to October

From 'The Castle of Otranto'

The marquis was not surprised at the silence that reigned in the princess's apartment. Concluding her, as he had been advertised, in her oratory, he passed on The door was a jar, the evening gloomy and overcast Pushing open the door gently, he saw a person kneeling before the altar As he approached nearer, it seemed not a woman, but one in a long woollen weed, whose back was towards him. The person seemed absorbed The marquis was about to return, when the figure, rising, stood some moments fixed in meditation, without regarding him. The marquis, expecting the holy person to come forth, and meaning to excuse his uncivil interruption, said, Reverend father, I sought the Lady Hippolita.-Hippolita! replied a hollow voice, camest thou to this castle to seek Hippolita? and then the figure turning slowly round, discovered to Frederic the fleshless jaws and empty sockets of a skeleton, wrapt in a hermit's cowl.—Angels of grace protect me1 cried Frederic, recoiling -Deserve their protection 1 said the spectre - Trederic, falling on his knees, adjured the phantom to take pity on him -Dost thou not remember me? said the apparition Remember the wood of Joppa! -Art thou that holy hermit? cried Frederic, trembling Can I do aught for thy eternal peace?-Wast thou delivered from bondage, said the spectre, to pursue carnal delights? Hast thou forgotten the buried sabre, and the behest of Heaven engraven on it?-I have not, I have not, said Frederic but say, blest spirit, what is thy errand to me? v hat remains to be done?-To forget Matilda 1 said the apparition, and vanished

Frederic's blood froze in his veins For some minutes be remained motionless. Then, falling prostrate on his face before the altar, he besought the intercession of every saint for pardon. A flood of tears succeeded to this transport, and the image of the beauteous Matilda rushing, in spite of him, on his thoughts, he lay on the ground in a conflict of penitence and passion. Ere he could recover from this agony of his spirits, the Princess Hippolita, with a taper in her hand, entered the oratory alone. Seeing a man, without motion, on the floor, she gave a sliriek, concluding him dead. Her fright brought Frederie to himself Rising suddenly, his face bedewed with tears, he would have rushed from her presence, but Hippolita, stopping him, conjured him, in the most plaintive accents, to explain the cause of his disorder, and by what strange chance she had found him there in that posture -Ah ' virtuous princess ' said the marquis, penetrated with grief-and stopped.- For the love of heaven, my lord, said Hippolita, disclose the cause of this transport! What mean these doleful sounds, this alarming exclamation on my name? What woes has Heaven still in store for the wretched Hippolita?-Iet silent '-By every pitying angel, I adjure thee, noble prince, continued she, falling at his feet, to disclose the purport of what lies at thy heart-I see thon feelest for me, thou feelest the sharp pangs that thou inflictestspeak, for pity 1-does ought thou knowest concern my child?-I cannot speak, cried Frederic, hursting from her-Oh 1 Matilda!

Walpole's Works were edited by Mary Berry (5 vols. 1778). Peter Cunningham's is the best edition of the Letters (9 vols. 1857-59) but a new edition by Mrs Paget Toynbee was m progres in 1902. See also Memoirs of Horace Walfole edited by Elix Warburton (1851) and the Life by Mr Austin Dobon (and ed. 1893). Macaulay's Essay is brilliant but unsympathetic. Sainte-Beuve's essays on Madame du Dessand (Canteries, vols. L'and in) give an interesting account of Walpole's relations with the Pannas salons. Some Unpublished Letters were edited by Sir Spencer Walpole in 1902.

Alexander Carlyle (1722-1805) was born at Cummertrees manse near Annan, whence in 1724 his father was called to Prestonpans Educated at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Leyden, he was minister of Inveresk from 1748 till his death a divinity student when he volunteered for the defence of Edinburgh against Prince Charlie (the defence the authorities did not attempt), and he saw the flight of the defeated royal troops from his father's manse garden The friend of Hume, Adam Smith, Smollett, John Home, &c., he was present in the theatre when Home's Douglas was first performed, and he belonged emphatically to the Broad Church party in the Scotland of the eighteenth century With Robertson the historian he led the Moderates in the Church of Scotland, he was Moderator of the General Assembly, and was made Dean of the Chapel Royal in 1789, His imposing presence earned him the name of 'Jupiter' Carlyle, 'he was,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'the grandest demigod I ever saw' His very interesting Autobiography was first edited in 1860 by John Hill Burton

Prestonpans.

I directed the maid to awake me the moment the battle began, and fell into a profound sleep in an instant I had no need to be awaked, though the maid was punctual, for I heard the first cannon that was fired, and started to my clothes, which, as I neither buckled nor gartered, were on in a moment, and immediately went to my father's, not a hundred yards off All the strangers were gone, and my father had been up before daylight, and had resorted to the steeple. While I was conversing with my mother, he returned to the house, and assured me of what I had guessed before, that we were completely defeated. I ran into the garden, where there was a mount in the south east corner, from which one could see the fields almost to the verge of that part where the battle vas fought. Even at that time, which could hardly be more than ten or fifteen minutes after firing the first cannon, the whole prospect was filled with runaways, and High Many had their coats turned landers pursuing them as prisoners, but were still trying to reach the town in hopes of escaping The pursuing Highlanders, when they could not overtake, fired at them, and I saw two fall in the glebe. By and by a Highland officer whom I knew to be Lord Elcho passed with his trun, and had an air of savage ferocity that disgusted and alarmed He inquired fiercely of me where a public house was to be found, I answered him very meekly, not doubting but that, if I had displeased him with my tone, his reply would have been with a pistol bullet

The crowd of wounded and dying now approached with all their followers, but their groans and agonies were nothing compared with the howlings, and cries, and lamentations of the women, which suppressed manhood and created despondency. Not long after the Duke of Perth appeared with his train, who asked me, in a very different tone, the way to Collector Cheap's, to which house he had ordered our wounded officers. Knowing the family were from home, I answered the questions of victorious elemency with more assurance of personal safety, than I had done to unappeased fury. I directed him the way to the house, which was hard by that where I had slept.

The rebel army had before day marched in three divisions, one of which vent straight down the waggonway to attack our cannon, the other two crossed the Morass near Seaton House, one of which marched north towards Port Scaton, where the field is broadest. to attack our rear, but over marched themselves, and fell in with a few companies that were guarding the baggage in a small enclosure near Cockenzie, and took the whole. The main body marched west through the plains, and just at the hreak of day attacked our army After firing once, they run on with their broadswords, and onr people fled. The dragoons attempted to charge, nnder Colonel Whitney, who was wounded, but wheeled immediately, and rode off through the defile between Preston and Bankton, to Dolphingston, half a mile off. Colonel Gardiner, with his division, attempted to charge, but was only followed by eleven men, as he had foretold, Cornet Kerr being one He continued fighting, and had received several wounds, and was at last brought down by the stroke of a broadsword over the head. He was carried to the minister's house at Tranent, where he lived till next forenoon His own house, which was nearer, was made an hospital for the Highlanders, no person of our army being carried there but the Master of Torphichen, who was so badly wounded that he could be sent to no greater distance. Some of the dragoons fled as far as Edinburgh, and one stood all day at the Castle gate, as General Gnest would not allow him to be taken in A considerable body of dragoons met at Dolplingston immediately after the rout, little more than half a mile from the field, where Cope joined them, and where it was said Lord Drummore offered to conduct them back, with assurance of victory when the Highlanders were busy with the booty. But they could not be prevailed on by his eloquence no more than by the youthful ardour of Earls Home and London. After a short halt, they marched over Talside Hill to Lauder. Sir Peter Halket, a captain in Lee's regiment, acted a distinguished part on this occasion, for after the rout he kept his company together and getting behind a ditch in Tranent Meadow, he kept firing away on the rebels till they were glad to let him surrender on terms.

In the meantime my father became very nneasy lest I should be ill treated by the rebels, as they would discover that I had been a Volunteer in Edinburgh, he therefore ordered the horses to be saddled, and telling me that the sea was out, and that we could escape hy the shore without being seen, we mounted, taking a short leave of my mother and the young ones, and took the way he had pointed out. We escaped without interruption till we came to Port seton harbour, a mile off, where we were obliged to turn up on the land, when my father observing a small party of High landers, who were pursuing two or three carts with baggage that were attempting to escape, and coming up with the foremost driver, who would not stop when called to, they shot him on the spot. This daunted my father, who turned immediately, and took the way we came We were back again soon after, when, taking off my hoots and putting on shoes, I had the appearance of a person who had not been abroad. I then proposed to go to Collector Cheap's house, where I understood there were twenty three wounded officers, to offer my assistance to the surgeons, Cunningham and Trotter, the first of whom I knew. They were surgeons of the dragoons, and had surrendered that they might attend the officers When I went in, I told Cunningham (afterwards the most emment surgeon in Dublin) that I had come to offer them my services, as, though no surgeon, I had better hands than a common servant. They were obliged to me, but the only service I could do to them was to try to find one of their medicine chests among the baggage, as they could do nothing for want of instruments I readily undertook this task, provided they would furnish me with a guard This they hoped they could do, and knocking at the door of an inner room, a Highland officer appeared, whom they called Captain Stewart. He was good looking, grave, and of polished manners. He answered that he would soon find a proper conductor for me, and despatched a servant with a message. In the meantime I observed a very handsome young officer lying in an easy chair in a frint, and seemingly dying. They led me to a chest of drawers, where there lay a piece of his skull, about two fingers' breadth and an inch and a half long I said, 'This gentleman must die.' 'No,' said Cunning ham, 'the brain is not affected, nor any vital part he has youth and a fine constitution on his side, and could I but get my instruments, there would be no fear of him ' This man was Captain Blake. Captain Stewart's messenger arrived with a fine, hrisk, little, well dressed Highlander, armed cap a pie with pistols, and dirk, and broadsword Captain Stewart gave him his orders, and we set off immediately

Never did any young man more perfectly display the boastful temper of a raw soldier, new to conflict and victory, than this Highland warrior. He said he had that morning been armour bearer to the Duke of Perth, whose valour was as conspicuous as his cleinency. that now there was no doubt of their final success, as the Almighty had blessed them with this almost blood less victory on their part, that IIc had made the sun to shine upon them uninterruptedly since their first setting out, that no hrawling woman had cursed, nor even a dog had harked at them, that not a cloud had interposed between them and the blessings of Heaven, and that this happy morning---- Here he was interrupted in his harangue by observing in the street a coaple of grooms leading four fine blood horses drew a pistol from his belt, and darted at the foremost 'Who are you, sir? and where are you going? and whom are you seeking?' It was answered with an uncovered head and a dastardly tone, 'I am Sir John Cope's coachman, and I am secking my master' 'You'll not find him here, sir, but you and your man and your horses are my prisoners. Go directly to the Collector's house, and put up your horses in the stable, and wait till I return from a piece of public service. Do this directly, as you regard your lives.' They in stantly obeyed. A few paces further on he met an officer's servant with two handsome goldings and a large and full clothes bag Similar questions and answers were made, and we found them all in the place to which they were ordered, on our return

It was not long before we arrived at Cockenzie, where, under the protection of my guard, I had an opportunity of seeing this victorious army. In general they were of low stature and dirty, and of a contemptible appearance The officers with whom I mixed were gentleman like, and very civil to me, as I was on an errand of humanity I was conducted to Lochcil, who was polished and gentle, and who ordered a soldier to make all the inquiry he could about the medicine chests of the dragoons After an hour's search, we returned without finding any of them, nor were they ever afterwards recovered view I had of the rebel army confirmed me in the pre possession that nothing but the weakest and most un accountable bad conduct on our part could have possibly given them the victory God forbid that Britain should ever again be in danger of being overrun by such a despicable enemy, for, at the best, the Highlanders were at that time hat a raw militia, who were not cowards.

On our return from looking for the medicine chests, we saw walking on the sea shore, at the east end of Prestonpans, all the officers who were taken prisoners. I then saw human nature in its most abject form, for almost every aspect bore in it shame, and dejection, and despair. They were deeply mortified with what had happened, and timidly anxious about the future, for they were doubtful whether they were to be treated as prisoners of war or as rebels. I ventured to speak to one of them who was nearest me, a Major Severn, for Major Bowles, my acquaintance, was much wounded, and at the Collector's He answered some questions I pnt to him with civility, and I told him what errand I had been on, and with what himanity I had seen the wounded officers treated, and ventured to assert that the prisoners would be well used. The confidence with which I spoke seemed to raise his spirits, which I com pleted by saying that nothing could have been expected but what had happened, when the foot were so shamefully deserted by the dragoons.

Garrick and Golf

Garrick was so friendly to John Home that he gave a dinner to his friends and companions at his house at Hampton, which lie did but seldom. He had told us to bring golf clubs and balls that we might play at that game on Molesly Hurst We accordingly set out in good time, six of us in a landau. As we passed through Kensington, the Coldstream regiment were changing guard, and, on seeing our clubs, they gave us three cheers in honour of a diversion peculiar to Scotland, so much does the remembrance of one's native country dilate the heart, when one has been some time alsent. The same sentiment made us open our purses, and give our countrymen wherewithal to driak the 'Land o' Cakes.' Garrick met us by the way, so impatient he seemed to be for his company There were John Home, and Robertson, and Wedderhurn, and Robert and James Adam, and Colonel David Wedderhurn, who was killed when commander of the army in Bombay, in the verr [1773]. He was held by his companions to be in every respect as clever and able a man as his elder brother the Chancelor, with a much more gay, popular, and social

Immediately after we arrived, we crossed the over to the golfing ground, which was very good None of the company could play but John Home and myself, and Parson Black from Aberdeen, who, being chaplain to a regiment during some of the Duke of Cumberland's campaigns, had been pointed out to his Royal Highness as a proper person to teach him the game of chess the Duke was such an apt scholar that he never lost a game after the first day, and he recompensed Black for harm? bent lum so cruelly, by procuring for him the living of Hampton, which is a good one. We returned and dired Mrs Garrick, the only lady, now grown sumptuously fat, though still very lively, being a woman of ancommon good sense, and now mistress of English, was in all She did not seem at respects most agreeable company all to recognise me, which was no wonder, at the end of twelve years, having thrown away my bag wig and sword, and appearing in my own grisly hairs, and m parson's clothes, nor was I likely to remind her of her former state.

Garrick had huilt a handsome temple, with a statue of Shakespeare in it, in his lower garden, on the banks of the Thames, which was separated from the upper one by a high road, under which there was an archway which united the two gardens. Garrick, in compliment to Home, had ordered the wine to be carried to this temple, where we were to drink it ninder the shade of the copy of that statue to which Home had addressed his pathetic verses on the rejection of his play The poet and the actor were equally gay, and well pleased with each other, on this occasion, with much respect on the one hard, and a total oblivion of animosity on the other, for vanif is a passion that is easy to be entreated, and unites freely with all the best affections. Having observed 2 green mount in the garden, opposite the archway, I said to our landlord, that while the servants were preparing the collation in the temple I would surprise him with a stroke at the golf, as I should drive a ball through his archway into the Thames once in three strokes. I had measured the distance with my eye in walking about the garden, and accordingly, at the second strole, made the ball alight in the mouth of the giteway, and roll down the green slope into the river. This was so dexterous that he was quite snrprised, and begged the club of me by which such a feat had been performed. We passed a very agreeable afternoon, and it is hard to say which were happier, the landlord and landlady, or the guests.

The visit to London was paid in 1758. Returning from Leyden in 1746, Carlyle had seen on the packet boat, disguised in boy's clothes, the Viennese dancing girl whom Garrick married in 1749

Sarah Fielding (1710-68), a sister of the great Henry Fielding (see page 339), also attained eminence in her generation as a novelist best known work was her first—David Simple, published in 1744, of which, in a preface to the second edition, Henry Fielding said that 'some of her touches might have done honour to the pencil of the immortal Shakespeare,' and Richardson quoted to her the opinion of a judge who gave her credit for a more perfect knowledge of the human heart than her great brother-an opinion that was probably unusual even then, and is now without a Other novels of Miss Fielding were supporter The Governess and The Countess of Dellayn She also translated from the Greek

Mrs Elizabeth Carter (1717-1806), the daughter of a Kentish clergyman, published in 1758 All the Works of Epictetus now Extant, translated from the Greek, and the work was received with high favour by the critics of the time. This learned lady, familiar to the readers of Boswell's Johnson, had previously (1739) trans lated, anonymously, Crousar's Examination of Pope's Essay on Man, and Algarotti's Newton's Philosophy Explained She had also published a small collection of poems written by herself before her twentieth year, and was a frequent correspondent of the Gentleman's Magazine Hence her early acquaintance with Johnson, who commemorated her talents and virtues in pithy sayings as well as in a Greek and a Latin epigram Her Poems on Several Oceasions (1762) contained only two from the former volume She knew Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Italian, Spanish, German, Portuguese, and Arabic, studied astronomy, ancient geography and history, played on the spinet and the German flute, sewed beautifully, and made admirable puddings Her attamments were by no means superficial Johnson said of a distinguished scholar, by way of compliment, that he understood Greek better than any one he had ever known except Elizabeth Carter Her Memoirs (by her nephew, 1808) and several collections of her letters to Mrs Montagu and others maintained her repute for learning and sense. The friend of Burke, Reynolds, Richardson, Horace Walpole, Bishop Butler, Beattie, and Hannah More, she lived to read and admire Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel Of her poems, the best known is an Ode to Wisdom, enshrined by Richardson in his Clarissa. It is in rather stilted style, and opens with these stanzas

The solitary bird of night
Through the thick shades now wings his flight,
And quits his time shook tower,
Where, sheltered from the blaze of day,
In philosophic gloom he lay
Beneath his vyy bower

With joy I hear the solemn sound
Which midnight echoes waft around,
And sighing gales repeat
Favourite of Pallas! I attend,
And, futhful to thy summons, bend
At wisdom's awful seat.

Charlotte Lennox (1720-1804) was the daughter of Colonel Ramsay, Lieutenant Governor of New York, came to England in 1735, and after the death of her father failed as an actress, married, and took to literature. Her novel The Female Quizote (1752) has for heroine a young lady who has half-crazed herself by reading the romances of Scudéry, and it was praised by Fielding as well as by Johnson Mrs Lennox also published a feeble critical work, Shakspear Illustrated, and translated from the French Brumoy's Greek Theatre, The Life of Sully, The Memons of Madame de Maintenon, and some other Her first novel, Harriot Stuart (1751), works was celebrated by Johnson and a party of ladies and gentlemen in the Devil Tavern, where a sumptuous supper, including a prodigious applepie, was provided, and Jolinson invested the authoress with a crown of laurel Her novel Henrietta was dramatised by her as The Sister, plagransed from by Burgoyne, and translated both into German and French She wrote other novels, poems, a 'dramatic pastoral,' and a comedy based on Chapman's Lastward Hoe (see Vol I p 378) The following is a conversation in the Female Quixote

You had the boldness, said she, to talk to me of love, and you well know that persons of my sex and quality are not permitted to listen to such discourses, and if for that offence I banished you my presence, I did no more than decency required of me, and which I would yet do, were I mistress of my own actions

But is it possible, consin, said Glanville, that you can be angry with any one for loving you? Is that a crime of so high a nature as to merit an eternal banishment from your presence?

Without telling you, said Arabella, blushing, whether I am angry at being loved, it is sufficient, you know, that I will not pardon the man who shall have the presumption to tell me he loves me.

But, madam, interrupted Glanville, if the person who tells you he loves you, be of a rank not beneath you, I conceive you are not at all injured by the favourable sentiments he feels for you, and though you are not dis posed to make any returns to his passion, yet you are certainly obliged to him for his good opinion

Since love is not voluntary, replied Arabella, I am not obliged to any person for loving me, for, questionless, if he could help it, he would.

If it is not a voluntary fivour, interrupted Glansille, it is not a voluntary offence, and if you do not think yourself obliged by one, neither are you at lib ity to be offended with the other

The question, said Arabella is not whether I on lit to be offended at being lovel, but whether it is not an offence to be told I am so

If there is nothing commit in the present itself mindrin, resinned Glinville certainly there can be no crime in declaring it

However specious your argument may appear, interrupted Arabelli, I am per unded it is an impactoral to erine to tell a lady you love her, and thou h. I had nothing cle to plead, yet the authority of custom is sufficient to prove it

Custom, Lady Bella, and Ganville, unling is wholk on my side, for the ladies are as far from hem, displeased at the addresses of their lover, that their chiefest care is to man them, and their greatest triumph to hear them talk of their passion. (5), making I hope you will allow that argument has no force.

I do not I now, miswered Arabella what sait of I dies they are who allow anch unbecoming liberties, I at I am ocition that Status Piris in Cleba Mandane, and all the illustrious heromes of antiquity whom i is a pleas to resemble, would never adout of the decoirse.

Ah i for Heaven's also cousin, interrupted Glanville, endeavouring to stiffe a lan h, do no exister yours it to be governed by such antiquated maxims? The verillia quite different to what it vis in those days and the ladies in this age would as soon follow the fashious of the Greek and Roman ladies, as immic their manners and, I believe, they would become one as well as the other

I am sure, replied Arabella the voild is not rine of virtuous now than it was in their days and there is good reason to behave it is not much wiser, and I do not see why the manners of this age nic to be preferred to those is of former ones, unless they are wiser and be ter, how ever, I cannot be persuaded that things are as virtually, but that when I am a little better acquainted with the world, I shall find as many persons who resemble Oroon dates, Artaxerxes, and the illustrious lover of Clein as those who are like Teribase, Artaxes and the presuming and insolent Glanville.

By the epithets you give me madam said Glanville, I find you have placed me in very laid company but pray, madam, if the illustrious lover of Cleha had never discovered his passion, how would the world have come to the knowledge of it?

He did not discover his passion, sir, resumed Arabella, till by the services he did the noble Clehus and his meomparable daughter, he could plead some title to their esteem he several times preserved the life of that renowned froman, delivered the beautiful Cleha when she was a captive, and, in fine, conferred so many obligations upon them, and all their friends, that he might well expect to be pardoned by the divine Cleha for daring to love her. Nevertheless, she used him very harshly when he first declared his passion, and bauished him also from her presence, and it was a long time before she could prevail upon herself to compassionate his sufferings.

The marquis, coming in, interrupted Arabella, upon which she took occasion to retire, leaving Glanville more captivated with her than ever

He found her usage of him was grounded upon examples the thought it her duty to follow, and congran her motions of life appeared, let they were supported with a much will and dedicates, that he could not help admining her. Hester Chapone (1727-1801), daughter of Thomas Mulso, a Northamptonshire squire, wrote a romance before she was ten, studied Frerch, Italian, Latin, and music, contributed to Johnson-Rambler, and became the intimate friend of Richardson the novelist. Her married life lasted only a few months, her husband, an attorney, daing in 1761. In 1772 she wrote her best known book or rather a collection of essays, called Lettas eather Improvement of the Africal and in 1775 her Miscellaries. An edition of her works, with a Life, appeared in 1807, and extended to six volumes. The following from the Improvement is rather characteristic —

When I speak of the best company, I do not mean in the common acceptation of the word—persons of high rank and fortune—but rather the most worths and sensible. It is however very important to a young woman to be introduced into life on a respectable looting, and to converse with those whose manners and style of life may polish her behaviour, refine her sentiments, and give her consequence in the eye of the world. Your equals in rank are most proper for intimacy, but to be sometimes amongst your superiors is every way desirable and advantageous, unless it should inspire you with pride, or with the foolish desire of emulating their grandeur and expense.

Above all things avoid intimacy with those of low birth and education! nor think it a mark of humility to delight in such society, for it much oftener proceeds from the meanest kind of pride, that of being the head of the empany, and seeing your companisms subservient to you. The servile flattery and submission which usually recommend such people and make amends for their ignorance and want of conversation, will infallibly corrupt your heart and make all company insight from whom you cannot expect the saine homage. Your manners and faculties, instead of improving must be continually lowered to suit you to your companions, and, believe me, you will find it no easy matter to raise them again to a level with those of polite and well informed people.

The greatest lindness and civility to inferiors is perfectly consistent with proper caution on this head. Treat them always with affability, and talk to them of their own affairs, with an iffectionate interest, but never make them familiar, nor admit them as associates in your diversions, but, above all never trust them with your secrets, which is putting yourself entirely in their power, and subjecting yourself to the most shameful slavery.

Catherine Macaulay (1731-91) was an ardent politician of outspokenly republican senti ments-'the hen brood of faction,' according to Walpole. The daughter of John Sanbridge, a Kentish proprietor, she married a 'Scotch doctor Macaulay in 1760, and in 1778, after twelve years of widowhood, a brother of the famous quack doctor Graham, also a Scotsman Her chief work was a History of England from the Accession of James I to the Elevation of the House of Hanover (8 vols 1763-83) Though a worl of no authority, it has well written passages, and was highly thought of by Mirabeau and Madanie Roland. calls Mrs Macaulay 'the ablest writer of the new Radical school, and Horace Walpole and Gray even put her History above Hume's To ridicule Mrs Macaulay's republicanism, Johnson one day proposed that her footman, 'a very sensible, civil, well behaved fellow citizen,' should be allowed to sit down to dinner vith the party, and in a still less complimentary vein, said it was better she should redden her own cheeks than blacken other people's Before her death she had visited George Washington in America, written against Burke's denunciation of the French Revolution. criticised Hobbes and produced a treatise on morals and letters on education. What Mrs Macaulay had in common with her illustrious namesake, and what she had not, will be gathered from the following paragraphs from her account of the Revolution, on

The Bishops committed to the Tower

There cannot be a stronger mark of that deep rooted prejudice which the doctrines of passive obedience had fixed in the minds of James and his party, and the entire dependence they had in the sincerity of its professors, than the boldness of a step which must naturally excite the resentment of a people who had shewn such ample te timonies of a blind devotion to the interests and power of the church Jeffries, who had hitherto been the fore most in all the violent councils of this and the preceding reign, remonstrated against the measure as impolitic and dangerous, and the anxiety and attention with which the public waited the issue of this business struck a terror in the minds of the most determined of the king's servants Directions were given that the reverend fathers should be carried by water, in order to prevent the emotions which a sight of their humiliations in a passage through the city might occasion, but this caution was needless, for the inflamed populace rushed in innumerable crowds to the river to wait for their arrival the banks were covered on both sides, and the rooms, and even the roofs of all the adjoining houses, were filled with eager spectators a shout of acclamation, which resounded from one end of the town to the other, was set up by the multitude when the bishops were discovered at a distance immediately followed by a deluge of tears, fervent prayers were offered up to heaven for their deliverance, as they approached the ground was streved with the protestant bodies of pions devotees, whilst others, yet more inflamed with zeal, ran up to the clim into the water to receive their blessing The contagion caught even the soldiers, who threw themselves on their knees to their prisoners, nor could Daniel in the lion's den excite more terror and compassion in the breasts of the devout Jews, than a lodgment in the Tower for a few weeks excited in the minds of a people who had beheld often with the eye of indifference those cruel executions which sully the page of history during the last reign and in the beginning of the present, and who but a few months before had beheld without any extraordinary emotion the rigorous sconng ing of Samuel Johnson, an honest but zealous divinc of the church of England, who had been given up by his brethren to the resentment of the court, which had been drawn on him for a publication entitled 'An humble and hearty address to all the English protestants in the arms, in which they are intreated not to make them selves the tools of the papists, to enslave their country and subvert their religion' Such are the effects of imagination over the human heart, that rancour and sympathy, indifference and passion, take their alternate rise from the mere phantoms of the brain, without being in any measure rationally regulated by the nature of circumstances or the complexion of facts. The behaviour of the bishops was equally calculated to correspond with their public professions, and at the same time to enflame the sympathy of the multitude. They distributed to all around them their blessings without reserve, they augmented the general favour by the most lowly submissive deportment, they exhorted the people to fear

God, honour the king, and to maintain their loyalty, and no sooner had they entered the precinets of the Tower, than they hurried to chapel, in order to return thanks for those afflictions which licaven in defence of its holy cause had thought them worthy to endure

The triumph of the church over prerogative, the idol to which they had taught the multitude to bow, was yet more splended on the day of their trial, than in their passage to the Iower. I went, nine peers, the far greater number of which were of the high tory faction, and had been highly instrumental in exalting the power of the crown and fixing James on the throne, with a great number of commoners and divines of inferior rank, attended the bishops to Westminster hall, and the populace who assembled in expectation of the event was more numerous than had ever been seen on any occasion.

Clara Reeve (1729-1807), born at Ipswich, the daughter of the rector of Freston, translated Barclay's Argents (1772), and wrote The Champton of Virtue, a Gothic Story (1777), renamed The Old English Baron, which was avowedly an imitation of Walpole's Castle of Otranto The Old Luglish Baron used constantly to be printed along with the Castle of Otranto, and in virtue of her chef d'auvri, Miss Reeve has an assured place in the history of the romantic movement in our literature. she was Mrs Radcliffe's literary godmother. It may even be said that in the management of the supernatural machinery so as to produce mysters and weird effect, she surpassed her prototype, but she had neither Walpolc's pointed style nor his grace Scott thought her weak in imagination, and criticised her style as sometimes tame and tiresome. But the book has gone through more than a dozen editions, and was three times re printed between 1883 and 1888. Miss Recve wrote four other novels, all forgotten, and The Progress of Romance (1785), a sort of history of fiction

David Lewis (1683?-1760), a Welshman born, seems to have been an usher in Westminster School. He wrote a blank-verse tragedy on Philip of Macedon (1727), but is best known for a collection of Miscellaneous Per vis by Several Hands (1726), which contains ould this Grongar Hill, Pope's With Spark, and or, there of songs and poems, some of the best of this, are attributed to himself, such as the foliable creprinted in Percy's Reliques

Away' let nought to love disple he lu
My Winifreda, move your care,
Let nought delay the heavenly blessii
Nor squeamish pride nor gloomy fe

What though no grants of royal donors,
With pompous titles grace our blood,
We'll shine in more substantial honours
And, to be noble, we'll be good

Our name while virtue thus we tender, Will sweetly sound where'er 'tis spoke, And all the great ones, they shall wonder How they respect such little folk What though from fortune's lavish bounty No mighty treasures we possess? We'll find within our pittance plenty, And be content without excess Still shall each I ind returning season Sufficient for our wishes give, I or we will live a life of reason, And that's the only life to live.

Through youth and age, in love excelling.
We'll hand in hand to either tread,
Sweet similing peace shall crown our dwelling.
And babes, sweet similing babes, our bed

How should I love the pre'ty creatures,
While round my knees they fondly clung!
To see them look their mother's features,
To hear them lisp their mother's tongue!

And when with envy Time transported, Shall think to rob us of our joys, You'll in your girls again be courted, And I'll go young in my boys

James Herrick (1720-69) was a distinguished classical scholar. Born at Reading, and educated there and at Trinity College, Oxford, he gaired a fellowship, and tool holy orders, but was unable to do duty from delicate health. Merrick wine some hymns, and, with no great success, attempted a version of the Psalms. Better known is

The Chameleon.

Oft has it been my lot to mark
A proud, conceited, talling spark,
With eves that hardly served at most
To guard their master 'gainst a post, Yet round the world the blade has been,
To see whatever could be seen Returning from his finished tour,
Grown ten times perfer than before,
Whatever word you chance to drop,
The travelled fool your mouth will stop
'Sir, if my judgment you'll allow—
I've seen—and sure I ought to know'—
So begs you'd pay a due submission,
And acquiesce in his decision

Two travellers of such a cest,
As o'er Arabra's wilds they pased,
And on their way in friendly chat,
Now talked of this, and then of that,
Discoursed awhile, 'mongst other matter
Of the Chameleon's form and nature.
'A stranger animal,' cries one,
'Sure never lived beneath the sun
A lizard's body lean and long,
A fish's head, a serpent's tongue,
Its tooth with triple claw disjoined,
And what a length of tail behind!
How slow its pace ' and then its hue—
Whoever saw so fine a blue?'

'Hold there,' the other quick replies,
''Tis green—I saw it with these eyes,
As late with open month it lay,
And warmed it in the sunny ray,
Stretched at its ease, the beast I viewed,
And saw it eat the air for food.'

'I've seen it, sir, as well as you, And must again affirm it blue, At leisure I the beast surveyed Extended in the cooling shade.'

"Tis green, 'tis green, sir, I assure ye."
'Green' 'crics the other in a fury
'Why, sir, d've think I've lost my eyes?
'Twere no great loss,' the friend replie,
'For if they always serve you thus,
You'll find 'em but of little use'

So high at last the contest ro e,
From words they almost came to blows
When luckily came by a third,
Fo him the question they referred,
And begged he'd tell them, if he knew,
Whether the thing was green or blue

'Sirs,' eries the umpire 'cease your pother,
The creature's neither one nor t'other
I caught the animal last night,
And viewed it o'er by candlelight
I marked it well, 'twas black as jet—
You stare—but, sirs, I've got it yet,
And can produce it '—' Pray, sir, do,
I'll lay my life the thing is blue'

'And I ll be sworn, that when you've seen
The reptile, von il pronounce him green'
'Well, then, at once to ease the doubt,' Replies the man, 'I'll turn him out
And when before your eyes I've set him,
If you don't find him black, I ll cat him'

He said, and full before their sight
Produced the beast, and lo!— twas white
Both stared, the man looked wondrous wise—
'My children' the Chameleon cries (Then first the creature found a tongue),
'You all are right, and all are wrong
When next you talk of what you view,
Think others see as well as you
Nor wonder if you find that none
Prefers your everight to his own'

Francis Fawkes (1721-77) translated Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moschus, Museus, and Theocritus, and wrote pleasing original verses Born at Warmsworth near Doncaster, and educated at Birry and Jesus Colleges, Cambridge, he was view of Orpington and rector of Hayes in Kent. He enjoyed the friendship of Johnson and Warton, Johnson acknowledged that 'Frank Fawkes had done the Odes of Anacreon very finely,' but, however classic in his tastes and studies, Fawkes relished a cup of English ale, as is shown by his pruise of

The Brown Jug

Dear Tom, this brown jug that now foams with mild ale (In which I will drink to sweet Nam of the vale) Was once. Foly I illpot, a thir ty old soul As one drink a bottle or fathomed a bowl. In Isou ingrabout twas his projecto excel And among jolly topers he hore off the bell

It chanced as in dog-days he set a his case. In his flower woven arbour, as gay as you please, With a friend and a pipe puting sorrows away, And with hones old stongo was toaking his clay,

His breath-doors of life on a sudden were thut, And he died full as ling as a Dorchester butt

His body when long in the ground it lind Imm. And time into clay had resolved it again, A potter found out in its covert so snug, And with part of fat Toby he formed this brown jug, Now sacred to friendship, and mitth, and mild ale, So here's to my lovely sweet Naii of the vale!

John Gambold (1711-71), bred at Oxford, came under Wesley's influence, and in 1742 resigned his living at Stanton Harcourt in Oxfordshire to become a preacher, and ultimately a bishop, among the Moravian Brethren. He wrote religious and theological works, hymns, and poems Erskine of Linhathen re-edited his works (1823), and an edition of his Poetical Words appeared in 1816. His principal poem was a dramatic piece (written 1740), in which he described himself in the character of Chaidius, a Roman soldier

The Mystery of Life

So many years I we seen the sun,
And called these eves and hands my own,
A thousand little acts I we done,
And childhood have and manhood known
O what is life! and this dull round
To trend, why was a spirit bound?

So many airy draughts and lines,
And warm excursions of the mind,
Have filled my soul with great designs,
While practice grovelled for behind
O what is thought 1 and where withdraw
The glories which my fancy saw?

So many tender joys and a oes
Have on my quivering soul had power,
Plain life with heightening passions role,
The hoist or burden of their hour
O what is all we feel! why fled
Those pains and pleasures o'er my head?

So many human souls divine,
So at one interview displayed,
Some oft and freely mixed with nunc.
In lasting bonds my heart have laid
O what is friendship! why imprese!
On my weak, wretched, dving breas?

So many wondrous gleams of light,
And gentle aidours from above,
Have made me sit, like scraph bright
Some moments on a throne of love
O what is virtue! who had I,
Who am so low a ta to so high?

Fre long when sovereign wildern will,
My soul an unknown path shall tread,
And's runcely leave who strangely fill's
This frame, and waft nie to the dead
O what is death? Its life's I is shore,
Where vinities are vain no more,
Where all pursuits their goal obtain,
And life is all retouche I again.
Where in their I right result of all nie.
Though's victors friend lays grief, and yes

James Hammond (1710-42), son of a Huntingdonshire squire, was educated at Westminster, became one of the friends of Frederick Prince of Wales, but did not shine in Parliament as member for Truro. According to the story, he fell deep in love with Miss Dishwood, a friend of Lady Bute, whose ineverable rejection of his suit inspired his once admired love elegies, condemned by Johnson though praised by Thomson and Chesterfield, they are obvious unitations of Fibullus—smooth, tame, and frigid. In the following elegy Hammond imagines himself married to his Delia, and retired to the country.

Let others borst their heaps of shining gold,
And view their fields, with waving plenty crowned,
Whom neighbouring foes in constant terror hold,
And trumpets break their slumbers, never sound

While calinly poor, I trifle life nwny, Fnjoy sweet leisure by my cheerful fire,
No wanton hope my quiet shall betray,
But, cheaply blest, I'll seorn each vain desire

With timely care I'll sow my little field,
And plant my oreliard with its master's hand,
Aor blush to spread the hay, the hook to wield,
Or range my sheaves along the sunny land

If Inte at dusk, while carelessly I roam,
I meet a strolling kid, or bleating lamb,
Under my arm I II bring the wanderer home,
And not a little chide its thoughtless dam

What joy to hear the tempest how! in vain,
And clasp a featful mistress to my breast!
Or, fulled to shumber by the beating rain,
Secure and happy, sink at last to rest!

Or, if the sun in finning Leo ride,
By slindy rivers indolently stray,
And with my Delia walking side by side,
Ilear how they murmur as they glide myny!

What joy to wind along the cool retreat,
To stop and gaze on Delia as I go!
To mingle sweet discourse with kisses sweet,
And teach my lovely scholar all I know!

Thus pleased at heart, and not with fance s dream,
In silent happiness I rest unknown,
Content with what I am, not what I seem,
I have for Delia and myself alone.

Ah, foolish man, who thus of her possessed,
Could float and wander with ambition's wind,
And if his outward trappings spoke him blest,
Not heed the sickness of his conscious mind!

With her I scorn the idle breath of praise, Nor trust to happiness that's not our own, The smile of fortune might suspicion raise, But here I know that I nm loved alone

Hers be the care of all my little train,
While I with tender indolence am blest,
The fivourite subject of her gentle reign,
By love nlone distinguished from the rest.

For her I II yoke my oxen to the plough,
In gloomy forests tend my lonely flock,
I or her a goat herd climb the mountains brow,
And sleep extended on the naled rock

All, what avails to press the stately bed,
And far from her 'midst tasteless grandeur weep,
By marble fountmins by the pensive head,
And, while they murmur, strive in vain to sleep?

Beauty and worth in her alide contend,

To charm the fance and to fix the rund,
In her, my wife, my mistiess, and my friend,
I taste the joys of sense and reason joined

On her I ll gnze, when others' loves are o er,
And dying press her with my clay cold hand—
Thou weep'st already, as I were no more,
Nor can that gentle breast the thought withstand

Oh, when I die, inv latest moments spare,
Nor let thy grief with sharper tornients kill,
Wound not thy cheeks, nor hurt that flowing hair—Though I am dead, my soul shall love thee still

Oh, quit the room, oh, quit the deathful bed, Or thou wilt die, so tender is the heart Oh leave me, Delia, ere thou see me dead, These weeping friends will do the mounful part

Let them, extended on the decent bier,
Convey the core in melancholy state,
Through all the village spread the tender tear
While pitving maids our wondrous love relate.

Richard West (1716-42), the friend of Gray and Walpole, was the only son of the Lord Clinacellor of Ireland and a grandson of Bishop Burnet. Bred at Eton and Christ Church Oxford, he wrote a number of fugitive poems and a lost druma. All his known poems are given in the Rev D C Tovey's Gray and his Friends (1890), where may letters are printed for the first time, in addition to those in the Walpole and the Grat correspondence. The following is 'imitated' from Tibullus (iii 5), the text differing in sundry minor points from the earlier form given by Tove)

Ad Amicos

Yes, happy youths on Camus sedgy side, You feel each joy that friendship can divide, Each realm of science and of art explore, And with the ancient blend the modern lore. Studious alone to learn whate'er mny tend To ruse the genius, or the heart to mend. Now pleased along the closstered walk you rove, And truce the verdnut innies of the grove, Where social oft, and oft alone, ve choose To catch the zephyr, and to court the muse Meantime at me-while all devoid of art These lines give back the image of my heart-At me the power that comes or soon or late, Or aims, or seems to aim, the dart of fate, From you remote, incthinks alone I stand, Like some sad exile in a desert land Around no friends their lement care to join In mutual warmth, and mix their heart with mine. Or real puns, or those which fancy ruse, For ever blot the sunshine of my days,

To sickness still, and still to grief a prey, Health turns from me her rosy face away

Inst Heaven! what sin ere life begins to bloom, Devotes my head untimely to the tomb? Did e er this hand against a brother's life Drug the dire bowl, or point the murderous knife? Did e er this tongue the slanderer's tale proclaim, Or madly violate my Maker's name? Did e'er this heart betray a friend or foe, Or know a thought but all the world might know? As yet just started from the lists of time, My growing years have scarcely told their prime, Useless as yet through life I've idly run, No pleasures tasted, and few duties done. Ah, who, cre autumn's mellowing suns appear, Would pluck the promise of the vernal year, Or ere the grapes their purple hue betray, Tear the crude cluster from the mourning spray? Stern power of fate, whose ebon sceptre rules The Stygian deserts and Cimmerian pools, Forbear, nor rashly smite my youthful heart, A victim yet unworthy of thy dart, Ah, stay till age shall blast my withering face, Shake in my head, and falter in my pace, Then aim the shaft, then meditate the blow, And to the dead my willing shade shall go

How weak is man to reason's judging eye! Born in this moment, in the next we die, Part mortal clay, and part ethereal fire, Too proud to creep, too humble to aspire. In vain our plans of happiness we raise, Pain is our lot, and patience is our praise, Wealth, lineage, honours, conquest, or a throne, Are what the wise would fear to call their own. Health is at best a vain precurious thing, And fair-faced youth is ever on the wing . Tis like the stream beside whose watery bed Some blooming plant exalts his flowery head. Nursed by the wave the spreading branches rise. Shade all the ground, and flourish to the skies, The waves the while beneath in secret flow. And undermine the hollow bank below, Wide and more wide the waters urge their way, Bare all the roots, and on their fibres prey, Too late the plant bewarls his foolish pride, And sinks untimely in the whelming tide

But why repine? Does life deserve my sigh, Few will lament my loss v hene'er I die. For those the wretches I despise or hate, I neither envy nor regard their fate. For me, whene'er all conquering death shall spread His wings around my unrepining head, I care not, though this face be seen no more, The world will pass as cheerful as before, Bright as before the day star will appear, The fields as verdant, and the skies as clear Nor storms nor comets will my doom declare, Nor signs on earth, nor portents in the air, Unknown and silent will depart my breath, Nor nature e'er take notice of my death Yet some there are-ere spent my vital days-Within whose breasts my tomb I wish to raise. Loved in my life, lamented in my end, Their praise would crown me as their precepts mend To them may these fond lines my name endear, Not from the Poet, but the Friend sincere.

Sir Gilbert Elliot (1722-77), author of Amynta, which Sir Walter Scott called 'the beautiful pastoral song,' was third baronet of Minto, and brother of Jean Elliot. Sir Gilbert was educated at Edinburgh and Leyden for the Scottish Bar, he was twenty years in Parliament as member successively for the counties of Selkirk and Royburgh, and was distinguished as a speaker He was in 1756 made a Lord of the Admiralty, in 1767 Keeper of the Signet in Scotland, and in 1770 Treasurer of the Navy He died at Marseilles, whither he had gone for the recovery of his health, in 1777 He was the intimate friend of Home, author of Douglas, and David Hume, but disliked the sceptical tendency of Hume's philosophy, and it was he who kept Hume from publishing the Dialogues during his own lifetime.

Amynta

My sheep I neglected, I broke my sheep hook,
And all the gay haunts of my youth I forsook
No more for Amynta fresh garlands I wove,
For amhition, I said, would soon cure me of love.
Oh, what had my youth with amhition to do?
Why left I Amynta? Why brole I my vow?
Oh, give me my sheep, and my sheep-hook restore,
And I'll wander from love and Amynta no more.

Through regions remote in vain do I rove, And bid the wide ocean secure me from love! O fool! to imagine that aught could subdue A love so well founded, a passion so true! Alas! 'tis too late at thy fate to repine, Poor shepherd, Amynta can never be thine Thy tears are all fruitless, thy wishes are vain, The moments neglected return not again

Christopher Smart, an unfortunate man of genius, was born 11th April 1722 at Shipbourne near Tunbridge, whither his father had migrated from Durham as steward to Viscount Vane. Through the influence of this nobleman, Christopher procured from the Duchess of Cleveland an allowance of £40 per annum He was admitted to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, in 1739, and elected a Fellow in 1745 At college Smart was remarkable for folly and extravagance, and his distinguished contemporary Gray prophesied truly that the result of his conduct would be a jail or bedlam In 1747 he wrote a comedy called a Trip to Cambridge, or the Grateful Fair, which was acted in Pembroke College Hall No remains of this play have been found, excepting a few songs and a mock-heroic soliloguy containing this

Thus when a barber and a collier fight,
The barber beats the luckless collier white,
The dusty collier heaves his ponderous sack,
And, hig with vengeance, beats the barber black
In comes the brick-dust man, with grime o'erspread,
And beats the collier and the barber red,
Black, red, and white, in various clouds are tossed,
And in the dust they raise the combatants are lost

Having written several pieces for periodicals published by Newbery, Smart became acquainted with the bookseller's family, and married his stepdaughter, Anna Maria Carnan, in 1753. He now removed to London and endeavoured to subsist by his pen. The notorious 'Sir' John Hill-whose wars with the Royal Society, with Fielding, Garrick, and others, are well known, an apothecary, hackwriter, and scurrilous pamplileteer who closed his life by becoming a quick doctor-having insidiously attacked Smart, the latter replied by a spirited satire entitled The Hilliad Among his various tasks were metrical translations of the Fables of Phredrus and of the Psalms and the parables, with a prose translation of Horace. In 1756 he was one of the conductors of a monthly periodical called The Universal Visiter, and to assist him, Johnson -who sincerely sympathised, as Boswell records, with Smart's unhappy mental crises—contributed In 1763, as previously in 1751, a few essays the poor poet was confined in a madhouse 'He has partly as much exercise,' said Johnson, 'as he used to have, for he digs in the garden deed, before his confinement, he used for exercise to walk to the ale-house, but he was carried back I did not think he ought to be shut up His infirmities were not novious to society insisted on people praying with him-also falling upon his knees and saying his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place, and I'd as lief pray with Kit Smart as any one else. Another charge was, that he did not love clean linen, and I have no passion for it.' During his confinement, it is said, writing materials were denied him, and Smart used to inscribe his poetical thoughts with charcoal on the walls of Bethlehem Hospital, or with a key on the wainscot Obviously he could not have written down in this way the eighty-four six line stanzas of the Song to David, composed during his saner intervals, the bulk of it presumably composed and carried in the memory Smart was afterwards released from his confinement, but debt and ill-fortune still pursued him committed to the King's Bench prison for debt, and died there, after a short illness, 21st May 1771

The Song to David is every way one of the most remarkable things in English poetry, and not merely, as it might in virtue of its origin and history be called, a 'curiosity of literature' Even if it be not, as D G Rossetti said, 'the only great accomplished poem of the last [i e. the eighteenth] century,' and though we do not quite agree with Mr Gosse in calling it 'a portent of beauty and originality,' it is an amazing burst of devout imagination, in some passages attaining unmistakable splendour of thought and expression, marked by rich imagery, memorable phrasing, and majestic rhy thms Professor Palgrave and Mr Stopford Brooke are equally warm in commendation of the poem Browning praised it in his Parleyings, and says it 'stations Smart on either hand with Milton and with Keats' There are evident traces in it of want of mental balance, but it is amazing to know that though it was printed by Smart in 1763 it was omitted from his collected poems in 1791 as 'exhibiting [only?] too melancholy proof of the estrangement of Smart's mind' Anderson and Chalmers in their collections give large extracts from Smart, but could not find a copy of the Song to quote from It was reprinted in 1819 and 1827, and the whole of it was given in the first edition of this work (1843). It has since then been repeatedly printed, a recent editor being Mr Tutin (1898).

Song to David

O thon, that sit'st upon a throne,
With harp of high, majestic tone,
To praise the King of kings
And voice of heaven ascending swell,
Which, while its deeper notes excel,
Clear as a clarion rings

To bless each valley, grove, and coast,
And clinrm the cherules to the post
Of gratitude in throngs,
To keep the days on Zion's Mount,
And send the year to his account,
With dances and with songs

O servant of God's holiest charge,
The minister of praise at large,
Which thou may'st now receive,
From thy blest mansion hail and hear,
Trom topmost eminence appear
To this the wreath I weave.

Great, valuant, pious, good, and clean, Sublime, contemplative, serene, Strong, constant, pleasant, wise! Bright effluence of exceeding grace, Best man! the swiftness and the race, The peril and the prize!

Great—from the lustre of his crown,
From Samuel's horn, and God's renown,
Which is the people's voice,
For all the host, from rear to vnn,
Applauded and embraced the man—
The man of God's own choice

Valiant—the word, and up he rose,
The fight—he triumphed o'er the foes
Whom God's just laws abhor,
And, armed in gallant faith, he took Against the boaster, from the brook,
The weapons of the war

Prous—magnificent and grand,
'Twas he the famous temple planned,
(The seraph in his soul)
Foremost to give the Lord his dues,
Foremost to bless the welcome news,
And foremost to condole.

Good—from Jehudah's genuine vein,
From God's best nature, good in grain,
His aspect and his heart
To pity, to forgive, to save,
Witness En gedi's conscious cave,
And Shimei's blunted dart

Clean—if perpetual prayer be pure,
And love, which could itself inure
To fasting and to fear—
Clean in his gestures, hands, and feet,
To smite the lyre, the dance complete,
To play the sword and spear

Sublime—invention ever young,
Of vast conception, towering tongue,
To God the eternal theme,
Notes from you exaltations caught,
Unrivalled royalty of thought,
O er meaner strains supreme.

Contemplative—on God to fix

His musings, and above the six

The Sabbath day he hlest,

'Twas then his thoughts self-conquest pruned,

And heavenly melancholy tuned,

To bless and bear the rest

Serene—to sow the seeds of peace,
Remembering when he watched the fleece
How sweeth Kidron purled—
To further knowledge, silence vice,
And plant perpetual paradise,
When God had calmed the world.

Strong—in the Lord, who could defy Satan, and all his powers that lie In sempiternal night, And hell, and horror, and despair Were as the lion and the bear To his undaunted might

Constant—in love to God, the Truth, Age, manhood, infancy, and youth—
To Jonathan his friend Constant hevond the verge of death,
And /iba and Mephibosheth
His endless frime attend.

Pleasant—and various as the year, Man, soul, and angel vithout peer, Priest, champion, sage, and boy, In armour or in ephod elad, His pomp, his piety was glad, Majestie was his joy

Wise—in recovery from his fall,
Whence rose his eminence o'er all,
Of all the most reviled,
The light of Israel in his ways,
Wise are his precepts, prayer, and praise,
And counsel to his child

His muse, hright angel of his verse, Gives balm for all the thorns that pierce, For all the pangs that rage, Blest light, still gaining on the gloom, The more than Michal of his bloom The Abishag of his age.

He sang of God—the mighty source
Of all things—the stupendous force
On which all strength depends,
From whose right arm, beneath whose eyes,
All period power, and enterprise
Commences, reigns, and ends

Angels—their ministry and meed,
Which to and fro with blessings speed,
Or with their citterns wait,
Where Michael, with his millions, bows,
Where dwells the scraph and his spouse,
The cherub and her mate

Of man—the semblance and effect
Of God and love—the saint elect
For infinite applause—
To rule the land, and briny broad,
To be laborious in his laud,
And heroes in his cause.

The world—the clustering spheres he made,
The glorious light, the soothing shade,
Dale, champing, grove, and hill,
The multitudinous abyss,
Where secreey remains in bliss,
And wisdom hides her skill.

Trees, plants, and flowers—of virtuous root,
Gem yielding blossom, vielding fruit,
Choice gums and precious balm,
Bless ye the nosegry in the vale,
And with the sweetness of the gale
Enrich the thankful psalm

Of fowl-e'en every beak and wing Which cheer the winter, hail the spring, That hive in peace, or prey, They that make music, or that mock, The quail, the brave domestic cock, The raven, swan, and jay

Of fishes—every size and shape,
Which nature frames of light escape,
Devouring man to shun
The shells are in the wealthy deep,
The shoals upon the surface leap,
And love the glaneing sun

Of beasts—the beaver plods his task,
While the sleek tigers roll and bask,
Nor yet the shades aronse,
Her cave the mining concy scoops,
Where o'er the mead the mountain stoops,
The kids exult and browse

Of gems—their virtue and their price, Which, hid in earth from man's device, Their darts of lustre sheath, The jasper of the master's stamp, The topiz blazing like a lamp, Among the mines beneath.

Blest was the tenderness he felt,
When to his graceful harp he knelt,
And did for audience call
When Satan with his hand he quelled,
And in screne suspense he held
The frantie throes of Saul

His furious foes no more maligned As he such melody divined, And sense and soul detained, Now striking strong, now southing soft, He sent the godly sounds aloft, Or in delight refrained. When up to heaven his thoughts he piled, I rom fervent hips fair Michal smiled,
As blush to blush she stood.
And chose herself the queen, and gave Her utinost from her heart—" so brave,
And plays his hymns so good."

The pillars of the Lord are seven,
Which stand from earth to topmort heaven,
His wisdom drev the plan,
His Word accomplished the design
I rom brightest gem to deepest mine
I rom Christ enthroned to man

O David, scholar of the I ord.
Such is thy science, whence revard,
And infinite degree.
O strength, O sweetness, Jasting ripe.
God sharp thy symbol, and thy type
The hon and the bee.

There is but One who he er rebelled, But One by passion unimpelled
By pleasures unenticed
He from himself his semblance sent,
Grand object of his own content,
And saw the God in Christ

'Tell them, I Am,' Jehovah said
To Moses—while earth heard in dread,
And, snutten to the heart,
At once above—beneath, around,
All nature, without voice or sound,
Replied—'O Lord, Thou Art.'

Sweet is the dew that falls betimes And drops upon the leafy limes. Sweet Hermon's fragrant air. Sweet is the hily soliter bell.

And sweet the wakeful tapers smell. That watch for early priver.

Sweet the young nurse with love intense,
Which smiles o'er sleeping innocence
Sweet when the lost arrive
Sweet the musician's ordour beats
While his vague mind s in quest of speets,
The choicest flowers to have Sweeter in all the strains of love The language of thy turtle dove Paired to thy swelling chord, Sweeter with every grace endued The glory of thy gratitude Respired unto the Lord

Strong is the horse upon his speed,
Strong in pursuit the ripid glede,
Which makes nt once his game
Strong the tall ostrich on the ground Strong thro' the turbulent profound Shoots yiphias to his aum

Strong is the hon—like a coal
His eyeball—like a bastion's mole
His chest against the foes
Strong, the gier-eagle on his sail Strong against tide th' enormous whale Emerges as he goes.

But stronger still, in earth and air, And in the sca, the man of prayer, And for beneath the tide, And in the sent to faith as igned, Where asl is have, where seek is find, Where knock is open wide

Clorious the sun in iniderreer, Clorious th' as embled fires appear, Glorious the comet strain Glorious the triumpet and alarm, Glorious th' almighty stretched-out arm, Glorious th' enraptured main

Glorious the northern lights astream, Glorious the son, when God's the there, Glorious the thurders roor Glorious, hosanna from the den, Glorious the entholic amen, Glorious the manyr's gore

Glorious—more glorious—is the crown Of hun that brought salvation down,

He merkness call d the Son,
Thor that stapen lous truth believed,
And no vithe matchies decis achieved Determined dand, and done.

William Wason (1724-97, the friend and literary executor of Gray, long survived the association which did him so much honour but he had appeared early as a poet. Born at Hull, the un of a clergyman he took his BA from St John's College, Cambridge, in 1745, and was elected 2 Fellow of Pembroke through the influence of Grav, who had been attracted to him by his Maix ? (1747), a lament for Pope in imitation of Lieda To his poem Isis (1748) an attack on the Jacobi is of Oxford, Thomas Warton replied in his In orfa of Isis In 1753 appeared his trageds of Elfric 'written,' as Southey said 'on an artificial model, and in a gorgeous diction, because he thought Shakespeare had precluded all hope of excellen e Vincon's model 725 in any other form of drama the Greek drains and he introduced into his par the classic accompaniment of the chorus A second drama, Caractacus (1759), is of a higher cast than Elfrida sumpler in language, and of more sus tained dignity in scenes situations and character Mason also wrote odes on Inaependence, Memory, Melancholy, and the Fall of Tyranny in which his sonorous diction swells into extravigance and bombast. His longest poetical vorl is his Fri lish Garden, a descriptive poem in four books of blank verse (1772-82) He also indited odes '0 the naval officers of Great Britain, to the Honour able William Pitt, and in commemorition of the Revolution of 1688 Under the name of Malcolm Macgregor, he published in quite another vein An Heroic Epistle to Sir William Clambers, Kright (1773), in which the taste for Chinese pagodas and Eastern bowers is cleverly ridiculed. Gray left him a legacy of £500, together with his books and manuscripts, and Mason in 1775 published his friend's poems with a memoir. In that memoir he made a greater and more important innovation than he had done in his dramas, instead of presenting the continuous narrative in which the biographer alone is heard, he incorporated the poet's journals and letters in chronological order, thus making the subject of the memoir in some degree his own biographer. This plan was afterwards adopted by Bosv ell in his Life of Johnson Mason became vicar of Aston in Yorkshire in 1754 and Canon of York in 1762. When politics ran high he took an active part on the side of the Whigs, but retained the respect of all parties poetry is lamentably lacking in simplicity, yet at times his rich diction has a fine effect. In his English Garden, though it is verbose and languid as a whole, there are some fine things quoted as 'superlative' from one of the odes

While through the west, where sinks the crimson day, Meek twilight slowly sails, and waves her banoers gray

Apostrophe to England.

In thy fair domain, Les, my loved Albion' many a glade is found, The liaont of wood-gods only, where if Art E'er dared to tread, twas with unsandalled foot, Printless, as if the place were holy ground And there are scenes where, though she whilom trod, Led by the worst of guides fell Tyranny, And ruthless superstition, we now trace Her footsteps with delight, and pleased revere What once had roused our hatred Put to Time. Not her, the praise is due. Ins gradual touch Has mouldered into beauty many a tower Which, when it frowned with all its battlements, Was only terrible and many a fanc Monastic, which, when decked with all its spires, Served bot to feed some pampered abbot's pride, And two the unlettered vulgar

Snowdon

Mona on Snowdon calls Hear, thoo king of mountains, hear, Hark, she speaks from all her strings Hark, her loudest echo riogs, King of mountains, bend thioe car Send thy spirits, send them soon, Now, when midnight and the moon Meet upon thy front of snow See, their gold and ebon rod, Where the sober sisters nod And greet in whispers sage and slow Snowdon, mark tis magic s hoor Now the muttered spell hath power, Power to rend thy ribs of rock, And burst thy base with thunder's shock But to thee no ruder spell Shall Mona u.e, than those that dwell In music's secret cells and he Steeped in the stream of harmony Sno vilon has heard the strain Hark, amid the wondering grove Other harpings answer clear Other voices meet our ear Piotons flutter, shadows move,

Busy murmurs hum around
Rustling vestments brush the ground,
Round and round, and round they go,
Throogh the twilight, throogh the shade,
Mount the oak's majestic head
And gild the tufted misletoe.
Cease we glittering race of light,
Close your wings, and check your flight,
Here, arranged in order due,
Spread your robes of saffron hue,
For lo' with more than mortal fire,
Mighty Mador smites the lyre
Hark, he sweeps the master strings'

Epitaph on his Wife

Take, holy earth! all that my soul holds dear Take that best gift which Heaven so lately gave To I ristol's fount I bore with trembling care.
Her faded form, she bowed to taste the wave,
And died! Does youth, does beauty, read the line?
Does sympathetic fear their breasts alarm?
Speak, dead Maria! breathe a strain divine,
Even from the grave thou shalt have power to charm.
Bid them be chaste, be innocent, like thee
Bid them in duty's sphere as meekly move,
And if so fair, from vanity as free
As firm in friendship and as fond in love

Tell them, though 'tis an awful thing to die—
Twas e'en to thee—yet the dread path once trod, Heaven lifts its everlasting portals high,
And bids the pure in heart behold their God

The last four lines which form a worthy climax to the whole, were added by Gray

George Campbell (1719-96), minister in Aberdeen and Princip il of Marischal College, was a theologian and critic of vigorous intellect and various learning. His Dissertation on Miracles. (1762), written in reply to Hume, vas at the time greatly admired as a masterly piece of reasoning, and his Philosophy of Rhetoric, published in 1776 was praised (unreasonably) as perhaps the best book of the kind since Aristotle but may yet be studied as an acute and well written statement of contemporary critical opinion. Other works were a Translation of the Four Gospels, some sermons, and a series of Lectures on Ecclesiastical History Hume admitted the ingenuity of Campbell's reply to his thesis on the impossibility of proving a miracle Hume's contention was that no testimony for any kind of miracle can ever amount to a probability. much less to a proof. Miracles can only be proved by testimony, and no testimony can be so strong as our own experience of the uniformity of nature Campbell argued that testimony has a natural and original influence on belief, antecedent to expenence and insisted that the earliest assent which is given to testimony by children, and which is previous to all experience is in fact the most un-The improbability of an event may be outweighed by slight direct evidence. His answer was divided into two parts that miracles are capable of proof from testimony religious miracles not less than o hers, and that the miracles on which the belief of Christianity is founded are sufficiently attested. The following paragraph is characteristic.

I do not hesitate to affirm that our religion has been indebted to the attempts, though not to the intenti ns, They have tried its trength, of its bitterest encinies indeed, and, by trying, they have displayed its strength, and that in so clear a light, as we could never have hoped, without such a trial, to have viewed it in them, therefore, write, let them argue, and when arguments ful, even let them eavil against religion as much as they please. I should be heartily sorry that ever in this island, the asylum of liberty, where the spirit of Christianity is better understood-however defective the inhabitants are in the observance of its precepts—than in any other part of the Christian world, I should, I say, be sorry that in this island so great a dieservice were done to religion as to check its adversaries in any other way than by returning a candid answer to their objections. I must at the same time acknowledge, that I am both ashamed and grieved when I ob erve any friends of religion betray so great a diffidence in the goodnes of their cause—for to this diffidence alone can it be imputed -15 to sliew nn inclination for recurring to more forelble The assaults of infidels, I may venture to prophesy, will never overturn our religion prove not more hurtful to the Christian system, if it be allowed to compare small things with the greate t, than the boisterous winds are said to prove to the sturds They slinke it impetuously for a time, and loudly threaten its subversion, whilst in effect they only some to make it strike its roots the deeper, and stand the finner ever after

Richard Hund (1720-1808), called the Beauty of Holiness' on account of his comcliness and picty, was born at Congreve in Staffordshire, and became a Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1742 In 1750 he became a Whitchall preacher, in 1774 Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1781 of Woicester Among his many works, theological and other, were a Commentary on Horace's 1rs Poetica (1749), Dissertations or Poetry (1755-57), Dialogues on Sincerty (1759), lus most popular book, Letters on Chivalry and Romance (1762), which revived interest in an unfashionable subject, and promoted the tendency towards romanticism in literary taste, Dialogues on Foreign Travel (1764), and An Introduction to the Prophecies (1772) He was long a very conspicuous and 'representative' author, Gibbon knew 'few writers more deserving of the great though prostituted name of the critic,' but he is now rarely cited and more rarely read. A collected edition of his works appeared in eight volumes in 1811, there is a memoir by Kilvert (1860)

Richard Price (1723-91), a Nonconformist dume, published in 1758 A Review of the Principal Questions and Difficulties in Morals, which attracted attention as 'an attempt to revive the intellectual theory of moral obligation, which seemed to have fallen under the attacks of Butler, Hutcheson, and Hume, even before Smith' The son of a minister at Tynton in Glamorgan, Price

it seventeen went to a Dissenting academ, in I ondon, became a preacher at Newington Green ind Hirliney, and established a reputation by but Remero and a worl on the Importance of Chris In 1769 he was made DD by tiamty (1765) Glasjon, and published his Treatise on Rear sionary Payments, the celebrated Northampton Mortality Tables, and other books on finance and political economy. In 1771 appeared his Appeal or the National Debt, in 1776 his Olser alters or Civil Liberty and the War with America, which brought him an invitation from Congress to assist in regulating its finances. He tool an active part in the political questions of the dr, at the time of the I reach Revolution. He was a republican in principle, and was attacked by Burke in his Refer tions or the Revolution In his great ethical treatise, Price, after Cudworth, supports the doc trine that moral distinctions being perceived by reason, or the understanding, are equally ramor ible with all other kinds of truth. Actions are in themselves right or wrong right and vrong are simple ideas incapable of analysis, and are given us by the intintive power of the reason There is a Life of Price b or understanding Morgan (1815) The following extract from the chapter in the Owier at eas on English police towards America, published while the var was in progress, shows how hearty were some of the sup porters the colonists found in the home di 18105 of the Empire, as Price already called the British donunious

Our governor, ever since I can remember, have been jenious that the Colonies, some time or o her, would throw off their dependence. The jealous was not founded on any of their acts or declarations. Ther have always, while at peace with us, disclaimed are such design and they have continued to disclaim it since they have been at war with us. I have re 27 indeed, to believe that independency it, even at the moment, generally dreaded among them as a calmute to which they are in danger of being driven, in order to woul a greater - The jealousy I have menumel vas, however, natural, and betrayed a secret opinio that the subjection in which they were held was more than we could expect them always to endure. In such circumstances, all possible care should have been taken to give them no reason for discontent and to preserve them in subjection, by keeping in that line of conduct to which custom had reconciled them, or at least never deviating from it, except with great caution and particularly, by avoiding all direct attacks on their Had we done this, the property and legislations different interests of so many states scattered over a vast continent, joined to our own prudence and modera tion, would have enabled us to maintain them in dependence for ages to come.—But instead of this how have we acted?—It is in truth too evident that our whole conduct, instead of being directed by that sound policy and foresight which in such circum stances were absolutely necessary, has been nothing (to say the best of it) but a series of the blindest ngour followed by retractation, of violence followed by con cession, of mistake, weakness and inconsistency

A recital of a few facts within everybody's recollection will fully prove this.

In the 6th of George the Second, an act was passed for imposing certain duties on all foreign spirits, molasses and sugars imported into the plantations In this act, the duties imposed are said to be given and granted by the Parliament to the King, and this is the first American act in which these words have been used But notwithstanding this, as the act had the appearance of being only a regulation of trade, the colonies submitted to it, and a small direct revenue was drawn by it from them --- In the 4th of the present reign, many alterations were made in this act, with the declared purpose of making provision for raising a revenue in America. This alarmed the Colonies, and produced discontents and remonstrances, which might have convinced our rulers this vas tender ground, on which it became them to tread very gently -- There is, however, no reason to doubt but in time they would have sunk into a quiet sub mission to this revenue act, as being at worst only the exercise of a power which then they seem not to have thought much of contesting, I mean, the power of taxing them externally -But before they had time to cool, a worse provocation was given them, and This being an attempt the Stamp-Act was passed to tax them internally, and a direct attack on their property, by a power which would not suffer itself to be questioned, which eased itself by lording them, and to which it was impossible to fix any bounds, they were thrown at once, from one end of the continent to the other, into resistance and rage --- Govern ment, dreading the consequences, gave way, and the Parliament (upon a change of ministry) repealed the Stamp Act, without requiring from them any recognition of its anthority, or doing any more to preserve its dignity, than asserting by the declaratory law, that it was possessed of full power and authority to make laws to bind them in all cases whatever --- Upon this peace was restored, and, had no further nttempts of the same kind been made, they would undoubtedly have suffered us (as the people of Ireland have done) to enjoy quietly our declaratory law They would have recovered their former habits of subjection, and our connection with them might have continued an increasing source of our wealth and glory -But the spirit of despotism and marice, always blind and restless, soon broke forth again. The scheme for drawing a revenue from America, by parliamentary taxation, was resumed, and in a little more than a year after the repeal of the Stamp Act, when all was peace, a third act was passed, imposing duties payable in America on ten, paper, glass, painters colours, &c -- This, as might have been expected, revived all the former heats, and the Limpire was a second time threatened vith the most dangerous commotions. --- Government receded again, and the Parliament (under another change of ministra) repealed all the obnoxious duties except that upon tea. This exception was made in order to main ain a shew of dignity. But it was in reality, sacrificing safety to pride and leaving a spinter in the wound to produce a gangrene - For some time, however, this relaxation answered its intended purpose. Our commercial intercourse with the Colonies was again recovered, and they avoided nothing but that tea which we had excepted in our repeal. In this state would things have remained, and even tea would perhaps in time have been graduall, admitted, had not the evil genius of Britain stepped forth once more to embroil the Impire.

The East India Company having fallen under diffi culties, partly in consequence of the loss of the Anierican market for tea, a scheme was formed for assisting them by an attempt to recover that market. With this view an act was passed to enable them to export their ten to America free of all duties here, and subject only to 3d per pound duty, payable in By this expedient they were enabled to offer it at a low price, and it was expected the con sequence would prove that the Colonies would be tempted by it, a precedent gained for taxing them, and at the same time the company relieved were, therefore, fitted out, and large cargoes sent The snare was too gross to escape the notice of the They saw it, and spurned at it refused to admit the tea, and at Boston some persons in disguise buried it in the sea .-- Had our governors in this case satisfied themselves with requiring a compensation from the province for the damage done, there is no doubt but it would have been granted Or had they proceeded no further in the infliction of punishment than stopping up the port and destroying the trade of Boston till compensation was made, the province might possibly liave submitted, and a sufficient saving would have been grined for the honour of the But having hitherto proceeded without wisdom, they observed now no bounds in their resentment the Boston port bill was added a bill which destroyed the chartered government of the province, a bill which withdrew from the jurisdiction of the province persons who in particular cases should commit inorder, and the Quebee bill. At the same time a strong body of troops was stationed at Boston to enforce obedience to these bills

All who knew any thing of the temper of the Colonies can that the effect of this sudden accumulation of vengeance, would probably be not intimiditing but exasperating them, and driving them into a general revolt. But our ministers had different apprehensions. They believed that the malecontents in the Coloni of Massachusetts were a small party headed by a few factious men, that the majority of the people would tall the side of government, as soon as they saw a force among them capable of supporting them, that at worst the Colonies in general would never make a common cause with this province, and that the issue would prove in a few months order, tranquillity and suhmission—Every one of these apprehensions was falsified by the events that followed

When the bills I have mentioned came to be carried into execution, the whole Province was thrown into confusion. Their courts of justice were shut up and all government was dissolved. The commander in chief found at necessary to fortify himself in Loron, and the other Colomes immediately resolved to make a common cause with this Coloms.

Disappointed by these consequences our ministers took fright. Once more they made an effort to retreat but indeed the most ungracious one that can well be imagined. A proposal was sent to the Color is called Conciliators, and the substance of which was that if any of them would raise such some as should be his imaginations and reflections, attentive, penetrating, and subtle in what relates to his fellow creatures, firm and ardent in his purposes, devoted to friendship or to enmity, jealous of his independence and his honour. which he will not relinquish for safety or for profit, under all his corruptions or improvements, he retains his natural sensibility, if not his force, and his commerce is a blessing or a curse, according to the direction his mind has received. But under the extremes of heat or of cold, the active range of the human soul appears to be limited, and men arc of inferior importance, either as friends or as encines. In the one extreme, they are dull and slow, moderate in their desires, regular and pacific in their manner of life, in the other, they are feverish in their passions, weak in their judgments, and addicted by temperament to animal pleasure. In both, the heart is mercenary, and makes important concessions for childish bribes in both, the spirit is prepared for servitude, in the one, it is subdued by fear of the future, in the other, it is not roused even by its sense of the present

David Garrick (1717-79), the greatest of all English actors, was also author of some dramatic pieces. He was a native of Hereford, though his family belonged to Lichfield, where he got most of his schooling, for a few months only he was a pupil of Samuel Johnson at Edial, and with him he came to London in 1737 to push his He entered himself a student of Lin coln's Inn, but receiving a legacy of £1000 from an uncle who had been in the wine-trade in Lisbon, he commenced business, in partnership with an elder brother, as wine-merchant of London and Lichfield A passion for the stage led him into a new life. In 1741 he appeared at Ipswich in Southerne's Oroonoko, in the same year his success as Richard III in London was immense. His merits quickly raised him to the head of his profession, the traditional formality disappeared before the perfect naturalness of the new actor, great alike in tragedy, comedy, and farce. As the manager of Drury Lane Theatre for a long course of years (1747-76), he bunished from the stage-or reconstructed -many plays of vulgar and immoral type, and his personal character, though marked by vanity and other foibles, gave a dignity and respectability to the profession of an actor author he was more lively and various than imposing or original. He wrote some epigrams, and even ventured on an ode or two, his forty dramatic pieces many of them adaptations, are of no great importance, indeed, but some of his many prologues and epilogues, to other people's plays as well as his own, are admirable. 'A fellow feeling makes one wondrous kind' comes from Garrick's last prologue, and not from Shakespeare, though it is doubtless based on 'A touch of nature makes the whole world kin' in its usual acceptation, the credit of Garrick's line is often given to Byron who quotes it in English Bards with 'one' changed to 'us' 'The Devil's sooner raised than laid' is from Garrick's prologue to the School for Scandal His best-known ode is that 'upon dedicating a Building and erecting a Statue to Shakespeare at Stratford-on-Avon,' his best song that called 'Peggy,' and addressed to Peg Woffington, and his most famous prologue that spoken by him on occasion of his last performance in 1776, when he played the part of Don Felix in Mrs Centlivre's play, A Wonder (see above at page 96)

An Occasional Prologue

A Veteran see! whose last act on the stage Intreats your smiles for sickness and for age, Their cause I plead, plead it in heart and mind, A fellow feeling makes one wondrous kind!

DAVID GARRICK
From the Portrait by R. E. Pine in the National Portrait Gallery

Might we but hope your zeal would not be less When I am gone, to patronize distress, That hope obtain'd the wish'd for end secures, To soothe their cares, who oft have lighten'd yours

Shall the great heroes of celestial line, Who drank full bowls of Greek and Roman wine, Cæsar and Brutus, Agamemnon, Hector, Nay, Jove lumself, who here has quaff'd his nectar ! Shall they, who govern d fortune, eringe and court her, Thirst in their age, and call in vain for porter? Like Belisarius, tax the pitying street, With 'date obolium,' to all they meet? Shan't I who oft have drench d my hands in gore, Stabb'd many, porson'd some beheaded more, Who numbers slew in battle on this plain, Shan't I, the slaver, try to feed the slain? Brother to all, with equal love I view The men who slew me, and the men I slew I must, I will, this happy project seize, That those too old and weak may live with ease.

Char I on mean, sir, they prove the object a trifle.

Sery Why, you pert jade, do you play on my words?

I say Sir Luke is——

Char Nobody

Sery Nobody! how the deuce do you make that out? He is neither a person attainted nor outlawed, may in any of his majesty's courts sue or be sued, appear by attorney or in propriâ persona, can acquire, buy, procure, purchase, possess, and inherit, not only per sonalities, such as goods and chattels, but even realities, as all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whatsoever and wheresoever

Char Bnt, sir-

Sery Nay further, child, he may sell, give, bestow, bequeath, devise, demise, lease, or to farm let, ditto lands, to any person whomsoever—and——

Char Without doubt, sir, but there are, notwith standing, in this town a great number of nobodies, not described by Lord Coke.

Sir Lune Limp (who has entered and joined in the conversation, reads a card presented b; a servant) 'Sir Gregory Goose desires the honour of Sir Luke Limp's company to dine. An answer is desired' Gadso' a little unlucky, I have been engaged for these three weeks.

Sery What I find Sir Gregory is returned for the corporation of Fleecem.

Sir Luke Is he so? Oh, oh! that alters the case. George, give my compliments to Sir Gregory, and I'll certainly come and dine there. Order Joe to run to Alderman Inkles in Threadneedle Street, sorry can t wait upon him, but confined to bed two days with the new influenza.

[Exit Servant

Char You make light, Sir Linke, of these sort of engagements.

Sir Lule What can a man do? These fellows—when one has the misfortune to meet them—take scandalous advantage when will you do me the honour, pray, Sir Luke, to take a hit of mutton with me? Do you name the day? They are as bad as a beggar who attacks your coach at the mounting of a hill, there is no getting rid of them without a penny to one, and a promise to t'other Sery True, and then for such a time too—three weeks!

I wonder they expect folks to remember. It is like a retainer in Michaelmas term for the summer assizes.

Str Luke Not but upon these occasions no man in England is more punctual than—— [Enter Servant with letter

From whom?

Serv Earl of Brentford. The servant waits for an answer

Str Luke Answer! By your leave, Mr Serjeant and Charlotte. [Reads] 'Taste for music—Mons. Duport—fail—dinner upon table at five' Gadso! I hope Str Gregory's servant an't gone.

Sera Immediately upon receiving the answer

Sir Luke Run after him as fast as you can—tell him quite in despair—recollect an engagement that can't in nature be missed, and return in an instant. [Exit Servaul

Char You see, sir, the I night must give way for my

Str Lule No, faith, it is not that, my dear Charlotte, you saw that was quite an extempore business. No, hang it, no, it is not for the title, but, to tell you the truth, Brentford has more wit than any man in the world it is that makes me fond of his house.

Char By the choice of his company he gives an unanswerable instance of that

Sir Luke You are right, my dear girl But now to give you a proof of his wit, you know Brentford's finances are a little out of repair, which procures him some visits that he would very gladly excuse.

Sery What need he fear? His person is sacred, for by the tenth of William and Mary—

Sir Luke He knows that well enough, but for all that-

Sery Indeed, by a late act of his own house—which does them infinite honour—his goods or chattels may

Sir Luke Seized upon when they can find them, hut he lives in ready furnished lodgings, and lires his coach by the month

Sery Nay, if the sheriff return 'non inventus.'

Sir Luke A plague o' your law, you make me lose sight of my story. One morning a Welsh coachinaler came with his bill to my lord, whose name was unluckily Lloyd. My lord had the man up. You are called, I think, Mr Lloyd? At your lordships service, my lord. What, Lloyd with an L. It was with an L, indeed, my lord. Because in your part of the world I have heard that Lloyd and Flloyd were synonymous, the very same names. Very often indeed, my lord. But you always spell yours with an L? Always. That, Mr Lloyd, is a little unlucky, for you must know I am now paying my dehts alphabetically, and in four or five years you might have come in with an F, but I am afraid I can give you no hopes for your L. Ha, ha, ha!

Servant (entering) There was no overtaking the servant

Sir Luke That is unlucky tell my lord I il attend him. I'll call on Sir Gregory myself [Exit Servant Ser] Why, you won't leave us, Sir Luke?

Sir Luke Pardon, dear Serjeant and Charlotte, have a thousand things to do for half a million of people, post tively, promised to procure a husband for Lady Cicely Sulky, and match a coach horse for Brigadier Whip, after that, must run into the city to borrow a thousand for young At all at Almack's, send a Cheshire cheese by the stage to Sir Timothy Tankard in Suffolk, and get at the Heralds' Office a coat of arms to clap on the coach of Billy Bengal, a nabob newly arrived, so you see I have not a moment to lose.

Sery True, true.

Sir Luke At your toilet to morrow you may—— [Servant, entering abruptly, runs against Sir Luke] Can't you see where you are running, you rascal?

Serv Sir, his grace the Duke of-

Sir Luke Grace! Where is he? Where-

Serv In his coach at the door If you an't better engaged, would be glad of your company to go into the city, and take a dinner at Dolly's

Sir Luke In his own coach, did you say?

Serv Yes, sir

Sir Luke With the coronets-or-

Serv I believe so

Sir Luke There's no resisting of that Bid Joe run to Sir Gregory Goose's.

Serv He is already gone to Alderman Inkle's

Sir Luke Then do you step to the knight—liey!—no—you must go to my lord's—hold, hold, no—I have it—step first to Sir Greg's, then pop in at Lord Brentford's just as the company are going to dinner

Serv What shall I say to Sir Gregory?
Sir Luke Anything—what I told you before

Serv And what to my lord?

Str Ltike What !—Why, tell him that my uncle from Epsom—no—that won't do, for he knows I don't care a farthing for him—hey! Why, tell him—hold, I have it Tell him that as I was going into my chair to obey his commands, I was arrested by a couple of bailiffs, forced into a hackney coach, and carried into the Pied Bull in the Borough, I beg ten thousand pardons for making his grace wait, but his grace knows my misfor——

[Exeunt Sir Luke and Servant

Char Well, sir, what d'ye think of the proofs? I flatter myself I have pretty well established my case

Sery Why, hussy, you have hit upon points, but then they are but trifling flaws, they don't vitiate the title, that stands unimpeached.

There are Lives of Foote by William Cool e and by John Bee, prefixed to editions of his works (1805 and 1830) Forster s Litays and most of the books dealing with the stage in his time discuss Foote.

Christopher Anstey (1724–1805) was author of the New Bath Guide, a light satirical and humorous poem, which set an example often since followed with success Smollett, in his Humphry Clinker, published five years later, might be almost said to have given us part of the New Bath Guide in prose. Many of the characters and situations are exactly the same as those of Anstey The poem is pitched mainly in conversational tone, and is easy, sportive, and entertaining, its swinging rhythms and varying rhymes seem hardly less modern than the Ingoldsby Legends, of which the modern reader is instinctively reminded The fashionable Fribbles of the day, the chat, scandal, and amusements, and the cant of some sectarians, are depicted with force and liveliness, if not without a touch of Anstey was son of the Rev Anstey, rector of Brinkley in Cambridgeshire, who possessed a landed property the poet afterwards inherited He was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, and in both places he distinguished himself as a classical scholar graduated BA in 1746, but in consequence of his refusal to deliver certain declamations, Anstey quarrelled with the heads of the university, and was denied the master's degree. In the epilogue to the New Bath Guide he alludes to this circumstance Granta, sweet Granta, where studious of ease, Seven years did I sleep, and then lost my degrees.

In 1756 he married the sister of his friend John Calvert of Albury Hall, in Hertfordshire, through whose influence he was returned to Parliament for the borough of Hertford. He was a frequent resident in Bath, and a favourite in the fashionable and literary coteries of the place. In 1766 was published his famous jett d'esprit, a letter in a variety of rhymcs, in which the fun is more noticeable than the poetry. He wrote various other pieces, but while the New Bath Guide was 'the only thing in fashion,' and relished for its novel and original kind of humour, the other productions of Anstey—including clegies, occasional pieces, a Pindaric ode on prize fighting, as well as a Latin version of Gray's Elegy—were neglected by the public, and have never been revived. On his paternal estate the poet was independent of a literary income, and he cheerfully took part in the sports of the field up to his eightieth year.

The Public Breakfast

Now my lord had the honour of coming down post, To pay his respects to so famous a toast, In hopes he her ladyship's favour might win, By playing the part of a host at an inn I'm sure lic's a person of great resolution, Though delicate nerves, and a weak constitution, For he carried us all to a place 'cross the nver, And youed that the rooms were too hot for his liver He said it would greatly our pleasure promote, If we all for Spring Gardens set out in a boat I never as yet could his reason explain, Why we all sallied forth in the wind and the rain, For sure such confusion was never yet known, Here a cap and a hat, there a cardinal blown While his lordship, embroidered and powdered all o'a, Was bowing, and handing the ladies ashore How the Misses did huddle, and scuddle, and run, One would think to be wet must be very good fun, For by waggling their tails, they all seemed to take pains

To moisten their pinions like ducks when it rains, And 'twas pretty to see how, like birds of a feather, The people of quality flocked all together, All pressing, addressing, caressing, and fond, Just the same as these animals are in a pond You've read all their names in the news, I suppose, But, for fear you have not, take the list as it goes,

There was Lady Greasewister, And Madain Van Twister, Her ladyship's sister Lord Crum, and Lord Vulter, Sir Brandish O'Culter, With Marshal Carouzer, And old Lady Mouzer,

And the great Hanoverian Baron Panzmowzer Besides many others who all in the rain went, to
On purpose to honour this great entertainment
The company made a most brilliant appearant
And ate bread and butter with great persever
All the chocolate too, that my lord set before
The ladies despatched with the utmost decont Soft musical numbers were heard all around, to The horns and the clarious echoing sound

Sweet were the strains, as odorous gales though blow
O'er fragrant banks, where pinks and rose
The peer was quite ravished, while close to least Lady Bunbutter, in beautiful pride!
Off turning his eyes, he with impure surveyed
All the powerful charms she so nobly displayed
As when at the feast of the great Alexander, Timotheus, the musical son of Thersander, Breathed heavenly measures

The prince was in puin, And could not contain, While Thus was sitting beside him, But, before all his peers,
Was for sbaking the spheres,
Snch goods the kind gods did provide him
Grew bolder and bolder,
And cocked up his shoulder,
Like the son of great Jupiter Ammon,
Till at length, quite opprest,
He sunk on her breast,

And lay there, as dead as a salmon Oh! had I a voice that was stronger than steel With twice fifty tongues to express what I feel, And as many good months, yet I never could utter All the speeches my lord made to Lady Bunbutter! So polite all the time, that he ne'er tonehed a bit, While she are up his rolls and applanded his wit For they tell me that men of true taste, when they treat, Should talk a great deal, but they never should eat And if that be the fashion, I never will give Any grand entertainment as long as I live For I'm of opinion, 'tis proper to cheer The stomach and bowels as well as the ear Nor me did the charming concerto of Abel Regale like the breakfast I saw on the table I freely will own I the mussins preserred To all the genteel conversation I heard E'en though I'd the honour of sitting between My Lady Stuff damask and Peggy Moreen, Who both flew to Bath in the nightly machine. Cries Peggy 'This place is enchantingly pretty, We never can see such a thing in the city You may spend all your lifetime in Cateaton Street, And never so civil a gentleman meet, [through, You may talk what you please, you may search London You may go to Carlisles, and to Almaek's too, And I'll give you my head if you find such a host, For coffee, tea, chocolate, butter, and toast How he welcomes at once all the world and his wife, And how civil to folk he ne'er saw in his life " 'These horns,' cries my lady, 'so tickle one's car, Lard I what would I give that Sir Simon was here! To the next public breakfast Sir Simon shall go, For I find here are folks one may venture to know Sir Simon would gladly his lordship attend, And my lord would be pleased with so cheerful a friend '

So when we had wasted more bread at a breakfast Than the poor of our parish have ate for this week past, I saw, all at once, a prodigious great throng Come bustling, and rustling, and jostling along, For his lordship was pleased that the company now To my Lady Bunbutter should curtsy and bow, And my lady was pleased too, and seemed vastly proud At once to receive all the thanks of a crowd And when, like Chaldeans, we all had adored This beautiful image set up by my lord, Some few insignificant folk went away, Inst to follow the employments and calls of the day, But those who knew better their time how to spend, The fiddling and dancing all chose to attend Miss Clunch and Sir Toby performed a cotillion, Just the same as onr Susan and Bob the postilion, All the while her mamma was expressing her joy, That her daughter the morning so well could employ Now, why should the Muse, my dear mother, relate The misfortnnes that fall to the lot of the great? As homeward we came-'tis with sorrow you'll hear What a dreadful disaster attended the peer,

For whether some envious god had decreed
That a Naiad should long to ennoble the breed,
Or whether his lordship was charmed to behold
His face in the stream, like Narcissus of old,
In handing old Lady B—— and daughter,
This obsequious lord tumbled into the water,
But a nymph of the flood brought him safe to the boat,
And I left all the ladies a cleaning his coat.

Lord Monboddo (1714-99), a Scottish judge and author whose eccentricity has been extravagantly emphasised at the expense of his singular acuteness, learning, and independence, was born at Monboddo House in Fordoun parish, Kincardine, and educated at Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Groningen, called to the Bar in 1737, and in 1767 raised to the Scottish Bench, when his own name, James Burnett, was superseded by the title of Lord Monboddo From his college days he was an enthusiastic student of Greek, and throughout life remained a worshipper of Homer and of Greek philosophy He despised Locke and suspected Hume, took little interest in Newton's system, and admired Shaftesbury and other moderns in so far as they were inspired with the classical spirit. He was a really learned civilian, distinguished himself in the famous Douglas cause, and was a highly respected judge. But it is not as lawyer, nor yet as author of the Essay on the Origin and Progress of Language (6 vols 1773-92) and Antient Metaphysics (6 vols 1779-99), that he is remembered, his character in his lifetime and his memory since his death have been mainly those of an eccentric whose perversity verged on unsoundness of mind, whose preposterous paradoxes were to be greeted with ridicule rather than with amazement or compassion. He was wholly impervious alike to contempt and ridicule. The theory which provoked so much mirth was an anthropological theory of which he was not the originator, and which had a good deal in common with the views which provoked such bitter opposition in Darwin's lifetime, but have now triumphed in the world and even, it would seem, in the Church Disregarding entirely the scriptural story of Eden and the fall of man, Monboddo accepted the theory expounded by Lucretius and taken for granted by Horace, that man was originally a very degraded animal, without ideas, without language, without social impulses or arrangement, and only slowly rose to successive stages of civilisation and culture by pressure of necessity—the need of food, of self-defence, of amusement, and other inevitable conditions ransacked not merely Diodorus Siculus and the ancients, but Americus Vespucius and Garcilaso de la Vega, Bougainville, Bell of Antermony, and all manner of modern travellers for tales of savage peoples and their ways, and he diligently questioned, personally or by letter, gentlemen who had been Jesuit missionaries in Canada, had held posts in India, or had been residents in Florida. His stories of cannibalism are gruesome, of twentyeight British men eaten by Indians, allies of the French, in spite of Montcalm's earnest request to be allowed to substitute a beeve for each man, the Indians, his Jesuit friend told him, said 'they were not such fools as to prefer beeves to And there are places in Africa Englishmen' where human flesh is exposed in the market like beef or mutton Deaf mutism is a valuable proof of original human speechlessness. The wild boy of Hanover is discussed, and Monboddo made a journey expressly to catechise the wild French girl of Champagne, her neighbours, and the abbess under whose charge she was put (Monboddo spoke French with fluency since his three years' stay in Groningen) The thing that specially caused judicious friends to grieve and the enemy to blaspheme was Monboddo's calmly arguing that the orang utans of Angola are undeveloped speci mens of the human species, and that a race of men had been visited in 1647 by an apparently reliable Swedish skipper (he wrote to Linnæus for particulars about him) who had long hairy tails and were, apparently, speechless In spite of his veneration for antiquity, Monboddo's anthropological method of studying the growth of civilisation, not by deductions from Genesis and ethical theory, but by studying authentic savage races, their ways and languages, was in his own time sufficiently rare, and we cannot but regret that he did not live to execute A History of Man, which he had long in contemplation course many ridiculous and entirely apocryphal additions were made to Monboddo's thesis-as that the tails had got worn off by much sitting, his statements were parodied and his arguments utterly misrepresented—as by Boswell and Johnson Monboddo returned Johnson's dislike with hearty contempt charged Johnson with being unable to read Greek texts, asseverated that he was neither a scholar nor a man of taste, and said that dictionary making, however necessary an occupation, required neither genius nor learning of Monboddo's jokes were misunderstood he was said to have carried his reverence for antiquity so far that, finding carriages were not in use among the ancients, he never would enter one, but till he was upwards of eighty made his annual Journey to London on horseback, it was, he said, a degradation of the genuine dignity of human nature to be dragged at the tail of a horse instead of mounting upon his back.

The anthropological discussions, it should be added, are almost wholly confined to the first volume of the Essay, the rest is taken up with discussions not unlike those in Harris's Herrics, the sixth volume deals with rhetoric. Antient Metaphysics is, of course, a plea in favour of Greek philosophy against all modern systems whatsoever Monboddo, as we have seen, bridges over the gulf between men and animals in two ways—both by recognising anthropoid apes (the seven-foot high ones would seem to be gorillas) as undeveloped human beings, and, on the other hand, by proving that there are unmistakably men who have longish tails and other undesirable peculiarities generally accounted bestial. The extracts are both from the first volume of the Essay

It is a clear case that we do not speak in that state which of all others best deserves the appellation of natural, I mean when we are born, nor for a considerable time after, and even then we learn but slowly, and with a great deal of labour and difficulty About the same time also we begin to form ideas. But the same answer, I know, is made to serve for both, namely, that our minds as well as our bodily organs are then weak, and therefore are unable to perform several of their natural functions, but as soon as they become strong and confirmed by age, then we both think and speak. That this is not true with respect to thinking I have already endeavoured to show, and with respect to speaking, I say, in the first place, that of all those savages which have been caught in different parts of Europe, not one had the use of speech, though they had all the organs of pronunciation such as we have them, and the understanding of a man, at least as much as was possible, when it is considered that their minds were not culti vated by any kind of conversation or intercourse with their own species, nor had they come the length, according to my hypothesis, of forming ideas, or thinl ing at all. One of these was catched in the woods of Hanover as late as the reign of George I, and for any thing I know is yet alive, at least I am sure he was so some years ago. He was a man in mind as well as body, as I have been informed by a person who lived for a considerable time in the neighbourhood of a farmer's house where he was kept, and had an oppor tunity of seeing him almost every day, not an idiot, as he has been represented by some who cannot make allowance for the difference that education makes upon men's minds, yet he was not only mute when first eaught, but he never learned to speak, though at the time the gentleman from whom I have my information saw him, he had been above thirty years in England

Further, not only solitary savages, but a whole nation, if I may call them so, have been found without the use This is the case of the Ouran Outangs that are found in the kingdom of Angola in Africa, and in several parts of Asia. They are exactly of the human form, walking erect, not upon all four, like the savages that have been found in Europe, they use sticks for weapons, they live in society, they make huts of branches of trees, and they carry off negroe girls, whom they make slaves of These facts are related of them by Mons. Buffon in his natural history, and I was further told by a gentleman who had been in Angola, that there were some of them seven feet high, and that the negroes were extremely afraid of them, for when they did any mischief to the Ouran Outang, they were sure to be heartily cudgelled when they were catched But though from the particulars above mentioned it appears certain that they are of our species, and though they have made some progress in the arts of life, they have not come the length of language, and accordingly none of them that have been brought to Europe could speak, and what seems strange, never learned to speak I myself saw at Paris one of them, whose skin was stuffed, standing upon a shelf in the king's cabinet of natural curiosities. He had exactly the shape and features of a man, and particularly I was informed, that he had organs of pronunciation as perfect as we have. He had several years at Versailles, and died by drinking spirits. He had as much of the understanding of a man as could be expected from his education, and performed many little offices to the lady with whom he lived, but never learned to speal. I was well informed too, of one of them be longing to a French gentleman in India, who used to go to mark et for him, but was likewise minte.

He follows up this by discussing the difficulty Frenchmen and Huron Indians have in learning to utter some sounds of the English language, and detailing the information he had himself obtained from the Abbé de l'Epce and Mr Braidwood, by cross-examining them as to the pains they had to get deaf people to articulate. Next we have his travellers' tales, ancient and modern, of tribes of men living in what he regards as the natural state, 'without arts or civility,' and behaving in almost all respects like mere brutes. Then comes his crucial instance

Before I conclude this article of travels, I will quote one traveller more, who is very little known, though he reports a very extraordinary fact concerning our species, and which well deserves the attention of naturalists. His name is Keoping, a Swede by birth, who, in the year 1647, went to the East Indies, and there served aboard a Dutch ship of force, belonging to the Dutch East India company, in quality of lieutenant In sailing through those seas they had occasion to come npon the coast of an island in the gulf of Bengal called Nicobar, where they saw men with tails like those of cats, and which they moved in the same manner. They came in canoes alongside of the ship, with an intention to trade with them, and to give them parrots in exchange for iron, which they wanted very much. Several of them came aboard the slup, and many more would have come, but the Dntch were afruid of being overpowered by their numbers, and therefore they fired their great guns, and frightened them away The next day they sent ashore a boat with five men, but they not having returned the following night, the day after the captain sent a larger boat ashore with more liands, and two pieces of cannon When they landed, the men with the tails came about them in great numbers, but by firing their cannon they chased them away but found only the bones of their companions, who had been devoured by the savages, and the boat in which they bad landed they found taken to pieces, and the iron of it carried away

The author who relates this is, as I am well informed, an anthor of very good credit. He writes in a simple plain manner, not life a man who intended to impose a lie upon the world, merely for the silly pleasure of making people stare, and if it be a lie (for it cannot be a mistal e), it is the only lie in his book, for every thing else that he has related of animals and vegetables has been found to be true. I am sensible, however, that those who believe that men are, and always have been, the same in all ages and nations of the world, and such as we see them in Europe, will think this story quite mcredible, but for my own part I am convinced, that we have not yet discovered all the variety of nature, not even in our own species, and the most incredible thing, in my apprehension, that could be told, even if there were no facts to contradict it, would be, that all the men in the different parts of the earth were the same in size, figure, shape, and colour. I am therefore disposed to believe, upon credible evidence, that there are still greater varieties in our species than what is mentioned by this traveller for that there are men with tails, such as the antients gave to their satyrs, is a fact so well attested that I think it cannot be doubted. But our Swedish traveller, so far as I know, is the only one who speaks of tails of sncb length as those of the inhabitants of Aicobar.

That these animals were men, as they traffieled, and used the art of navigation, I think cannot be denied appears that they herded together, and lived in some kind of society, but whether they had the use of lan guage or not, does not appear from our author's relation and I should incline to think that they had not, and that in this respect they resembled the Ouran Outangs, though in other respects they appeared to be farther advanced in the arts of life, for I do not think that any traveller has said that the Ouran Outings practised navigation or They live, however, in society, act together commerce in concert, particularly in attacking elephants, build huts, and no doubt practise other arts, both for sustenance and defence, so that they may be reckoned to be in the first stage of the human progression, being associated, and practising certain arts of life, but not so far advanced as to have invented the great art of language, to which I think the inhabitants of Nicobar must have approached nearer (if they have not already found it out), as they are so much farther advanced in other arts

This he fortifies by a long and elaborate note to the following effect

The story is told in the 6th volume of Linnaus's Amanitates academica, in an academical oration of one Hoppius, a scholar, as I suppose, of Linneus, who relates the story upon the credit of this keoping, with several more circumstances than I have mentioned As I knew nothing then of any other author who had spoken of men with tails, I thought the fact extraordinary, and was not disposed to believe it without knowing who this Keoping was, and what credit he deserved. I therefore wrote to Linnæus, inquiring about him, and desiring to know where his book was to be found He returned me a very polite answer, informing me that the book was lately reprinted at Stoel holm, 1743, apud Salvium, that the anthor was 'natione Suecus, secutus naves Belgicas per plures annos, imprimis ad insulas Indiæ Orientalis Incepit iter 1647 Erat Lieutenant navalis rei Habet multa de animalibus et plantis sparsa, simpliei stylo, sed omnia reliqua quæ retulit de his, simplicitate et fide summa recenset, quorum omnia reliqua hodie notissima ct confirmata.'

Upon this information I got the book from Stock holm. It is in the Swedish language, which I do not understand, but that passage of it having been translated to me by a Swedish gentleman, I found it to agree exactly with the story told by Hoppius. And the gentleman, who was very well acquainted with the book, confirmed what Linnæus says, of its being written in a plain and simple style, bearing intrinsic marks of truth

As this is a matter of great curiosity, I will subjoin what Linneus further says in his letter to me. [And he adds six other cases of tailed men reported by Linneus.]

Richard Jago (1715–81), son of a Warwickshire rector, was a servitor at University College, Oxford (where Shenstone, then a commoner, was his intimate friend), and became vicar of Snitterfield near Stratford-on-Avon. He wrote an elegy on The Blackbirds (1753), Edgehill, or the Rural Prospect Delineated and Moralised (1767), Labour and Genius, or the Mill-Stream and the Cascade, a Fable (1768), Adam, an oratorio (mainly from Paradise Lost), and other poetical pieces, all collected and published in one volume in 1784.

Absence

With leaden foot Time creeps along,
While Delia is away,
With her, nor plaintive was the song,
Nor tedious was the day
Ah! envious power, reverse my doom,
Now double thy career,
Strain every nerve, stretch every plume,

And rest them when she's here

Thomas Blacklock (1721-91), the blind poet, attracted sympathy and interest, but, though he was an amiable and excellent man, his verse is almost wholly tame, languid, and commonplace. The son of a Cumberland bricklayer who had settled at Annan in Dumfriesshire, he completely lost his sight by smallpox when only six months old, but his worthy father, assisted by neighbours, aniused his solitary boyhood by reading to him, and before he was twenty he was familiar with Spenser, Milton, Pope, Addison, Thomson, and Allan Ramsay, from whom he largely derived his images and impressions of nature and natural objects His father was accidentally killed when the studious youth was about nineteen, but Dr Stevenson, an Edinburgh physician, having seen some of his attempts at erse, brought their blind author to the Scottish capital, where he was enrolled as a student of divinity ln 1746 he published a volume of his poems, which was reprinted with additions in 1754 and 1756 licensed in 1759, and in 1762 was by the Earl of Selkirk nominated minister of Kirkcudbright. But the parishioners were opposed both to Church patronage in the abstract and to this exercise of it in favour of a blind man, and the poet relinquished the appointment for an annuity He now resided in Edinburgh, and took in boarders, but suffered from depression of spirits, supposing that his powers were failing him, his generous ardour in 1786 on behalf of Burns showed no diminution of taste or sensibility He published some sermons and theological treatises, and an article on Blindness for the Encyclopædia Britannica

Terrors of a Guilty Conscience
Cursed with unnumbered groundless fears,
How pale you shivering wretch appears!
For him the daylight shines in vain,
For him the fields no joys contain,
Nature's whole charms to him are lost,
No more the woods their music boast,

No more the meads their vernal bloom, No more the gales their rich perfume Impending mists deform the sky, And beanty withers in his eye. In hopes his terror to elnde, By day he mingles with the crowd, Yet finds his soul to fears a prey, In bnsy crowds and open day If night his lonely walks surprise, What horrid visions round him rise! The blasted oak which meets his way, Shewn by the meteor's sudden ray, The midnight mnrderer's lone retreat Felt heaven's avengeful bolt of late, The clashing chain, the groan profound, Loud from you ruined tower resound, And now the spot he seems to tread, Where some self slaughtered corse was laid, He feels fixed earth beneath him bend, Deep murmurs from her caves ascend, Till all his soul, by fancy swayed, Sees livid phantoms crowd the shade

Ode to Aurora on Melissa's Birthday
Of time and nature eldest born,
Emerge, thou rosy fingered morn,
Emerge, in purest dress arrayed,
And chase from heaven night's envious shade,
That I once more may pleased survey,
And hail Melissa's natal day

Of time and nature eldest born, Emerge, thou rosy fingered morn, In order at the eastern gate The bours to draw thy chariot wait, Whilst Zepliyr on his balmy wings, Mild nature's fragrant tribute brings, With odours sweet to strew thy way, And grace the bland revolving day

But, as thou lead'st the radiant sphere,
That gilds its birth and marks the year,
And as his stronger glories rise,
Diffused around the expanded skies,
Till clothed with beams serenely bright,
All heaven's vast concave flames with light,

So when, through life's protracted day,
Melissa still pursues her way,
Her virtnes with thy splendour vie,
Increasing to the mental eye,
Though less conspicuous, not less dear,
Long may thy Bion's prospect cheer,
So shall his heart no more repine,
Blessed with her rays, though robbed of thine.

Of this ode Henry Mackenzie said it was 'a compliment and tribute of affection to the tender assiduity of an excellent wife, which I have not anywhere seen more happily conceived or more elegantly expressed

Sir William Blackstone (1723-80), a Londoner born, made choice of the law for his profession, entered himself a student of the Middle Temple, and took formal leave of poetry in verses published in Dodsley's Miscellany But though he had forsaken his muse, he still—like Charles Lamb, when he had given up the use of the 'great plant' tobacco-'loved to live in the suburbs of her graces' Blackstone, who was called to the Bar in 1746, became Vinerian Professor of Law at Oxford, where he delivered the lectures afterwards published as the famous Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765-69) After refusing the Solicitor-Generalship, he was knighted, and died a judge in the Court of Common Pleas The Commentaries that arose out of his lectures as first professor of English law at Oxford (the Civil or Roman law had always been taught) were the first attempt to popularise and systematise the law of Though he had not an original or England independent mind, and was not profoundly versed in either Civil or Common law, he produced an unequalled compendium of what was known on his chosen subject, admirably written in a style always clear and generally dignified, though somewhat Junius attacked him for leaning too much to the side of prerogative, and abiding rather by precedents than by sense and justice, Priestley protested against his statement and defence of the law as against Dissenters, and Bentham later assailed his view on the nature of law in general But the work took, maintained an unique place in English law, and erelong was cited not as a mere statement of the law, but as an original authority. As the standard exposition it was edited and re edited (down to 1840 in England, to 1884 in the United States), and even now modern statements are in part adaptations of Blackstone, who thus sums up the relative merits of an elective and hereditary monarchy

It must be owned, an elective monarchy seems to be the most obvious and best suited of any to the rational principles of government and the freedom of human nature, and accordingly, we find from history that, in the infancy and first rudiments of almost every state, the leader, chief magistrate, or prince hath usually been And if the individuals who compose that state could always continue true to first principles, un influenced by passion or prejudice, unassailed by corrup tion, and unawed by violence, elective succession were as much to be desired in a kingdom as in other inferior The best, the wisest and the bravest communities man would then be sure of receiving that crown which his endowments have merited, and the sense of an unbiassed majority would be dutifully acquiesced in by the few who were of different opinions But history and observation will inform us that elections of every kind, in the present state of human nature, are too frequently brought about by influence, partiality, and artifice, and even where the case is otherwise, these practices will be often suspected, and as constantly charged upon the successful, by a splenetic disappointed This is an evil to which all societies are hable, as well those of a private and domestic kind, as the great community of the public, which regulates and includes the rest. But in the former there is this advan tage, that such suspicions, if false, proceed no further than jealousies and mirmurs, which time will effectually suppress, and, if true, the injustice may be remedied by legal means, by an appeal to those tribunals to which every member of society has (by becoming such) virtu ally engaged to submit. Whereas, in the great and independent society which every nation composes, there is no superior to resort to but the law of nature, no method to redress the infringements of that law but the actual exertion of private force. As, therefore, between two nations complaining of mutual injuries, the quarrel can only be decided by the law of arms, so in one and the same nation, when the fundamental principles of their common union are supposed to be invaded, and more especially when the appointment of their chief magistrate is alleged to be unduly made, the only tribunal to which the complainants can appeal is that of the God of battles, the only process by which the appeal can be carried on is that of a civil and intestine A hereditary succession to the crown is therefore now established in this and most other countries, in order to prevent that periodical bloodshed and misery which the listory of ancient imperial Rome and the more modern experience of Poland and Germany may show us are the consequences of elective Lingdoms

The Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse

As by some tyrant's stern command A wretch forsakes his native land, In foreign climes condemned to roam An endless exile from his home. Pensive he treads the destined way, And dreads to go nor dares to stay Till on some nelglibouring mountain's brow He stops, and turns his eyes below, There, melting at the well known view, Drops a last tear, and bids adien So I, thus doomed from thee to part, Gay queen of finey and of art, Reluctant move, with doubtful mind, Oft stop, and often look behind Companion of my tender age, Serencly gay, and sweetly sage, How blithesome we were wont to rove. By verdant full or shady grove, Where fervent bees, with humming voice, Around the homed oak rejoice, And aged elms with awful bend, In long cathedral walks extend ! I ulled by the lapse of gliding floods, Cheered by the warbling of the woods, How blest my days, my thoughts how free, In sweet society with thee ! Then all was jovous, all was young, And years unheeded rolled along But now the pleasing dream is o'er, These scenes must charm me now no more, Lost to the fields, and torn from you-Farewell '-a long, a last adicu. Me wrangling courts, and stubborn law, To smoke, and crowds, and cities draw There selfish faction rules the day, And pride and avarice throng the way. Diseases taint the murky air, And midnight confingrations glare, Loose Revelry, and Riot bold, In frighted streets their orgies hold, Or, where in silence all is drowned, Fell Mnrder walks his lonely round, No room for peace no room for you, Adieu, celestial nymph, adieu!

Shakspeare, no more, thy sylvan son, Nor all the art of Addison, Pope's heaven strung lyre, nor Waller's ease, Nor Milton's mighty self must please Instead of these, a formal hand In furs and coifs around me stand, With sounds uncouth and accents dry, That grate the soul of harmony, Each pedant sage unlocks his store Of mystic, dark, discordant lore, And points with tottering hand the ways That lead me to the thorny maze There, in a winding close retreat, Is Justice doomed to fix her seat, There, fenced by bulwarks of the law, She keeps the wondering world in awe, And there, from vulgar sight retired, Like Eastern queens, is more admired Oh, let me pierce the secret shade Where dwells the venerable maid ' There humbly mark, with reverent awe, The guardian of Britannia s law, Unfold with joy her sacred page, The united boast of many an age, Where mixed, yet uniform, appears The wisdom of a thousand years In that pure spring the bottom view, Clear, deep, and regularly true, And other doctrines thence imbibe Than lurk within the sorded scribe, Observe how parts with parts unite In one harmonious rule of right, See countless wheels distinctly tend By various laws to one great end, While mighty Alfred's piercing soul Pervades and regulates the whole. Then welcome business, welcome strife. Welcome the cares, the thorns of life. The visage wan, the pore blind sight, The toil by day, the lamp at night, The tedious forms, the solemn prate, The pert dispute, the dull debate, The drowsy bench, the babbling hall, For thee, fair Justice, welcome all ! Thus though my noon of life be past, I et let my setting snn, at last, Find out the still, the rural cell, Where sage retirement loves to dwell! There let me taste the home felt bliss Of innocence and inward peace. Untainted by the guilty bribe, Uncursed amid the harpy tribe, No orphan's cry to wound my ear, My honour and my conscience clear Thus may I calmly meet my end, Thus to the grave in peace descend

Albania was one of two Scottish descriptive poems (The Clyde the other) belonging to this period, which were reprinted in 1803 in John Leyden's collection Albania, an anonymous work of two hundred and ninety-six lines in blank verse, in praise of Scotland, was published in London in 1737, its author apparently being a Scottish minister who had lately died young Aaron Hill prefixed some highly encomiastic lines to the editor, but the little volume seems to have remained unnoticed and unknown till 1783, when Dr Beattie, in one of his Essays on Poetry and Music, quoted a picturesque passage, praised also by Sir Walter Scott, which describes 'invisible hunting,' a superstition formerly prevalent in the Highlands, and not unknown elsewhere.

The Invisible Hunting

E'er since of old the laughty thanes of Ross (So to the simple swain tradition tells) Were wont, with clans and ready vassals thronged, To wake the bounding stag or gulty wolf, There oft is heard at midnight or at noon, Beginning faint, but rising still more loud And nearer, voice of hunters, and of hounds, And horns hoarse winded, blowing far and keen, Forthwith the hubbub multiplies, the gale Labours with wilder shricks, and rifer din Of hot pursuit, the broken ery of deer Mangled by throttling dogs, the shouts of men, And hoofs thick beating on the hollow hill Sudden the grazing heifer in the vale Starts at the noise, and both the herdsman's ears Tingle with inward dread Aghast he eyes The mountain's height, and all the ridges round, Yet not one trace of living wight discerns, Nor knows, o'errwed, and trembling as he stands, To what or v hom he owes his idle fear, To ghost, to witch, to fair, or to fiend, But wonders, and no end of wondering finds.

John Wilson (1720-89), parish schoolmaster at Lesmahagow and Greenock, was the author of The Clyde, another descriptive poem included by Levden in the same volume with Albania 1767 the magistrates and minister of Greenock, before they admitted Wilson to the superintendence of the grammar school, stipulated that he abandon 'the profine and unprofitable art of poemmaking' ! He complied, burned his unfinished manuscripts, and faithfully kept his word. world probably lost little through the barbarism of the Greenock functionaries For though Wilson had a good command of the heroic couplet, a keen love for scenery, and in the Clyde produced what Leyden called 'the first loco descriptive poem of any merit,' he had none of the originality of the true 'maker'—as will be seen from the challenge The Clyde, which extends to Forth, quoted below to nearly two thousand lines, was published in 1764, along with a 'dramatic sketch,' Earl Douglas, which in its original form Wilson had issued in 1760

Borst not, great Forth, thy broad majestic tide, Beyond the graceful modesty of Clyde, Though famed Mæander, in the poet's dream, Ne'er led through fairer field his wandering stream. Bright wind thy mazy links on Stirling's plain, Which oft departing, still returns again, And wheeling round and round in sportive mood, The nether stream turns back to meet the upper flood Now sunk in shades, now bright in open day, Bright Clyde in simple beauty winds his way

William Wilkie (1721-72), author of The Lipigomad, was a native of Echlin in Dalmeny parish, Linlithgowshire, and sometime minister In 1759 he was elected Professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of St He was described as a very absentminded, eccentric person, who wore as many clothes as tradition assigns to the gravedigger in Hamlet on the stage, and who used to lie in bed with two dozen prir of blankets above him According to David Hume, Wilkie's Homeric studies were also conducted on an eccentric The Scottish farmers near Edinburgh method were very much troubled, Hume reported, with wood-pigeons, 'and Wilkie's father planted him often as a scarecrow (an office for which he is well qualified) in the midst of his fields of wheat He carried out his Homer with him, together with a table, and pen and ink, and a great rusty He composed and wrote two or three gun lines, till a flock of pigeons settled in the field, then rose up, ran towards them, and fired at them, returned again to his former station, and added a rhyme or two more, till he met with a fresh interruption? The Lpigoniad, a Poem in nine Books, published in 1757, deals with the fortunes of the Epigoni, the sons of the seven heroes who led the expedition against Thebes, it was founded on part of the fourth book of the Iliad, and in style modelled on Popc's Homer Though marvellously popular in Scotland, it had few readers in England. A somewhat depreciatory notice of it in the Critical Review drew forth a long reply from David Hume, in which he speaks of its six thousand lines as 'abounding in sublime beauties,' and conceived so thoroughly in the spirit of Homer as 'would almost lead us to imagine that the Scottish bard lind found a lost manuscript of that father of poetry, and had read a faithful translation of it into English? Here obviously (as in Hume's Inudation of Home's Douglas) the warm hearted friend predominated over the philosophical critic, as also when he pronounced the following description of the person and mission of Jealousy to be 'printed in the most splendid colours that poetry affords' It is, how ever, vigorous and ingenious, and as good a speci men as could be offered of the powers of the 'Scottish Homer,' who also published a collection of fables in verse after the manner of Gay-one of them in his native vernacular was by birth a gentleman and by training a doctor, he was something of a poet, and produced a superficial history, but as a novelist he is memorable. He was born at Dalquhurn House, near Renton in Dunibartonshire, and baptised on the 19th of March 1721. His father, a younger son of Sir James Smollett of Bonhill, judge and Scottish M.P., having died early, the poet was educated by his grandfather After the usual course of study at the grammar school of Dumbarton and the University of Glasgow, Tobias apprenticed to a medical prac titioner in Glas gow His appren ticeship expired, the young and sanguine adven turer proceeded to London, his chief dependence being n tragedy, The Regicide, on the assassination of lames I of Scotland Foiled in his efforts to get it brought out at the theatres, he became surgeon's mate on board eighty - gun ship, and was pre sent at the disasexpedition trous against Cartha gena described in

Roderick Random He left the navy, and fell in love in Jamaica, and by 1744 was practising medicine in London In 1746 and 1747 he published two short satires, Advice and Reproof, and in 1748 he gave to the world his novel of Roderick Random Peregrine Pickle appeared three years afterwards, and made even a greater hit Smollett failed as a physician in London and at Batli, and, taking a house at Chelsea, he devoted himself to literature as a profession, becoming by turns, as Thackerny said, 'reviewer and historian, critic, medical writer, poet and pamphleteer' Spite of his laborious ness and literary facility, his life was one continual struggle for existence, embittered by personal quarrels brought on by his irritable temper He quarrelled with relations, patrons, and literary rivals, and had fierce feuds with Lyttelton, Fielding, Churchill, Garrick, Akenside, Wilkes, and others

In 1753 his romance of Ferdinand Count Fathom was published, and in 1755 his translation of Don Quita oth—based mainly on the earlier translation of Jerus, for Smollett's knowledge of Spanish was far from perfect. In 1756 he became editor of the Critical Review, which drew him into much acrid controversy. An attack on Admiral Knowles, one of the commanders at Carthagena, led to a trial for libel, and he was sentenced to pay a fine of £100, and suffered three months' imprisonment.

TOBIAS SMOLLETT
From the Portrait in the National Portrait Gallery (Artist unknown).

(from the Revolution of 1688) us a continuation to Hume. The Reprisal, a farce of the sea, was fairly successful on the stage in 1757 He translated Gil Blas (1761), but it is doubtful whether he executed any part of the translation of The Works of M Voltaire, published in 1761-70 under his name and that of Thomas Francklin He compiled a Compendium of Voyages, and superintended and partly wrote a Universal History Like Goldsmith, he showed extraordinary versatility, and, except Goldsmith, few writers with such an undeniably original vein of genius ever performed so large an amount of dismal drudgery and hackwork. For political discussion he was ill qualified by temper, and, taking the unpopular side, he was completely vanquished by the truculent satire and abuse of Wilkes

His health was now shattered by sedentary labour, family trials, and worry In 1747 he had solcd himself by writing his least successful novel, Lanncelot Greaves (1762)Another proof of versatility and industry was his History of England, written, it was affirmed, in fourteen months (1756-57) The rate of production wholly precluded thought research, or even conscientious study, uid the work, essentially booksellers' hackwork, was severely indignantly denounced by some critics It is unequal in execu tion, and abounds in errors and inconsistencies Its fate ultimately was to be truncated, and made to serve

In prison he con-married a West Indian Indy, Miss Lascelles, their only child died at the age of fifteen, and the disconsolate father tried to fly from his grief by a tour through France and Italy He was absent two years, and published his Travels through France and Italy (1766), which, with cleams of humour and insight, shows plenty of prejudice and of paradox. Sterne ridiculed this work, and its author as Smelfungus, in his Senti mental Journey In the famous statue of the Venus de Medici, 'which encliants the world,' Smollett could see no beauty of feature, and the attitude he considered awkward and out of character Modern taste, as it happens, rather justifies him than his amazed critics in this He laments that 'the labours of printing should have been so much employed on the shocking subjects of the martyrology.' The Pantheon at Rome-that 'glorious combination of beauty and magnificence '-lie said, lool ed lile a huge cockpit open at the top. Sterne said that such declarations should have been reserved for his physician, they could only have sprung from bodily distemper 'Yet be it said.' remarks Sir Walter Scott, 'without offence to the memory of the witty and elegant Sterne, it is more easy to assume, in composition, an air of alternate gricty and sensibility, than to practise the virtues of generosity and benevolence, which Smollett exercised during his whole life though often, like his own Matthew Bramble, under the disguise of pecvishness and irritability. Sterne's writings show much flourish concerning virtues of which his life is understood to have produced little fruit, the temper of Smollett was 'like a lusty winter, frosty, but kindly "' And it should be noted that though the Travels are occupied to a tedious extent with denuncrations of the dirt and discomfort of French and Italian hotels, and of the extortions and various misdemeanours of the French and Italian innleepers and postillions-exhibitions of spleen due no doubt partly to all health-Smollett made very many shrewd observations. He kept a careful record of the daily variations of temperature and weather at Nice for more than a year, recognised long before Lord Brougham the special ments of Cannes, and, describing in the reign of Louis XV the miseries of the French people and the extortions to which they were subjected, foretold very clearly the likelihood of the coming cataclysm On his return to England he published a political satire, The Adventures of an Atom (1769), in which he attacked his former patron, Lord Bute, and also the Earl of Chatham His conduct as a politician was guided more by personal feelings than public principles, and neglect or seeming in gratitude provoked a burst of indignation. He was no longer able to contend with the 'sea of troubles' that encompressed him, and in 1770 he again went abroad in quest of health. His friends endeavoured in vain to procure him an appointment as consul at some Mediterranean port, and he settled in a cottage near Leghorn Here, in weakness and suffering, he wrote his Humphry Clinker, last and most original of all his novels. He had just heard of the success of Humphry before his death (21st October 1771)

It was six years after the publication of Joseph Andrews, and before Tom Jones had been produced, that Smollett appeared as novelist. He had adopted Le Sage as his model, but his characters, his scenes, his opinions and prejudices, were all eminently British From first to last lie improved in taste and judgment, but his invention, his native liumour, and his knowledge of life and character are as conspicuous in Roderick Random as in any of his works, Tom Bowling is his most perfect sea character The adventures of Roderick are no doubt largely autobiographical, with a fair element of absurd exaggeration 'His novels are recollections of his own adventures,' Thackeray judges, 'his characters drawn, as I should think, from personages with whom he had become acquainted in his own career of life not invent much, as I fancy, but had the keenest perceptive faculty, and described what he saw with wonderful relish and delightful broad humour' In Roderick Random scene follows scene with astonishing rapidity at one time his liero basks in prosperity, at another he is plunged in utter destitution. He is led into different countries, and into the society of wits, sharpers, courtiers, courtesans, and men of all grades. In this tour of the world and of human life, the reader is amazed at the careless profusion, the inexhaustible humour, of an author who pours out his materials with such prodigality and facility. There is no elaboration of character, no careful preparation of incidents, no unity of design, and there is a plentiful use of extravagant carreature instead of realistic presentation Roderick Random is liurned on without fixed or definite purpose, and though there is a dash of generosity and good humour in his character, he is equally conspicuous for unconscionable libertinism and mischievousness. There is even utter meanness in his conduct toward his humble friend Strap Smollett's grossness is indefensible, and in his estimate of women he falls far below Richardson and Fielding Roderick Random must be enjoyed for its broad liumour and comic incidents, which, even when most farcical, are seldom quite impossible and almost never tiresome It is at once amusing fiction and sound history, for its pictures of eighteenth century life in the British navy are simply priceless

Peregrine Pickle is formed of the same materials, cast in a larger mould. The hero is as unscrupulous as Roderick Random, and is more deliberately profligate. Scott calls him 'the savage and ferocious Pickle,' and denounces his 'low and ungentleman like tone,' but in the second work the comic powers of the author are more variously displayed. Scenes and incidents are multiplied with kaleidoscopic profusion. The want of decent drapery is too apparent. Smollett never had much regard for the minor.

morals or proprieties of life, but where shall we find a more entertaining gallery of portraits—some of them doubtless contemptible and revolting—or a series of more laughable incidents? The one eyed mail veteran, Commodore Trunnion, is an eccentric drawn in Smollett's extravagant vein, who keeps garrison in his house as on board ship, and makes his servants sleep in hammocks and turn out to watch. Yet in his death he is almost convincing. The Memous of a Lady of Quality—a true tale (of Lady Vane), for inserting which Smollett was bribed by a sum of money—mark the most humiliating episode in the novelist's record.

Terdinand Count Tathom is more in the style of a romance—the portraiture of a complete villain, proceeding step by step to rob his benefactors and pillige mankind. His adventures at gamblingtables and hotels, and his exploits as a physician, afford scope for the author's saturical genius the most powerful passages in the novel are those which recount Terdinand's seduction of Celinda, the story of Monimia, and the description of the tempest in the forest, from which he took shelter in a robber's hut Some of the incidents are related with the intensity and power of a tragic poet There is a vein of fantastic sentimentality in the means by which Fathom works on Celinda's superstitious fears and timidity by means of an Aolian 'The strings,' says Smollett, with inflated rhetoric, 'no sooner felt the impression of the balmy zephyr, than they began to pour forth a stream of melody, more ravishingly delightful than the song of Philomel, the warbling brook, and ill the concert of the wood' Few readers of Peregrine Pickle can forget the touching allusion to the Scottish Jacobites at Boulogne, 'exiled from their native homes in consequence of their adherence to an unfortunate and ruined cause,' who went duly to the seaside in order to indulge their longing eyes with a prospect of the white cliffs of Alliion which they could never more approach

Sir Launcelot Greaves is a rather poor sort of trivesty of Don Quizoti, in which the preposterousness of the plot is sometimes relieved by the humour of some of the characters and con-Captain Crowe, in especial, is no unworthy comrade of Trunnion and Bowling Butler's Presbyterian knight going 'a colonelling' is ridiculous enough, but the chivalry of Sir Launcelot and his attendant outrages all sense and probability An eighteenth century knightcreant in cap a pie armour redressing the wrongs of estimable men and maidens defrauded of their rights, unjustly shut up in delitors' prisons and madhouses, and sharing in their misadventures, is even at the best hopelessly incredible.

Humphry Clinier (so spelt hy Smollett) is, on the whole, the most natural and entertaining of all the novels of Smollett, and is replete with grave, caustic, and humorous observation. Matthew Bramble is Smollett himself grown old, turned somewhat cymical through experience of the world, but vastly improved in taste. He probably caught the idea, as he took some of the incidents of the family tour, from Anstey's New Bath Guide, but the staple of the work is emphatically his own In the light sketching of scenery, the quick succession of incidents, the romance of Lismahago's adventures among the American Indians, and the humour of the serving-men and maids, Smollett seems to come into closer competition with Le Sage or Cervantes than in any of his other works conversion of Humphry may have been suggested by Anstey, but the bad spelling of Tabitha and Mrs Winifred Jenkins is an original device of Smollett, which aids in the subordinate effects of the domestic drama, and has been industriously exploited by later humourists—as has the 'derangement of epitaphs' which not seldom crops up in Thackeray thought Uncle Bowling in Smollett Roderick Random as good a character as Squire Western himself, and Humphry Chuker he pronounced 'the most laughable story that has ever been written since the goodly art of novel writing began' Smollett wrote English almost like an Englishman, his peculiarities are mainly those of the period His diction is plain and undistinguished, but lucid and vigorous Professor Minto roundly declared that Smollett's influence (which may be traced in Marryat, Thackeray, and Dickens) was greater than that of Fielding But in spite of some attempts, such as Scott's, to exalt him, Smollett must be ranked far below Richardson, Fielding, or Sterne, see Mr Dobson's criticism The prose extracts are taken above at page 8 from Roderick Random, Peregrine Pickle, and Humphry Clinker respectively

Sir Walter Scott praised the fine commencement of his Ode on Independence, 'Lord of the lion-heart and eagle eye,' but in its succession of strophes and antistrophes, the mythological characters (Liberty, Disdain, Old Time, the liermit Wisdom, Fair Freedom, Oppression, and the like) become wearisome

Ode to Leven Water
On Leven's banks, while free to rove,

And tune the rural pipe to Love,

I envied not the happiest swain That ever trod the Arcadian plain Pure stream, in whose transparent wave My youthful limbs I wont to lave, No torrents stain thy limpid source, No rocks impede thy dimpling course, That sweetly warbles o'er its bed, With white, round, polished pebbles spread, While, lightly poised, the scaly brood In myriads cleave thy crystal flood, The springing trout in speckled pride, The salmon, monarch of the tide, The ruthless pike, intent on war, The silver eel, and mottled par Devolving from thy parent lake, A charming maze thy waters make, By howers of hirch and groves of pine, And hedges flowered with eglantine.

Still on thy banks so gaily green,
May numerous herds and flocks be seen
And lasses chanting o'er the pail,
And shepherds piping in the dale,
And ancient faith that knows no guile,
And industry embrowned with toil,
And hearts resolved, and hands prepared,
The blessings they enjoy to guard!

The Tears of Scotland.

Written in 1746 on the larborities committed in the Highlands by ille Fing 13h forces in der the command of the Duke of Cumberland, af er the Lattle of Cu† oden.

Yourn, hapless Caledonia mourn
Thy lainshed peace, thy laurels torn I Thy sons, for valour long renowned,
Lie slaughtered on their native ground,
Thy ho pitable roofs no more
Invite the stranger to the door,
In smoky ruins sunly they he,
The monuments of crucky

The wretched owner sees afar
His all become the prev of war,
Bethinks him of his babes and wife,
Then smites his breast, and curses life.
The swains are famished on the rocks,
Where once they fed their vanton flocks,
Thy ravished virgins shrick in vain,
Thy infants pensh on the plain

What boots it, then, in every clime,
Through the vide spreading waste of time,
Thy martial glory, crowned with praise,
Still shone vith undiminished blaze?
Thy towering spirit now is brolle,
This need is bended to the voke
What foreign arms could never quell,
By civil rage and rancour fell

The rural pipe and merry by
No more shall cheer the happy day
No social scenes of gav delight
Beguile the dreary winter night
No strains but those of sorrow flow,
And nought be heard but sounds of woe,
While the pale plantoms of the slain
Glide nightly o er the silent plan

O baneful cause, O fatal morn, Accursed to ages yet unborn!
The sons against their father stood,
The parent shed his children's blood let, when the rage of battle ceased,
The victor's soul was not appeased
The naked and forlorn must feel Devouring flames and murdering steel 1

The pious mother, doomed to death,
Forsaken, wanders o'er the heath,
The bleat wind whistles round her head,
Her helpless orphans cry for bread,
Bereft of shelter, food, and friend,
She views the shades of night descend,
And stretched beneath the inclement skies,
Weeps o'er her tender babes, and dies

While the warm blood bedews my veins, And unimpaired reinembrance reigns, Resentment of my country's fate Within my filial breast shall beat, And, spite of her insulting foe, My sympathising verse shall flow 'Mourn, hapless Calcilonia, mourn Thy banished peace, thy laurels torn.'

Mr Morgan's Manner

While he was thus discoursing to me, we heard a voice on the cockpit ladder pronounce, with great vehemence, in a strange dialect, 'The devil and his dam blow me from the top of Moanchdenny, if I go to him before there is something in my pelly, let his nose be as yellow as saffron, or as plue as a pell, look you, or green as a lect, 'tis all one.' To this declaration somebody answered, 'So it seems my poor messmate must part his cable for want of a little assistance. His fore topsail is loose already, and besides, the doctor ordered you to overhaul him, but I see you don't mind what your master says'-Here he was interrupted with, 'Splutter and oons I von lousy tog, who do von call my master? get you gone to the doctor, and tell him my birth, and education, and my abilities, and moreover, my behaviour is as good as his, or any shentleman's (no disparagement to him) in the whole world Got pless my soul ' does he think, or conceive, or imagine, that I am a horse, or an ass, or a goat, to trudge backwards and forwards, and upwards and downwards, and ly sea and by land, at his will and pleasures? Go your ways, you rapscallion, and tell doctor Atkins that I desire and request that he will give a look upon the tying man, and order some thing for him if he be dead or alive, and I will see him take it by and by, when my eraving stomach is satisfied, look you' At this, the other went away, saying, that if they would serve him so when he was dying, by G-d he would be foul of them in the other world

Here Mr Thomson let me know that the person we heard was Mr Morgan, the first mate, who was just come on board from the hospital, whither he had attended some of the siek in the morning. At the same time I saw him come into the birth He was a short, thick man with a face garmished with pimples, a snub nose turned up at the end, an excessive wide mouth, and little fiery eyes, surrounded with slin puckered up in in numerable wrinkles My friend immediately made him acquainted with my case, when he regarded me with a very lofty look, but without speaking, set down a bundle he had in his hand, and approached the cupboard, which when he had opened, he exclaimed, in a great passion, 'Cot is my life! all the pork is gone, as I am a Christian ' Thomson then gave him to understand that as I had been brought on board half famished, he could do no less than entertain me with what was in the locker, and the rather, as he had bid the steward enter me in the mess. Whether this disappointment made Mr Morgan more peevish than usual, or he really thought himself too little regarded by his fellow mate, I know not, but after some pause he went on in this manner 'Mr Thomson, perhaps you do not use me with all the good manners, and complaisance, and respect look you, that becomes you, because you have not vouchsafed to advise with me in this affair. I have, in my time, look you, been a man of some weight and substance, and consideration, and have kept house and home, and paid seot and lot, and the king's taxes, ay, And moreover, also, and maintained a family to boot I am your senior, and your elder, and your petter, Mr Thomson '- 'My elder I'll allow you to be, but not my better,' cried Thomson, with some lient. 'Cot is my saviour, and witness too,' said Morgan, with great vehemence, 'that I am more elder, and therefore more petter by many years than you' Fearing this dispute might be attended with some bad consequence, I in terposed and told Mr Morgan I was very sorry for having been the occasion of any difference between him and the second mate, and that, rather than cause the least breach in their good understanding, I would ent my allowance by myself, or seek admission to some other company But Thomson, with more spirit than discretion, as I thought, insisted upon my remaining where he had appointed me and observed that no man possessed of generosity and compassion would have any objection to it, considering my birth and talents, and the misfortunes I had of late so unjustly undergone. This was touching Mr Morgan on the right key, who protested with great earnestness that he had no objection to my being received in the mess, but only complained that the ceremony of asking his 'As for a shentleman in consent was not observed distress,' said he, shaking me by the hand, 'I lofe him as I lose my own powels for, Cot help me! I have had vexations enough upon my own pack?

(From Roderick Random, I xxv)

The Death of Commodore Trunnion

About four o'clock in the morning our hero arrived at the garrison [Commodore Trunnion's house was fitted up as a fortress, with diteli, drawbridge, and courtyard with artillery], where he found his generous uncle in extremity, supported in bed by Julia on one side and Lieutenant Hatchway on the other, whilst Mr Jolter administered spiritual consolation, and between whiles comforted Mrs Trunnion, who, with her maid, sat by the fire, weeping with great decorum—the physician having just taken the last fee, and retired after pronouncing the fatal prognostic.

Though the Commodore's speech was interrupted by a violent hiccup, he still retained the use of his senses, and when Peregrine approached, stretched out his hand. with manifest signs of satisfaction. The young gentle man, whose heart overflowed with gratitude and affection, could not behold such a spectacle unmoved, so that the Commodore perceiving his disorder, made a last effort of strength, and consoled him in these words 'Swab the spray from your bowsprit, my good lad, and coil up your You must not let the toplifts of your heart give way because you see me ready to go down at these years. Many a better man has foundered before he has made half my way, thof I trust, by the mercy of God, I shall be sure in port, in a most blessed riding, for my good friend Jolter hath overhauled the journal of my sins, and by the observation he hath taken of the state of my soul, I hope I shall happily conclude my voyage, and be brought up in the latitude of heaven. Here has been a doctor that wanted to stow me choke full of physic, but when a man's hour is come, what signifies his taking his departure with a 'pothecary's shop in his hold? These fellows come alongside dying men, like the messengers of the Admiralty with sailing orders, but I told him as how I could slip my cable without his direction or assistance, and so he hauled off in

This eursed biccup makes such a ripple in the current of my speech that mayhap you don't understand what I say Now, while the sucker of my wind pipe will go, I would willingly mention a few things which I hope you will set down in the log book of your remembrance when I am stiff, d'ye see There's your aunt sitting whimpering by the fire, I desire you will keep her tight, warm, and easy in her old age she's an honest heart in her own way, and, thof she goes a little erank and humoursome by being often overstowed with Nantz and religion, she has been a faithful shipmate to me. Jack Hatchway, you know the trim of her as well as e'er a man in Ingland, and I believe she has a kindness for you, whereby if you two grapple in the way of matri mony when I am gone, I do suppose that my godson, for love of me, will allow you to live in the garrison all the days of your life. I need not talk of Pipes, because I know you'll do for him without any recommendation, the fellow has sailed with me in many a hard gale, and I'll warrant him as stout a seaman as ever set face to the weather But I hope you'll take care of the rest of the crew, and not disrate them after I am dead in favour of new followers Shun going to law as you would shun the devil, and look upon all attorneys as devouring sharks or ravenous fish of prey. As soon as the breath is out of my body, let minute guns be fired, till I am safe underground. I would also be buried in the red jacket I had on when I boarded and took the Renummy my pistols, cutlass, and pocket compass be laid in the coffin along with me. Let me be carried to the grave by my own men, rigged in the black caps and white shirts which my barge's crew were wont to wear, and they must keep a good look out that none of your pillering rascallions may come and herve me up again for the lucre of what they can get, until the careass is belaved by a tombstone As for the motto or what you call it, I leave that to you and Mr Jolter, who are scholars, but I do desire that it may not be engraved in the Greek or Latin lingos, and much less in the French, which I abominate, but in plain English, that when the angel comes to pipe all hands at the great day, he may know that I am a British man, and speak to me in my mother tongue. And now, I have no more to say, but God in heaven have mercy upon my soul, and send you all fair weather where soever you are bound'

His list moments, however, were not so near as they imagined. He began to doze, and enjoyed small intervals of ease till next day in the afternoon, during which re missions he was heard to pour forth many pious ejaculations, expressing his liope that for all the heavy cargo of his sins, he should be able to surmount the puttock shrouds of despair, and get aloft to the cross trees of God's good favour. At last his voice sank so low as not to be distinguished, and having hun about an hour almost without any perceptible sign of life, he gave up the ghost with a groan (From Pergenne Pickle)

Hatchway's Epitaph on Commodore Trunnion

Here hes, foundered in a fathom and a half, the shell of Hawser Trunnion, formerly commander of a squadron in his Minjesty's service, who broached to at 5 P M. Oct x in the year of his age threescore and nineteen. He kept his guns always loaded, and his tackle ready manned, and never showed his poop to the enemy, except when he took her in tow, but his shot being expended, his match burnt out, and his upper works decayed, he was sunk by death's superior weight of metal Nevertheless he will be weighed again at the Great Day, his rigging refitted, and his timbers repaired, and, with one broad side, make his adversary strike in his turn

Bath as seen by Mr Bramble

You must know, I find nothing but disappointment at Bath, which is so altered, that I can scarce believe it is the same place that I frequented about thirty years ago Methinks I hear you say,- 'Altered it is, without all doubt, but then it is altered for the better, a truth which, perhaps, you would own without hesitation, if yon yourself was not altered for the worse.' The reflec tion may, for aught I know, be just The inconveniences which I overlooked in the heyday of health, will natu rally strike with exaggerated impression on the irritable nerves of an invalid, surprised by premature old age, and shattered with long suffering-Bnt I believe you will not deny that this place, which Nature and Providence seem to have intended as a resource from distemper and disquiet, is become the very centre of racket and dis sipation. Instead of that peace, tranquility, and ease, so necessary to those who labour under bad health, weak nerves, and irregular spirits, here we have nothing but noise, tumult, and hurry, with the fatigue and slavery of maintaining a ceremonial, more stiff, formal, and oppressive than the etiquette of a German elector national hospital it may be, but one would imagine that none but lunatics are admitted, and, truly, I will give you leave to call me so, if I stay much longer at Bath-But I shall take another opportunity to explain my sentiments at greater length on this subject-I was impatient to see the boasted improvements in architecture, for which the upper parts of the town have been so much celebrated, and t'other day I made a circuit of all the new buildings The square, though irregular, is on the whole pretty well laid out, spacions, open, and airy, and in my opinion by far the most wholesome and agreeable situation in Bath, especially the upper side of it, but the avenues to it are mean, dirty, dangerous, and indirect. Its communication with the baths is through the yard of an inn, where the poor trembling valetudinarian is carried in a cliair, betwixt the heels of a double row of horses, wincing under the curry combs of grooms and postillions, over and above the hazard of being obstructed, or overturned by the carriages which are continually making their exit or their entrance.—I suppose, after some chairmen shall have been maimed, and a few lives lost by those accidents, the corporation will think in earnest about providing a more safe and commodious passage. The circus is a pretty bauble, contrived for show, and looks like Ves pasian's amphitheatre turned outside in. If we consider it in point of magnificence, the great number of small doors belonging to the separate houses, the inconsider able height of the different orders, the affected ornaments of the architrave, which are both childish and misplaced, and the areas projecting into the street, surrounded with iron rails, destroy a good part of its effect upon the eye, and perhaps we shall find it still more defective, if we view it in the light of convenience. The figure of each separate dwelling house, being the segment of a circle, must spoil the symmetry of the rooms, by contracting them towards the street windows, and leaving a larger sweep in the space behind If, instead of the areas and iron rails, which seem to be of very little use, there had been a corridore with arcades all round, as in Covent garden, the appearance of the whole would have been more magnificent and striking, those arcades would have afforded an agreeable covered walk, and sheltered the poor chairmen and their carriages from the rain, which is here almost perpetual. At present, the chairs stand soaking in the open street, from morning to night, till they become so many boxes of wet leather, for the benefit of the gouty and rheumatic, who are transported in them from place to place. Indeed, this is a shocking inconvenience that extends over the whole city, and I am persuaded it produces infinite mischief to the delicate and infirm even the close chairs contrived for the sick, by standing in the open air, have their freeze linings impregnated, like so many sponges, with the moisture of the atmosphere, and those cases of cold vapour must give a charming check to the perspiration of a patient, piping hot from the bath, with all his pores wide open

Lieutenant Lismahago

There is no hold by which an Englishman is sooner taken than that of compassion -We were immediately interested in behalf of this veteran.-Even Tabby's heart was melted, but our pity was warmed with in dignation when we learned that in the course of two sanguinary wars he liad been wounded, maimed, miltilated, taken, and enslaved, without ever having attained a higher rank than that of lieutenant.-My nucle's eyes gleamed, and his nether lip quivered, while he exclaimed, -'I vow to God, sir, your case is a reproach to the service.—The injustice you have met with is so flagrant.' -'I must crave your pardon, sir,' cned the other, inter rupting him, 'I complain of no injustice -I purchased an ensigncy thirty years ago, and in the course of service rose to be a heutenant, according to my seniority '- 'But in such a length of time,' resumed the squire, 'you must have seen a great many young officers put over your head.'-'Nevertheless,' said he, 'I have no cause to murmur -They bought their preferment with their money -I had no money to carry to market-that was my misfortune, but nobody was to blame.'- 'What! no friend to ad vance a sum of money?' said Mr Bramble I might have borrowed money for the purchase of a company,' answered the other, 'but that loan must have been refunded, and I did not choose to encumber myself with the debt of a thousand pounds, to be paid from nn income of ten shillings a day ' 'So yon have spent the best part of your life,' cried Mr Bramble, 'your youth, your blood, and your constitution, amidst the dangers, the difficulties, the horrors, and hard ships of war, for the consideration of three or four shillings a-day—a consideration—' 'Sir,' replied the Scot, with great warmth, 'you are the man that does me injustice, if you say or think I have been actuated by any such paltry consideration -I am a gentleman, and entered the service as other gentlemen do, with such hopes and sentiments as honourable ambition in spires.-If I have not been lucky in the lottery of life, so neither do I think myself unfortunate.-- I owe no man a farthing, I can always command a clean shirt, a mutton chop, and a truss of straw and, when I die, I shall leave effects sufficient to defray the expense of my burnal?

My uncle assured him he had no intention to give him the least offence by the observations he had made, but, on the contrary, spoke from a sentiment of friendly regard to his interest.-The lieutenant thanked him with a stiffness of civility which nettled our old gentleman, who perceived that his moderation was all affected, for whatsoever his tongue might declare, his whole appear ance denoted dissatisfaction -In short, without pretend ing to judge of his military merit, I think I may affirm that this Caledonian is a self conceited pedant, awkward, rude, and disputations -He has had the benefit of a school education, seems to have read a good number of books, his memory is tenneious, and he pretends to speak several different languages, but he is so addicted to wrangling that he will cavil at the clearest truths, and, in the pride of argumentation, attempt to reconcile contradictions -Whether his address and qualifications are really of that stamp which is agreeable to the taste of our aunt Mrs Tabitha, or that indefatigable maiden is determined to shoot at every sort of game, certain it is she has begun to practise upon the heart of the heu tenant, who favoured us with his company at supper

The Vale of Leven.

(From Melford's Newcastle letter in Humphry Clinker)

The water of Leven, though nothing near so consider able as the Clyde, is much more transparent, pastoral, and delightful. This charming stream is the outlet of Loch Lomond, and through a track of four miles pursues its winding course over a bed of pebbles, till it joins the Firth of Clyde at Dumbarton On this spot stands the castle formerly called Alcluyd, and wished by these two rivers on all sides except a narrow istlimus, which at every spring tide is overflowed, the whole is a great curiosity, from the quality and form of the rock, as from the nature of its situation. A very little above the source of the Leven, on the lake, stands the house of Cameron, belong ing to Mr Smollett (the Inte commissary), so embosomed in oak wood that we did not perceive it till we were within fifty yards of the door. I have seen the Lago di Garda, Albano, di Vico, Bolseni, and Geneva, and I preser Loch Lomond to them all—a preserence which is certainly owing to the verdant islands that seem to float upon its surface, affording the most enchanting objects of repose to the excursive view. Nor are the banks desti tute of beauties which can partake of the sublime. On this side they display a sweet variety of woodland, corn field, and pasture, with several agreeable villas, emerging, as it were, out of the lake, till at some distance the pros pect terminates in huge mountains, covered with heath, which, being in the bloom, affords a very rich covering of purple. Everything here is romantic beyond imagina This country is justly styled the Arcadia of Scot land, I do not doubt but it may vic with Arcadin in everything but climate. I am sure it exects it in verdure, wood, and water (From Humphry Clinker)

'The blast that blows hardest is soon overblown' is a line from a song of Smolletts, and this is from his Regicule

"To exult
Ev n o er nn enemy oppressed and heap
Affliction on the afflicted, is the mark
And the mean triumph of a dastard soul

There have been collective editions of Smollett's works in 1790, 1797 (re-edited 1872), 1845 &c., besides selections and separate editions of the novels (as by Samisbury in 1895 and W E. Henles in 1900). Lives have been written by Dr John Moore (1797) R. Anderson, Scott, Roscoe, R. Chambers, D. Herbert, and Samtsbury for editions and by D. Hannay (1887) and Oliphant Smeaton (1897) in short monographs.

Adam Smith

was born at Kirkenldy in Fifeshire, 5th June 1723, his fither, who held the situation of comptroller of customs, died before the birth of his son Glasgow University (from 1737 on) Smith distinguished himself by his acquirements, thence as Snell exhibitioner lie passed to Balliol College, Oxford, where he continued for seven years friends had designed him for the Church, but he preferred literature and science In 1746 he came to Edinburgh, and joined the brilliant group which comprised David Hume, John Home, Hugh Blair, Principal Robertson, and Lord Hailes He gave a course of lectures in Ldinburgh on rhetoric and belles lettres, which, in 1751, recommended him to the vacant chair of logic in Glasgow, and this lie next year exchanged for the more congenial one In 1759 he published his of moral philosophy Theory of Moral Sentiments, and in 1763 he accompanied the young Duke of Buccleuch as travelling tutor on the Continent. absent two years, and in Paris made the acquaintance of Quesnay, Turgot, Necker, and On his return Smith retired to his native town, and pursued a severe system of study which resulted in the publication, in 1776, of his great work on the Il calth of Nations After Hume's death, in that same year, he went to London, and was a member of the club to which Reynolds, Garrick, and Johnson belonged. In 1778 he returned to Edinburgh as one of the commissioners of customs, and his latter days were spent in ease and opulence. He died in 1790

The philosophical or ethical doctrines of Smith attracted much notice for a time, largely owing to their easy style and his illustrations. He was called the most eloquent of modern moralists, and his work was illustrated with such a wealth of examples, with such true pictures of the passions and of life and manners, that it was read with pleasure by many who, like Gray the poet, could not see in the darkness of meta-His leading doctrine, that sympathy must necessarily precede our moral approbation or disapprobation, and is accordingly the root of ethics, never met with wide acceptance derive our moral sentiments,' said Brown, 'which are as universal as the actions of mankind that come under our review, from the occasional sympathies that warm or sadden us with jovs, and griefs, and resentments which are not our own, seems to me very nearly the same sort of error as it would be to derive the waters of an overflowing stream from the sunshine or shade which may occasionally gleam over it'

Smith's Wealth of Nations laid the foundation of the science of political economy. Some of its leading principles had been indicated by Hobbes and Locke, Mandeville had also in his Fable of the Bees (see above, page 200) illustrated the advantages of free trade, Joshua Child, William Petty, and Dudley North had made considerable progress in the same direction, Hume in his essays had shown that no nation could profit by stopping the natural flood of commerce between itself and the rest of the world. Several French writers, especially the Physiocrats, and amongst them notably Turgot and Quesnay, had taught many of the new ideas to which Smith was destined to give the fullest and fittest expression, although it is clear, from his recently published Glasgow lectures, that the main lines of his system had been conceived independent of French 'physio cratic' influence, before 1760 Smith's labour of ten years produced a complete system of political economy, and the execution of his work shows such indefitigable research, so much sagacity, learning, and information derived from arts and manufactures no less than from books, that the Wealth of Nations must always be regarded as one of the magistral works on political philosophy Its leading principles were thus summed up by M'Culloch 'He shewed that the only source of the opulence of nations is labour, that the natural wish to augment our fortunes and rise in the world is the cause of riches being accumulated demonstrated that labour is productive of wealth, when employed in manufactures and commerce, as well as when it is employed in the cultivation of land, he traced the various means by which labour may be rendered most effective, and gave a most admirable analysis and exposition of the prodigious addition made to its efficacy by its division among different individuals and countries, and by the employment of accumulated wealth or capital in industrious undertakings shewed, in opposition to the commonly received opinions of the merchants, politicians, and statesmen of his time, that wealth does not consist in the abundance of gold and silver, but in the abundance of the various necessaries, conveniences, and enjoyments of human life, that it is in every case sound policy to leave individuals to pursue their own interest in their own way, that, in prosecuting branches of industry advantageous to themselves, they necessarily prosecute such as are at the same time advantageous to the public, and that every regulation intended to force industry into particular channels, or to determine the species of commercial intercourse to be carried on between different parts of the same country, or between distant and independent countries, is impolitic and pernicious?

Of course he was not infallible, even if his own premises are admitted, his doctrines, or what are said to be his doctrines, have been charged with inculcating selfishness, and denounced as too abstract and individualistic. As being too cosmopolitan, he was opposed by leaders of the naturalist school like List and Carey, insisting that the economy of each country must be adapted to the special conditions of its development—thus protection, not required in England, might be advantageous and necessary for Germany and the United States. The historical school also opposes the abstract method. Ricardo, one of the most eminent successors of Smith, was even more abstract and less historical than his forerunner, and J. S. Mill's work was mainly a restatement of Smith's and Ricardo's. It must be remembered that Smith wrote before the scientific methods in history had been established, before the days of evolution, before the development of modern industrialism, and before socialistic modes of thought had become common But it rarely happens that the opus magnum of the founder of a science, which has moulded and guided the policy of states, retains for later ages as high and permanent value as does that of Smith And the book is by no means merely a manual of economics, a propaganda for free trade, it con tains many a shrewd and luminous suggestion for the solution of historical and political problems, not a few sagacious and valuable contributions to a science of politics and a philosophy of history

On Guilty Ambition.

To attain to this envied situation, the candidates for fortune too frequently abandon the paths of virtue, for unhappily the road which leads to the one and that which leads to the other he sometimes in very opposite directions. But the ambitious man flatters himself that, in the splendid situation to which he advances, he will have so many means of commanding the respect and admiration of mankind, and will be enabled to act with such superior propriety and grace, that the lustre of his future conduct will entirely cover or efface the foulness of the steps by which he arrived at that elevation In many governments the candidates for the highest stations are above the law, and if they can attain the object of their ambition, they have no fear of being called to account for the means by which they required They often endeavour, therefore, not only by fraud and falschood, the ordinary and sulgar arts of intrigue and cabal, but sometimes by the perpetration of the most enormous crimes, by murder and assassination, by rebellion and civil war, to supplant and destroy those who oppose or stand in the way of their greatness They more frequently miscarry than succeed, and com monly gain nothing by the disgreeful punishment which is due to their crimes. But though they should be so lucly as to attain that wished for greatness, they are always most miscrably disappointed in the happi ness which they expect to enjoy in it. It is not ease or pleasure, but always honour, of one kind or another, though frequently an honour very ill understood, that the ambitious man really pursues. But the honour of his exalted station appears, both in his own eyes and an those of other people, polluted and defiled by the baseness of the means through which he rose to it. Though by the profusion of every liberal expense, though by excessive indulgence in every proflighte pleasure—the wretched but usual resource of ruined characters, though by the hurry of public business, or by the prouder and more dazzling tumult of war, he may endeavour to efface both from his own memory and from that of other people the remem brance of what he has done, that remembrance never fuls to pursue him. He invokes in vain the dark and dismal powers of forgetfulness and oblivion 11e remem bers himself what he has done, and that remembrance tells him that other people must likewise remember it Amidst all the gaudy pump of the most ostentatious greatness, amidst the venal and vile adulation of the great and of the learned, amidst the more innocent though more foolish acclamations of the common people, amidst all the pride of conquest and the triumph of successful war, he is still secretly pursued by the aveng ing furies of shame and remore, and while glory seems to surround him on all sides, he limself in his own imagination sees black and foul infainy fast pursuing him, and every moment ready to overtake him from behind Even the great Cresar, though he had the magnanimity to dismiss his guards, could not dismiss his suspicions The remembrance of Pharsaha still haunted and pur When at the request of the senate he had the generosity to pardon Marcellus, he told that assembly that he was not unaware of the designs which were carrying on against his life, but that, as he had lived long enough both for nature and for glory, he was con tented to die, and therefore despised all conspiracies He had perhaps lived long enough for nature, but the man who felt himself the object of such deadly resentment, from those whose favour he wished to guin, and whom he still wished to consider as his friends, liad certainly hved too long for real glory, or for all the happiness which he could ever hope to enjoy in the love and esteem of his equals (From the Moral Sentiments)

On the Division of Labour

Observe the accommodation of the most common artificer or day labourer in a civilised and thriving country, and you will perceive that the number of people of whose industry a part, though but a small part, has been employed in procuring him this accommodition, exceeds all computation. The woollen cost, for example, which covers the day labourer, as coarse and rough as it may appear, is the produce of the joint labour of a great multitude of worl men. The shepherd, the sorter of the wool, the wool comber or carder, the dyer, the scribbler, the spinner, the weaver, the fuller, the dresser, with many others, must all join their different arts in order to complete even this homely production How many merchants and carriers, besides, must have been employed in transporting the materials from some of those worl men to others, who often live in a very distant part of the country. How much commerce and navigation in particular, how many ship builders, sailors, sail makers, rope makers, must have been employed in order to bring together the different drugs made use of by the dyer, which often come from the remotest corners of the vorlil! What a variety of labour, too, is neces sary in order to produce the tools of the meanest of those workmen! To say nothing of such complicated machines as the ship of the sailor, the mill of the fuller, or even the loom of the weaver, let us consider only what a variety of labour is requisite in order to form that very simple machine, the shears with which the shepherd clips The miner, the builder of the furnace for the wool smelting the ore, the feller of the timber, the burner of the charcoal to be made use of in the smelting house, the brief maker, the brief layer, the worl men who attend the furnice, the millwright, the forger, the smith, must all of them join their different arts in order to produce Were we to examine in the same manner all the different parts of his dress and household furniture, the coar clinen shirt which he werrs next his skin, the shoes which cover his feet, the bed which he hes on, and all the different parts which compose it, the latchen grate at which he prepares his victuals, the coals which he mal es use of for that purpose, dug from the bowels of the earth, and brought to him, perhaps, by a long sea and a long land carriage, all the other itensils of his Litchen, all the furniture of his table, the I nives and forks, the earthen or pewter plates upon which he serves up and divides his victuals, the different liands employed in preparing his bread and his beer, the glass window which lets in the heat and the light, and keeps out the wind and the run, with all the knowledge and art requisite for preparing that beautiful and happy invention, without which these northern parts of the world could scarce have afforded a very comfortable habitation, together with the tools of all the different workmen employed in producing those different conveniences, if we examine, I say, all these things, and consider what a variety of labour is employed about each of them, we shall be sensible that, without the assistance and co operation of many thousands, the very meanest person in a civilised country could not be provided, even according to what we very falsely imagine the easy and simple manner in which he is commonly accommodated Compared, indeed, with the more extravagant luxury of the great, his accommoda tion must no doubt appear extremely simple and easy, and yet it may be true, perhaps, that the accommodation of n European prince does not always so much exceed that of an industrious and frugal peasant, as the accommodation of the latter exceeds that of many an African king, the absolute masters of the lives and liberties of ten thousand naked savages.

(From the Wealth of Nations, Book 1. Chap 1)

Europe and its Colonies

Such have been the general ontlines of the policy of the different European nations with regard to their colonies. The policy of Lurope, therefore, has very little to boast of, either in the original establishment, or, so far as concerns their internal government, in the subsequent prosperity of the colonies of America.

Folly and injustice seem to have been the principles which presided over and directed the first project of establishing those colonies, the folly of hinting after gold and silver mines, and the injustice of coveting the possession of a country whose harmless natives, far from having ever injured the people of Europe, had received the first adventurers with every mark of kindness and hospitality. The adventurers, indeed, who formed some of the latter establishments, joined to the chimerical project of finding gold and silver mines, other motives more reasonable and more laudable, but even these motives do very little honour to the policy of Europe

The English Puritans, restrained at home, fled for freedom to America, and established there the four governments of Nev England. The English Catholics, treated with much greater injustice, established that of Maryland the Quakers, that of Pennsylvania. The Portuguese Jews, persecuted by the Inquisition, stript of their fortunes, and banished to Brazil, introduced, by their example, some sort of order and industry among the transported felons and strumpets by whom that colony was originall peopled, and taught them the culture of the sugar cane. Upon all these different occasions, it was not the wisdom and policy, but the disorder and injustice of the European governments, which peopled and cultivated America.

In effectuating some of the most important of these establishments, the different governments of Europe had as little merit as in projecting them. The conquest of Mexico was the project, not of the council of Spain, but of a governor of Cuba, and it was effectuated by the spirit of the bold adventurer to whom it was entrusted, in spite of everything which that governor, who soon repented of having trusted such a person, could do to thwart it. The conquerors of Chili and Peru, and of almost all the other Spanish settlements upon the continent of America, carried out with them no other public enconragement, but a general permission to male settle ments and conquests in the name of the king of Spain Those adventures were all at the private risk and expense of the adventurers The government of Spain contri buted scarce anything to any of them That of England contributed as little towards effectuating the cstublish ment of some of its most important colonies in North America.

When those establishments were effectuated, and had become so considerable as to attract the attention of the mother country, the first regulations which she made with regard to them had always in view to secure to herself the monopoly of their commerce, to confine their market, and to enlarge her own at their expense, and, consequently, rather to damp and discourage, than to quicken and forward the course of their prosperity. In the different vays in which this monopoly has been exercised, consists one of the most essential differences in the policy of the different European nations with regard to their colonies. The best of them all, that of England, is only somewhat less illiberal and oppressive than that of any of the rest.

In what way, therefore, has the policy of Europe contributed either to the first establishment, or to the present grandeur of the colonies of America? In one way, and in one way only, it has contributed a good deal Alagna virûm mater! It bred and formed the men who were capable of achieving such great actions, and of laying the foundation of so great an empire, and there is no other quarter of the vorld of which the policy is capable of forming, or lias ever actually and in fact formed, such men. The colonies owe to the policy of Europe the education and great views of their active and enterprising founders, and some of the greatest and most important of them, so far as concerns their internal government, owe to it scarce anything else.

(From the Il caith f Nations Book iv Chap. 7)

Advantages to Ireland and the Colonies in Union with Britain

By a union vitli Great Britain, Ireland would gain, besides the freedom of trade, other advantages much more important, and which would much more than compensate any increase of taxes that might accompany that union By the union with England, the middling and inferior ranks of people in Scotland gained a complete deliverance from the power of an anstocracy which had always before oppressed them By a union with Great Britain, the greater part of people of all ranks in Ircland would gain an equally complete deliverance from a much more oppressive aristocracy, an aristocracy not founded, like that of Scotland, in the natural and respectable dis tinctions of birth and fortune, but in the most odious of all distinctions, those of religious and political prejudices, distinctions which, more than any other, animate hoth the insolence of the oppressors and the hatred and in dignation of the oppressed, and which commonly render the inhabitants of the same country more hostile to one another than those of different countries ever are-Without a union with Great Britain, the inhabitants of Ireland are not likely for many ages to consider them selves as one people.

No oppressive aristocracy has ever prevailed in the colonies Even they, however, would in point of happiness and tranquillity gain considerably by a union with Great Britain. It would at least deliver theni from those rancorous and virulent factions which are in separable from small democracies, and which have so frequently divided the affections of their people and disturbed the tranquillity of their governments, in their form so nearly democratical. In the case of a total separation from Great Britain, which, unless prevented by a union of this kind, seems very likely to tale place, those factions would be ten times more virulent than Before the commencement of the present dis turbances, the coercive power of the mother country had always been able to restrain those factions from breaking out into anything worse than gross brutality and insult. If that coercive power were entirely taken away, they would probably soon break out into open violence and bloodshed. In all great countries which are united under one uniform government, the spirit of party commonly prevails less in the remote provinces than in the centre of the empire. The distance of those provinces from the capital, from the principal scat of the great scramble of faction and ambition, makes them enter less into the views of any of the contending parties, and renders them more indifferent and impartial spectators of the conduct

The spirit of party prevails less in Scotland than in England In the case of a union, it would probably prevail less in Ireland than in Scotland, and the colonies would probably soon enjoy a degree of concord and unanimity at present unknown in any part of the British Both Ireland and the colonics, indeed, would be subjected to heavier taxes than any which they at In consequence, however, of a diligent and present pay furthful application of the public revenue towards the discharge of the national debt, the greater part of those taxes might not be of long continuance, and the public revenue of Great Britain might soon be reduced to what was necessary for maintaining a moderate peace establishment (From the Il calth of Nations, Book v Chap 3.)

Parish Schools

But though the common people cannot, in any end hised society, be so well instructed as people of some runl and fortune, the most essential parts of education, however, to read, write, and account, can be acquired at so early a period of life, that the greater part even of those who are to be bred to the lowest occupations, have time to require them before they can be employed in those occupations. I or a very small expense the public can facilitate, can encourage, and can even impose upon almost the whole body of the people, the necessity of acquiring those most essential parts of education

The public can facilitate this acquisition by establish ing in every parish or district a little school, where children may be taught for a reward so moderate, that even a common labourer may afford it, the master being partly, but not wholly paid by the public, because if he was wholly or even principally paid by it, he would soon learn to neglect his business. In Scotland the establish ment of such parish schools has taught almost the whole common people to read, and a very great proportion of them to write and account. In England the establish ment of charity schools has had an effect of the same kind. though not so universally, because the establishment is not so universal. If in those little schools the books by which the children are taught to read were a little more instrue tive than they commonly are, and if instead of a little smattering of Latin, which the children of the common people are sometimes taught there, and which can scarce ever be of any use to them, they were instructed in the elementary parts of geometry and mechanics, the literary education of this rank of people would perhaps be as complete as it can be There is scarce a common tride which does not afford some opportunities of applying to it the principles of geometry and mechanics, and which would not therefore gradually exercise and improve the common people in those principles, the necessary intro duction to the most sublime as well as to the most useful sciences (From Wealth of Nations Book v Chap 1-Art. ii.)

Hume's Last Illness

His cheerfulness was so great, and his conversation and amusements ran so much in their usual strain, that, notwithstanding all bad symptoms, many people could not believe he was dying 'I shall tell your friend, Colonel Edmondstoune,' said Dr Dundas to him one day, 'that I left you much better, and in a fair way of recovery' 'Doctor,' said he, 'as I believe you would not care to tell anything but the truth, you had better tell him that I am dying as fast as my enemics, if I have any, could wish, and as easily and cheerfully as my best friends could desire. Colonel Lamondstoune soon after wards came to see him, and talle leave of him, and on his way home he could not forhear writing him a letter bidding him once more an eternal adicu, and applying to lim, as to a dying man, the beautiful I rench verses in which the Abbe Chaulien, in expectation of his own death, Inments his approaching separation from his friend, the Marquis de la Lave Mr Humc's magna mimity and firmness were such that his most affectionate friends knew that they hazarded nothing in talking to him as to a dying man, and that so far from being hurt by this frankness, he was rather pleased and flattered by I happened to come into his room while he was reading this letter, which he had just received and which he immediately shewed me. I told him that though I was sensible how very much he was veakened, and that appearances were in main respects very had yet his cheerfulness was still so great, the spirit of life seemed still to be so very strong in him, that I could not help entertaining some faint hope He answered, 'Your hopes are groundless? 'Well,' said I, 'you have at least the satisfaction of leaving all your friends, your brother's family in particular, in great prosperity said that he felt that satisfaction so sensibly that, when he was reading, a few days before, Lucian's Dialegues of the Dead, among all the excuses which are alleged to Charon for not entering readily into his boat, he could not find one that fitted him, he had no house to finish, he had no daughter to provide for, he had no enemies upon whom he wished to revenge himself 'I could not well imagine,' said lie, 'what excuse I could nial e to Charon in order to obtain a little delay. I have done everything of consequence which I ever meant to do, and I could at no time expect to leave my relations and friends in a better situation than that in which I am now likely to leave them. I therefore have all reason to die contented. He then diverted himself with inventing several joenlar excuses which he thought he might make to Charon, and with imagining the very surly answerwhich it might suit the character of Charon to return to 'Upon further consideration,' said he, 'I thought I might say to him, "Good Charon, I have been correct ing my works for a new edition. Allow me a little time that I may see how the public receives the alterations" But Charon would answer, "When you have seen the effect of these, you will be for making other alterations There will be no end of such excuses, so, honest friend, please step into the boat" But I might still urge, "Have a little patience, good Charon, I have been endeavouring to open the eyes of the public. If I live a few years longer, I may have the satisfaction of seeing the downfall of some of the prevailing systems of super stition" But Charon would then lose all temper and "You lostering rogue, that will not happen these many hundred years Do you fancy I will grant you n lease for so long a term? Get into the boat this instant, you lazy loitering rogue "" (From a letter to Strahan)

The anecdote is characteristic of Smith as well as of Hume Hutcheson and Smith, Kames and Monboddo, and most of the eminent Scotsmen of the period illustrate that eighteenth-century humanism or semi-deistic rationalism which is a marked reaction against the older Scottish Calvinistic theocratical outlook on life and the world, and which in a more orthodox shape appears as Moderatism in Robertson Carlyle Plair, and the literary Church men Smith's works were edited by Dugald Stewart (1811-12), and contain, besides the Theory of the Moral Sentiments and the II callh of Nations, essays on the first formation of languages, the history of astronomy ancient physics ancient logic, and the imitative arts, his Glasgow Lectures on Justice Police Revenue, Arms were edited from notes by a student in 1895. There are editions of the Wealth of Vations by M Culloch (1850) Thorold Rogers (1880) and Prof Nicholson (1884) See Lives by Dugald Stewart (1811), Fairrer (1881), Haldane (1897) and Rae (1895) and see the Rev H G Graham's Scottish Men of Letters in the Eighteenth Century (1902)

John Home (1722-1808), author of Douglas, was born at Leith, where his father, though of gentle blood, was town clerk, and he studied at Edinburgh for the Church Taken prisoner fighting as a volunteer on the royalist side at Falkirk (1746), he made an exciting escape from Doune Castle, and nevt year he became minister of Athelstaneford, where he wrote the tragedy Agrs, and, in 1754, Douglas, founded on the ballad of Gil Morrice. Both plays were rejected by Garrick, but Louglas, brought out at Edinburgh (1756), met with brilliant success, and evoked equal enthusiasm in London the year after. But its production gave such offence to the Edinburgh Presbytery that the author resigned his ministry (1757), and became private secretary to the Earl of Bute and tutor to the Prince of Wales, who on his accession as George III gave him a pension of £300 a year, to which a sinecure of equal value was added in 1763. In connection with Home's withdrawal from the Church after he became known as a successful dramatist, it should be remembered that in England contemporary clerical opinion was almost equally hostile to the writing of plays by clergymen. Thus, when 'Estimate' Brown (see page 392) published his tragedies in 1754-56, Warburton, Hurd, and many other conspicuous clerics lamented that a clergyman should compromise his dignity by making a connection with the stage. The success of Douglas induced Garrick to bring out Agis, and to accept Home's next play, The Siege of Aquileia Home produced also The Fatal Discovery, Alonzo, Alfred, and a few occasional poems His prose History of the Rebeltion of 1745 utilised his own personal experience somewhat too fully, the autobiographical element at times overshadows the main plot, and the work is, inevitably perhaps, disproportionate and episodical Home married happily in 1770, and in 1779 settled in Edinburgh, where till his death he enjoyed the friendship of the Edinburgh literati—of Hume, Blair, Robertson, and 'Jupiter' Carlyle. He survived most of his contemporaries, and died at eighty six

The last of our tragic poets whose works for any time held the stage, Home had interesting plots and occasional flashes of genuine poetry, but he did not succeed in discarding the pompous declamation of his forerunners Patriotism, local feeling, and personal friendship made the Edin burgh critics absurdly overestimate the dramatic worth of Douglas, and men who should have known better set the play alongside, or even above, Shakespeare's best A critic in many respects so judicial as Hume (a kinsman and friend) actually said that Home possessed 'the true theatric genius of Shakespeare and Otway, refined from the unhappy barbarism of the one and the licentiousness of the other absurdly said that Home 'methodised wild Shakespeare into plan' Some English critics were for a time led into undue enthusiasm Even Collins, who dedicated to him his ode on Highland super stitions, makes rather much of him Mackenzie, the 'Man of Feeling,' was of opinion that the chief scene between Lady Randolph and Old Norval, in which the preservation of Douglas is described, had no equal in modern, and scarcely a superior in the ancient, drama, and Scott in this agreed with Mackenzie Christopher North still thought nobody could bestow too much praise on Douglas Now the presbyter dramatist is perhaps too much contemned

Douglas, the young hero, 'enthusiastic romantic, desirous of honour, careless of life and every other advantage when glory lay in the balance,' was the schoolbox model of Scottish youth for the best part of a century, the stock quotation beginning—

My name is Norval on the Grampian Hills

My father feeds his flocks-was worn threadbare by much repetition. As a specimen of Home's style and diction, part of the discovery scene may suffice. Lord Randolph had been attacked by four men, and rescued by young Douglas, an old man, taken in the woods, is apprehended as one of the assassins, some rich jewels being found in his possession

Lady Randolph Account for these, thine own they For these, I say be steadfast to the truth, [cannot be Detected falsehood is most certain death

Now lightsome o'er the level mead, Where midnight fairies rove, I ske them the jocund dance we'll lead, Or tune the reed to love For see, the rosy May draws night She claims a virgin queen, And hark! the happy shepherds cry "Tis Kate of Aberdeen

Lord Hailes is the name under which the indefitigable antiquary and miscell ineous writer Sir David Dalrymple (1726-92) is reincmbered The great grandson of the first Lord Stair, he was born and educated at Edinburgh, was called to the Scottish Bar in 1748, and in 1766 became a judge of the Court of Session as Lord Hailes, in 1776 a justiciary lord. He was a sound and learned lawyer, but at his country-sent of New Hulles near Edinburgh, he give his leisure to uninterrupted literary activity, largely in elucidating from the sources and putting on a sounder basis ancient Scottish ecclesiastical and national history sincere Christian, he did not cherish great intimacy with Hume, Adam Smith, and their set, but though a Whig and Presbyterian he was no bigot, and was highly esteemed by Johnson and Burke translated Hume's autobiographical fragment into elegant Latin, and edited the works of John Hales of Eton and the discourses of John Smith of Cambridge, and he refuted Gibbon, republished annotated old Scottish songs and poems, and wrote much on legal antiquities (proving that much of Scottish law vas derived from English sources He was the first to edit the Statutes of the Synods of the old Catholic Church in Sco land Aniong his historical works are A Discourse on the Gowrie Conspiracy (1757) and Memorials relating to the Reigns of James I and Charles I (1762-66), the best-known are the Anuals of Scotland, from the time of Malcolm Canmore to the accession of the House of Stewart (1776-79). This was the first critical history of the period, fully accepting the sound method laid down by Father Innes (see above at page 302), and was praised by Johnson in contrast to the 'painted histories more to the taste of the age'—an obvious allusion to Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon. John Scott (1730-83), our only Quaker poet till Bernard Barton won his laurels, was the son of a draper in London, who retired to Amwell in Hertfordshire. There too the son, who was mainly self taught, spent his days, improving his garden and grounds, and writing moral and descriptive poems, elegies, moral eclogues, epistles, and pamphlets on the poor laws and political questions Johnson, who 'loved Scott,' visited him here Scott 'fondly hoped to immortalise' his home, and his chief poem is Anwell (1776). The following verses were obviously dictated by real feeling as well as Quaker principle

Ode on Hearing the Drum.

I hate that drum's discordant sound,
Parading round, and round, and round
To thoughtless youth it pleasure yields,
And lures from cities and from fields,
To sell their liberty for charms
Of tawdry lace, and glittering arms,
And when Ambition's voice commands,
To march, and fight, and fall in foreign lands.

I hate that drum's discordant sound, Parading round, and round, and round To me it talks of ravaged plains, And burning towns, and ruined swains, And mangled limbs, and dying groans, And widows' tears, and orphans moans, And all that misery's hand bestows

Dr William Dodd (1729-77), a popular London preacher in the early years of George III, became known through his Beauties of Shakespeare (1752), and still more through his unhappy and shameful end Born at Bourne in Lincolnshire, and educated as a sizar at Cambridge, where he was fifteenth wrangler, he took orders and settled in London, and there, as chaplain of the Magdalen Hospital, he charmed all the fashionable ladies with his charity sermons Walpole, who once went to hear him there, tells how he harangued 'entirely in the French style' and theatrically addressed a royal prince who was in the congregation, beseeching his protec Dodd wrote some religious books, edited the Christian Magazine, became king's chaplain, LLD, and tutor to Lord Chesterfield's nephew

His expensive habits, however, sank him hopelessly in debt, a simoniacal attempt to buy the rich living of St George's, Hanover Square, resulted in his professional disgrace, and after selling a chapel at Pimlico which he had purchased in his palmy days, he forged his patron's and pupil's name to a bond for £4200 For this he was sentenced to death and hanged at Tyburn in July 1777, in spite of a strong agitation for miti gation of his sentence, in which Dr Johnson, who wrote petitions for him, and also composed the sermons he preached in prison, took a leading part After his death appeared a small volume of Thoughts in Prison, containing some penitent and edifying prose and verse, the latter much in the style of Young Johnson, although he had done his best to save Dodd from the gallows, did not 'wish to see him made a saint,' and remarked with more than his usual asperity on the Thoughts in Prison, 'A man who has been canting all his hie may cant to the last.'

Augustus Montague Toplady (1740-78), hymn-writer, was the son of a major in the army, born at Farnham and educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Dublin, in 1768 he became vicar of Bioad Hembury, Devon, and in 1775 preacher in a chapel near Leicester Fields, London A strenuous defender of Calvinism, he was a learned, keen, and bitter controversialist In a long-sustrined theological feud with John Wesley he spoke of one of Wesley's tracts as a known, wilful, palpable lie, and said of another statement, that its 'Satanic guilt was only equalled by its Satanic shamelessness,' to which Wesley retorted that he refused to 'fight with chimney-His Church of England vindicated sweepers 3 from Arminianism (1769) and Historic Proof of the Calvinism of the Church of England (1774), his Scheme of Christian and Philosophical Necessity (1775), and most of his work in verse are equally forgotten, but no hymn is better known than 'Rock of Ages,' first published in a Gospel magazine of 1775, which, in spite of its extraordinary mixed metaphors, has kept its hold on all religious denominations In 1759 he had published Poems on Sacred Subjects, the Psalms and Hymns (1776) was a collection by various authors. Of his own hymns, that oftenest sung after 'Rock of Ages' is unquestionably 'Your harps, ye trembling saints' The pious meditation or 'Address to his Soul,' beginning 'Deathless Principle, arise,' sometimes counted amongst his best poems, shows by its very first line how far it falls behind the better-known liymns Toplady rose from his deathbed to preach a last sermon contradicting a rumour that he had withdrawn any point of antagonism to Wesley

There is a Memoir by Row prefixed to his Works (1794), and one by Winters (1872), and see Ryle's Christian Leaders of a Hundred Years Ago (1869). His schoolboy journal-mentioning a farce submitted by him to Garrick-was printed in the Christian Observer in 1830, and reprinted in the Gospel Magazine in 1899.

Johnson was the son of a boolselier, and a as born at Inchield on the 18th of September 1709. Educated at the gramm ir-schools of

Lichteld and Stourbridge, he entered Pembroke College Oxford, as a commoner in his nineteenth year and, owing to his failur's misfortunes in trade, was compelled to leave the universit without a degree. He had been only fourteen morths at Oxford, but during that time had distinguished himself b translating Pope's Messiali into Litin verse. For a short vilile he was it her in a school at Market Bosworth, and in 1755 produced his first prose work a translation of the Jesuit Lobo's Abyssinian travels, but marra me a widow Mrs Porter, who was in her forty calch year (Johnson limself was twenty seven) -he are private academy at Edial near his native city. He had only three pupils, one of them David Garrick. After an unsuccessful trial of schoolmastering for a year and a half Johnson vent to London in 1737 accompanied by Garrick He had written part of his tragedy of Irom, Topin, to get it brought on the stage, but it was refu ed and he now commenced author by piefession, con ribiting it says reviews, &c to the tienties in's Masazire, and writing for the same p rished a monthly account of the proceedings in I drament under the title of 'Reports of the Debates of the Senate of Lillipote' Notes of the specenes are furn shed to him, and he extended them with a large discretion, in his own grandilo quent style taking care, as he said that the Whig di should not have the best of it. He was him of a trunch Tory and High Churchman to the ced. In 1738 appeared his poem of London in uni at on of the third satire of Juvenal, for which Dod less a chim ten gumers. Anonymously nub It 1 ed it instrintly become popular, and a second edi on vis called for within a week. Pope in guned after the author, saving such a man yould scon be known, and recommended Johnson to 1 and Go or who would have obtained for the poor poet the mastership of a grammar school in Leterstershire had not the academical M.A. been indispensable, and this Johnson could not now secure. He saruggled on, producing taskwork for Cive, the proprietor of the Gertleman's Magazine, and in 1744 published the Life of Richard Sarage, his friend and comrade in adversity, who had died the previous year. This admirable specimen of biography - admirable in spite of its very serious inaccuracies - was also published anonymously. But it is a known to be Johnson's, and his reputation continued to advance, so that the chief booksellers in London engaged him in 1747 to prepare a Dictionary of the English I an quage, for which he was to receive 1500 guineas The prospectus of the Dictionary was addressed to I ord Chesterfield, who acl not ledged the honour by bestowing on Johnson an honorarium of ten Seven years and more elapsed before the Dictionary was completed, and when it was on the ere of publication, Chesterfield-hoping, as Johnson believed, that the work might be dedicated to him -- wrote two papers in the periodical called the World in commendation of the plan of the Dictionary Wholly mistrusting his motives, Johnson penned an indignant letter to the noble earl, which remains inimitable as a frank and dignified expression of wounded pride and surly independence

Felruary 7, 1755

My Lord-I have been lately informed by the proprietor of the World, that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your lordship. To be so distinguished is an honour, which, being very little accustomed to favours from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge

When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of man kind, by the enchantment of your address, and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself le zanqueur du vanqueur de la terre—that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending, but I found my attendance so little encouraged, that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could, and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little

Seven years, my lord, have now passed since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door, during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it at last to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before

The shepherd 10 Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks

Is not a patron, my lord, one who looks with uncon cern on a man struggling for life in the water, and when he has reached ground, cucumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind, but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it, till I am solitary, and cannot impart it, till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should con sider me as owing that to a patron which Providence has enabled me to do for myself

Having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favourer of learning, I shall not be dis appointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less, for I have been long wakened from that dream of hope, in which I once boasted myself with so much evultation, my lord—Your lordship's most humble, most obedient servant

SAN JOHNSON

The Dictionary, which appeared in 1755, was hardly remarkable for philological research—etymological accuracy was then unattainable—but it is rich in happy and luminous definitions, the result of keen insight, great sagacity, precision of understanding, and clearness of expression. A few of the definitions betray the personal feelings and peculiarities of the author. For example, 'Excise' is explained, in accordance with the Tory hatred of Walpole, as 'a hateful tax levied upon commodities, and adjudged, not by the common judges of property, but wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid' A pension is defined to be 'an allowance made to any one without an equivalent. In England, it is generally understood to mean pay given to a state hireling for treason to his country' After such a definition it is scarcely to be wondered that Johnson paused and felt some 'compunctious visitings' before he accepted a pension himself Oats he defined, 'A grain which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people.' Yet, like the genuine humourist he was, he could jest also at himself, as when he described a lexicographer as 'a writer of dictionaries, a harmless drudge, that busies himself in tracing the original, and detailing the signification of The Dictionary, which was to remain the standard English dictionary for a century, was based on an interleaved copy of the Universal Ltymological English Dictionary of Nathan Bailey, which, published in 1721, attained to its thirtieth While his Dictionary was in edition in 1802 progress Johnson sought relaxation as well as pecuniary help from other tasks In 1749 he published The Vanity of Human Wishes, an imitation of the tenth satire of Juvenal, for which he received fifteen guineas. The same year Garrick brought out Irene, stately, full of admirable sentiments and sound maxims, but lacking tenderness, and though it was not successful, by good management the representation realised £195, 17s, besides £100 from Dodsley for the copyright of the play

Johnson's poetry forms but a small portion of the history of his mind or of his works. Yet his imitations of Juvenal are among the best imitations of a classic we possess, and Gray declared that London—the first in time, and by far the inferior of the two-had 'all the ease and all the spirit of an original' In the Vanity of Human Wishes Johnson departs more from his model and takes wider views of human nature, society, and manners His pictures of Wolsey and Charles of Sweden have a dignity and vigour that would do honour to Dryden, while the historical and philosophic por traitures are set in a framework of reflections on the cares, vicissitudes, and sorrows of life, so profound, so true and touching, that they may well be called 'mottoes of the heart.' Sir Walter Scott said this poem was 'a satire the deep and pathetic morality of which has often extracted tears from those whose eyes wander dry over pages professedly sentimental,' and Mr Gosse has very justly and felicitously described it as 'perhaps the most Roman poem in the language.' Johnson's other poetical pieces are short and occasional, but his fine Prologue on the Opening of Drury Lane and his lines On the Death of Mr Robert Levett are in his best manner

His next venture was an attempt to revive the kind of periodical literature which had proved so successful in the hands of Addison and Steele. After the Guardian periodical writing had for long been chiefly confined to politics The opening number of Johnson's Rambler appeared on the 20th of March 1750, and the periodical vas continued twice a week without interruption till the 14th of March 1752 Johnson received only four contributions (one of them from Samuel Richardson) during the whole course of the publication, consequently the work bore the stamp of but one mind, and that mind cast in a peculiar mould Steele's light graces and genialities were wanting, and sketches of the fashions and frivolities of the times, which had contributed so much to the popularity of the former essayists, found no place in the grave and gloomy pages of the Rambler The serious and somewhat pedantic style of the work was ill calculated for general readers, and it was no favourite with the public. When he collected these essays, Johnson revised and corrected them with great care, but even then they appeared heavy and cumhrous, his attempts at humour were not happy, and the women characters, as Garrick said, vere all Johnsons in petticoats. They all speak in the same measured, lofts style, and are like sculptured figures rather than real life. The author's use of hard words was a common grievance, but it is somewhat curious to find denounced in the Rambler words like resuscitation, narcotic, faturity, and germiration, which are now in daily use and have lost all air of pedantry Johnson's turgid style, moreover, often rose to grandeur and beauty, his imagery was striking and original, and his inculcation of moral and religious duty was earnest and impressive. Goldsmith declared that a system of morals might be drawn from these essays, and certainly no other English writer of that day could have moralised in such a dignified strain Six years after the Rambler was dropped there appeared the Idler, which was somewhat more lively, and ran as a weekly newspaper from 15th April 1758 to 5th April 1760 Of its one hundred and three papers no less than ninety one vere written by Johnson. Means hile lie had contributed twenty-six papers to John Haukesworth's Adventurer (1752-54), which, like the World and Connoisseur hetween 1753 and 1756, was among the imitators of the Rambler

Rasselas, Prince of Abissinia (1759), was written hy Johnson to pay some small debts and defray the funeral expenses of his mother, who had died at the age of ninety. It appeared almost simultaneously with Voltaire's Caudide, or it might have been taken for a counterblast to that irreverent jeu d'esprit. Ostensibly an Eastern tale, it is actually a series of essays on various subjects of morality and religion—on the efficacy of pilgrimages, the state of departed souls, the probability of the reappearance of the dead, the dangers of solitude—on all which the philosopher and the Prince of Abyssinia talk a little more ponderously than Johnson did for more than twenty years in his house at Bolt Court or in the club In spite of its rather tedious didacticism the book had a wonderful popularity, which was long maintained habitual melancholy of the author is everywhere apparent-it was not left to Werther to illustrate Weltschmerz-and is best expressed perhaps in the fine apostrophe to the river Nile great Father of waters thou that rollest thy floods through eighty nations, to the invocations of the daughter of thy native king Tell me if thou waterest, through all thy course, a single habitation from which thou dost not hear the murmurs of complaint.' When Johnson afterwards penned his depreciatory criticism of Gray, and uphraided him for apostrophising the Thames, adding rudely, 'Father Thames has no better means of knowing than himself,' he forgot that he had written Rasselas

In 1762 a new and hrighter era commenced pension of £300 was settled upon Johnson, chiefly through the influence of Lord Bute, then the all potent Minister, and ever afterwards the life of the great moralist was free from the corroding anxieties of poverty In 1764 the Literary Club was established, including Burke, Reynolds, Goldsmith, Gibbon, Garrick, Murphy, and others, and in this famous resort Johnson reigned supreme, the most hulliant talker of his age. In 1765 appeared, after many years' promises and delays, his edition of Shakespeare, about which, he said, he felt no solicitude, and the public was nearly asındıfferent It contained proofs, especially in an eloquent and masterly prefice, of his acuteness and insight into human nature, but was a careless and unsatisfactory piece of editorial work. Made easy by his pension and writings, Johnson undertook, in the autumn of 1773, his celebrated journey to the Hehrides in company with Boswell, whom he had first met ten years hefore in a bookseller's shop in Covent Garden It was certainly a remarkable undertaling for a man of sixty four, heavy, near sighted, somewhat deaf, full of English prejudices, a townsman who preferred Fleet Street to all the charms of Arcadia He had to perform great part of the journey on horseback, travelling over mountains and bogs, and to cross stormy firths and arms of the sea in open boats His account of the tour, published in 1775 is A Journey to the Western Isles of Scotland, is a most entertaining work. In the Highlands the imagination of Johnson expanded with the new scenery and forms of life presented to his view of feudalism, of clanship, and of ancient Jacobite families found full scope, and as he was always a close observer, his descriptions convey much amusing and novel information. His complaints of the want of woods in Scotland, though iterated with almost comical perseverance and querulousness, had the effect of setting the landlords to plant their hleak moors and mountains and improve the aspect of the country

In 1775 Johnson received the doctor's degree from Oxford, and soon afterwards he undertook the last and best of his works, the inimitable Lives of the English Poets, prefixed as prefaces to an edition of the English poets brought out by the London booksellers in 1779-81 In these famous biographies all critics have admired a freedom of style, a vigour of thought, and happiness of illustration rarely attained even by their author of the work was inadequate, as the lives begin only Some feeble and worthless rhymewith Cowley sters also obtained niches in Johnson's gallery, but the most serious defect is the injustice done to some of our greatest masters, largely through the political or personal prejudices of the biographer To Milton Johnson is strikingly unjust, though his criticism on Paradise Lost is able and profound Gray is treated with a coarseness and insensibility derogatory only to the critic, and in general the higher order of imaginative poetry suffers under the dictator's heavy hand beauties were too airy and ethereal for his grasptoo subtle for his feelings or understanding the lives of Dryden and Pope and most of the poets of their school are critical masterpieces, while the judgments of books and men throughout show a sublimated common-sense, a ripeness of experience, and a warmth of humanity that make the series, for all its carelessness and inaccuracy, as indubitably a classic in biography as the Parallel Lives of Plutarch It must be remembered, too, that Johnson had an unequalled knowledge of the literary period covered by his biographies, that he knew many of the men about whom he wrote, and had first hand or authentic traditions about most of the others, and all this gives a quite unique value to the Lives The Tory principles of Johnson, combined with the recollection of his pension, had induced him in his latter days to embark on the troubled sea of party politics, and he wrote several pamphlets-The False Alarm (1770), Thoughts on the Late Transactions respecting Falkland's Islands (1771), The Patriot (1774), and Taxation no Tyranny (1775)—in defence of the Ministry and against the claims of the Americans, but these are of minor note and value His work was now done His health had always been pre-He had from birth been afflicted with a scrofulous taint, all his life he was a prey to constitutional melancholy (often to the verge of insanity), and had a horror of death was an inmate in the family of Mr Thrale, the opulent brewer at Streatham, the agreeable society he met there, and especially the conversation and attentions of Mrs Thrale (afterwards Mrs Piozzi), sootlied and delighted him, but after this intimacy was interrupted (by Mrs Thrale's marriage with her Italian husband) Johnson's life in Bolt Court was but a sad and gloomy one. In his last sickness, however, which was cheered by the pious attentions of friends like Burke and Reynolds, he showed an unexpected screnity and fortitude. He died on the 13th of December 1784, and was buried in Westminster Abbey Revered with justice in his own day as the dictator of letters and the arbiter of morals in England, he has been best known to later generations as the hero of Boswell's matchless biography, wherein he appears as the prince of English talkers and the most vivid and outstanding figure in our literary history, the extracts from Boswell in the next article supplement the present brief sketch of his life. Yet even apart from Boswell, Johnson is a mighty name His two Juvenalian satires, his epoch-making Dictionary, and his Lives of the Poets suffice to signalise him as a man of rarely virile and various powers and achievement, a genuine poet of the secondary rank, and a prose writer who at his best is one of the most consummate masters of our tongue.

Shakespeare and the Unities

To the unities of time and place he has shewn no regard, and perhaps a nearer view of the principles on which they stand will diminish their value, and with draw from them the veneration which, from the time of Corneille, they have very generally received, by discovering that they have given more trouble to the poet than pleasure to the auditor

The necessity of observing the unities of time and place trises from the supposed necessity of making the drama credible. The criticks hold it impossible that an action of months or years can be possibly believed to pass in three hours, or that the spectator can suppose limiself to sit in the theatre while ambassadors go and return between distant kings, while armies are levied and towns besieged, while an exile wanders and returns, or till he whom they saw courting his mistress shall lament the untimely fall of his son. The mind revolts from evident falsehood, and fiction loses its force when it departs from the resemblance of reality.

From the narrow limitation of time necessarily arises the contraction of place. The spectator, who knows that he saw the first act at Alexandria, cannot suppose that he sees the next at Rome, at a distance to which not the dragons of Medea could in so short a time have transported him, he knows with certainty that he has not changed his place, and he knows that place cannot change itself, that what was a house cannot become a plain, that what was Thebes can never he Persepolis

Such is the triumphant language with which a critick exults over the misery of an irregular poet, and exilts commonly without resistance or reply. It is time, therefore, to tell him by the authority of Shakespeare, that he assumes, as an unquestionable principle, a position which, while his breath is forming it into words, his understanding pronounces to be false. It is false that any representation is mistaken for reality, that any dramatick fable in its materiality was ever credible, or for a single moment was ever credited.

The objection arising from the impossibility of passing the first hour at Alexandria, and the next at Rome, supposes that when the play opens the spectator really imagines himself at Alexandria, and believes that his walk to the theatre has been a voyage to Egypt, and that he lives in the days of Antony and Cleopatra. Surely he that imagines this may imagine more He that can take the stage at one time for the palace of the Ptolemies may tale it in half an hour for the promontory of Actium. Delusion, if delusion be admitted, has no certain limitation, if the spectator cao be once persualed that his old acquaintance are Alexander and Casar, that a room illuminated with candles is he plain of Pharsalia or the bard of Granicus, he is in a state of elevation above the reach of reason or of truth, and from the heights of corpyrean poetrs may despise the circumscriptions of terrestrial nature. There is no reason why a mind thus wandering in cestacy should count the clock, or why an hour should not be a century in that calenture of the brain that can make the sage a field

The truth is, that the spectators are always in their series and know, from the first act to the last, that the sage is only a stage, and that the players are only players. They come to hear a certain number of lines recited with jut gesture and elegant modulation. The lines relate to some action, and an action must be in some place, but the different actions that complete a story may be in places very remore from each other, and where is the absurdity of allowing that space to represent first Athens, and then Sieily, which was always 3 nown to be neither. Sieily nor Athens, but a modern theatre?

Py supposition, as place is introduced, time may be extended the time required by the fable clapses for the mo t par between the ac so for, of so much of the action as is repre inted the real and poetical duration is the same. If in the fir t act preparations for war against Mithril tes are represented to be made in Konic, the event of the war mry, without absurdity be represented in the catastrophe as happening in Pontus, we know that there is neither var nor preparation for war, we Inos that we are neither in Rome nor Pontus, that neither Mithirdates nor Lucullus are before us drima exhibits successive initiations of successive actions, and why may not the second imitation represent an action that happened years after the first, if it be so connected with it that nothing but time can be supposed to intercene? Time is, of all modes of existence, most obsequious to the imagination, a lapse of years is as easily conceived as a passage of hours. In contempla tion we easily contract the time of real actions, and therefore willingly permit it to be contracted when ve only see their imitation

It will be asked how the drima moves, if it is not credited. It is credited with all the credit due to a drima. It is credited, whenever it moves, as a just picture of a real original as repre enting to the auditor what he would himself feel if he vere to do or suffer what is there feigned to be suffered or to be done. The reflection that stril es the heart is not that the evils before us are real evils, but that they are evils to which we ourselves may be exposed. If there be any fallacy, it is not that we fancy the players, but that we funcy ourselves unhappy for a moment, but we rather lament the posibility than suppose the presence of misery, as a mother veeps over her babe when she remembers that The delight of tragedy death may take it from her proceeds from our consciousness of fiction, if we thought murders and treasons real, they would please no more

Imitations produce pain or pleasure, not because they are mistal en for realities, but because they bring realities to mind. When the imagination is recreated by a painted landscape, the trees are not supposed capable to give is shade, or the fountains cooloess, but we consider how we should be pleased with such fountains playing beside us, and such voods waving over us. We are aguated in reading the history of Henry the Fifth, yet no man takes his book for the field of Agincourt. A drimatick exhibition is a book recited with concomitants that increase or diminish its effect. Familiar comedy is often more powerful on the theatre than in the page, imperial trigedy is always less. The himour of Petriichio may be heightened by grimnee, but what voice or what gesture can hope to add dignity or force to the soliloquy of Cato?

A play read affects the mind like a play neted. It is therefore evident that the netion is not supposed to be real, and it follows that between the acts a longer or shorter time may be allowed to pass, and that no more account of space or duration is to be talen by the auditor of a drama than by the reader of a narrative, before whom may pass in an hour the life of a hero or the revolutions of an empire

Whether Shalespeare linew the unities and rejected them by design, or deviated from them by happy ignorance, it i, I think, impossible to decide, and useless to inquire. We may reasonably suppose that when he role to notice he did not want the counsels and admonitions of scholars and criticks, and that he at last de liberately persisted in a practice which he might have begun by chance. As nothing is essential to the fable but units of action, and as the unities of time and place are evidently from false assumptions, and, by circumserib ing the extent of the drama, lesson its variety, I cannot think it inuch to be lamented that they were not I nown by him, or not observed nor, if such another poet could arise, should I very vehemently reproach him that his first act passed at Venice and his next in Cyprus. Such violation of rules merely positive become the compre hensive genius of Shakespeare, and such censures are suitable to the minute and slender enticism of Voltaire.

(From the preface to the edition of Shakespeare)

On Revenge

A wise man will make liaste to forgive, because he I now s the true value of time, and will not suffer it to pass nway in innecessary pain. He that willingly suffers the corrosions of inveterate lintred, and gives up his days and nights to the gloom of malice and perturbations of stratagem, cannot surely be said to consult his ease. Resentment is an union of sorrow with malignity a combination of a passion which all endeasour to avoid, with a passion which all concur to detest man who retires to meditate mischief and to exas perate his own rage-whose thoughts are employed only on means of distress and contrivances of ruin-whose mind never pauses from the remembrance of his own sufferings but to indulge some hope of enjoying the calamities of another-may justly be numbered among the most miserable of human beings, among those who are guilty without reward, who have neither the gladness of prosperity nor the calm of innocence.

Whoever considers the weakness both of himself and others will not long want persuasives to forgiveness. We know not to what degree of mulignity any injury is to be imputed, or how much its guilt, if we were to inspect the mind of him that committed it, would be extenuated by mistake, precipitance, or oegligence, we cannot be certain how much more we feel than was intended to be inflicted, or how much we increase the mischief to ourselves by voluntary aggrivations. We may charge to design the effects of accident, we may think the blow violent only because we have made our selves delicate and tender, we are on every side in danger of error and of guilt, which we are certain to avoid only by speedy forgiveness.

From this pacific and harmless temper, thus propitious to others and ourselves, to domestic tranquillity and to social happiness, no man is withheld but by pride, by the fear of being insulted by his adversary or despised by the world. It may be laid down as an unfailing and universal axiom, that 'all pride is abject and mean'. It is always an ignorant, lazy, or cowardly acquiescence in a false appearance of excellence, and proceeds not from consciousness of our attainments, but insensibility of our wants.

Nothing can be great which is not right. Nothing which reason condemns can be suitable to the dignity of the human mind. To be driven by external motives from the path which our own heart approves, to give way to anything but conviction, to suffer the opinion of others to rule our choice or overpower our resolves, is to submit tamely to the lowest and most ignominious slavery, and to resign the right of directing our own lives.

The utmost excellence at which humanity can arrive is a constant and determinate pursuit of virtue without regard to present dangers or advantage, a continual reference of every action to the divine will, an habitual appeal to everlasting justice, and an unvaried elevation of the intellectual eye to the reward which perseverance only can obtain But that pride which many, who pre sume to boast of generous sentiments, allow to regulate their measures has nothing nobler in view than the approbation of men, of beings whose superiority we are under no obligation to acknowledge, and who, when we have courted them with the utmost assiduity, can confer no valuable or permanent reward, of beings who igno rantly judge of what they do not understand, or partially determine what they never have examined, and whose sentence is therefore of no weight till it has received the ratification of our own conscience

He that can descend to bribe suffrages like these at the price of his innocence—he that can suffer the delight of such acclamations to withhold his attention from the commands of the universal sovereign—has little reason to congratulate himself upon the greatness of his mind, whenever he awakes to seriousness and reflection, he must become despicable in his own eyes, and shrink with shame from the remembrance of his cowardice and folly

Of him that hopes to be forgiven, it is indispensably required that he forgive. It is therefore superfluous to urge any other motive. On this great duty eternity is suspended, and to him that refuses to practise it, the thronc of mercy is inaccessible, and the Saviour of the world has been born in vain

(From The Rambler, No 185)

Is Marriage a Failure?

'I know not,' said the princess, 'whether marriage be more than one of the innumerable modes of human misery. When I see and reckon the various forms of connubial infelicity, the nnexpected causes of lasting discord, the diversities of temper, the oppositions of opinion, the rude collisions of contrary desire when both are urged by violent impulses, the obstinate contests of disagree able virtues, where both are supported by consciousness of good intention, I am sometimes disposed to think with the severer casuists of most nations, that marriage is rather permitted than approved, and that none, but by the instigation of a passion too much indulged, entangle themselves with indissoluble compacts.

(From Rasselas)

From the Preface to the Dictionary

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labour of years, to the honour of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology, without a contest, to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authors whether I shall add anything by my own writings to the reputation of English literature must be left to time, much of my life has been lost upder the pressures of disease, much has been trifled away, and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me, but I shall not think my employment useless or ignorm if, by my assistance, foreign nations and distant ages gain access to the propagators of knowledge and understand the teachers of truth, if my labours afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Baçon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.

When I am animated by this wish, I look with plea sure on my book, however defective, and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavoured That it will immediately become popular I have not promised to myself, a few wild blunders and risible absurdates, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter and liarden ignorance into contempt, but useful dili gence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert, who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since, while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding and some falling away, that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient, that he whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand, that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task which Scaliger compares to the labours of the anvil and the mine, that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present, that sudden fits of madvertency will surprise vigilance, slight avocations will seduce attention, and easual eclipses of the mind will darken learning, and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory at the moment of need for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to morrow

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed, and though no book was ever spired out of tenderness to the author, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns, yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great, not in the soft obscurities of retirement or under the shelter of academic bowers, but amidst inconvenience

Parallel between Pope and Dryden

Pope profes ed to have learned his poetry from Dryden, whom, whenever an opportunity was presented, he praised through his whole life with unvaried liberality, and perhaps his character may receive some illustration if he be compared with his master

Integrity of understanding and nicety of discernment were not allotted in a less proportion to Dryden than to The rectitude of Dryden's mind was sufficiently shewn by the dismission of his poetical prejudices, and the rejection of unnatural thoughts and rugged numbers But Dryden never desired to apply all the judgment that he had He wrote, and profes of to write, merely for the people and when he pleased others he contented humself. He spent no time in struggles to rouse latent powers he never attempted to make that better which was already good, nor often to mend what he mu t have known to be faulty. He wrote, as he tells us, with very little consideration, when occasion or necessity called upon him, he ponred out what the present moment happened to supply and when once it had passed the pre ejected it from his mind for when he had no pecuniars interest, he had no further soli itude

Pope was not content to satisfy he do it also exect, and therefore always endeavoured to do his bet he did not court the candour, but dar d the judgment of his reader, and expecting no in his ence from others, he sheved none to himself. The commind line, and words with minute and punctifions observation, and retouched every part with in lefatigable diligence, till he had left nothing to be forgiven.

lor this reason he lept his pieces very long in his han is, while he considered and reconsidered them. The only poems which can be supposed to have been written with such regard to the times a might has en their publication were the two satires of Thir's eight, of which Dodsle, told me that they a cre brought to him by the author that they might be fairly copied. Almost every line, he said, 'was then written twice over I gave him a clean transcript, which he sent some time aftery and to me for the press, with almost every line a ritten ty ice over a second time.'

This declaration that his care for his works ceased at their publication was not strictly true. This parental attention never abandoned them, what he found amiss in the first edition, he silently corrected in those that followed. He appears to have revised the Iliad, and freed it from some of its imperfections, and the Essay on Creticism received many improvements after its first appearance. It will seldom be found that he altered without adding clearness, elegance, or vigour

Pope had perhaps the judgment of Dryden, but Dryden certainly wanted the diligence of Pope

In acquired knowledge the superiority must be allowed to Dryden, whose education was more scholastic, and who, before he became an author, had been allowed more time for study, with better means of information. Hi mind has a larger range, and he collects his images and illustrations from a more extensive circumference of science. Dryden knew more of man in his general nature, and Pope in his local manners. The notions of Dryden were formed by comprehensive speculation, and those of Pope by minute attention. There is more dignity in the knowledge of Dryden, and more certainty in that of Pope

Poctry was not the sole praise of either, for both excelled likewise in prose, but Pope did not borrow his prose from his predecessor. The style of Dryden is capricious and varied, that of Pope is cautious and uniform. Dryden obeys the motions of his own mind,

Pope constrains his mind to his own rules of composition. Dryden i sometimes vehenical and rapid. Pope is als assessmooth, uniform, and gentle. Dryden's page is a natural field, it ing into inequalities and discribed by the varied exuberance of abundant regretation. Pope's is a reliect last, shaven by the scythe and levelled by the roller.

Of genius, that power which constitutes a post, that quality sithout which judgment is cold and Luowledge is mert, that energy which collects, combines, amplifies, and animate, the superiority must, with some his tadou be allowed to Dryden. It is not to be inferred that of this poetical vigour Pope In I only a little because Dryden had more for every other virter since filter must give place to Pope, and even of Dryden it must be said that if he has bo, her paragraphs he has not better poems. Dryd n's ju fermances i ere olympi has i, either excited by some external occasion or exterted by dome tie reces its, he composed withost consideration and published radio confection. What his many could supply at call or garlier in one excursion, was all that he sought, and all the he pare. The dil tors caution of Pope enable I mm to combe to his sentiments, to mustiply he images, and to accomply e all that study might produce or chance night supply. If the flights of Dryten, herefore are higher, Pope continues longer on the sing If of Dryden's fire the blace is brighter, of lope the heat simple legular and con 'anoften surpressing expectation and Pope never falls below it. Draden is real with frequent astonishment, and Pope with perpenual delight

On what foundation stands the warrior's pride, How just his hopes, let Swedish Charles decide A frame of adminant, a soul of fire No danger fright him, and no labours tire, Our love, our fear, extends his wide domain, Unconquered lord of pleasure and of pain No jovs to him pacific sceptres yield, War sounds the trump he rushes to the field Ikhold surrounding lings their power combine And one expitulate, and one resign, Perce courts his hand, but spreads her charms in vain, 'Think nothing grined, he cries, 'till nought remain, On Moscow's walls till Gothic standards fly, An I all be mine beneath the polar sky? The march legins in military state An I note us on his eye suspended wait Stem famine guards the solitary coast, And winter barricades the realnis of frost He comes nor want, nor cold, his course delay, Hi le blushing glory, Inde Pultowa's day The vanguished hero leaves his brol en bands, And shows his miseries in district lands, Condemned a needy supplicant to wait, While Indies interpose and slaves debute But did not chance at length her error mend? Did no subverted empire mark his end? Did rwal monarchs give the fatal wound, Or hostile nullions press him to the ground? His fall was destined to a barren strand, A petty fortress, and a dubious hand, He left the name, at which the world grew pale, To point a moral or adorn a tale

But grant the virtues of a temperate prime, Bless with an age exempt from scorn or erime, An age that melts with unperceived decay, And glides in modest innocence away. Whose peaceful day benevolence endears, Whose night congratulating conscience cheers. The general favourite as the general friend, Such age there is, and who shall wish its end?

Net even on this her load misfortune flings. To press the weary minutes' flagging wings. New sorrow rises as the day returns, A sister siel ens, or a daughter mourns. Now kindred ment fills the sable bier, Now Incerated friendship claims a tear. Year chases year, decay pursues decay, Still drops some joy from withering life away, New forms nrise, and different views engage, Superfluous lags the veteran on the stage,

Till pitying nature signs the last release, And bids afflicted worth retire to peace.

Put few there are whom hours lile these await, Who set unclouded in the gulfs of fate. From Marlb rough's eyes the streams of dotage flow, And Svift expires a driveller and a show

Where, then, shall hope and fear their objects find? Must dull suspense corrupt the stagnant mind? Must liclpless man, in ignorance sedate, Roll darkling down the torrent of his fite? Must no dislike alarm, no wishes rise, No cries involve the mercies of the skies? Inquirer, cease, petitions jet remain, Which Heaven may hear, nor deem religion vain Still raise for good the supplicating voice, But leave to heaven the measure and the choice. Safe in his power, whose eyes discern afar The secret ambush of a specious prayer Implore his aid, in his decisions rest, Secure v hate'er he gives, he gives the best. Yet when the sense of sacred presence tires, And strong devotion to the skies aspires, Pour forth thy fervours for a healthful mind, Obedient passions, and a will resigned, For love, which scarce collective man can fill, For patience, sovereign o'er transmuted ill, For faith, that, panting for a happier scat, Counts death I ind nature's signal of retreat These goods for man the laws of Heaven ordain, These goods he grants, who grants the power to gun, With these celestial wisdom calms the mind,

Prologue spoken by Mr Garrick at the Opening of the Theatre in Drury Lane in 1747

And makes the happiness she does not find

When Learning's triumph o'er her barbarous foes First reared the stage, immortal Shakespeare rose, Each change of many coloured life he drew, Lathausted worlds, and then imagined new Existence saw him spurn lier bounded reign, And panting Time toiled after him in vain His powerful strokes presiding truth impressed, And unresisted passion stormed the breast

Then Jonson came, instructed from the school,
To please in method, and invent by rule,
His studious putience and laborious art
By regular approach assailed the heart
Cold approbation gave the lingering bays,
I or those who durst not censure, scarce could praise.
A mortal born, he met the general doom,
But left, life Egypt's kings, a lasting tomb

The vits of Charles found casier ways to fame, Nor wished for Jonson's art or Shakespeare's flame, Themselves they studied, as they felt they writ, Intrigue was plot, obscenity was wit Vice always found a sympathetic friend, They pleased their age, and did not aim to mend Vet bards like these aspired to lasting pruse, And proudly hoped to pimp in future days Their cause was general, their supports were strong, Their slaves were willing, and their reign was long,

Till shame regained the post that sense betrayed, And virtue called oblivion to her aid

Then crushed by rules, and weakened as refined, For years the power of Tragedy declined, From bard to bard the frigid caution crept, Till declamation roared, whilst passion slept, Yet still did virtue deign the stage to tread, Philosophy remained, though nature fled But forced at length her ancient reign to quit, She saw great Faustus lay the ghost of wit Exulting folly hailed the joyful day, And Pantomime and song confirmed her sway

But who the coming changes can presage,
And mark the future periods of the stage?
Perhaps, if skill could distant times explore,
New Belins, new D'Urfeys, yet remain in store,
Perhaps, where Lear has raved and Hamlet died,
On flying cars new sorcerers may ride
Perhaps—for who can guess the effects of chance?—
Here Hunt may box, or Mahomet may dance.

Hard is his lot that, here by fortune placed, Must watch the wild vicissitudes of taste, With every meteor of caprice must play, And chase the new blown bubbles of the day Ah! let not censure term our fate our choice, The stage but echoes back the public voice, The drama's laws the drama's patrons give, For we that live to please, must please to live.

Then prompt no more the follies you deers,
As tyrants doom their tools of guilt to die,
"Tis yours this night to bid the reign commence
Of rescued nature and reviving sense,
To chase the charms of sound, the pomp of show,
For useful mirth and salutary woe,
Bid Scenie Virtue form the rising age,
And Truth diffuse her radiance from the stage
Hunt was a famous boxer on the stage Mahomet a rope dancer who had been exhibiting at Covent Garden Theatre.

On the Death of Dr Robert Levett (1782)

Condemned to Hope's delusive mine, As on we toil from day to day, By sudden blasts, or slow decline, Our social comforts drop away

Well tried through many a varying year, See Levett to the grave descend, Officious, innocent, sincere, Of every friendless name the friend

Yet still he fills affection's eye, Obscurely wise and coarsely kind, Nor, lettered arrogance, deny Thy praise to ment unrefined.

When fainting nature called for aid,
And hovering death prepared the blow,
His vigorous remedy displayed
The power of art without the show

In misery's darkest cavern known,
His useful care was ever nigh,
Where hopcless anguish poured his groan,
And lonely want retired to die

No summons mocked by chill delay, No petty gain disdained by pride, The modest wants of every day, The toil of every day supplied His virtues will ed their narrow round, Nor made a pau e, nor left a void, And sure the Eternal Master found The single talent well employed

The bus day—the peaceful night, Unfelt, uncounted, glided by, His frame was firm—his powers were bright, Though now his eightieth year was nigh

Then vi li no fiery throbbing pain,
No cold gradations of decay,
Death broke at once the vital chain,
And freed his soul the nearest way

My dear friend, clear our mind of cant. You may talk as other people do, you may say to a man, 'Sir, I am your humble servant.' You are not his most humble servant. You may say, 'These are had times, it is a melancholy thing to be received to such times.' You don't mind the times. You tell a man, 'I am sorry you had such had yeather the last day of your journey and were so much yet.' You don't care sixpence whe her he is wet or dry. You may talk in this manner, it is a mode of talling in society, but don't think foolishly.

Treating your adversary with respect is giving him an advantage to a high he is not entitled. The greater part of men cannot judge of reasoning, and are impressed by character, so that, if you allow your adversary a respectable character, they will think that though you differ from him you may be in the wrong. Sir, treating your adversary with respect it striking soft in a battle

Johnson's works were first collected by his literary executor Sir John Hawkins, and published in eleven volumes in 1787-89. Arthur Murphy's edition in eleven volumes with a biographical essay, followed in 177/3 and the best of their many successors is that published at Oxford in eleven volumes in 1825. Dr Birkbeck Hill has edited Rasselas (1887) Wit and Wisdom of Dr Johnson (1888), Select Essays (1889) and the Letters of Johnson (1892). There are editions of the I ires of the Poets by Peter Cunningham (1854) and Mrs Napier (1899) and a selection of six of the lives was edited by Matthen Arnold in 1878 For Boswell's Life and its editors and critics, see the following article on Boswell. The other biographical matter, including and from Hawkins's Life, Murphy's Essay Mrs Piozzis Anecdotes, and the Recollections by Richard Cumberland Bisliop Percy, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Hannah More, Madame D Arblay, and others is reprinted in Mrs Napier's volume of Johnsoniana (1884). The chief critical estimates are Macaulay s famous essay and biography, and Mr Leslie Stephen's monograph in the series of 'English Men of Letters' while much relevant information may be found in Birkbeck Hill's Dr Johnson his Friends and his Critics (1878) and Seccombe's Age of Johnson (1900). There is a useful bibliography in Colonel F Grant's volume on Johnson in the 'Great Writers series (1887).

James Boswell.

the biographer of Dr Johnson, was born at Edin burgh, 18th October 1740, eldest son of Lord Auchinleck, a law lord, who had taken his title from the Avrshire estate which had belonged to the family since the reign of James IV. He was educated at the Edinburgh High School and at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, but greatly trratated the shrewd and surly old judge I to rejoin Rousseau in England, and immediately by his frivolity and dissipation A rest less itch for writing made him, a boy of eighteen, keep an 'c act journal,' write poems and pro logues to Edinburgh plays, and publish, at twenty three, a scries of would be clever and Witty letters th it h id passed between himself and a companion of egual age and experience, and a year in London at twenty spoiled hım for a provincial. His capacity for making friends and for fall ing temporarily in love, and his eagerness to know people that were notorious for anything, were as deep rooted in his nature as his love of letters and of literary distinc-During his second visit to London he had the supreme happiness of making Dr Jolinson's acquaintance in the back parlour of Tom Divice's shop in Russell Street (16th May 1763) The sincerity of the disciple's respect seems to have touched the master's heart, and the acquaintance quickly ripened into a warm friendship, which stood the strun of many a brutal rebuff on Johnson's part, and was kept in repair by frequent letters on both sides throughout the rest of Johnson's life A few months later Johnson accompanied Boswell to Harwich, on his way to study civil law at Utrecht, and parted from him with many wise counsels. At Utrecht Boswell spent one winter between study and dissipation, on an allowance from his father of £240 a year, ifter which, instead of returning home, he went on a tour through Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, and made the acquaintance of Voltaire and I him, but not without much grumbling and many

Rousseau Rousseau gave him a letter of introduction to Paoli, and to that hero the indefatigable Boswell at once repaired (1765) He was well received by the Corsicans, and for a time played the great Englishman to his heart's content, not forgetting to ask Paoli 'a thousand questions with regard to the most minute and private circum stances of his life' Returning through France in 1766, he escorted Therese Levasseur on her way afterwards passed ndvocate. and had some little professional cess, he seems to have employed himself voluntarily at least in the last stages of the famous Douglas cause. His Account of Corsica appeared early in 1768, and had a great vogue Jolinson said the journal was 'm a very high delightful degree and curious poet Gray, whose eves were undimmed by the partiality of friend ship, called it, in a letter to Horace Walpole, 'a dia logue between a green goose and a hero' Enily 1767 Boswell waited upon Chatham in Corsican costume to plead for Paoli, and was honoured some time after by a warm letter from the great statesman, which encouraged him in reply to the characteristic temerity of asking, 'Could your Iordship find time to honour me now and then with a letter? correspond with a Paoli and with a Chatham is enough to keep a young man ever ardent in the pursuit of virtuous fame.

From this time Boswell's mind was much taken up with a succession of matrimonial schemes, which ended somewhat prosaically with his marriage (1769) to his cousin, Margaret Montgomers, a prudent and amiable woman, who bore him seven children, and proved herself a sensible and On the same day his father forgiving wife married a cousin of his own, to the son's disgust and alarm The old judge allowed his son £300 a year, and from time to time paid his debts for

Boswell never became a prosperous lawyer, and continued to make visits to London almost every year. In 1773, fortunately for the world but against the wishes of many of the members, he was, through Johnson's influence, elected a member of the famous Literary Club Later in the same year occurred the memorable ourney to the Hebrides Neither Lord Auchinleck nor Boswell's own wife could understand the enthusiasm for the uncouth-looking philosopher, and although the latter was studiously polite, she could not hide from the astute Johnson the fact that he was disliked In 1775 Boswell began to keep his terms at the Inner Temple, and was ultimately called to the English Bar in 1786, in 1776 the Auchinleck property was entailed upon him, and in the August of 1782 he succeeded, on his father's death, to an estate of £1600 a year His last meeting with Johnson was at dinner with Sir Joshua Reynolds early in 1784, the year Johnson died Crol er calculated that Boswell met Johnson in all on one hundred and eighty days, or two hundred and seventy-six including the Scotch tour

Boswell now made some attempts to enter on a political career, for some years entertained hopes from the patronage of Lord Lonsdale, and could not understand Pitt's 'utter folly' in not seeing the value of 'my popular and pleasant talents,' but his sole reward vas the recordership of Carlisle, which he resigned in a year, through resentment of his patron's treatment of him 1789 his wife died, and henceforward his drinking habits got the mustery of him, he had been drinking all his days, with fits of repentance and solemn promises of amendment between his drunkard's hypochondria and the pressure of money difficulties he found refuge in writing Johnson's I ife, which occupied him several years Spite of occasional despondency and the pinch of financial difficulty, he refused to part with the copyright, and his confidence was justified. The book appeared in the May of 1791, vas received with delight, and sold so rapidly that a second edition was issued in July 1793. But his success failed to lighten his gloom or break him of his intemperate habits, his health gave way, and he died in London, after a brief illness, on the 19th of Vizy 1795

Boswell's Life of Johnson is admittedly our greatest biography, and the singular merit of the book raised the question how it could possibly have been written by a man of such egregious weakness and vanity as Boswell Macaulay advanced the preposterous paradox that it was because of his unrivalled qualifications as a fool that its author had written the best life in existence. The true explanation doubtless is, that this vanity and folly by no means made up Boswell's whole mental equipment, and that the unenviable qualities in his character become so conspicuous largely because he had so much less reticence than ordinary men The man who could retain the friendship of Samuel Johnson, and who could be described as 'the best travelling companion in the world,' was something more than a partisite and a fool. Nor could the most veracious fool have written such a devterously artistic book doubt he had a noble subject, Johnson's character and wit, his winged words, and his unsurpassed command of the mother-tongue in unforge-able phrases rendered a remarkable picture almost But in Boswell's hands nothing has suffered, from evidence we have about a few of the conversations, we know that these at any rate have gained greatly in point from his editorial touch. He adds not one v ord too much, but gives us the most vivid dramatic pictures by a few simple but subtle strokes. This is not the work of memory nearly so much as of artistic repro duction-it is not photographic and realistic half so much as it is idealistic and creative have here a special literary faculty, and, moreover, one of the rarest This obtrusive, irrepressible, absurd, drunken Scotch advocate and laird had in him something of the true Shakespearean

Boswell in Paoli's Camp

The ambasciadore Inglese, The English ambasciadour, as the good peasants and soldiers used to call me, like came a great favourite among them. I got a Corsican dress made, in which I walked about with an air of true satisfaction. The General did me the honour to present me with his own pistols, made in the island, all of Corsican wood and iron, and of excellent work manship I had every other accountement. I even got one of the shells which had often sounded the alarm to liberty I preserve them all with great care.

The Corstean peasants and soldiers were quite free and easy with me. Numbers of them used to come and see me of a morning, and just go out and in as they pleased. I did every thing in my power to make them fond of the British, and bid them hope for an alliance with us. They asked me a thousand questions about my country, all which I cheerfully answered as well as I could.

One day they would needs hear me play upon my German flute. To have told my honest natural visitants, Really, gentlemen, I play very ill, and put on such airs as we do in our genteel companies, would have been highly ridiculous. I therefore imme diately complied with their request. I gave their one or two Italian airs, and then some of our beantiful old Scots tunes, Gilderoy, the Lass of Patie's Will Corn Riggs are Bonny. The pathetick simplicity and pustoral gaiety of the Scots musicl will always please those who have the genuine feelings of nature. The Corsicans were charmed with the specimens I gave them, though I may now say that they were very indifferently performed.

My good friends insisted also to have an English song from me I endeavoured to please them in this too, and was very lucky in that which occurred to me. I sung them 'Hearts of oak are our ships, Hearts of oak are onr 'men' I translated it into Italian for them, and never did I see men so delighted with a song as the Corsicans were with 'Hearts of oak.' 'Cuore di querco,' ened they, 'bravo Inglese.' It was quite a joyous riot I fancied myself to be a recruiting sea-officer I fancied all my chorus of Corlicans aboard the British fleet.

Boswell's First Meeting with Johnson.

At last, on Monday the 16th of May, when I was sitting in Mr Davies's back parlour, after having drunk tea with him and Mrs Davies, Johnson unexpectedly came into the shop, and Mr Davies having perceived him, through the glass door in the room in which we were sitting, advancing towards us, he announced his awful approach to inc, somewhat in the manner of au actor in the part of Horatio, when he addresses Hamlet on the appearance of his father's ghost, 'Look, my lord, it comes?' I found that I had a very perfect idea of Johnson's figure, from the portrait of him painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds soon after he had published his Dictionary, in the attitude of sitting in his easy chair in deep meditation, which was the first picture his friend did for him, which Sir Joshua very kindly presented to inc, and from v luch an engraving has been made for this Mr Davies mentioned my name, and respect fully introduced me to him I was much agitated, and recollecting his prejudice against the Scotch, o' which I had heard much, I said to Davies, 'Don't tell where I come from '-' From Scotland,' cried Davies, roguishly 'Mr Johnson,' said I, 'I do Indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it.' I am willing to flatter myself that I meant this as light pleasantry to soothe and conciliate him, and not as an humiliating abasement at the expense But however that might be, this speech of my country was somewhat unlucky, for with that quickness of wit for v hich lie was so remarkable, he seized the expression, 'come from Scotland,' which I used in the sense of being of that country, and, as if I had said that I had come away from it, or left it, retorted, 'That, Sir, I find, is what a very great many of your countrymen cannot help' This stroke stunned me a good deal, and when we had sat down, I felt myself not a little embarrassed, and apprehensive of what might come next addressed himself to Davies 'What do you think of Garrick? He has refused me an order for the play for Miss Williams, because he knows the house will be full, and that an order would be vorth three shillings ' Lager to take any opening to get into conversation with him, I ventured to say, 'O Sit, I cannot think Mr Garriel would grudge such a trifle to you' 'Sir,' said he, with a stern look, 'I have known David Garrick longer than you have done, and I know no right you have to talk to me on the subject.' Perhaps I descried this check, for it was rather presumptuous in me, an entire stranger, to express any doubt of the justice of his animadversion upon his old acquaintance and pupil. I now felt myself much mortified, and began to think that the hope which I had long indulged of obtaining his acquaintance was blasted And, in truth, had not my ardour been uncommonly strong, and my resolution un commonly persevering, so rough a reception might have deterred me for ever from making any further attempts Fortunately, however, I remained upon the field not wholly discomfited, and was soon rewarded by hearing some of his conversation. [1763]

Johnson at the 'Mitre

I had learnt that his place of frequent resort was the Mitre tavern in Flect Street, where he loved to sit up late, and I begged I might be allowed to pass an evening with him there soon, which he promised I should. A few days afterwards, I met him near Temple Bar about one o'clock in the morning, and asked if he would then go to the Mitre 'Sir,' said he, 'it is too late, they won't let us in But I'll go with you another night, with all my heart'

A revolution of some importance in my plan of life had just taken place for instead of procuring a com mission in the foot guards, which was my own inclination, I had, in compliance with my father's wishes, agreed to study the law, and was soon to set out for Utrecht, to hear the lectures of an excellent civilian in that Uni versity, and then to proceed on my travels. Though very desirous of obtaining Dr Johnson's advice and in structions on the mode of pursuing my studies, I was at this time so occupied, shall I call it? or so dissipated by the amusements of London, that our next meeting was not till Saturday, June 25, when, happening to dine at Clifton's eating house, in Butcher-row, I was surprised to perceive Johnson come in and take his seat at another table. The mode of dining, or rather being fed, at such houses in London is well known to many to be particu larly unsocial, as there is no ordinary, or united com pany, but each person has his own mess, and is under no obligation to hold any intercourse with any one. A liberal and full minded man, however, who loves to talk, will break through this churlish and unsocial restraint Johnson and an Irish gentleman got into a dispute con cerning the cause of some part of mankind being black 'Why, Sir,' said Johnson, 'it has been accounted for in three ways either by supposing that they are the posterity of Ham, who was cursed, or that God at first in three ways either by supposing that they are the posterity of Ham, who was cursed, or that God at first created two kinds of men, one black, and another white, or that, by the heat of the sun, the skin is scorched, and so acquires a sooty hue. This matter has been much canvassed among naturalists, but has never been brought to any certain issue. What the Irishman said is totally obliterated from my mind, but I remember that he became very warm and intemperate in his expressions, upon which Johnson rose, and quietly walked away. When he had retired, his antigonist took his revenge, as he thought, by saying, 'He has a most ungainly figure, and an affectation of pomposity unworthy of a man of genius.'

Johnson had not observed that I was in the room I followed him, however, and he agreed to meet me in the evening at the Mitre I called on him, and we went thither at nine. We had a good supper, and port wine, of which he then sometimes drunk a bottle. The orthodox high church sound of the Mitre,—the figure and manner of the celebrated Samuel Johnson,—the extraordinary power and precision of his conversation, and the pride, arising from finding myself admitted as his companion, produced a variety of sensations and a pleasing elevation of mind beyond what I had ever before experienced [1763]

Johnson in the Stage-Coach.

On Friday, August 5, we set out early in the morning in the Harwich stage coach. A fat elderly gentlewoman and a young Dutchman seemed the most inclined among us to conversation. At the inn where we dined, the gentlewoman said she had done her best to educate her children, and particularly that she had never suffered them to be a moment idle. Johnson 'I wish, Madam, you would educate me too, for I have been an idle fellow all my life ' 'I am sure, Sir,' said slie, 'you have not been idle.' Johnson 'Nay, Madam, it is very true and that gentleman there (pointing to me) has been idle. He was idle at Edinburgh His father sent him to Glasgow, where he continued to be idle He then came to London, where he has been very idle, and now he is going to Utrecht, where he will be as idle as ever' I asled him privately how he could expose me so Johnson 'Poh, poh 1' said he, 'they knew nothing about you, and will think of it no more' In the after noon the gentlewoman talked violently against the Koman Catholics, and of the horrors of the Inquisition To the utter astonishment of all the passengers but inyself, who knew that he could talk upon any side of a question, he defended the Inquisition, and maintained that 'false doctrine should be checked on its first appearance, that the civil power should unite with the church in punishing those who dare to attack the established religion, and that such only were punished by the Inquisition' He had in his pocket Pomponius Mela de Situ Orbis, in which he read occasionally, and seemed very intent upon ancient geography by no means niggardly, his attention to what was generally right was so minute that having observed at one of the stages that I ostentatiously gave a shill ling to the coachman, when the custom was for each passenger to give only suspence, he took me aside and scolded me, saying that what I had done would make the coachman dissatisfied with all the rest of the passengers, who gave him no more than his due. This was a just reprimand, for in whatever way a man may indulge his generosity or his vanity in spending his money, for the sake of others he ought not to raise the price of any article for which there is a constant

Having stopped a night at Colchester, Johnson talled of that town with veneration, for having stood a siege for Charles the First The Dutchman alone now remained with us. He spole English tolerably well, and thinking to recommend lumself to us hy expatiating on the superiority of the criminal jurisprudence of this country over that of Holland, he inveighed against the barbarity of putting an accused person to the torture in order to force a confession But Johnson was as ready for this as for the Inquisition 'Why, Sir, you do not, I find, understand the law of your own country torture in Holland is considered as a favour to an accused person, for no man is put to the torture there unless there is as much evidence against him as would amount to conviction in England An accused person among you, therefore, has one chance more to escape punishment than those who are tried among us.'

At suppor this night he talked of good eating with uncommon satisfaction 'Some people,' said he, 'have a foolish way of not minding, or pretending not to mind, what they eat. For my own part, I mind my belly very studiously and very carefully, for I look upon it, that he who does not mind his belly will hardly mind anything else' He now appeared to me Jean Bull philosophe, and he was for the moment not only serious hut vehement [1763.]

Mrs Williams's Tea-Table

We went home to his house to tea. Mrs Williams made it with sufficient dexterity, notwithstanding her blindness, though her manner of satisfying herself that the cups were full enough appeared to me a little awkward, for I fancied she put her finger down a certain way, till she felt the tea touch it. In my first elation at being allowed the privilege of attending Dr Johnson at his late visits to this lady, which was like being e sceretioribus consilits, I willingly drank cup after cup, as if it had been the Heliconiun spring. But as the charm of novelty went off, I grew more fastidious, and besides, I discovered that she was of a peevish temper

There was a pretty large circle this evening Jolinson was in very good humour, lively, and ready to talk upon all subjects Mr Fergusson, the self taught philosopher, told him of a new invented machine which went without horses, a man who sat in it turned a handle, which worked a spring, that drove it forward 'Then, Sir,' said Johnson, 'what is gained is, the man has his choice whether he will move himself alone, or himself and the machine too' Dominicetti being mentioned, he would not allow him any ment. 'There is nothing in all this hoasted system. No, Sir, medicated baths can be no better than warm water, their only effect can be that of tepid moisture' One of the company took the other side, maintaining that medicines of various sorts, and some too of most powerful effect, are introduced into the human frame by the medium of the pores, and, therefore, when warm water is impregnated with salutiferous substances, it may produce great effects as a bath This appeared to me very satisfactory Johnson did not answer it, but talking for victors, and determined to be master of the field, he had recourse to the device which Goldsmith imputed to him in the witty words of one of Cibber's comedies 'There is no argu ing with Johnson, for when his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it? He turned to the gentleman, 'Well, Sir, go to Dominicetti, and get thyself fumigated, but be sure that the steam be directed to thy head, for that is the peccant part' This produced a triumphant roar of laughter from the motley assembly of philosophers, printers, and dependents, male and female

I know not how so whimsical a thought came into my mind, but I asked, 'If, Sir, you were shut up in a castle, and a new born child with you, what would you do '' Johnson 'Why, Sir, I should not much like my company ' Boswell 'But would you take the trouble of rearing it?' He seemed, as may well be supposed, unwilling to pursue the subject, but upon my persevering in my question, replied, 'Why yes, Sir, I would, but I must have all conveniences If I had no garden, I would make a shed on the roof, and take it there for fresh air I should feed it, and wash it much, and with warm water to please it, not with cold water to give it pain' Borvell 'But, Sir, does not heat relax' Johnson 'Sir, you are not to imagine the water is to be very hot. I would not coddle the child No, Sir, the hardy method of treating children does no good I'll take you five children from London, who shall cuff five Highland children Sir, a man bred in London will carry a burden, or run, or wrestle, as well as a man hrought up in the liardest manner in the country' Borvell 'Good living, I suppose, makes the Londoners strong' Johnson 'Why, Sir, I don't know that it does Our chairmen from Ireland, who are as strong men as any, have been brought up upon potatoes. Quantity makes up for quality' Boswell 'Would you teach this child that I have furnished you with any thing' Johnson 'No, I should not be apt to teach it' Boswell Would not you have a pleasure in teaching it?' Johnson 'No, Sir, I should not have a pleasure in teaching it 'Boswell 'Have you not a pleasure in teaching men' There I have you You have the same pleasare in teaching men that I should liave in teaching children' Johnson 'Why, something about that' [26th October 1769]

Johnson at his Inn

We dined at an excellent inn at Chapel house, where he expatiated on the felicity of England in its taverns and inns, and triumphed over the French for not having, in any perfection, the tavern life. 'There is no private liouse,' said he, 'in which people can enjoy themselves so well as at a capital tavern. Let there be ever so great plenty of good things, ever so much grandeur. ever so much elegance, ever so much desire that every body should be easy, in the nature of things it cannot be there must always be some degree of care and The master of the house is anxious to enter anxicty tain his guests—the guests are anxious to be agreeable to him, and no man but a very impudent dog indeed can as freely command what is in another man's house Whereas at a tavern there is as if it were his own a general freedom from anxiety. You are sure you are welcome, and the more noise you make, the more trouble you give, the more good things you call for, the welcomer you are No servants will attend you with the alacrity which waiters do, who are incited by the prospect of an immediate reward in proportion as they please No, Sir, there is nothing which has yet been contrived by man by which so much happiness is pro duced as by a good tavern or inn' He then repeated, with great emotion, Shenstone's lines

'Whoe'er has travell'd life's dull round, Where er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
The warmest welcome at an inn'

My illustrious friend, I thought, did not sufficiently udinire Shenstone. That ingenious and elegant gentleman's opinion of Johnson appears in one of his letters to Mr Graves, dated Feb 9, 1760. 'I have lately been reading one or two volumes of the Rainhler, who, excepting against some few hardnesses in his manner, and the want of more examples to enliven, is one of the most nervous, most perspicuous, most concise, most harmonious prose writers. I know. A learned diction improves by time.'

In the afternoon, as we were driven rapidly along in the post chaise, he said to me, 'Life has not many things better than this' We stopped at Stratford upon Avon, and drank ten and coffee, and it pleased me to be with him upon the classic ground of Shakespeare's native place. [21st March 1776]

Meeting of Johnson and Wilkes

Upon the much expected Wednesday, I called on him about half an honr before dinner, as I often did when vevere to dine out together, to see that he was ready in time, and to accompany him. I found him buffeting his books as upon a former occasion, covered with dust, and making no preparation for going abroad 'How is this, Sir?' said I 'Don't you recollect that you are to dine at Mr Dilly's?' Johnson 'Sir, I did not think of going to Dilly's it went out of my head I have ordered dinner at home with Mrs Williams' Boswell 'But, my dear Sir, you know you were en gaged to Mr Dilly, and I told him so He will expect you, and will be much disappointed if you don't come.' Johnson 'You must talk to Mrs Williams about this'

Here was a sad dilemma. I feared that what I was so confident I had secured would yet be frustrated He had accustomed himself to show Mrs Williams such a degree of humane attention as frequently imposed some restraint upon him, and I knew that if she should be obstinate, he would not stir I hastened down stairs to the hlind lady's room, and told her I was in great uneasiness, for Dr Johnson had engaged to me to dine this day at Mr Dilly's, but that he had told me he had forgotten his engagement, and had ordered dinner at home 'Yes, Sir,' said she, pretty peevishly, 'Dr John son is to dine at home '-'Madam,' said I, 'his respect for you is such that I know he will not leave you unless you absolutely desire it. But as you have so much of his company, I hope you will he good enough to forego it for a day, as Mr Dilly is a very worthy man, has frequently had agreeable parties at his liouse for Dr Johnson, and will be vexed if the Doctor neglects him to day And then, Madam, he pleased to consider my situation, I carried the message, and I assured Mr Dilly that Dr Johnson was to come, and no doubt he has made a dinner, and invited a company, and boasted of the honour he expected to have. I shall be quite disgraced if the Doctor is not there.' She gradually softened to my solicitations, which were certainly as earnest as most entreaties to ladies upon any occasion, and was graciously pleased to empower me to tell Dr Jolinson, 'That all things considered, she thought he should certainly go' I flew back to him, still in dust, and careless of what should be the event, 'indifferent in his choice to go or stay,' but as soon as I had announced to him Mrs Williams's consent, he roared, 'Frank! a clean shirt'-and was very soon drest. When I had him fairly seated in a hackney coach with me, I exulted as much as a fortune hunter who has got an heiress into a post chaise with him, to set out for Gretna Green

When we entered Mr Dilly's drawing room, he found himself in the midst of a company he did not know I kept myself snug and silent, watching how he would conduct himself. I observed him whispering to Mr Dilly, 'Who is that gentleman, Sir?'-'Mr Arthur Lee.'-Johnson 'Too, too, too,' (under his hreath,) which was one of his habitual mutterings. Mr Arthur Lee could not but be very obnoxious to Johnson, for he was not only a patriot but an American He was after wards minister from the United States at the Court of Madrid 'And who is the gentleman in lace?'—'Mr Wilkes, Sir' This information confounded him still more, he had some difficulty to restrain himself, and taking up a book, sat down upon a window seat and read, or at least kept his eye intently upon it for some time, till he composed himself His scelings, I dare say, were awkward enough But he no doubt re collected having rated me for supposing that he could be at all disconcerted by any company, and he, therefore, resolutely set himself to behave quite as nn easy man of the world, who could adapt himself at once to the disposition and manners of those whom he might chance to meet.

The cheering sound of 'Dinner is upon the table' dissolved his reverie, and we all sat down without any symptom of all humour There were present—beside Mr Wilkes and Mr Arthur Lee, who was an old com panion of mine when he studied physic at Edinburgh-Ir (now Sir John) Miller, Dr Lettsom, and Mr Slater the druggist. Mr Wilkes placed himself next to Dr Johnson, and behaved to him with so much attention and politeness that he gained upon him insensibly man eat [ate] more heartily than Johnson, or loved better what was nice and delicate. Mr Wilkes was very assiduous in helping him to some fine yeal. 'Pray give me leave, Sir,-It is better here-A little of the brown -Some fat, Sir-A little of the stuffing-Some gravy-Let me have the pleasure of giving you some butter-Allow me to recommend a squeeze of this orange, or the lemon, perhaps, may have more zest '- 'Sir, Sir, I am obliged to you, Sir,' cried Johnson, bowing, and turning his head to him with a look for some time of 'surly virtue,' but, in a short while, of complacency [15th May 1776]

Boswell's Last Meeting with Johnson

On Wednesday, June 30, the friendly confidential dinner with Sir Joshua Reynolds took place,—no other company being present. Had I known that this was the last time that I should enjoy, in this world, the conversation of a friend whom I so much respected, and from whom I derived so much instruction and entertain ment, I should have been deeply affected. When I now look back to it, I am vexed that a single word should have been forgotten.

Our conversation turned npon living in the country, which Johnson, whose melancholy mind required the dissipation of quick successive variety, had habituated himself to consider as a kind of mental imprisonment 'Yet, Sir,' said I, 'there are many people who are content to live in the country' Johnson 'Sir, it is me the intellectual world as in the physical world we are told by natural philosophers that a body is at rest in the place that is fit for it, they who are content to live in the country, are fit for the country'

Talking of various enjoyments, I argued that a re finement of taste was a disadvantage, as they who have attained to it must be seldomer pleased than those who have no nice discrimination, and are there fore satisfied with everything that comes in their way Johnson 'Nay, Sir that is a paltry notion Endea your to be as perfect as you can in every respect.'

I accompanied him, in Sir Joshua Reynolds's coach, to the entry of Bolt conrt He asked me whether I would not go with him to his house, I declined it, from an apprehension that my spirits would sink. We bade adien to each other affectionately in the carriage. When he had, got down upon the foot pavement, he called out, 'Fare you well,' and without looking back, sprung away with a kind of pathetic briskness, if I may use that expression, which seemed to indicate a stringgle to conceal uneasiness, and impressed me with a foreboding of our long, long separation [1784.]

of a Four to the Hebrides and 'Johnsoniana') and by Dr Birkbeck Hill (6 vols 1887). Invaluable for the light thrown on Boswell's inner character are his Letters to Temple (1856) whose acquaint ance he had made while yet a student at Edinhurgh University, and Boswelliana (1874) by Charles Rogers. Of the famous essays hy Macaulay and Carlyle, which contradict rather than correct each other, the latter has much more truth in it than the former. There is a Life of Boswell by Percy Fitzgerald (2 vols. 1891).

THOMAS DAVIDSON

Mrs Piozzi (1741-1821) was as yet Mrs THRALE when she became a particular star in Dr Johnson's firmament. Born at Bodyel in Carnaryonshire, Hester Lynch Salusbury in 1763 married Henry Thrale, a prosperous Southwark brewer, in 1765 Johnson conceived an extraordinary affection for her, was domesticated in her house at Streatham Place for over sixteen years, and for her sake learned to soften many of his eccentricities Thrale, who made Johnson one of his four executors, died in 1781, after his wife had borne him twelve children, and in 1784 the brewery—'the potentiality of becoming rich beyond the dreams of avarice,' as Johnson said-was sold for £135,000 Johnson felt himself slighted when the widow became attached to the Italian musician Piozzi The marriage took place in July 1784, the pair travelled through France, Italy, Germany, and Belgium, returning to England in 1787 In 1795 Mrs Piozzi built Brynbella on the Clwyd, and there Piozzi died in 1809 When past seventy the irrepressible old lady formed a sentimental attachment for the actor W A. Conway, she was eighty when she died from the conse quences of a broken leg Vivacious, frank, and witty, she was charming and pretty, if hardly beautiful. Only two of her works can be said to live, and that solely through their subject—Ancedotes of Dr Johnson (1786, reprinted in Mrs Napier's Johnsoniana, 1884) and Letters to and from Dr Johnson (1788) She was an acute observer, and her reminiscences are often interesting, though she was by no means painfully accurate. Her Observations and Reflections on her Continental experiences are forgotten, as are a book on British Synonymy (1794) and her Retrospection over the events of eighteen hundred years (1801) poems, the best-known, The Three Warnings, was her first, and was so much above the level of her other verse that it was believed to have been at least amended by Johnson, it appeared in a volume of Miscellanies issued in 1766 by Mrs Williams, the blind inmate of Johnson's house Mrs Piozzi's contributions to The Florence Miscellany in 1785 afforded a subject for Gifford's satire, his Baviad having been written expressly to ridi cule the Della Cruscan mutual admiration society, of which Mrs Piozzi was arch priestess

From 'The Three Warnings'

When sports went round, and all were gay, On neighbour Dobson's wedding day, Death called aside the jocund groom With him into another room, And looking grave—'You must,' says he,
'Quit your sweet bride, and come with me'
'With you!' and quit my Susah's side?
With you!' the hapless husband cried,
'Young as I am, 'tis monstrous hard!
Besides, in truth, I'm not prepared
My thoughts on other matters go,
This is my wedding-day, you know'

What more he urged I have not heard, His reasons could not well be stronger, So Death the poor delinquent spared, And left to live a little longer I et calling up a serious look, His hour glass trembled while he spoke-Neighbour,' he said, 'farewell' no more Shall Death disturb your mirthful hour And further, to avoid all blame Of cruelty upon my name, To give you time for preparation, And fit you for your future station, Three several warnings you shall have, Before you're summoned to the grave, Willing for once I'll quit my prey, And grant a kind reprieve, In hopes you'll have no more to say, But, when I call again this way, Well pleased the world will leave.'

Well pleased the world will leave. To these conditions both consented, And parted perfectly contented

What next the hero of our tale befell,
How long he lived, how wise, how well,
How roundly he pursued his course,
And smoked his pipe, and stroked his horse,
The willing muse shall tell
He chaffered then, he bought and sold,
Nor once perceived his growing old,
Nor thought of Death as near
His friends not false, his wife no shrew, Wany his gains, his children few,
He passed his hours in peace.

But while he viewed his wealth increase, While thus along life's dusty road, The beaten track content he trod Old Time, whose haste no mortal spares, Uncalled, unheeded, unawares, Brought on his eighticth year And now, one night, in musing mood,

As all alone he sate, The unwelcome messenger of Fate Once more before him stood.

Half stilled with anger and surprise, 'So soon returned!' old Dobson cries.

'So soon, d'ye call it?' Death replies'Surely, my friend, you're but in jest!
Since I vas here before
'Tis sir and thirty years at least,
And you are now fourscore'

'So much the worse,' the clover rejoined,
'To spare the aged would be kind
However, see your search be legal,
And your authority—is 't regal?
Else you are come on a fool's errand,
With but a secretary s warrant
Beside you promised me Three Warnings
Which I have looked for nights and mornings,
But for that loss of time and ease,
I can recover damages'

"I know, cries Death, 'that at the best, I seldom am a welcome guest, But don't be captious, friend, at least, I little thought you'd still be able. To stump about your farm and stable Your years have run to a great length, I wish you joy, though, of your strength!"

'Hold' says the farmer, 'not so fast' I have been lame these four years past' 'And no great wonder,' Death replies, 'However, you still keep your eyes, And sure, to see one's loves and friends, For legs and arms would make amends'

'Perhaps,' says Dobson, 'so it might,

But latterly I we lost my sight'

'This is a shocking story, fauli,
Yet there's some comfort still,' says Death,

'Each strives your sadness to amuse,
I warrant you have all the news'

'There's none,' cries he, 'and if there were,
I'm grown so deaf, I could not hear'

'Nay, then,' the spectre stern rejoined,

'These are unjustifiable yearnings
If you are lame, and deaf, and blind,
You've had your Three sufficient Warnings,
So come along, no more we'll part,'
He said, and touched him with his dart.
And now old Dobson, turning pale,
Yields to his fate—so ends my tale

The secretary 8 warrant refers to the famous illegal warrant used against Wilkes (see below at page 516). In 1861 Abraham Hayward edited Mrs Piozzi 8 As tobiography, Let ert and Literary Remains (2 vols 1861), see also Mangin's Piozziana (1833) and L B Seely 8 Mrs Thrisle (1891).

THE REIGN OF GEORGE III. AND COMING CHANGES

T was part of the spirit of the nineteenth century to look down on the eighteenth and all its works, and greatly to overestimate the deeper, higher, holier temper of the new epoch Coleridge's discovery, by German help, of the contrast between understanding and reason, led him to an unphilosophical disdain of all that had been accomplished in the century into which he was born, Carlyle denounced 'a sceptical century and godless,' 'opulent in accumulated falsities as never century was' It became customary to agree that those three unhappy generations of men were dead to faith, to historical insight, to poetical feeling, to love of nature, to apprehension or real admiration of the sublime, the beautiful, the tender, the true. And it was assumed that the English literature of the period, mysteriously differing from that of all other periods, consistently and comprehensively reveals and displays these lamentable defects in intellectual and spiritual life.

Geological development did not proceed by universal cataclysms, in literary history, though there are changes of humour, of taste, and of fashion—violent as well as gradual, profound as well as superficial—the revolutions recorded are rarely or never so absolute as nmeteenthcentury writers unhistorically declared, and the transition from the eighteenth-century way of looking at things or of putting things was not one of them The men of the eighteenth century bled when they were pricked, laughed if they were tickled, died when they were poisoned, they loved, they hated, they rejoiced and hoped and fcared, the roots of poetry were still deep-planted in their life, even though the life had for the time gone ont of their poetry

In truth, the literature of that time was a somewhat peculiarly self consistent outcome of the characteristic English temperament. Our literary mood has changed, but in our ordinary rule of life the principles of the eighteenth century are still dominant. The Englishman does not wear his heart on his sleeve, still less the Scotsman-it is weak and worthy only of a foreigner to be demonstrative not propose to take the public to his heart, or let them feel the very pulse of the machine In religion he will not grovel in abject selfnegation, nor does he desire or aim at ecstatic Englishmen do not (except in poetry) shout for intensity of joy or scream with laughter-nor do they weep or whine if they can possibly help it, they are reticent in the sphere of the domestic affections, and are very slow to unbosom themselves about any other We are not enthusiastic, we regard the intense with suspicious dislike. We do not adore, we do not gush, we will not allow ourselves to seem surprised or delighted, we are extremely reserved-good form so prescribes it However much we may actually feel, this is still the law of the island-born, save only in art and poetry Yet contrariwise, in literature and art, but there only, we now set the highest value on that which is the most complete self revelation of the artist, illustrating even the fainter nuances of his varying moods, his hopes, his fears, his doubts, struggles, distresses, despondencies, despairs In poetry we say we love intensity and unreserve

Not so was it with us under good Queen Anne and the Georges Then the Englishman carried into his literature what was and is still the rule of his daily life-moderation, commonsense, correctness, abhorrence of 'enthusiasm' in word as in deed, self-complacent apprecia tion of the high degree of civilisation he had now happily attained, and a corresponding disregard of what he thought 'Gothic,' barbarous, and uncultured Dignified reserve was the keynote of literature, the 'lyric cry,' whether of joy or grief, was repressed on principle, mystery and marvel were ratiocinatively explained away, nature was admired on philosophical grounds, 'propriety' was the fetich of the period, decorum, elegance, point, and good taste took anstocratic precedence of uncouth originality, humour, and power The originality, the humour, and the power had not ceased to exist, but it was not the fashion to welcome them save under restraint

Yet even in the early part of the century, as we have seen, the classicism adapted to French modes, the Popian formalism specially characteristic of the whole period, was early disturbed by the emergence here and there of a vein of idealism, sentimentalism, realism, and nature worship, and of a simplicity sometimes not a little affected Wesley and Whitefield had wakened the dogmatic and anti-dogmatic slumber of indifference with powerful effect before the middle of the century Berkeley's idealism had sufficiently little in common with the age of deism and of common-sense. Thomson was but one of the poets of nature seen in a new light. Spenser, after long oblivion, was tasted again, and after a fashion ımıtated There is a romantic note in the Countess of Winchilsea's Reverse, in Parnell's Night-Piece, in Hamilton of Bangour's Biaes of Yarrow Long before Macpherson, before even Jerome Stone of Dunkeld, such a minor poet as Aaron Hill sang after Gaelic modelsonce, at least-of Scuir Uaran in the wilds of Ross shire, of heather, pines, and highland lochs, and in vision described Skye as a 'fair isle' nearly fifty years before it was discovered by Dr Johnson, and sought and found new poetic materials in semi barbarous Russia. 'Gothic' ceased to be a synonym for the uncouth, the contemptible, the worthless Gray was strongly attracted by things Celtic, Norse, weird, glamorous, Collins's ode on The Superstitions of the Highlands, written in 1749, contained, according to Lowell, the germ of the whole romantic movement, and the fither of the Wartons wrote 'Runic' odes. Vernacular writing became popular, Allan Ramsay by his Evergreen revived interest in the poetic past of his country, pseudo antique ballads were largely manufactured in the north, as also songs lacking neither in directness, simplicity, tenderness, nor pathos

In the latter half of the century the spirit of innovation shows itself more constantly, more irrepressibly, and in more various shapes. Interest in the romantic past, curiosity about the unfamiliar ways and regions of the remote East, willingness to be surprised and attracted by novelties, a craving for change, accompany the 'return to nature'. Life is more varied, there is a warmer throb in literature Scottish national feeling assumed new shapes, the Welsh national awakening, intellectual and spiritual, became pronounced, the Irish National party found leaders in Flood and Significantly enough Adam Smith founded a new social polity in the very year that the American Revolution made a break in history, and this and much else in thought and in speech, and even in song, prepared the way for projecting a tabula rasa, for the vision of all things become new, to be realised not in the kingdom of God but in the Republic of the Étre Suprême Shakespearean criticism, begiin in Queen Anne's time, had become really im portant with Johnson, Steevens, and Malone Though Gibbon still called German a barbarous idiom, a new desire to know about things German showed that the existence of a great reutonic literature had begun to be realised, 'Sturm und Drang' and Werterism were more readily assimilated in England than Klopstock Youngs Night Thoughts and and Gessner Blair's Grave illustrate the widespread elegiac mood, the determination to snatch a fearful joy from the poetic aspects of the melancholy, and were wholly independent of Werter Werter and Gotz von Berlichingen told both directly and indirectly on English literature, as did the inclodramas of other German authors

By common consent two publications are accepted as specially showing that 'going in the tops of the trees' that heralded the spirit of the new century, Macpherson's (1760-63) and Percy's Reliques Even by those who most abhorred it, as by Wordsworth, it was admitted that the 'impudent Highlander's' phantom offspring was greeted with acclamation in the south, and 'the thin consistence took its course through Europe upon the breath of popular applause' And Percy, who had begun his literary life work by truns lating (from the Portuguese) a Chinese novel and (from Du Mallet) Eddaic poetry, issued in 1765 those Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, to which German literature was profoundly indebted, and by which, as Wordsworth said, English poetry 'has been absolutely redeemed I do not think there is an able writer in verse of the present day who would not be proud to acknowledge his obligation to the Reliques I know it is so with my friends? According to Wordsworth, Percy 'only wanted resolution to follow his genius into the regions of true simplicity and genuine pathos, as evinced by his exquisite ballad of Sir Cauline and by many other pieces,' but unhappily fell back in his Hermit of Warkworth to 'the vague, glossy, and unfeeling language of his day' Since the prophet of the New Spirit made this memorable profession and confession, the significance of the Reliques for England and the world has only become more manifest. The Wartons had a large share in the new propaganda, not merely by direct polemic against Pope and by their rehabilitation of the ancient writers, but by their sympathy for things Celtic, 'Gothic,' and mediæval The Rowley Porms showed the immediate effect of the novel affection for a mediævalism often wholly misconceived, melodramatic, and false to history, too defective in their antiquarianism to deceive any but the unwary or uninstructed, they are yet, as the work of a true and original poet, much more genuinely romantic than the tame verse of the Wartons

Hidden grots, mossy cells, Druids and bards, monks and hermits, knights and minstrels, came to their own, the love for the wild in scenery. eccentric in Gray and Walpole, became normal, until 'Picturesque Tours' and the æstheticism of Gilpin and Uvedale Price became matter of mirth and parody The Castle of Otranto, Scott said, had 'been justly considered the original and model of a peculiar species of composition,' and it prepared the way for the Old English Baron, for The Mysteries of Udolpho, with its odd b'end of romanticism and sentimentalism, and for Lewis's Monk several English translations of Burger's Lenore appeared between 1796 and 1800 Beattie's Minstrel, full of the love of solitary communion with nature and frank joy in her beauty, in so far anticipates Wordsworth, Thomas Warton, in thought and feeling, in word and rhythm, often anticipates Scott The Traveller and Deserted Village show didacticism on a new plane, Goldsmith's keen sense of the social evils of his time was strongly marked, and his simple English, though his sentences were often built on the Johnsonian model, was a sharp contrast to Johnson's Latinised ponderousness Goldsmith as playwright broke with old conventions, to the dismay of conservatives, as Garrick on the stage had brought about a swift advance from formalism to naturalness, Sheridan went even further in emancipating comedy from Gibbon, in noble succession the stilted style to Hume and Robertson, at least marks the historical trend of men's minds Burke, by his attitude to the Americans in their struggle, showed that if he became pronouncedly hostile !

to the French Revolution, it was the fault as well as the misfortune of the friends of liberty Bentham was engaged in his lifelong polemic against established legal and political grievances, Godwin's Political Justice contained well nigh as powerful revolutionary elements as Paine's works The caustic caricatures and pungent parodies of the Anti Jacobin, of Gifford and 'Peter Pindar,' served not merely as a reductio ad absurdum of what was novel, fantastic, extravagant, but cherished a subversive spirit that acted in quite other ways than was intended satire proved again 'the bane of the sublime' as then understood for ever impossible that tendency to run not in personification and apostrophe, of which Erasmus Darwin is the most unlucky exponent —a tendency which, ever since Thomson's ornate and artificial diction had been commended by admirable poetry, had run parallel with the tendency seen in Goldsmith and Cowper to simpler Cowper and Burns are the notable poets of the last decades of the century showed in full measure the enthusiasm of humanity, Cowper summed up all the tender humanities and sweet domesticities in verse which even Wordsworth accounted 'chaste in Campbell's Pleasures of Hope is the last of the category of which Akenside's Pleasures of the Imagination was the most notable early example, romantic only in name, doubly didactic in substance Crabbe is still a didactic, though his peculiar gravitation to humble life and depressing issues points away from the temper of his predecessors William Lisle Bowles distinctly marks the transition period, Blake, a prophet and more than a prophet, though in the eighteenth century is hardly of it Rogers's Pleasures of Memory belongs to the same group as the earlier Pleasures of the Imagination and the later Pleasures of Hope, and Campbell's patriotic songs only continue a series of which Thomson's 'Rule Britannia' and Garrick's 'Heart of Oak' were early examples Jane Austen lives and moves in the eighteenth century Samuel Rogers, a senior contemporary of Scott and Byron, who lived to be a patriarch of letters for years after the first edition of this work was issued, into the generation to which Lord Macaulay and Carlyle and Thackeray belonged, yet learned at school to love those who were to be his masters and models throughout life, while Gray and Goldsmith and Johnson were yet alive

Oliver Goldsmith.

Were speculation here admissible, it might be interesting to speculate what would have been the position in literature of Oliver Goldsmith (1728-74) if we had known as little of his life as we are supposed to know of the life of Shake-His position in letters is undoubtedly speare As an essavist, he ranks with the best, as a poet, he produced some of the most enduring work of his generation, he wrote a novel of which the reputation is cosmopolitan, and, of his two plays, one is not only a masterpiece, but a masterpiece which modern managers still find a charm to conjure with Had we known no more of him than this, we might have invested him with almost any characteristics and qualities But thanks to the biographies of Sir James Prior (1837), of John Forster (1848), of Washington Irving (1849), and of others, his life and habits have been made as familiar as those of his contemporary, Johnson He has been exhibited as he was-a fallible, fussy, sensitive, vain, strutting little man, fond of fine clothes, not blessed with great advantages either in person or education, but saved from his initial insignificance by his varied experiences, his tender humanity, his lovableness, and his genius On the whole, what is recorded of his chequered career has rather increased than diminished our interest in his work.

The son of a poor curate of the Established Church in Ireland, Goldsmith was born at Pallas or Pallasmore in the county of Longford, a village not far from Ballymahon. His birthplace was a tumble down, fairy haunted farmhouse overlooking the pleasant river Inny, and he was the fifth of seven children, three of whom were girls two years after he was born, his father, by the death of an uncle, became rector of Kilkenny West, and transferred his residence to the hamlet of Lissoy in Westmeath, on the right of the road from Ballymahon to Athlone This was the scene of Ohver's childhood, and of those genial hospitalities which he sketched many years later when describing, in the Citizen of the World, the humours of the 'Man in Black.' His first preceptress was a relative named Elizabeth Delap, who reported him to be tractable but stupid From her he passed to the village schoolmaster, Thomas Byrne, an old soldier of Queen Anne. who inflamed his pupil's imagination with stories of Peterborough and legends of banshees and Rapparees, a course of education which was further stimulated by the songs of blind harpers and the ballads of his father's dairy maid, Peggy Golden, who must have been as musical as Walton's Maudlin From Byrne he passed to school at Elphin, and subsequently to Athlone and Edgeworthstown, at which last place he seems to have encountered, in the Rev Patrick Hughes, n master who understood his idiosyncrasies his schooldays were not brilliant, and, save for the incident which afterwards formed the germ of his comedy of She Stoops to Conquer, uneventful Swaggering to school on a borrowed hick, he was led by a wag into mistaking the house of a gentleman at Ardagh for an inn, and by the kindness of the owner, Mr Featherston, was not allowed to discover his mistake until the next morning, thus completely vindicating, by a youthful experience, the probability of an expedient to which some of the critics of his later play objected as far fetched

By this time he was fifteen, ungainly, deeply scarred with the smallpox, of uncertain ability, but extremely active and athletic His elder brother, Henry, had obtained a scholarship at Trinity College, Dublin, and to Irinity College, in June 1744, went Oliver Goldsmith, much against his will, as a 'sizar' With a schoolfellow named Beatty, he was housed in the garrets of No 35 in a range of buildings which has long since disappeared His college career was not very worshipful His tutor, Theaker Wilder (whose brutulity has been perhaps exaggerated), did not understand him, nor did Oliver understand mathematics, which was Wilder's specialty He lounged (like Johnson at Oxford) about the college gate, played the flute, got involved in a college row, and finally, devoting the proceeds of a small exhibition to a mixed entertainment in his rooms, was pounced upon by his scandalised tutor, who summarily dispersed the guests, knocking down the host Thereupon Oliver promptly sold his books and ran away, bound for America, a goal which, like many others, he never reached. After coming perilously close to starvation, he was enticed back to college by his brother Henry His university life henceforth was barren of incident. There is a pleasant tradition that he wrote songs for the Dublin ballad-singers, and then stole out at night to hear them sung, but beyond this there is little to record. On the 27th of February 1749 he took his B.A. and left the college, in the library of which is still preserved one of the old window panes of No 35 upon which he had scratched an autograph and a date.

His father being dead and his eldest sister married, his mother had retired to a little cottage at Ballymahon She had other children, and it was obviously out of her power to support her In this juncture his family, including erratic son n benevolent uncle Contarine, who had already befriended him, urged Oliver to take orders, a course which he disliked He accordingly qualified, as persons generally qualify for things they dislike, by neglecting to qualify at all He lived pleasantly from house to house, fished and otter-hunted in the Inny, played the flute with his pretty cousin, Jane Contarine, and took the chair (like his own Tony Lumpkin later) at tavern free and easys When, eventually, he presented himself before the Bishop of Elphin for ordination, he is alleged to have accentented his incompetence by making his appearance in scallet breedies. Needless to say he was rejected. Then his uncle Contarine found him a tuco-ship. But when, by this, he had accumulated about thirty pounds, he quitted home on a good horse, to return speedily on a bad one, n i is his savings, but with a romantic and probably remanced) account of his moving adventures. His long suffering uncle nov resolved to equip him for the lay, and despatched him to the Femple But he got no further than Dublin, where he pla ed away his means to a sharper, and as obliged to return home once more. After another internal he started for Edinburgh o stud medicine, and, strange to say, arrived at his destration. This was in 1752. At Edin b righ there are more records of his fine clo hes and consistal talents than of his studies until, in 1754 he transferred these latter to Le den, his journey to which place was not vithout further acc dents A verr later, bring again penniless, he left he den on a vallan, tour travelling through France German, St. tzerland, and Italy, picking up a precarous existence by disputing at the foreign uni errines and h. playing the flute. In this was he accumulated the impressions de zorize which he after ards embodied in the Liquity into Pelite Lecritiz, the Traveller, and the Ir ar of Walefield When, ultimately, in February 1756 he landed at Dover, after a year's desal or, v indening he had nothing but a few halfpence in his porket

For the ne t three years his experiences were equally diversified There is a legend that he was a strolling player, it is known that he was successively an apothecar 's journeyman a poor physician in the Bankside, Southwark the had somewhere required a m sterious foreign diploma), a corrector of the press to Pichardson, a dramatic author funacted, and an usher in a Peckliam Here he fell in with Griffiths the book seller, the editor and proprietor of the Monthly Recrew, into whose service, at the sign of the *Dunciad, he pissed as a writer-of all-worl Quarrelling shortly afterwards with his employer, he published, under the name of a college friend, James Willington, a translation of a bool which had then just appeared at Rotterdam, the Memoirs of a Protestant, condimned to the Galleys of France, for his Peligioi -the Protestant being one Jean Marteille of Bergerac This appeared in Lebruary 1758, after which he seems to have returned to Peel ham, pending a fresh attempt to obtain a footing in the medical profession He was, as a matter of fact, appointed surgeon and physician But the appointment to a factory at Coromandel came to nothing, and at the close of 1758 he was rejected at Surgeons' Hall as 'not qualified' for a hospital mate. At this time he was living at No 12 in a tiny square off the Old Buley I nown as Green Arbour Court, and now non existent Here, early in 1759, he was isited by Dr Percy, who found I him in a bare-walled room correcting the proofs of a fresh literary effort, a lightitled Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe This was put fortliannonymously in April, and was fairly well received. What was better, it brought its author other work. Before the close of the year he lind commenced and concluded a volume of miscellineous essays and verses entitled The Bee, and he was contributing to the Busy Body and the Lady's Magazire These efforts attracted the attention of Newbers the bookseller and Smollett, both of whom invoked his assistance He began contributing to Smollett's British "fagazine, one of his earliest essays being the admirable 'Re erie it the Boar's Head Tavern in East Cheap,' while for Newbery's paper, the Public Leager, on 24th January 1760 he wrote the first of the series of imaginary Chinese Letters afterwards collected under the general title of The Citizen of the World For these last he had the precedent of Montesquicu's Lettres Persanes (1721), but it is not improbable that his immediate suggestion was derived from Horice Wilpole's Letter from Xo Ho, a Ch nese Philosopher at London, to his friend Lien Chi, at Pel ng (1757)-Lien Chi Altangi being one of Goldsmith s correspondents.

About the middle of 1760 his improved circumstances justified his moving into better quarters at 6 Wine Office Court, 17eet Street, where, in the following year, he was visited by Johnson story henceforth is mainly a record of hurried hack vork relieved by masterpieces. He edited the Lady's Magazine, he wrote Memoirs of Volkure (1761), a History of Mecklenburgh (1762) a Life of Richard Nash (1762), a History of Eng-Int d (in letters-1764), and so forth. Among this hetero-eneous mass come some of those efforts by which he retains his position in Linglish Literature. His Citizen of the World appeared in 1762, and two years later, in December 1764, he published his first long poem, The Traveller, or, a Prospect of Society, a frament of which he had forwarded to his brother Henry during his Continental exile. Six months later he issued a selection of his Essays (June 1765), and in March (1766) appeared the famous I can of II abefuld How Johnson was summoned to the author, held in durance of his landlady for rent-how the manuscript of the novel was produced, and sold by the Doctor for sixty pounds—has often been told, and retold Unluckily, considerable confusion has been imported into this picturesque and time honoured incident by the discovery, in recent years, that Goldsmith lind disposed of a third share in this very book, as early as October 1762, to Benjamin Collins, the Salisbury printer, who subsequently printed it. How this inconvenient fact is to be reconciled with the canonical tradition is not clear, at all events an explanation is not at present fortlicoming Another discovery, of equally recent date, is that this popular book, at the outset, was by no means the success it has since proved to be. The fourth edition of 1770 started with a loss, and it took nine years more to reach a sixth edition. Such were the beginnings of a classic which, even now, in one form or another is reprinted annually.

With the publication of the Vicar of Walefield Goldsmith's position as a writer was established He had already won his reputation as an essayist. The Traveller was recognised as a memorable poem, and ın the days of Field ıng, Smollett, Richardson, and Sterne, he had now succeeded in producing a novel which resembled the work of none of them except in the creation of permanent types His name made him desirable as editor, his charm of style attractive is a compiler, and to obtain work was no longer difficult Johnson had introduced him to his circle, he be longed to the Literary Club, and he was the friend of Rey nolds and Burke. One branch of literature only he had left untried -the Stage-in which success, as now, meant fortune, and fortune both his tastes and his habits rendered indispensable In 1768, after considerable difficulty, he succeeded in producing at Covent Garden the comedy of The Good-Natur'd Man It was a good, though not a very good, comedy But it was a welcome change from the sentimental drama of the Kellys and Cumberlands of the period, and even its partial success brought him £400, independent of its sale in book form It likewise justified his perseverance as a dramatic author. What it did not so manifestly justify was his immediate removal to chambers in the Temp'e, which he furnished elaborately with the money. The disappearance in this way of his funds threw him back upon the old 'book building,' and agreements for histories of Animated Nature, of England, of Rome, followed rapidly and significantly Then, early in 1770, he published his second didactic poem, The Deserted Village, in which, with greater finish and beauty of cadence, he repeated the triumph of the Traveller

His remaining years—and they were not many—may be rapidly chronicled Besides the compilations above mentioned, he prepared Lives of Parnell the poet and Bolingbroke. After these, in March 1773, was produced at Covent Garden his comedy of She Stoops to Conquer More skilful in construction than its predecessor, happier in its contrasts of character. and bubbling over with kindly hum our, it was a brilliant success A year later, on Monday the 4th of April 1774, its author died at his chambers in Brick Court, Middle Temple, of a nervous fever brought on by overwork and worry, and aggravated by his obstinate reliance on a popular nos He was trum in his forty-sixth year, ndburied on the 9th April in the burialground of the Temple Church, the triforium of which contains a modern tablet to his memory

1776 a monument, with a medallion by Nollekens and an epitaph by Johnson, which contains the famous 'Nullum quod tetigit non ornavit' (an echo, says Croker, of Fénelon on Cicero), was erected in the south transept of Westminster Abbey A few days after his death was issued his unfinished poem of Retaliation, a sequence of epitaph-epigrams upon several of his friends, and two years later, with some minor pieces, followed The Haunch of Ventson, a 'Poetical Epistle' to his friend and countryman Lord Clare, which is one of the brightest of his lighter efforts In 1801 his Miscellaneous Works were collected in four volumes, and prefixed to these was an 'Introductory Memoir' by Bishop Percy and others, which constitutes the first source for his biography

'Let not his fruities be remembered,' wrote Johnson to Langton, 'he was a very great man'

Of this there can be no question But in the 'ficrce light' which his different biographers have turned upon the incidents of his career, his weaknesses have been thrown into undue prominence. It cannot be denied that he vas self important and consequential, little gifted with physical attractions, morbidly anxious to disguise his personal Improvident by temperament, and shortcomings poor in his vouth, when money came to him in middle life he was carcless and extravagant. As a talker he did not shine, and it was his ill-fortune to be thrown into the company of those who excelled in conversation. But it is admitted that he had 'swallow flights' of wit, which were the more admirable from their rarity He was generous, he was sympathetic, he had the kindest heart in the world. And m all stories to his disadvantage, it is only fair to scrutinise the authority His success, coupled with his with attention peculiarities, made him many enemies, and much of what tells to his discredit originated with those who either disliked or envied him

In regard to his work, he undoubtedly-to use another phrase of Johnson-'flowered late.' He was past thirty before he had printed a line v orth reading, and he lived but fifteen years longer In those fifteen years, however, he was drawing freely upon the experiences he had obtained in the earlier period—those intellectual wanderjahre in which he had served and supplemented an undesigned apprenticeship to Letters 'No man,' says John Forster truly, 'ever put so much of himself into his books as Goldsmith' His recollections colour the Traviller and the Descried Village, they are scattered through the Essays and the Citizen of the World, they reappear dispersedly in the Vicar of Wakefield, they make the pretext of She Stoops to Conquer He had employed his past so much, indeed, that it may be doubted whether he could have used it more The play that was to follow She Stoops was never written, the novel begun after the Vicar, if it ever existed, is sud to have been But his positive legacy is of rare unhopeful value. Two excellent didactic and descriptive poems, some admirable occasional verse, many essays of signal merit, a novel that is still praised, and a comedy that is still acted-these are no inconsiderable offering to that 'Mr Postenty' to whom he once tendered mocking dedication. And they are all animated by the same characteristics they reveal the same gentle and affec tionate nature, display the same I indly humour, the same compassionate indulgence for poor humanity, and they are written in the same clear, graceful, and unaffected style.

The Traveller, or, a Prospect of Society

Remote, unmended, melancholy, slow, Or by the lazy Scheldt or wandering Po, Or onward where the rude Carinthian boor Aguint the houseless's ranger shuts the door, Or where Campania's plain forsaken lies, A weary waste expanding to the skies Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see, My heart untravelled fondly turns to thee, Still to my brother turns, yith ceaseless pun, And drags at each remove a length'ning chain

Eternal blessings crown my earliest friend, And round his dwelling guardian saints attend, Blest be that spot, where cheerful guests retire. To pause from toil, and trim their evening fire. Blest that abode, where want and pain repair, And every stranger finds a ready chair. Blest be those feas's with simple plenty crowned, Where all the ruddy family around. Laugh at the jest or pranks that never fail, Or sigh with pity at some mournful tale. Or press the bashful stranger to his food, And learn the luxury of doing good.

But me, not destined such delights to share, My prime of life in wandering spent and care, Impelled, with steps unceasing, to pursue Some fleeting good, that mocks me with the vie That, like the circle bounding earth and skies, Allures from far, yet, as I follow, flies, My fortune leads to traverse realms alone, And find no spot of all the world my own

Even now, where Alpme solitudes ascend, I sit me down a pensive honr to spend And placed on high above the storm's career, Look downward where an hundred realms appear, Lakes, forests, cities, plains, extending wide, The pomp of kings, the shepherd's humbler pride

When thus Creation's charms around combine, Amidst the store should thanl less pride repine? Say, should the philosophic mind disdam
That good, which males each humbler bosom vain?
Let school taught pride dissemble all it can,
These little things are great to little man,
And wiser he, vehose sympathetic mind
Exults in all the good of all mankind.
Veglittering towns, with wealth and splendour crowned,
Ve fields, where summer spreads profusion round,
Ve lales, whose vessels eatch the busy gale,
Ve bending swains, that dress the flowery vale,
For me your tributary stores combine,
Creation's heir, the world, the world is mine!

As some lone miser, visiting his store,
Ben Is at his treasure, counts, recounts it o'er,
Hoards after hoards his rising raptures fill,
Le still he sighs, for hoards are wanting still Thus to my breast alternate passions rise,
Pleased with each good that heaven to man snpplies
Let oft a sigh prevails, and sorrows fall,
To see the hoard of human bliss so small,
And oft I wish amidst the scene, to find
Some spot to real happiness consigned,
Where my worn soul, each wandering hope at rest,
May gather bliss to see my fellows blest.

But where to find that happiest spot below,
Who can direct, when all pretend to I now?
The shuddering tenant of the frigid zone
Boldly proclaims that happiest spot his own,
Extols the treasures of his stormy seas,
And his long nights of revelry and ease
The nal ed negro, panting at the line,
Boests of his golden sands and palmy wine,

Basks in the glare, or stems the tepid wave, And thanks his Gods for all the good they gave. Such is the patriot's boast, where'er we roam, His first, best country ever is at home And yet, perhaps, if countries we compare, And estimate the blessings which they share, Though patriots flatter, still shall wisdom find An equal portion dealt to all mankind, As different good, by art or nature given, To different nations makes their blessings even Nature, a mother kind alike to all, Still grants her bliss at Labour's earnest call, With food as well the peasant is supplied On Idra's cliffs as Arno's shelvy side, And though the rocky crested summits frown, These rocks, by custom, turn to beds of down.  $\Gamma$ rom Art more various are the blessings sent. Wealth, commerce, honour, liberty, content I et these each other's power so strong contest, That either seems destructive of the rest. Where wealth and freedom reign contentment fails, And honour sinks where commerce long prevails Hence every state to one loved blessing prone, Conforms and models life to that alone Each to the favourite happiness attends, And spurns the plan that aims at other ends, I'll carried to excess in each domain, This favourite good begets peculiar pain

But let us try these truths with closer eyes, And trace them through the prospect as it has Here for a while my proper cares resigned, Here let me sit in sorrow for maikind, Like you neglected shrub at random cast, That shades the steep, and sighs at every blast

Fir to the right where Apennine ascends, Bright as the summer, Italy extends, Its uplands sloping deck the mountain's side, Woods over woods in gry theatric pride, While oft some temple's mouldering tops between, With venerable grandeur mark the scene.

Could Nature's bounty satisfy the breast,
The sons of Italy were surely blest
Whatever fruits in different climes were found,
That prondly rise, or humbly court the ground,
Whatever blooms in torrid tracts appear,
Whose bright succession decks the varied year,
Whatever sweets salute the northern sky
With vernal lives that blossom but to die,
These here disporting own the kindred soil,
Nor ask luxuriance from the planter's toil,
While sea born gales their gelid wings expand,
To winnow fragrance round the smiling land

But small the bliss that sense alone bestows,
And sensual bliss is all the nation knows
In florid beauty groves and fields appear,
Man seems the only growth that dwindles here.
Contrasted faults through all his manners reign
Though poor, luxurious, though submissive, vain,
Though grave, yet trifling, zealons, yet untrue,
And even in penance planning sins anew
All evils here contaminate the mind,
That opulence departed leaves behind,
For wealth was theirs, not far removed the date,
When commerce proudly flourished through the state,
At her command the palace learned to rise,
Again the long fallen column sought the skies,

The canvas glowed beyond e'en Nature warm, The pregnant quarry teemed with human form, Till, more unsteady than the southern gale, Commerce on other shores displayed her sail, While nought remained of all that riches gave, But towns unmanned, and lords without a slave, And late the nation found with fruitless skill, Its former strength was but plethoric ill

Yet, still the loss of wealth is here supplied By arts, the splendid wrecks of former pride, From these the feeble heart and long fallen mind An easy compensation seem to find Here may be seen, in bloodless pomp arrayed, The paste board triumph and the cavalcade, Processions formed for piety and love, A mistress or a saint in every grove By sports like these are all their cares beguiled, The sports of children satisfy the child, Each nobler aim, repressed by long control, Now sinks at last, or feebly mans the soul, While low delights, succeeding fast behind. In happier meanness occupy the mind As in those domes where Casars once bore sway, Defaced by time and tottering in decay, There in the ruin, heedless of the dead, The shelter seeking peasant builds his slied, And, wondering man could want the larger pile, Exults, and owns his cottage with a smile

My soil, turn from them, turn we to survey Where rougher climes a nobler race display, Where the bleak Swiss their stormy mansion tread, And force a churlish soil for scanty bread, No product here the barren hills afford, But man and steel, the soldier and his sword, No vernal blooms their torpid rocks array, But winter lingering chills the lap of May, No Zephyr fondly sues the mountain's breast, But meteors glare, and stormy glooms invest.

Yet still, even here, content can spread a charm, Redress the clime, and all its rage disarm Though poor the peasant's hut, his feasts though small, He sees his little lot the lot of all, Sees no contiguous palace rear its head To shame the meanness of his humble shed, No costly lord the sumptuous banquet deal, To make him loathe his vegetable meal, But calm, and bred in ignorance and toil, Each wish contracting, fits him to the soil Cheerful at morn he wakes from short repose, Breasts the keen air, and carols as he goes, With patient angle trolls the finny deep, Or drives his venturous ploughshare to the steep, Or seeks the den where snow tracks mark the way, And drags the struggling savage into day At night returning, every labour sped, He sits him down, the monarch of a shed, Smiles by his cheerful fire, and round surveys His children's looks, that brighten at the blaze, While his loved partner, boastful of her hoard, Displays her cleanly platter on the board And haply, too, some pilgrim, thither led, With many a tale repays the nightly bed

Thus every good his native wilds impart, Imprints the patriot passion on his heart, And e'en those ills that round his mansion rise, Enhance the bliss his scanty fund supplies Dear is that shed to which his soul conforms, And dear that hill which lifts him to the storms, And as u child, when scaring sounds molest, Clings close and closer to the mother's breast So the loud torrent, and the whirlwind's rorr, But bind him to his native mountains more

 Such are the charms to barren states assigned, Their wants but few, their wishes all confined Yet let them only share the praises due, If few their wants, their pleasures are but few, For every want that stimulates the breast, Becomes a source of pleasure when redrest Whence from such lands each pleasing science flies, That first excites desire, and then supplies, Unknown to them, when sensual pleasures cloy, To fill the languid pause with finer joy, Unknown those powers that raise the soul to flame, Catch every nerve, and vibrate through the frame Their level life is but a mould'ring fire, Unquenched by want, unfanned by strong desire, Unfit for raptures, or, if raptures cheer On some high festival of once a year, In wild excess the vulgar breast takes fire, Till, buried in debauch, the bliss expire

But not their joys alone thus coarsely flow
Their morals, like their pleasures, are but low
For, as refluement stops, from sire to son
Unaltered, unimproved, the manners run,
And love s and friendship's finely pointed dart
Fall blunted from each indurated heart
Some sterner virtues o'er the mountain's breast
May sit like falcons cowering on the nest,
But all the gentler morals, such as pluy
Through life's more cultured walks, and charm the way
These, far dispersed, on timorous pinions fly,
To sport and flutter in a kinder sky

To kinder skies, where gentler manners reign, I turn, and France displays her bright domain Gay sprightly land of mirth and social case, Pleased with thyself, whom all the world can please, How often have I led thy sportive choir, With tuncless pipe, beside the murmuring Loire ! Where shading clms along the margin grew, And freshened from the wave the Zephyr flew And haply, though my harsh touch, faltering still, But mocked all tune, and marred the dancer's skill, I et would the village praise my wondrous power, And dance, forgetful of the noontide hour Alike all ages. Dames of ancient days Have led their children through the mirthful maze, And the gav grandsire, skilled in gestic lore, Has frisked beneath the burden of threescore

So blest a life these thoughtless realms display, Thus idly busy rolls their world away Theirs are those arts that mind to mind endear, For honour forms the social temper here Honour, that praise which real ment gains, Or e'en imaginary worth obtains, Here passes current, pind from hand to hand, It shifts in splendid traffic round the land From courts, to camps, to cottages it strays, And all are taught an avarice of praise, They please, are pleased, they give to get esteem, Till, seeming blest, they grow to what they seem

But while this softer art their bliss supplies, It gives their follies also room to rise For praise too dearly loved, or varinly sought, Eufechles all internal strength of thought, And the weak sonl, within itself unblest, Leans for all pleasure on another's breast Hence ostentation here, with triwdry art, Pauts for the vulgar praise which fools impart, Here vanity assumes her pert grimace, And trims her robe of frieze with copper lace, Here beggar pride defrauds her daily cheer, To boast one spleudid banquet once u year, The mind still turns where shifting fashion draws, Nor weighs the solid worth of self applause.

To men of other minds my finey flies, Embosomed in the deep where Holland lies. Methiuks her patient sons before me stand, Where the broad ocean leans against the land, And, sedulous to stop the coming tide, Lift the tall rampire's artificial pride Onward, methinks, and diligently slow, The firm-connec ed bulwark seems to grow, Spreads its long arms amidst the watery roar, Scoops out an empire and usurps the shore. While the pent ocean rising o er the pile. Sees an amphibious world beneath him smile The slow canal, the yellow blossomed vale, The willow tufted bank, the gliding sail, The crowded mart, the cultivated plain, A new creation rescued from his reign

Thus, while around the wave subjected soil Impels the native to repeated toil, Industrious habits in each hosom reign, And industry begets a love of gain Hence all the good from opulence that springs, With all those ills superfluous treasure brings, Arc here displayed Their much loved wealth imports Convenience, plenty, elegance, and arts, But view them closer, craft and fraud appear, Even liberty itself is bartered here At gold's superior charms all freedom flies, The needy sell it, and the rich man buys, A land of tyrants, and a den of slaves, Here wretches seek dishonourable graves, And calmly bent, to servitude conform, Dull as their lakes that slumber in the storm.

Heavens! how unlike their Belgie sires of old! Rough, poor, content, ungovernably hold, War in each breast, and freedom on each brow, How much unlike the sons of Britain now!

Fired at the sound, my genius spreads her wing, And flies where Britain courts the western spring, Where lawns extend that scorn Areadian pride, And brighter streams than famed Hydaspis glide. There all around the gentlest breezes stray, There gentle music melts on every spray, Creation's mildest charms are there combined, Extremes are only in the master's mind' Stern o'er each hosom reason holds her state. With daring aims irregularly great, Pride in their port, defiauce in their eve, I see the lords of humankind pass by, Intent on high designs a thoughtful band, By forms unfashioned, fre h from \ature's hand, Fierce in their native hardiness of soul. True to imagined right, above control, While even the peasant boasts the e rights to sean, And learns to venerate himself as man

While many a pastime circled in the shade,
The young contending as the old surveyed,
And many a gambol frolicled o or the ground,
And sleights of art and feats of strength went round
And sall, as each repeated pleasure tired, Succeeding sports the mirthful band inspired
The dancing pair that simply sought renown,
By holding out to tire each other down,
The sy ain mistrustless of his smutted face,
While secret laughter tittered round the place,
The bashful virgin's sidelong looks of love,
The matron's glance that yould those looks reprove
These were thy charms, sweet village, sports like these,
With sy cet succession, taught e en toil to please

Sweet was the sound, when oft, at evening s close, Up wonder hill the village marmar rose, There, as I passed with careless steps and slow, The mingling notes came softened from below, The swain responsive as the inili maid sung, The sober herd that lowed to mee their young, The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool, The playful children just let loose from school, The watchdog's voice that baved the v hispering wind, And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind These all in syect confusion sought the shade, And filled each pause the nightingale had made.

Near yonder copic, where once the garden smiled, And still where many a garden flot or grows wild, There, I here a few torn shrubs the place disclose, The village preacher's modest mansion rose I man he was to all the country dear, And passing rich with forty pounds a year, Remote from towns he ran his godly race, Nor e'er had changed, nor wished to change his place, Unpractised lie to fawn, or seek for power, By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour, Far other aims his heart had learned to prize, More skilled to raise the wretched than to rise. His house was I not n to all the vigrant train, He clied their wanderings, but relieved their pain, The long remembered beggar vas his guest, Whose beard descending swept his agod breast, The runed spendthrift, now no longer proud, Claimed I indred there, and had his claims allowed, The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay, Sat by his fire, and tall cd the night away, Wept o'er his vounds, or tales of sorrow done, Shouldered his crutch, and showed how fields were won. Pleased with his guests the good man learned to glow, And quite forgot their vices in their woe, Carcless their ments or their faults to scan, His pity gave ere charity began

Thus to relieve the v retched was his pride, And e'en his failings leaned to Virtue's side, But, in his duty prompt at every call, He v atched and wept, he prayed and felt, for all, And, as a bird each fond endearment tries, To tempt her new fledged offspring to the slies, He tried each art, reproved each dull delay, Allured to brighter worlds, and led the vay

Beside the bed where parting life was laid, And sorrow, guilt, and pain, by turns dismayed, The reverend champion stood. At his control Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul, Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise, And his last faltering accents whispered praise.

At church, with mech and unaffected grace, His looks adorned the venerable place, Truth from his lips prevailed with double sway, And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray The service past, around the pious man, With ready zeal, each honest rustic ran, L'en children followed with endearing wile, And plucked his gown, to share the good man's smile, His ready smile a parent's warmth expressed, Their welfare pleased him, and their cares distressed. To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given, But all his serious thoughts had rest in Heaven. As some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form, Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm, Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread, Lternal sunshine settles on its head Beside you struggling fence that slirts the way, With blossomed furze unprofitably gry, There, in his noisy mansion skilled to rule, The village master taught his little school, A man severe he was, and stern to view, I knew him well, and every truant knew Well had the boding tremblers learned to trace The day's disasters in his morning's face. Full well they laughed, vith counterfeited glee, At all his jokes, for many a jole had he, Full well the busy whisper, circling round, Conveyed the dismal tidings when he frowned, Let lie was I ind, or, if severe in aught, The love he bore to learning was in fault, The village all declared how much he knew, Twas certain he could write, and cipher too, Lands he could measure, terms and tides presage, And e'en the story ran that he could gauge, In arguing, too, the parson owned his skill, For e'en though vanquished, he could argue still. While words of learned length, and thundering sound, Amazed the gazing rustics ranged around, And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew, That one small head could carry all he knew

But past is all his fame. The very spot Where many a time lie triumphed, is forgot. Near youder thorn, that lifts its head on high, Where once the sign post caught the passing eye, Low lies that house where nut brown draughts inspired, Where gray beard mirth and smiling toil retired, Where village statesmen talked with looks profound, And news much older than their ale went round. Imagination fondly stoops to trace The parlour splendours of that festive place, The white washed wall, the nicely sanded floor, The varnished clock that clicked behind the door. The chest contrived a double debt to pay, A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day, The pictures placed for ornament and use, The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose. The hearth, except when winter chilled the day, With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel gay. While broken tea cups, wisely I ept for show. Ranged o'er the chimney, glistened in a row

Vain transitory splendours! could not all Reprieve the tottering mansion from its fall! Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart An hour's importance to the poor man's heart, Thither no more the peasant shall repair, To sweet oblivion of his daily care, No more the farmer's news, the barber's tale, No more the wood man's balled shall prevail, No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear, Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear, The bost himself no longer shall be found Careful to see the mantling bliss go round, Nor the coy maid, half willing to be pressed, Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest.

Yes! let the rich deride, the proud disdain, These simple blessings of the lowly train, To me more dear, congenial to my heart, One native charm, than all the gloss of art. Spontaneous joys, where Nature has its play, The soul adopts, and owns their first born sway Lightly they frolie o'er the vacant mind, Unenvied, unmolested, unconfined But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade, With all the freaks of wanton wealth arrayed, In these, ere triffers half their wish obtain, The toiling pleasure sickens into pain, And e en while fashion's brightest arts decoy, The heart distrusting asks if this be joy

Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen who survey The rich man's joys mercase, the poor's decay, 'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand Between a splendid and a happy land Proud swells the tide with loads of freighted ore, and shouting Folly hails them from her shore, Hoards, e'en beyond the miser's wish, abound, And rich men flock from all the world around Yet count our gains This wealth is but a name. That leaves our useful product still the same Not so the loss The man of wealth and pride Takes up a space that many poor supplied. Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds, Space for his horses, equipage, and hounds, The robe that wraps his himbs in silken sloth, Has robbed the neighbouring fields of half their growth, His seat, where solitary sports are seen, Indignant spurns the cottage from the green, Around the world each needful product flies, For all the luxuries the world supplies While thus the land adorned for pleasure, all In barren splendour feebly waits the fall

Elegy on the Death of a Mad Dog

Good people all, of every sort,
Give ear unto my song,
And if you find it wond'rous short,
It cannot hold you long

In Islington there was a man,
Of whom the world might say
That still a godly race he ran,
Whene'er he went to pray

A kind and gentle heart he had,
To comfort friends and foes
The naked every day he clid,
When he put on his clothes

And in that town a dog was found,
As many dogs there be,
Both mongrel, puppy, whelp and hound,
And curs of low degree

This dog and man at first were friends,
But when a pique began,
The dog, to gain some private ends,
Went mad and bit the man

Around from all the neighbouring streets,
The wondering neighbours ran,
And swore the dog had lost his wits,
To bite so good a man

The wound it seemed both sore and sad,
To every Christian eye,
And while they swore the dog was mad,
They swore the man would die

But soon a wonder came to light,

That showed the rogues they lied,
The man recovered of the bite,
The dog it was that died

The Haunch of Venison.

Thanks, my Lord, for your venison, for finer or fatter
Never ranged in a forest, or smoked in a platter,
The haunch was a picture for painters to study,
The fat was so white, and the lean was so ruddy Though my stomach was sharp, I could scarce help regretting,

To spoil such a delicate picture by eating,
I had thoughts, in my chambers, to place it in view,
To be shown to my friends as a piece of virtu,
As in some Irish houses, where things are so so,
One gammon of bacon hangs up for a show
But for eating a risher of what they take pride in, They'd as soon think of eating the pan it is fried in But hold—let me pause—Don't I hear you pronounce
This tale of the bacon a damnable bounce?
Well, suppose it a bounce—sure a poet may try,
By a bounce now and then, to get courage to fly
But, my lord, it's no bounce—I protest in my turn
It's a truth—and your lordship may ask Mr Byrne
To go on with my tale—as I grzed on the haunch,

I thought of a friend that was trusty and staunch, So I cut it, and sent it to Reynolds undrest, To print it, or eat it, just as he liked best Of the neck and the breast I had next to dispose, 'Twas a neck and a breast—that might rival Monroe's But in parting with these I was puzzled again, With the how, and the who, and the where, and the when. There's Howard, and Coley, and H-rth, and Hiff, I think they love venison—I know they love beef, There's my countryman Higgins-Oh! let him alone, For making a blunder, or picking a bone But hang it-to poets who seldom can eat, Your very good mutton's a very good treat, Such dainties to them their health it might hurt, It's like sending them ruffles, when wanting a shirt. While thus I debated, in reverse centred, An acquaintance, a friend as he called himself, entered, An under bred, fine spoken fellow was he, And he smiled as he looked at the venison and me 'What have we got here '-Why this is good eating '

'Why, whose should it be?' cried I with a flounce

Your own I suppose-or is it in waiting?'

- 'I get these things often , '-but that was a bounce
- 'Some lords, my acquaintance, that settle the nation, Are pleased to be kind—but I hate ostentation'

'If that be the case,' then, cried he, very gay,
'I'm glad I have taken this honse in my way
To morror you take a poor dinner with me,
No words—I insist on 't—precisely at three We'll have Johnson, and Barke, all the wits will be there,
My acquaintance is slight, or I dask my Lord Clare.
And now that I think on't, as I am a sinner!
We wanted this venison to make out the dinner
What say you—a pasty? it shall, and it must,
And my wife, little kitty, is famous for crust
Here, porter!—this venison with me to Mile end,
No stirring—I beg—my dear friend—my dear friend!'
Thus snatching his hat, he brushed off life the wind,
And the porter and catables followed behind

Left alone to reflect, having emptied my shelf,
And 'nobody with me at sea but myself,' Though I could not help thinking my gentleman hasty, \(\c'\) Johnson, and Burke, and a good venison pasty,
Were things that I never dishked in my life,
Though clogged with a coxcomb, and Kitty his wife
So next day, in due splendour to make my approach,
I drove to his door in my own hackney coach

When come to the place where we all were to dine, (A chair lumbered closet just twelve feet by nine) My friend bade me welcome, but struck me quite dumb, With tidings that Johnson and Burle would not come, 'For I knew it,' he cried, 'both eternally fail, The one with his speeches, and t'other with Thrale, Pat no matter, I'll warrant we'll make up the party, With two full as clever, and ten times as hearty. The one is a Scotchman, the other a Jew, They re bosh of them merry, and authors like you, The one varies the Snarler, the other the Scourge, Some think he writes Cinna—he owns to Panurge' While thus he described them by trade and by name, They entered, and dinner vas served as they came.

At the top a fried liver and bacon were seen,
At the bottom was tripe, in a swingeing tureen,
At the sides there was spinach and pudding made hot,
In the middle a place where the pasty—was not Nov, my Lord, as for tripe, it's my utter aversion,
And your bacon I hate lile a Turk or a Persian,
So there I sat stucl, like a horse in a pound,
While the bacon and liver went merrily round
But what vexed me most was that d—'d Scottish rogue, With his long winded speeches, his smiles and his brogue,

And, 'Madam,' quoth he, 'may this bit be my poison, A prettier dinner I never set eyes on, Pray a slice of your liver, though may I be curst, But I've eat of your tripe till I'm ready to burst' 'The tripe,' quoth the Jew, with his chocolite cheek, 'I could dine on this tripe seven days in the week I like these here dinners so pretty and small, But your friend there, the Doctor, eats nothing at all ' 'O-Oh 1' quoth my friend, 'he'll come on in a trice, He's leeping a corner for something that's nice 'There's a pasty '-' A pasty 1' repeated the Jew, 'I don't care if I I cep a corner for 't too ' 'What the de'il, mon, a pasty!' re echoed the Scot, 'Though splitting, I'll still I eep a corner for thot.' 'We'll all I eep a corner,' the lady cried out, 'We'll all keep a corner,' was echoed about

While thus we resolved, and the pasty delayed, With looks that quite petrified, entered the maid, A visage so sad, and so pale with affright, Waked Priam in drawing his curtains by night But we quickly found out, for who could mistake her? That she came with some terrible news from the baker And so it fell out, for that negligent sloven Had shut ont the pasty on shutting his oven Sad Philomel thus-but let similes drop-And now that I think on 't, the story may stop To be plain, my good Lord, it's but labour misplaced, To send such good verses to one of your taste, You've got an odd something—a kind of discerning— A relish-a taste-sickened over by learning, At least, it's your temper, as very well I nown, That you think very slightly of all that's your own So, perhaps, in your habits of thinking amiss, You may make a mistake, and think slightly of this

Mr Byrne was Lord Clare's nephew 'Nobody with me at sea but myself is a quotation from the love-letters of Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, 10 Lady Grosvenor (1769)

Extracts from 'Retaliation.'

Goldsmith and some of his friends occasionally dined together at the St James's Coffee-house. One day it was proposed to write epitaphs upon him. His country, dialect and blinders furnished subjects for writtensm. He was called on for 'retaliation, and, at the next meeting, produced part of this poem, which was left un finished at his death.

Here hes our good Edmund, whose genius was such, We scarcely can praise it, or blame it too much. Who, born for the Universe, narrowed his mind, And to party give up what was meant for mankind Though fraught with all learning, yet straining his throat To persuade Tommy Townshend to lend him a vote, Who, too deep for his hearers, still went on refining, And thought of convincing, while they thought of dining Though equal to all things, for all things unfit, Too nice for a statesman, too proud for a wit For a patriot too cool, for a drudge disobedient, And too fond of the right to pursue the expedient In short, 'twas his fate, unemployed, or in place, Sir, To cat matton cold, and cut blocks with a razor

Here lies David Garrick, describe me, who can, An abridgment of all that was pleasant in man, As an actor, confessed without rival to shine, As a wit, if not first, in the very first line, Yet, with talents like these, and an excellent heart, The man had his failings, a dupe to his art, Lil e an ill judging beauty, his colours he spread, And beplastered with rouge his own natural red On the stage he was natural, simple, affecting, 'Twas only that when he was off he was acting With no reason on earth to go out of his way, He tarned and he varied full ten times a day, Though secure of our hearts, yet confoundedly sick If they were not his own by finessing and trick He cast off his friends, as a huntsman his pack, For he knew when he pleased he could whistle them back.

Of praise a mere glutton, he swallowed what came, And the puff of a duuce he mistook it for fame, Till his relish grown callous, almost to disease, Who peppered the highest was surest to please But let us be candid, and speak out our mind, If dunces applauded, he paid them in kind

Ye Kenricks, ye Ke lys, and Woodfalls so grave, What a commerce was yours, while you got and you gave!

How did Grub street re echo the shouts that you raised, While he was be Rosciused, and you were be praised that peace to his spirit, wherever it flies, To act as an angel, and mix with the skies. Those poets, who owe their best fame to his skill, Shall still be his flatterers, go where he will, Old Shakespeare, receive him, with pruse and with love, And Beaumonts and Bens be his Kellys above.

Here Reynolds is laid, and to tell you my mind,
He has not left a better or wiser behind
His pencil was striking, resistless, and grand,
His minners were gentle, complying, and bland,
Still born to improve us in every part,
His pencil our faces, his manners our heart
To coxcombs averse, yet most civilly steering,
When they judged without skill, he was still hard of hearing

When they talked of their Raphnels, Correggios, and stuff He shifted his trumpet, and only took snuff

'Edmund is of course, Burle The sketch of Reynolds was never completed. Prior (Life of Goldsmith: 1837—11 499) says half a line more had been written It was 'By flattery suspoiled and remained unaltered in the MS

From 'She Stoops to Conquer'

Lanalord There be two gentlemen in a post chaise at the door They've lost their way upo' the forest, and they are talking something about Mr Hardeastle.

Ton, Lumpkin As sure as can be, one of them must be the gentleman that's coming down to court my sister Do they seem to be Londoners?

Land I believe they may They look woundily like Frenchmen

Ton; Then desire them to step this way, and I'll set them right in a twinkling [Exit Landlord] Gentle men, as they mayn't be good enough company for you, step down for a moment, and I'll be with you in the squeezing of a lemon [Exeunt Mob] Father in law has been calling me whelp and hound this half year Now, if I pleased, I could be so revenged upon the old grumbletonian But then I am afraid—afraid of what? I shall soon be worth fifteen hundred a year, and let him frighten me out of that if he can [Enter Landlord, conducting Marlow and Hastings ]

Marlow What n tedious uncomfortable day have we had of it! We were told it was but forty miles neross the country, and we have come above threescore.

Tony No offence, gentlemen; but I am told you have been inquiring for one Mr Hardcastle in these parts. Do you know what part of the country you are in?

Hastings Not in the least, sir, but should thank you for information

Tony Nor the way you came?

Hast No, sir, but if you can inform us-

Tony Why, gentlemen, if you know neither the road you are going, nor where you are, nor the road you came, the first thing I have to inform you is that—you have lost your way

Mar We wanted no ghost to tell us that.

Tony Pray, gentlemen, may I be so bold as to ask the place from whence you came?

Mar That's not necessary towards directing us where we are to go

Tony No officee, but question for question is all fair, you know Pray, gentlemen, is not this same Hardcastle a cross grained, old fashioned, whimsical fellow, with an ugly face, a daughter, and a pretty son?

Hast We have not seen the gentleman, but he has the family you mention

Tony The daughter, n tall, trapesing, trolloping, talk ative may pole, the son, a pretty, well bred, agreeable youth, that everybody is fond of

Mar Our information differs in this the daughter is said to be well bred and beautiful, the son, an awkward booby, reared up and spoiled at his mother's apron string

Ton, He he m. Then, gentlemen, all I have to tell you is, that you won t reach Mr Hardcastle's house this night, I believe Hart Unfortunate!

Tony It's a long, dark, boggy, dirty, dangerous wav Stingo, tell the gentlemen the way to Mr Hardcastle's [vanhing upon the Landlerd]—Mr Hardcastle's of Qing mire marsh \[ \text{\text{Outubelow} upon the Particles of Qing mire marsh \] \[ \text{\text{Outubelow} understand me?} \]

Land Master Hardcastle's! Lack a-dust, my masters, you're come a deadly deal wrong. When you came to the bottom of the hill, you should have crossed down Squash lane.

Mar Cross down Squash lane!

Land Then you were to keep straight forward till you came to four roads

Mar Come to where four roads meet?

Tony Ay, but you must be sure to take only one of them

Mar O, sir' you're facetious.

Tony Then, keeping to the right, you are to go sideways till you come upon Crack-skull Common, there you must look sharp for the track of the wheel, and go forward till you come to Farmer Murrain's barn. Coming to the farmer's barn, you are to turn to the right, and then to the left, and then to the right about agun, till you find out the old mill—

Mar Zounds, man' we could as soon find out the longitude l

Hast What's to be done, Marlow?

Mar This house promises but a poor reception, though perhaps the landlord can necommodate us

Land Alack, master! we have but one spare bed in the whole house.

Tony And to my knowledge, that's taken up hy three lodgers already [After a fause, in which the rest seem disconcerted] I have hit it don't you think, Stingo, our landlady could accommodate the gentlemen by the fireside with—three churs and a bolster?

Hast I hate sleeping by the fireside.

Mar And I detest your three chairs and a bolster

Ton; You do, do von? Then let me see—what if you go on a mile further to the Buck's Head, the old Buck's Head on the hill, one of the best inns in the whole county

Hast O ho! so we have escaped an adventure for this night, however

Land [Apart to Tony] Sure you bean't sending them to your father's as an inn, be you?

Tony Mum! von fool, you, let them find that out. [To them ] You have only to keep on straight forward till you come to n large old house by the roadside you'll see a pair of large horns over the door, that's the sign Drive up the vard, and call stoutly about you flast Sir, ve are obliged to you The servants can't miss the way?

Ton; No, no but I tell vou, though, the landlord is rich, and going to leave off business, so be wants to be thought a geutleman, saving your presence, he, he, he 'He'll be for giving you his company, and, ecod' if you mind him, he'll persuade you that his mother was an alderman, and his aunt a justice of the peace

Land A troublesome old blade, to be sure, but a leeps as good wines and beds as any in the vhole country

Mar Well, if he supplies us with these, we shall want no further connection. We are to turn to the right, did you say?

Ton; No, no, straight forward I'll just step myself and shew you a piece of the way [To the Land lord! Mum' [Execut

[Marlo v and Hastings at the Supposed Inn ]

Hast After the disappointments of the day, welcome once more, Charles, to the comforts of a cleau room and a good fire Upon my word, a very well looking house, antique, but creditable.

[Enter Hardcastle]

Hardcastle. Gentlemen, once more you are heartily welcome. Which is Vir Marlow? [Mar advances] Sir, you're heartily welcome. It's not my way, you see, to receive my friends with my back to the fire. I like to give them a hearty reception, m the old style, at my gate, I like to see their horses and trunks taken care of.

Mar [Asule] He has got our names from the ser vants already [To Hard] We approve your caution and hospitality, sir [To Hast] I have been thinking, George, of changing our travelling-dresses in the morning, I am grown confoundedly ashamed of mine

Hard I beg, Mr Marlow, you'll use no ceremous in this house.

Hast I fancy, Charles, You're right the first blow is half the battle I intend opening the campaign with the white and gold Hard Mr Marlow—Mr Hastings—gentlemen—pray be under no restraint in this house. This is Liberty hall, gentlemen, you may do just as you please here.

Mar Yet, George, if we open the campaign too fiercely at first, we may want aummnition before it is over I think to reserve the embroidery to secure a retreat.

Mard Your talking of a retreat, Mr Marlow, puts me in mind of the Duke of Marlborough when we went to besiege Denain. He first summoned the garrison—

Mar Don't you think the ventre d'or waistcoat will do with the plain brown?

Hard He first summoned the garrison, which might consist of about five thousand men-

Hast I think not brown and vellow mix but very poorly

Hard I say, gentlemen, as I was telling you, he summoued the garrison, which might consist of about five thousand men—

Mar The girls lil e finery

Hard Which might consist of about five thousand men, well appointed with stores, ammunition, and other implements of war Now, says the Dinke of Marlborough to George Brooks, that stood next to him—you must have heard of George Brooks—I'll pawn my dukedom, says he, but I take that garrison without spilling a drop of blood. So—

Mar What, my good friend, if you gave us a glass of punch in the meantime, it would help us to carry on the siege with vigour

Hard Punch, sir' [Aside] This is the most unaccountable kind of modesty I ever met with

Mar les, sir, punch. A glass of warm punch after our journey vill be comfortable [Enter Servant with a tanhard] This is Liberty hall, you know

Ilard Here's a cup, sir

Mar So this fellow, in his Liberty hall, will only let us have just what he pleases. [Aside to Hast

Hard [Taking the cup] I hope you ll find it to your mind. I have prepared it with my own hands, and I behave you'll own the ingredients are tolerable. Will you be so good as to pledge me, sir? Here, Mr Marlow, here is to our better acquaintance. [Drinks.]

Mar A very impudent fellow this, but he's a character, and I'll humour him a little [Iside] Sir, my service to you.

[Dri k]

Hast I see this fellow wants to give us his company, and forgets that he's an innheeper before he has learned to be a gentleman [1stde

Mar From the excellence of your cup, my old friend, I suppose you have a good deal of business in this part of the country Warm work now and then at elections, I suppose?

Hard No, sir I have long given that work over Since our betters have hit upon the expedient of elect ing each other, there's no business 'for us that sell ale'

Hast So, you have no turn for politics, I find

Hard Not in the least. There was a time indeed, I fretted myself about the mistakes of government, lile o'her people, but finding myself every day grow more angry, and the government growing no better, I left it to mend itself. Since that, I no more trouble my head about who's in or who's out than I do about Hyder Ally, or Ally Cawn, than about Ally Croal er. Sir, my service to you

Hast So that, with eating above stairs and drinking below, with receiving your friends within and amusing them without, you lead a good, pleasant, bustling life of it.

Hard I do stir about a good deal, that's certain Half the differences of the parish are adjusted in this very parlour

Mar [4fter drinking] And you have an argument in your cup, old gentleman, better than any in West minster Hall.

Hard Ay, young gentleman, that, and a little philosophy

Mar Well, this is the first time I ever heard of an innkeeper's philosophy [A.idi

Hast So, then, like an experienced general, you attach them on every quarter. If you find their reason manage able, you attach them with your philosophy, if you find they have no reason, you attack them with this. Here's your health, my philosopher. [Driv/s

Ilurd Good, very good, thank you, ha! ha! ha! ha! Vour generalship puts me in mind of Prince Eugene when he fought the Turks at the battle of Belgrade. You shall hear

War Instead of the battle of Belgrade, I think it's almost time to talk about supper What has your philosophy got in the house for supper?

Hard For supper, sir? [Aside] Was ever such a request to a man in his own house?

Mar Yes, sir, supper, sir, I begin to feel an appetite I shall make devilish work to night in the larder, I promise you.

Hard Such a brazen dog sure never my eyes be held [Aside] Why really, sir, as for supper, I can't well tell My Dorothy and the cookmand settle these things between them I leave these kind of things en tirely to them

Mar You do, do you?

Hard Entirely By the by, I believe they are in actual consultation upon what's for support his moment in the kitchen

Mar Then I beg they'll admit me as one of their privy council. It's a way I have got. When I travel, I always choose to regulate my own supper. Let the cook be called. No offence, I hope, sir

Hard O no, sir, none in the least yet, I don't know how, our Bridget, the cookmand, is not very communicative upon these occasions. Should we send for her, she might seeld us all out of the house

Hast Let's see your list of the larder, then I always match my appetite to my bill of fare

Mar [To Hardcastle, who looks at them with surprise]

Sir, he's very right, and it's my way too

Hard Sir, you have a right to command here Here, Roger, bring us the bill of fare for to night's supper, I believe it's drawn out Your manner, Mr Hastings, puts me in mind of my uncle, Colonel Wallop It was a saying of his that no man was sure of his supper till he had caten it

[Servant brings in the bill of fare, and exit Hast All upon the high ropes! His uncle a colonel! We shall soon hear of his mother being 1 justice of peace [Aside] But let's hear the bill of fare

Mar [Perusing] What's here? For the first course, for the second course, for the dessert. The devil, sir l Do you think we have brought down the whole Joiners' Compuny, or the Corporation of Bedford, to ent up such a supper? Two or three little things, clean and comfortable, will do

Hast But let's hear it

Mas [Reading] For the first course at the top, a pig and prune sauce.

Hast Confound your pig, I say

Mar And confound your prune sauce, say I

Hard And yet, gentlemen, to men that are hungry, pig with prune sauce is very good cating

Mar At the bottom a calf's tongue and brains

Hast Let your brains be knocked out, my good sir, I don't like them

Mar Or you may clap them on a plate by themselves I do

Hard Their impudence confounds me. [Ande] Gentlemen, you are my guests, make what alterations you please. Is there anything else you wish to retrench or after, gentlemen?

Var Item a pork pic, a boiled rabbit and sausages, a florentine, a shaking pudding, and a dish of tiff—taff—taffety cream

Hast Confound your made dishes! I shall be as much at a loss in this house as at a green and yellow dinner at the I rench ambassador's table. I'm for plain cating

Hard I'm sorry, gentlemen, that I have nothing you like, but if there be anything you have a particular fancy to——

Mar Why, really, sir, your bill of fare is so exquisite, that any one part of it is full as good as another Send us what you please So much for supper and now to see that our beds are aired, and properly taken care of

Hard I entreat you'll leave all that to me You shall not stir a step

Mar Leave that to you! I protest, sir, you must excuse me, I always look to these things myself

Hard I must insist, sir, you'll make yourself easy on that head

Mar You see I'm resolved on it. A very trouble some fellow this, as ever I met with [Aside.

Hard Well, sir, I'm resolved at least to attend you. This may be modern modesty, but I never saw anything look so like old fashioned impudence.

[Asiae]

[Exeunt Mar and Hard

A City Night-Piece

Ille dolet vere qui sine teste dolet .-- MART

The clock has struck two, the expiring taper rises and sinks in the socket, the watchman forgets the hour in slumber, the laborious and the happy are at rest and nothing now wakes but guilt, revely and despair. The drunkard once more fills the destroying bowl, the robber walks his midnight round, and the suicide lifts his guilty arm against his own sacred person.

Let me no longer waste the night over the page of antiquity, or the sallies of contemporary genius, but pursue the solitary walk, where Vanity, ever changing, but a few hours past, walked before me, where she kept up the pageant, and now, like a froward child, seems hushed with her own importunities.

What a gloom hangs all around I The dying lamp feebly emits a yellow gleam, no sound is heard but of the chiming clock, or the distant watch dog. All the bustle of human pride is forgotten, and this hour may well display the emptiness of human vanity.

There may come a time when this temporary solitude may be made continual, and the city itself, like its inhabitants, fade away, and leave a desert in its room

What cities, as great as this, have once triumphed in existence, had their victories as great as ours, joy as just and as unbounded as we, and, with short sighted pre sumption, promised themselves immortality. Posterity can hardly trace the situation of some. The sorrowful triveller wanders over the awful ruins of others, and, as he beholds, he learns wisdom, and feels the trinsience of every sublunary possession.

Here stood their citadel, but now grown over with weeds, there their senate house, but now the haunt of every novious reptile, temples and theatres stood here, now only an undistinguished heap of ruin. They are fallen, for luxury and avarice first made them feeble. The rewards of the state were conferred on amusing, and not on useful, members of society. Thus true virtue languished, their riches and opulence invited the plunderer, who, though once repulsed, returned again, and at last swept the defendants into undistinguished destruction.

How few appear in those streets, which but some few hours ago were crowded, and those who appear, no longer now wear their daily mask, nor attempt to hide their lewdness or their misery

But who are this who make the streets their couch, or I folia sort repose from wretchedness a the doors of the opelent? These are strangers, wan levers, and orphans a rose e reumstances are too humble to expect redress, and their distres es too great even for pity Some are written the covering clen of rage, and o hers emperated with disease, the world seems to have disclaimed them, society turns is back upon their dures, and has given them up to unledness and har or. These pier shivering females have once seen hap, ar day onl been flattered in a beauty have been prosiduted to the gas luxurous villain, and are non-turned out to meet the sevents of winter in the sines. Perlaps now lying at the doors of their between, they say to we clies whose hearts are insin il 'e o enirmity or debauchees who may curse, be vella reliese il em

Why, why was I born a men, and yet see the sufferings of a reiches I canno relieve! Poor houseless erea ures! the year will give you reproaches, but will not give you renef. The sa, hies, ruisfortunes, the most image name unecouncies of the rich, are engricated with all the percer of cloqueries and engage our attention, while you veep unheaded, persecuted by every subor mate spece of tyrony and finding causity in every law.

Why was this heart of mine formed with so much sen illustration why was not my forture adapted to its impulsed. Ten lettle, without it expacitly of relieving only makes the heart that feels it more wire ched than the oly of which we for a stance.

But 'et no turn from a wene of such c'stree to the specified hypicine, vio has been talling of virtue till the turn of bell, and now scale out, to give a look to his sices under the protection of midnight—sices more a rosious, because he attemps to conceal them. See look he pan's down the dark ailes, and, with histoning sips, fears an acquaintance in every face. He has possed the whole day in company he hates, and now how to prolong the night among company that as heartily hate him. #### The Strolling Player

I am fond of amiscinent, in whatever company it is to be found, and wit, though dressed in rags, is ever pleasing to me. I cent some days ago to take a walk in St James's Parl, about the hour in which company leave it to go to dinner. There is ere but fels in the walks, and those is ho stayed seemed, by their looks, rather more is illing to forget that they had an appetite then gain one. I sat down on one of the benches, at the other end of which was seated a man in very shabby clorkes.

We continued to groan, to hem, and to cough, as a unal upon such occasions, and at last ventured upon conversation. 'I beg pardon, sir,' end I, 'but I think I have seen you before your face is familiar to me?—
'Yes, sir,' replied he, 'I have a good familiar face,-as my friends tell m. I am as vell known in every town in Ingland as the dromedary or live crocodile. You must inderstand, sir, that I have been these sixteen years Merr; Andrew to a puppet show, last Bartholomew Fair my master and I quarrelled, beat each other, and parted, he to sell lus puppets to the pincushion malers in Rosemar, Lane, and I to starve in St James's Parl'

'I am sorry, sir, that a person of your appearance should labour under any difficulties.' 'Oh, sir,' returned he, 'my appearance is very much at your service, but though I canno boast of eating much, yet there are few that are merricr if I had twenty thousand a year, I should be very merry, and, thanh the Fates, though not worth a groat, I am very merry still. If I have three pence in my poolet, I never refuse to be my three half pence, and if I have no money, I never seom to be treated by any that are I ind enough to pay my reel oning. What think you, sir, of a steak and a tankard? You shall treat me now, and I will treat you again, when I find you in the Park in love with eating, and without money to pay for a dinner'

As I never refuse a small expense for the sake of a merry companion, we instantly adjourned to a neigh bouring ale house, an I in a few moments had a frothing tankard and a smolving steak spread on the table before us. It is impossible to express how much the sight of such good cheer improved my companion's vivaeity. 'I like this dinner, sir,' says he, 'for three reasons first, because I am naturally fond of beef, secondly, because I am hingry, and, thirdly and lastly, because I get it for rothing no ment eats so sweet as that for v lineh we do not pay.'

He therefore no fell to, and his appetite seemed to corre pond with his inclination. After dinner was over, he observed that the steal was tough 'and yet, sir,' re urns he, 'bad as it was, it seemed a rump steak to me Oh, the delights of poverty and a good appetite! We Lengars are he very fondlings of Nature, the rich she treats like an arrant stepmother, they are pleased with nothing cut a steal from what part you will, and it is insurportably tough, dress it up with pielles, and even pickles cannot procure them an appetite. But the whole creation is filled with good things for the beggar, Calvert's lutt out tastes Champagne, and Sedgeley's home breved excels Tol ay Joy, joy, my blood ! though our estates lie not here, we have fortunes a herever we go. If an inundation sweeps away half the grounds of Cornwall, I am content-1 have no lands there, if the stocks sink, that gives me no unersiness-I am no Jew ' The fellows vivacity, joined to his poverty, I own, rused my curiosity to know something of his life and circumstances, and I entreated that he would indulge my desire 'That I will, sir,' said he, 'and welcome, only let us drank to prevent our sleeping let us have another tanlard while ve are awake-let us have another tanlard, for, ah, how charming a tanlard looks when full ' (From the Essays, 1766-2nd ed )

Beau Tibbs at Vauxhall

The people of London are as fond of walking as our friends at Pel in of riding, one of the principal enter tainments of the citizens here in summer is to repair about nightfall to a garden not far from town, where they wall about, show their best clothes and best faces, and listen to a concert provided for the occasion

I accepted an invitation a few evenings ago from my old friend, the Man in Black, to be one of a party that vas to sup there, and at the appointed hour waited upon him at his lodgings. There I found the company assembled, and expecting my arrival. Our party consisted of my friend, in superlative finery, his stockings rolled, a black velvet waisteoat, which was formerly new, and a gray wig combed down in imitation of hair, a pawnbroker's widow, of whom, by the by, my friend was a professed admirer, dressed ont in green damask, with three gold rings on every finger. Mr Tibbs, the second rate beau I have formerly described, together with his lady, in flimsy silk, dirty gauze instead of hinen, and an hat as big as an umbrella.

Our first difficulty was in settling how we should set out. Mrs Tibbs had a natural aversion to the water, and the widow, being a little in flesh, as warmly protested against walling, a coach was therefore agreed upon, which being too small to carry five, Mr Tibbs consented to sit in his wife a lap

In this manner, therefore, we set forward, being entertained by the way with the bodings of Mr Tibbs, who assured us he did not expect to see a single creature for the evening above the degree of a cheesemonger, that this was the last night of the gardens, and that consequently we should be pestered with the nobility and gentry from Thames Street and Crooked Lane, with several other prophetic ejaculations, probably in spired by the unersiness of his situation

The illuminations began before we arrived, and I must confess, that upon entering the gardens I found every sense overpaid with more than expected pleasure the lights everywhere glimmering through the scarcely moving trees-the full bodied concert bursting on the stillness of the night—the natural concert of the birds, in the more retired part of the grove, vying with that which was formed by art - the company guly dressed, looking satisfaction—and the tables spread with various delicacies -all conspired to fill my imagination with the visionary happiness of the Arabian laugiver, and lifted me into an ecstasy of admiration. 'Head of Confucius,' cried I to my friend, 'this is fine this unites rural beauty with courtly magnificence, if we except the virgins of im mortality, that hang on every tree, and may be plucked at every desire, I do not see how this falls short of Mahomet's l'aradise !'- 'As for virgins,' cries my friend, it is true they are a fruit that do not much abound in our gardens here, but if ladies, as plenty as apples in antumn, and as complying as any Hours of them all, can content you, I fancy we have no need to go to heaven for Paradise 1

I was going to second his remarks, when we were called to a consultation by Mr Tibbs and the rest of the company, to know in what manner we were to lay out the evening to the greatest advantage. Mrs Tibbs was for keeping the genteel walk of the garden, where, she ob creed, there was always the very best company, the undow, on the contrary, who came but once a season, was for securing a good standing place to see the water worls, which she assured us would begin in less than an hour at farthest a dispute therefore began, and as it was managed between two of very opposite characters, it threatened to grow more bitter at every reply Tibbs wondered how people could pretend to know the polite world, who had received all their rudiments of breeding behind a counter to which the other replied, that though some people sat behind counters, yet they could sit it the head of their own tables too, and carve three good dishes of hot ment whenever they thought proper, which was more than some people could say for themselves, that hardly knew a rabbit and onions from a green goose and gooseberries.

It is hard to say where this might have ended, had not the husband, who probably knew the impetuosity of his wife's disposition, proposed to end the dispute by adjourning to a box, and try if there was anything to be had for supper that was supportable To this we all consented, but here a new distress arose. Mr and Mrs Tibbs would sit in none but a genteel box—a box where they might see and be seen-one, as they expressed it, in the very focus of public view, but such a box was not easy to be obtained, for though we were perfectly convinced of our own gentility, and the gentility of our appearance, yet we found it a difficult matter to persuade the keepers of the boxes to be of our opinion, they chose to reserve genteel boxes for what they judged more genteel company

At last, however, we were fixed, though somewhat obscurely, and supplied with the usual entertainment of the place. The widow found the supper excellent, but Mrs Tibbs thought everything detestable. 'Come, come, my dear,' cries the husband, by way of con solation, 'to be sure we can't find such dressing here as we have at Lord Crump's or Lady Crimp's, but, for Vauxhall dressing, it is pretty good it is not their victuals, indeed, I find fault with, but their wine, their wine,' cries he, drinking off a glass, 'indeed, is most abominable'

By this last contradiction the widow was fairly con quered in point of politeness. She perceived now that she had no pretensions in the world to taste, her very senses were vulgar, since she had praised detestable custard, and smacked at wretched wine, she was there fore content to yield the victory, and for the rest of the night to listen and improve. It is true, she would now and then forget herself, and confess she was pleased, but they soon brought her back again to miserable rcfinement She once praised the painting of the box in which we were sitting, but was soon convinced that such paltry pieces ought rather to excite horror than satisfaction slie ventured again to commend one of the singers, but Mrs Libbs soon let her know, in the style of a connoissenr, that the singer in question had neither ear, voice, nor judgment

Mr Tibbs, now willing to prove that his wife's pretensions to music were just, entreated her to favour the company with a song, but to this she gave a positive denial-'for you know very well, my dear,' says she, 'that I am not in voice to day, and when one's voice is not equal to one's judgment, what signifies singing? besides, as there is no accompaniment, it would be but spoiling music.' All these excuses, however, were over ruled by the rest of the company, who, though one would think they already had music enough, joined in But particularly the widow, now willing the entreaty to convince the company of her breeding, pressed so warmly, that she seemed determined to take no refusal At last, then, the lady complied, and after humming for some minutes, began with such a voice, and such affectation, as, I could perceive, gave but little satisfae tion to any except her husband He sat with rapture in his eye, and beat time with his hand on the table

You must observe, my friend, that it is the custom of this country, when a lady or gentleman happens to sing, for the company to sit as mute and motionless as statues. Every feature, every limb, must seem to correspond in fixed attention, and while the song continues, they are to rumain in a state of universal petrifaction. In this mortifying situation we bid continued for some time. listening to the song, and looking with tranquillity, when the master of the box came to inform us that the water works were going to begin At this information I could instantly perceive the widow bounce from her seat, but correcting herself, she sat down again, repressed in motives of good breeding. Mrs Tibbs, who had seen the water works an hundred times, resolving not to be interrupted, continued her song without any share of mercy, nor bad the smallest pity on our impatience The widow's face, I own, gave me high entertainment, in it I could plainly read the struggle she felt between good breeding and curiosity she talked of the water works the whole evening before, and seemed to have come merely in order to see them, but then she could not bonnee ont in the very middle of a song, for that would be forfeiting all pretensions to high life, or high lived company, ever after Mrs Tibbs, therefore, kept on singing, and we continued to listen, till at last, when the song was just concluded, the waiter came to inform us that the water works were over

'The water works over 1' cried the widow, 'the water works over already! that's impossible! they can't be over so soon!'—'It is not my business,' replied the fellow, 'to contradict your ladyship, I'll run again and see.' He went, and soon returned with a confirmation of the dismal tidings. No ceremony could now bind my friends disappointed mistress. She testified her displeasure in the openest manner, in short, she now began to find fault in turn, and at last insisted upon going home, just at the time that Mr and Mrs Tibbs assured the company that the polite hours were going to begin, and that the ladies would instantaneously be entertained with the horis.—Adicu.

From 'The Vicar of Wakefield.'

The place of our retreat was in a little neighbourhood, consisting of farmers, who tilled their own grounds, and were equal strangers to opulence and poverty. As they had almost all the conveniencies of life within them selves, they seldom visited towns or cities in search of superfluity Remote from the polite, they still retained the primeval simplicity of manners, and, frugal by habit, they scarce knew that temperance was a virtue. They wrought with cheerfulness on days of labour, but observed festivals as intervals of idleness and pleasure They kept up the Christmas carol, sent true love knots on Valentine morning, ate pancakes on Shrovetide, showed their wit on the first of April, and religiously cracked nuts on Michaelmas eve. Being apprised of our approach, the whole neighbourhood came ont to meet their minister, dressed in their finest clothes, and preceded by a pipe and tabor. A feast also was provided for our reception, at which we sat cheerfully down, and what the conversation wanted in wit was made up in langhter

Our little habitation was situated at the foot of a sloping hill, sheltered with a beautiful underwood behind, and a prattling river before, on one side a meadow, on the other a green. My farm consisted of about twenty acres of excellent land, having given an hundred pounds for my predecessor's good will. Nothing could exceed the neatness of my little enclosures, the elms and hedgerows appearing with inexpressible beauty. My house consisted of but one story, and was covered with thatch, which gave it an air of great snuguess, the walls, on the inside, were nicely whitewashed, and my daughters undertook to adorn them with pictures of their own designing. Though the same room served us for parlour and kitchen, that only made it the warmer. Besides, as it was kept with the nimost neatness, the dishes, plates, and coppers being well sconred, and all disposed in bright rows on the shelves, the eye was agreeably relieved, and did not want richer furniture. There were three other apartments, one for my wife and me, another for our two daughters within our own, and the third, with two beds, for the rest of the children.

The little republic to which I gave laws was regulated in the following manner. By snnrise we all assembled in our common apartment, the fire being previously kindled by the servant. After we had saluted each other with proper ceremony-for I always thought fit to keep up some mechanical forms of good breeding, without which freedom ever destroys friendship—we all bent in gratitude to that Being who gave us another day duty being performed, my son and I went to pursue our usual industry abroad, while my wife and daughters employed themselves in providing breakfast, which was always ready at a certain time. I allowed half an hour for this meal, and an hour for dinner, which time was taken np in innocent mirth between my wife and daughters, and in philosophical arguments between my son and me

As we rose with the sun, so we never pursued our labours after it was gone down, but returned home to the expecting family, where smiling looks, a neat hearth, and pleasant fire, were prepared for our reception were we without guests sometimes farmer Flamborough. our talkative neighbour, and often the blind piper, would pay us a visit, and taste our gooseberry wine, for the making of which we had lost neither the receipt nor the These harmless people had several ways of being good company, while one played, the other would sing some sootling ballad,-Johnny Armstrong's Last Good Night, or the Cruelty of Barbara Allen. night was concluded in the manner we began the morning, my youngest boys being appointed to read the lessons of the day, and he that read loudest, distinctest, and best, was to have a halfpenny on Sunday to put into the poor's box

When Sunday came, it was indeed a day of finery, which all my sumptuary edicts could not restrain. How well soever I fancied my lectures against pride had conquered the vanity of my daughters, yet I still found them secretly attached to all their former finery they still loved laces, ribands, bugles, and catgut, my wife herself retained a passion for her crimson paduasoy, because I formerly happened to say it became her

The first Sunday, in particular, their behaviour served to mortify me I had desired my girls the preceding night to be dressed early the next day, for I always loved to be at chirch a good while before the rest of the congregation. They punctually obeyed my directions, but when we were to assemble in the morning at breal fast, down came my wife and daughters, dressed out in all their former splendour, their hair plastered up with pomatum, their faces patched to taste, their trains bundled up into a heap behind, and rustling at every motion. I could not help smiling at their vanity, par ticularly that of my wife, from whom I expected more

In this exigence, therefore, my only resource was to order my son, with an important air, to call our The girls were amazed at the command, but I repeated it with more solemnity than before "Surch, my dear, you jest,' cried my wife, 'we can walk it perfectly well we want no corch to carry us now '-You mistake, child, returned I, 'we do want a coach, for if we walk to church in this trim, the very children in the parish will hoot after us - 'Indeed,' replied nix wife, 'I always unagined that my Charles was fond of seeing his children next and handsome about him !-'You may be as neat a you please' interrupted I, 'and I shall love you the better for it, but all this is not neatness but frippery These rufflings, and pullings, and patchings will only male us hated by all the wives of our neighbours. No my children, continued I, more gravely, those gowns may be altered into something of a planer cut, for finery is very unbecoming in 114, who want the means of decency. I do not I now whether such flounging and shredding is becoming even in the rich, if we consider upon a moderate calculation, that the nakedness of the indigent world may be clothed from the trimming of the vain."

This remonstrance had the proper effect, they went vith great composure that very instant, to change their dress, and the next day I had the attisfaction of inding my daughters, at their own reque t, employed in outring up their trains into Sunday waistcoats for Dick and Bill, the two little ones and, what was still more satisfactory, the gowns seemed improved by this curtailing

Dedication of 'The Deserted Village' to Sir Joshua Reynolds

Dear Sir,—I can have no expectation in an address of this land culier to add to voir reputation or to establish my own. You can gain nothing from my admiration, as I am ignorant of that art in which you are said to excel, and I may lose much by the severity of your judgment, as few have a juster taste in poetry than you. Setting interest therefore aside, to which I never paid much attention, I must be indulged at present in following my affections. The only dedication I ever made was to my brother, because I loved him better than most other men. He is since dead. Permit me to inscribe this poem to you

How far you may be pleased with the versification and mere incehanical parts of this attempt, I don't pretend to enquire, but I know you will object (and indeed several of our best and wisest friends concur in the opinion) that the depopulation it deplores is no where to be seen and the disorders it laments are only to be found in the poets' own imagination. To this I can scarcely make any other answer than that I sincerely believe what I have written, that I have taken all possible pains, in my country excursions, for these four or five years past, to be certain of what I allege, and that all invitews and enquiries have led me to believe tho e inferies real, which I here attempt to display. But this is not the place to enter into an enquiry whether the country be depopulating, or not, the discussion would take up much room, and I should prove myself, at best, an indifferent politician, to the the reader with a long preface, when I want his unfatigued attention to a long

For twenty or that's years past, it has been the fashion to consider laxing as one of the preate to national adventages, and all the wisdom of antiquits, in that particular, as erroncous. Still, however, I must remain a professed ancient on that head, and continue to bink those laxings prejudicial to states, by which in many views are introduced, and in many kingdoms have been undone. Indeed so much has been pointed out of late on the other side of the que tion, that, marels for the rake of novelty and variety, one call in cause wish to be in the right —I am dear Sir, ye is sincere I need and ardent Admiter.

AUSTIN DOBSON

Thom is Permant (1726-98), of good Welsh family, studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and ere he left the university had begun his many tours which began with rambles in Lingland and the Principality, but extended into Ireland (1754), the Continent (1765), and Scotland (1769 and 1772), then, he says, falmost as unknown as kamehuka? FRS and DCL, he published important books on British zoology, British quadrupeds, Arctic zoology, and on the history of London But he is chiefly remembered for his Tours in Scotland (3 vols 1771-75) and Wales (2 vols 1778-81) The former extorted from Johnson the admission, 'He's a Whig, sir, a sad dog, but he's the best triveller I ever read, he observes more things than any one else does. His observations and statements are not always perfectly accurate, and his reflections may not be very profound, but the popularity of his works stimulated others to follow his example, and had the effect of greatly promoting general interest in his favourite studies

Charles Churchill was held to have revealed a second Dryden when in 1761 he published his saturical poem, the Rosciad, of which Garrick is the principal hero-or victini The impression was maintained by his reply to the critical reviewers, and his Epistle to Hogarth, The Prophecy of Famine, Night, and passages in his other poemsall thrown off in haste to serve the purpose of the day-showed unusual vigour and facility of versification, and a boldness (and broadness) of personal invective that drew instant attention to their Even Cowper, from early predilections, thought highly of Churchill, and pronounced him 'indeed a poet' Now it is voted enough if he is treated as little more than a special pleader or pamphleteer in verse. He never touches the heart, save in some few lines of penitential fervour, he never soared to the realms of imagination, and with the beauties of external nature he had not He died before he had the slightest sympathy well attained the prime of life, yet there is no youthful enthusiasm about his works, nor any indication that he sought a higher fame than that of being the terror of actors and artists, an eccentric amongst libertines, and a devoted slave to Wilkes The 'fatal facility' of his verse, and his clever, witty, unscrupulous satire of living individuals and passing events, made all London 'ring from side to side' with applause when real poetry could hardly find publishers or readers

Hardly any notable English author save Kit Marlowe was more unhappy in his life and end than Charles Churchill He was the son of a clergyman in Westminster, where he was born in In 1748, while still a schoolboy February 1731 at Westminster, he made a Flect marriage with a young Westminster lady, this debarred him from Oxford or Cambridge, and he was assisted by his father, till he was ordained and settled in the Essex curacy of Rainham His father died in 1758, and the poet was appointed his successor in the curacy and lectureship of St John's at West-This promotion only proved the bane of minster poor Churchill He was in his twenty-seventh year, and his conduct had been irreproachable, but he now renewed his intimacy with Lloyd and other school companions, and launched into a career of dissipation and extrivagance. His poetry secured notoriety, and he not only disregarded his lectureship, but Inid aside the clerical garb, and appeared in the extreme of fishion, with blue cort, gold-laced hat, and ruffles The Dean of Westminster remonstrated, and his parishioners protested, but Churchill merely ridiculed this prudery, and Lloyd made an epigram of it

To Churchill, the bard, ones the Westminster dean, Leather breeches, white stockings I pray what do you mean? 'Tis shameful, irreverent—you must keep to church rules If wise ones, I will, and if no, they 're for fools If reason don't bind me, I 'll shake off all fetters, To be black and all black, I shall leave to my betters Yet dean and congregation were seen in the long-run to be too powerful, and Churchill found it necessary to resign the lectureship in 1763, having two years earlier separated from his wife. His ready pen still three off at will his popular satires, and he plunged into the grossest excesses. These he actually essayed to justify in a poetical epistle to Lloyd on Night, revenging himself on prudence and the world by railing at them in good set terms 'This vindication proceeded,' says his biographer, 'on the exploded doctrine that the barefaced avowal of vice is less culpable than the practice of it under a hypocritical assumption of virtue'. The poet's irregulantics affected his literary faculty, and his poem of The Ghost proved both incoherent and tiresome His acquaintance with Wilkes was a curse to him, for Wilkes was not more conspicuous for public factiousness than for personal debauchers Churchill assisted his new associate in the Aerth Briton, and pocketed the profits from its sale. Hence lie was included with Wilkes in the list of those whom the messengers had verbal instructions to apprehend under the general warrant (see page 516), and he escaped apprehension through Wilkes's presence of mind Churchill entered the room where Wilkes was already in custody of the messenger 'Good-morning, Mr Thomson,' said Wilkes to him 'How does Mrs Thomson do? Does she dine in the country? Churchill took the hint as readily as it had been given, Mrs Thomson was waiting for him, and he came only, he said, for a moment, to ask him how he did. And taking leave, he hastened home, secured his papers, retired into the country, and cluded all Churchill now set about his satire, the Prophecy of Famme, which, like Wilkes's North Briton, was specially directed against the Scottish The outlawry of Wilkes separated the friends, but they kept up a correspondence, and Churchill continued to be a keen political satirist. The excesses of his daily life remained equally notorious, and he cherished a discreditable alliance with the daughter of a Westminster tradesman Hogarth, who disapproved of Churchill as a friend of Wilkes, caricatured the satirist as a bear dressed canonically, with ruffles at his paws, and holding a pot of porter Churchill took revenge in a fierce and sweeping 'epistle' to Hogarth, which is said to have caused him exquisite annoyance The unhappy saturist's career drew to a sad and premature close In October 1764 lie went to France to pay a visit to his friend Wilkes, and was seized at Boulogne with a fever, of which he died next month, and the exclergy man's will, made the day before his death, contains, contrary to the then usual formula, not the slightest expression of religious faith or hope. He was buried at Dover, and some of his gav associates placed over his grave a stone, on which was engraved his own line

Life to the last enjoyed, here Churchill lies.

A worther tribute was given fifty years afterwards by Byron in his lines on 'the grave of him who blazed the comet of a season' Churchill expressed contrition for misconduct in verses that evidently came from the heart

Look back! a thought which borders on despair, Which human nature must, yet cannot bear 'Tis not the habbling of a busy world, Where praise and censure are at random hurled, Which can the meanest of my thoughts control, Or shake one settled purpose of my soul, Free and at large might their wild curses roam, If all, if all, alas I were well at home No, 'tis the tale which angry conscience tells, When she with more than tragic horror swells Each circumstance of guilt, when, stern but true, She brings bad actions forth into review, And, like the dread handwriting on the wall, Bids late remorse awake at reason's call, Armed at all points, bids scorpion vengeance pass. And to the mind holds up reflection's glass-The mind which starting heaves the heartfelt groan. And hates that form she knows to be her own

(From The Conference)

In Night, Churchill thus ingeniously descanted on the proverbial privileges of poets

What is 't to us if taxes rise or fall?

Thanks to our fortune, we pay none at all
Let mnekworms, who in dirty acres deal,
Lament those hardships which we cannot feel
His Grace, who smarts, may bellow if he please,
But must I bellow too, who sit at ease?
By custom safe, the poet's numbers flow
Free as the light and air some years ago

No statesman e'er wall find it worth his puns To tax our labours and excise our brains Burdens like these, vile earthly buildings bear, No tribute's laid on castles in the air!

No English poet, Southey said, ever enjoyed so excessive and so short lived a popularity as Churchill, 'indeed no one seems more thoroughly to have understood his own powers, there is no indication in any of his pieces that he could have done anything better than the thing he did. To Wilkes he said that nothing came out till he began to be pleased with it himself, but to the public, as in these lines from Gotham, he boasted of the haste and carelessness with which his verses were poured forth'

IIad I the power, I could not have the time, While spirits flow, and life is in her prime, Without a sin 'grinst pleasure, to design A plan, to methodise each thought, each line, Highly to finish, and make every grace. In itself charming, take new charms from place. Nothing of books, and little known of men, When the mad fit comes on, I seize the pen, Rough as they run, the rapid thoughts set down, Rough as they run, discharge them on the town

Churchill lacked the chief essentials of true satire, a real insight into the heart of man and that rarest power of happy evaggeration, of preserving likeness in unlikeness and verisimilitude in distortion. A fatal volubility in rhyming, a kind of boisterous but unequal energy, and an instinctive hatred of wrong, often hardly to be distinguished from the mere spleen and obstinacy, combined to make him the hero of the hour and its ephemeral interests, but was not equipment enough for a Dryden, or even a Butler

The most amusing and, on the whole, the best of Churchill's satires is his Prophecy of Famine, professedly a Scots pastoral inscribed to Wilkes The Earl of Bute's administration had directed the enmity of all disappointed patriots and partisans against the Scottish nation. Even Johnson and Junius were not above giving this complexion to their prejudice, and Churchill revelled in it with such undisguised exaggeration that the most saturnine or sensitive of Scotsmen might have laughed at its extravagant absurdity. This unique pastoral opens as follows.

A Scots Pastoral.

Two boys whose birth, beyond all question, springs From great and glorious though forgotten kings, Shepherds of Scottish lineage, born and bred On the same bleak and barren mountain's head, By niggard nature doomed on the same rocks To spin ont life, and starve themselves and flocks, Fresh as the morning, which, enrobed in mist, The mountain's top with usual dullness kissed, Jockey and Sawney to their labours rose, Soon clad, I ween, where nature needs no clothes, Where from their youth inured to winter skies, Dress and her vain refinements they despise.

Jockey, whose manly high cliect bones to crown, With freckles spotted flamed the golden down, With merkle art could on the bagpipes play, Even from the rising to the setting day, Sawney as long without remorse could bawl Home's madrigals, and ditties from Fingal Oft at his strains, all natural though rude, The Highland lass forgot her want of food, And, whilst she scratched her lover into rest, Sunk, pleased though hungry, on her Sawney's breast

Far as the eye could reach no tree was seen, Earth, clad in russet, scorned the lively green The plague of locusts they secure defy, For in three honrs a grasshopper must die No living thing whate'er its food, feasts there, But the chameleon, who can feast on air No birds, except as birds of passage, flen, No bee was known to hum, no dove to coo No streams, as amber smooth, as amber clear, Were seen to glide, or heard to warble here Rebellion's spring, which through the country ran, Furnished with bitter draughts the steady clan No flowers embalmed the air, but one white rose, Which on the tenth of June by instinct blows. By instinct blows at morn, and, when the shades Of drizzly eve prevail, by instinct fades.

The tenth of June was the birthday of the old Chevalier In the same poem Churchill comments on himself

Me, whom no muse of heavenly birth inspires, No judgment tempers, when rash genius fires, Who boast no ment but mere knack of rhyme, Short gleams of sense and satire out of time, Who cannot follow where trim fancy leads By prattling streams, o'er flower empurpled meads Who often, but without success, have prayed For apt alliteration's artful aid, Who would, but cannot with a master's skill Coin fine new epithets which mean no ill Me thus uncouth, thus every way unfit For pacing poesy and ambling wit, Taste with contempt beholds, nor deigns to place Amongst the lowest of her favoured race.

Smollett, who, as the satirist believed, had attacked him in the Critical Review, was treated with ironical compliment in The Apology addressed to the Critical Reviewers

Smollett.

Whence could arise this mighty critic spleen, The muse a trifler, and her theme so mean? What had I done that angry heaven should send The bitterest foe where most I wished a friend? Oft hath my tongue been wanton at thy name, And hailed the honours of thy matchless fame For me let hoary Fielding bite the ground So nobler Pickle stand superbly bound, From Livy's temples tear the historic crown, Which thith more justice blooms upon thine own Compared with thee, be all life vinters dumb, But he who wrote the life of Tommy Thumb Who ever read the Regicide but swore The author wrote as man ne'er wrote before? Others for plots and under plots may call, Here's the right method-have no plot at all! 84

On Hogarth.

Hogarth-I take thee, Candour, at thy word, Accept thy proffered terms, and will be heard. Thee have I heard with virulence declaim. Nothing retained of Candour but the name, By thee have I been charged in augry strains With that mean falsehood which my soul disdains Hogarth ' stand forth.—Nay, hang not thus aloof Now, Candour, now thou shalt receive such proof. Such damning proof, that henceforth thou shalt fear To tax my wrath, and own my conduct clear Hogarth! stand forth-I dare thee to be tried In that great court where Conscience must preside, At that most solemn bar hold up thy hand, Think before whom, on what account, you stand, Speak, but consider well from first to last Review thy life, weigh every action past Nay, you shall have no reason to complain Take longer time, and view them o'er again Canst thou remember from thy earliest youth-And, as thy God must indge thee, speak the truth-A single instance where, self laid aside, And justice taking place of fear and pride, Thou with an equal eye didst genius view, And give to ment what was ment s due? Genius and ment are a sure offence, And thy soul sickens at the name of sense. Is any one so foolish to succeed? On Envy's altar he is doomed to bleed Hogarth, a guilty pleasure in his eyes, The place of executioner supplies, See how he gloats, enjoys the sacred feast, And proves himself by crucity a priest In valks of humour, in that cast of style, Which, probing to the quick, yet makes us smile, In comedy, his natural road to fame, Nor let me call it by a meaner name, Where a beginning, middle, and an end Are aptly joined, where parts on parts depend, Each made for each, as bodies for their soul So as to form one true and perfect whole, Where a plain story to the eye is told, Which we conceive the moment we behold, Hogarth unrivalled stands, and shall engage Unrivalled praise to the most distant age

In The Farewell Churchill has-

Be England what she will,
With all her faults, she is my country still, which Cowper's Task improved into the form more familiar (as quoted in Beppo)

England, with all thy faults I love thee still—My country!

Churchill, unconsciously repeating Spenser, writes of 'a bold, bad man,' 'He mouths a sentence as a dog a bone' is in the Rosciad, and 'A heart to pity and a hand to bless' is from the Prophecy of Famine, and it is Gotham which describes

William Falconer (1732-69) was born in Edinburgh, the son of a poor burber, whose two other children were both of them de if and dumb. He went early to sea on board a Leith merchantship, and was afterwards servant to a pur er in the navy. Before he was eighteen he was second in ite in the Dritai ma, a vessel in the Levant trade, shipwrecked off Cape Colonna, with the loss of all the crew but three, and this Palconer made the subject of his popular poem. In 1751 he was hving in Edinburgh, where he published his first poetical attempt, a monody on the death of Prederick Prince of Wales, wishing, with a real worthy of ancient Pistol,

To as 1st the pouring rains with I rimful eves, And aid hourse howling Boreas vith In scolis?

In 1762 appeared the enumently successful Slip wieck, dedicated to the Duke of York, who procured the sulor poet's appointment as midshipm in son the Rojal George, whence he was transferred to be purser in the Glory, a frigate of thirty two guns setting in London at the peace he viole a poor satire on Willes, Churchill, and others, and compiled a useful natical dictionary. In October 1769 he sailed from England is purser of the Juroral frigate, bound for India. The vessel reached the Cape of Good Hope early in December, but foundered soon after, as is supposed, in the Mozambique Channel.

Three editions of the Sliperick's are published during the authors life, the second (1764) had a about nine hundred near lines added the third, issued the very day before he embarked on his , fital vovage, had about two hundred additional lines, with various afterations and ranspositions, by no means all improvements—some of the best passages were spoilt and parts of the narrative i Hence Mr Stamer Clark on a splendid confused illustrated edition of the poem (1804), restored many of the discarded lines, and presented a text compounded of the three different editions This version of the paem is that now generally printed, but the Edinburgh edition of 1858 follows more closely Fulconer's latest edition. Clarke conjectured-and other editors copied his preposterous error—that Falconer, overjoved at his appointment to the Aurora, and busy preparing for his voyage. had entrusted to his friend David Mallet the re vision of the poem, and that Mallet lind corrupted the text Now, Mallet had at this time been dead for four years, and Falconer, in the advertisement prefig. to the work, expressly states that he had high me pi bjected it to a strict and thorough re what infortunately, as in Akenside's case, his sud Ahanlis not commensurate with his labour

The Shiprored has the rare ment of being both true to fact and poetical, even its rules and directions are approved of by seamen. At first the poet did little more than describe in nautical phrase and simple narrative the disaster he had witnessed, the characters of Albert, Rodmond, Palemon, and

On the Shores of Greece.

The natives, while the ship departs their land, Ashore with admiration gazing stand Majestically slow, before the breeze, She moved triumphant o er the yielding seas, Her bottom through translucent water shone, White as the clouds beneath the blaze of noon, The bending wales their contrast next displayed, sheath All fore and aft in polished jet arrayed. Britannia, riding awful on the prow, Gazed o'er the vassal-wave that rolled below Where'er she moved, the vassal waves were seen To yield obsequious, and confess their queen. High o'er the poop, the flattering winds unfirled The imperial flag that rules the watery world Deep blushing armours all the tops invest, And warlike trophies either quarter drest Then towered the masts, the canvas swelled on high. And waving streamers floated in the sla Thus the rich vessel moves in trim array, Lil e some fair virgin on her bridal-day Thus like a swan she cleaves the watery plain, The pride and "onder of the Agean main !

The Storm and Wreck off Cape Colonna.

But nov Athenian mountains they descry, And o'er the surge Colonna frowns on high. Where marble columns, long by time defaced, Moss-covered on the lofty Cape are placed, There reared by fair devotion to sustain, In elder times, Tritonia's sacred fane. The circling beach in murgerous form appears, Decisive goal of all their hopes and fears. The seamen now in wild amazement see The scene of ruin rise benea h their lee, Swift from their minds elapsed all dangers past, As dnmb with terror they behold the last And now, while winged with ruin from on high, Through the rent cloud the ragged lightnings fly, A flash quick glancing on the nerves of light, Struck the pale helmsman with eternal night Rodmond, who heard a piteous groan behind, Tonched with compassion, gazed upon the blind, And while around his sad companions crowd, He guides the nnhappy victim to the shroud 'Hie thee aloft, my gallant friend,' he cries, 'Thy only succour on the most relies' The helm, bereft of half its vital force, Now scarce subdied the wild unbridled course. Quick to the abandoned wheel Arion came, The ship's tempestuous sallies to reclaim. The vessel, while the dread event draws nigh, Seems more impatient o'er the waves to fly Fate spurs her on. Thus, issuing from afar, Advances to the sun some blazing star, And, as it feels the attraction's lindling force, Springs onward with accelerated course The moment fraught with fate approaches fast ! While thronging sailors climb each quivering mast The ship no longer now must stem the land, And 'Hard a starboard '' is the last command; While every suppliant voice to Heaven applies, The prow, swift wheeling, to the westward flies, Twelve sailors, on the foremast who depend, High on the platform of the top ascend Fatal retreat I for while the plunging prow Immerges headlong in the wave below, Down pressed by watery weight the bowsprit bends, And from above the stem deep crashing rends Beneath her bow the floating ruins lie, The foremast totters, unsustained on high,

And now the ship, fore lifted by the sea,
Hurls the tall fabrie backward o'er her lee,
While, in the general wreck, the faithful stay
Drags the maintop mast by the cap away
Fling from the mast, the seamen strive in vain
Through hostile floods their vessel to regain.
Weal hope, alas! they buffet long the wave,
And grasp at life though sinking in the grave,
Till all exhausted, and bereft of strength,
O'erpowered, they yield to cruel fate at length.
The hostile waters close around their head,
They sink! for ever numbered with the dead!

Those who remain the weather shrouds embrace. Nor longer mourn their lost companions' case. Transfixed with terror at the approaching doom, Self pity in their breasts alone has room Albert and Rodmond and Palemon near, With young Arion on the mast appear. Even they, amid the unspeakable distress, In every look distracting thoughts confess, In every vein the refluent blood congeals, And every bo-om mortal terror feels Begirt with all the horrors of the main, They viewed the adjacent shore, but viewed in vain. It comes I the dire catastrophe dray's near, Lashed furious on by destiny severe The ship hangs hovering on the verge of death, Hell yawns, rocks rise, and breakers roar beneath! O jet confirm my heart, ye powers above, This last tremendous shock of fate to prove! The tottering frame of reason yet sustain! Nor let this total havoe whirl my brain! Since I, all trembling in extreme distress, Must still the hornble result express.

In vain, alas! the sacred shades of yore Would arm the mind with philosophie lore. In vain they'd teach us at the latest breath. To smile serene amid the pangs of death. Immortal Zeno's self would trembling see. Inexorable fate beneath the lee, And Epictetus at the sight in vain. Attempt his stoic firmness to retain, Had Socrates, for godlike virtue famed, And wisest of the sons of men proclaimed, Spectator of such various horrors been, L'en he had staggered at this dreadful scene.

In vain the cords and axes were prepared, For every wave now smites the quivering yard, High o'er the ship the, throw a dreadful shade, Then on her burst in terrible cascade, Across the foundered deck o'erwhelming roar, And foaming, swelling, bound upon the shore Swift up the mountain billow now she flies, Her shattered top half buried in the skies, Borne o'er a latent reef the hull impends Then thundering on the marble crags descends, Her ponderous bulk the dire concussion feels, And o'er upheaving surges wounded reels-Again she plnnges! hark! a second shock Bilges the splitting vessel on the rock— Down on the vale of death, with dismal cries, The fated victims shiddering east their eyes In wild despair, while yet another stroke With strong convulsion rends the solid oak, Ah Heaven !- behold her crashing ribs divide! She loosens, parts, and spreads in ruin o'er the tide.

Ossian.

The 'translator' of Ossian still stands in a dan and dubious light, as indeed he seems to have been willing to do in the eyes of his contem poranes, about the primeral Celtic bard linnself there is perhaps less matter of debate and taste have abated the pleasure with which the 'poems of Ossi in' once were read, but effusions which were in their own time quite unique and engrossed so much attention, which were truns lated into many different languages, which were haded with enthusiasm by Gray, David Hume, John Home, and other almost equally emment persons, and which, in an imperfect Italian trans lation, formed the favourite reading of \( \) ipoleon, demand careful study from students of literature The Ossianic poems must rink as a monument of the romantic movement in Furopean literature, and seem to have given it a not inconsiderable impulse. They delighted Herder, influenced Goethe and Schiller, and were mutated by Coleralge and Byron, though Wordsworth poured contempt on them. For most men they are associated with the name of James Macpherson, who claimed only to have presented them in an I nglish form

James Macpherson (1776-96) and born at Ruthven, near Kingussic in inverness shire. A small farmer's son, he was brought up a 'bare foot laddie,' but, fully resolved to become a minister, studied at both Aberdeen and Edin burgh in 1753-56. In 1758 he published a heroic poem in six cintos, The Highlander, which at once proved his ambition and his incompetence I or a short time the divinity student taught the school of Ruthven, whence he was glad to remove to become tutor in a wealthy family While attending his pupil (afterwards Lord Lynedoch) at the spa of Moffit, he became acquainted, in the autumn of 1759, with John Home, the author of Douglas, to whom he showed what he said were translations of fraginents of ancient Gaelic poetry still recited in the Highlands It was, he declared, still one of the favourite amusements of his countrymen to listen to the tales and compositions of their ancient bards, and he described these fragments as full of pathos and poetical power. Under the patronage of Home's friends-Hugh Blair, 'Jupiter' Carlyle, and Adam Ferguson-Macpherson published next year a small volume of sixty pages, entitled Fragments of Ancient Poetry, translated from the Galie or Lise Language The publication attracted general attention, and subscription was made to enable Macpherson to male a tour in the Highlands to collect other pieces His journey proved highly successful In 1761 he presented the world with Fingal, an epic poem, in six books, in 1763 Temora, another cpic, in eight books. The sale was immense, and the same of the work spread swiftly over the civil ised world. The assumption that, in the third or fourth century, among the vild remote mountains and islands of Scotland, there existed a prople exhibiting all the high and chivalious feelings of refined valour, generous, magnitumity, rd virtue, was enumently edeulated to exerte astonish ment, shile the idea of the poems being handed down by or il tradition through to many conturies mong rude, savi, e and barbarou, tribes was little less astounding. Many doubted others disbelieved but a still greater number findul, ed the pleasing supposition that I right fought and Ossian sang? It vir hinted that Macpherson's as not altogether ill pleased to be under the imputation of hising housed the British public, see he thus acquired the higher credit is a great organal At all events he realised Lizno by his enterprise, and in 1764 arcompanied Governor Johnston to Per acola as his secretar quarrelling with his patron, he returned in 1766, and fixed his residence in London. became one of the literary supporters of the administration, published come his origit works, and was a popular pump'ileteer. In 1775 he published a translation of the 11 of in the same style of poetical prose as Ossim which merch proved a source of rideale and opprobnim to the translator. But a pamphlet of his in defence of the tastion of America, and another on the Opposition in Parliament in 1770, were much applicated and he are noted to combit the Let ers of Junius, writing under the signitures of 'Mushis,' 'Se vols,' &c Appointed agent for the Nubob of Areo in 1770 he next year obtinied a sent in Purliament for the borough of Camelford, yet despite his anilytion it does no appear that he ever attempted to speak in the House of Commons In 1789, having realised a handsome fortune he purchased the property of Rutts, in his native parish and having changed its name to the mole majestic one of Belleville—since 1900 retinied by his successor Balavil-he built upon it a splendid Italianate mansion designed by the architect Adam of Adelphi fame. There he hoped to spend old age in case and dignity, but survived only seven years. His eagerness for posthumous distinction was seen in some of the bequests of his will He orduned that his body should be interred m Westminster Abbey, and that a sum of £5∞ should be laid out in creeting a monument to his memory in some conspicuous situation near Both injunctions were duly fulfilled, his home he was actually buried near Poets' Corner, and a marble obelisk, with a medallion portrait, may be seen gleaming aundst a clump of trees by the roadside near Kingussie In order to understand the controversy about

Macpherson's merits and demerits, it is necessare to remember that Ossian was the great heroic poet of the Gael, the name is a diminutive—Ossian, Ossian, the little os or deer. In Gaelic story, Ossian was the son of Fionn MacCumhail, a hero who, in the third century AD, gathered about him a band of warriors like himself, called The adventures and exploits of these heroes, and especially of the principal figures in the group-of Fionn himself, magnanimous and wise, of his grandson Oscar, chivalrous and daring, of his nepliew Diarmad, bandsome and brave, of his rival Goll, the one eyed, and Conan, the villain of the band-their jealousies, dissensions, and final overthrow, constitute the literature of the In the legend Ossian was carried away by his fairy hind-mother to Eilean na h-Oige, 'the isle of the ever young,' from whence at length he returned, and now old, blind, and alone, he told the store of the heroes to St Patrick legends of the Feinn are but a fragment of the heroic literature of the Gael, and in the oldest MSS the deeds of Fionn and his companions occupy but little space, but eventually they partly absorbed and totally eclipsed the earlier traditions-those of at least two earlier cycles of story, so that Ossianic literature is now practically another name for the heroic literature of the Gael. These traditions, which have come down from the misty past in tale and ballad, were early reduced to writing, and as time went on blossomed forth into vastly developed incident and detail In ballads preserved in the Book of Leinster (c. 1150 AD) Ossian is represented as old and blind, surviving both his father and his A fifteenth-century VIS recounts the boyish exploits of Fionn Later the volume of tradition gets fuller, while cycles tend to become confused The leader of the Feinn is at one time a god, at others a hero, a king, a giant, but usually a great warmor, as wise as brave. In the book of the Dun Cow his mother is Muirn 'of the Fair Neck,' in later traditions we hear of Fionn as the son of a sister of Cucbullin, at another time a Scandinavian princess gave him birth But the literary form in which the legends are preserved remains practically unchanged. The Gaelic tale is essentially narrative prose with verse interspersed, Gaelic poetry, older and later, is always rhymed lyric verse

It was in 1760-63 that Macpherson published the longer epics and shorter pieces, epic and dramatic-all purporting to be translations of poems composed by Ossian, the son of Fingal. 'The translation,' Dr Blair is made to say in the preface to the Fragments printed in 1760, 'is extremely literal,' and while the work, in the opinion of many competent judges, possessed great literary merit, the genuineness of the whole thing was early called in question by Dr Johnson and others An angry controversy followed maintained that Macpherson had jumbled together persons and periods to an unwarrantable extent, that his originals, so far as he had any, were not Scottish, but Irish. If this were all that could be said one would feel justified in regarding, with Professor Windisch of Leipzig, Macpherson's

Ossian as a legitimate development of the old traditions. For the legends of the Feinn are the common property of the Gael, whether in Ireland, Scotland, or Man. They are located in Scotland, Scotland, or Man. They are located in Scotland topography time out of mind, and within the last four hundred years almost as rich a harvest of ballad and tale has been recovered in Scotland as in Ireland. It is no doubt absurd to represent Fionn, whom Macpherson, after Barbour, calls Fingal, as a mighty Caledonian monarch, at one time successfully fighting the Roman legions in the third century, at another assisting Cuchullin, who lived in the beginning of the first century, to expel from Ireland the Norsemen who made their appearance for the first time in the end of the eighth, and Dr Douglas Hyde, from the Irish point of view, insists that Macpherson's confusion of the Fenian and Cuchullin eras is 'one of the surest proofs that his brilliant Ossian had no Gaelic original' But Macpherson had warrant in genuine tradition for mixing up names and epochs In the 'Battle of Ventry' Fionn defeats the Lings of the world According to a Grelic tale, his father Cumhal sets up as king of Alba, and the kings of Ireland and Scandinavia combine to effect his overthrow, while the son is for ever fighting Norsemen Zimmer propounded the theory that the whole of these stories are in their origin traceable to Teutonic sources, the very names by which the hero and his band are known being borrowed from the Norse.

But in Macpherson's Ossian there is too wide a departure from genuine Gaelic literature and tradition. In his magnifying of the past, in his sympathy with nature, and in his powerful descriptions of the scenery of his own mountain land James Macpherson is true to the genius of his people, but beyond that he passes wholly away from the Gaelic sphere Gaelic literature supplies material for epics and dramas, but the epic and dramatic, as literary forms, were unknown to the Highlanders The dim and shadowy characters of Macpherson are in sharp contrast to the clear-cut features of the Gaclic heroes As Wordsworth said 'In nature everything is distinct, yet nothing defined into absolute independent singleness. In Macpherson's work it is exactly the reverse, everything that is not stolen is in this manner defined, insulated, dislocated, deadened-vet nothing distinct. It will always be so when words are substituted for things' The 'translator' rarely makes a definite state ment of fact, but when he does-as when, for example, he arms the old Grels with bows and arrows-he blunders hopelessly Macpherson is the most vague and abstract of writers, Gache poets are wearisome in detail, and revel in the In the opening of the third book of Cathloda, Macpherson ruses the problem of the origin and issue of things, but he is indebted for his answer rather to Bisliop Berkeley than to the son of Fionn

Macpherson was not a Gaelic scholar, and the fact may be considered conclusive proof of his inability to compose the Gaelic text of Ossian, which ultimately did appear, though the only Gaelic printed in the author's lifetime was Temora, Book vii Ossian was published in all the languages of Europe before he appeared in his own. And when at length the great edition of 1807 was issued, there were Grelic texts for only one half of the poems, and for about three fourths of the matter published by Macpherson in English forty-five years previously others no 'original,' ancient or modern, has ever yet been found, several old Gaelic MSS reported to the committee appointed by the Highland Society to investigate had all mysteriously disappeared by one strange accident or another it must be allowed that the truncated Ossian does not show to advantage in his native garb, nor have the Gaelic-speaking people ever known him There is not a single line of these Gaelic texts which can be proved to have been committed to writing before Macpherson's day The diction is essentially modern The loan-words are numerous, several of them borrowed from English. idioms and constructions are colourless, and show traces of classical training rather than of the turns of phrase characteristic of native authors so called blank verse in which the poems are written is unknown to Gaelic poetry

The truth seems to be that these so-called translations were essentially the compositions of James Macpherson, and that the Grelic texts were prepared with or without aid from his friends, but how and when we do not now know Nor can we say how much he was indebted, directly or indirectly, to oral traditions. The conclusions arrived at by the educated generally have been thus summed up by a student so carefully trained in research as Mr Haddan, collaborator with Bishop Stubbs 'Every one now admits that Macpherson, having traditional material at his disposal, by no means confined himself to it, but was a free inventor as well as a free translator. Looking back it the man and his times, we can see how eleverly he placed his He was wrongly accused on some points, and became most judiciously angry His anger made him taciturn, and he wrapped himself in it as a cloak. But the Celtic nationality was roused, and it fought for him when he would not defend himself. Chatterton died by poison or starvation, the Shal espeare forgenes hastened the death of Ireland, but James Macpherson, an obscure tutor, flourished under persecution, exclininged angry letters with Dr Johnson, translated Homer atrociously, and died a member of Parliament'

But even so, Macpherson retains the credit of having produced a considerable body of poetry of a type then quite unknown, strange and curious where not attrictive or interesting Admitting the misty confusion, the iteration of the same imagers, the monotons which inevitably produces tedium, it should be willingly recognised that there is much that is striking and poetical in Macpherson's Ossian-1 blend of wildness, magnificence, tenderness, pithos, and Celuc glamour, with traces of the indubitable 'natural magic' of poetry, which, when it was absolutely new and unparalkled, naturally impressed and influenced more than it can do now it did its work, and left its mark on the literature of Europe. The sections are very various in ment or power desolution of Balclutha and the lamentations in the Songs of Schma are conceived with true feeling and poetical power, but the battles of the car-borne heroes are stilted and unnatural, read like the quivotic encounters of knightly iomance, and lack the air of remote antiquity, of dim and solitary grandeur, of shadowy superstitious fear, which haunts Ossian's heatlis, lakes, and mountains

Ossian's Address to the Sun.

I feel the sun, O Malvina! leave me to my rest. Perhaps they may come to my dreams, I think I hear a feeble voice! The beam of heaven delights to shine on the grave of Carthon—I feel it warm around

O thou that rollest above, round as the shield of my fathers! Whence are thy beams, O sun! the everlasting light? Thou comest forth in thy awful beauty, the stars hide themselves in the sky, the moon, cold and pale, sinks in the western wave, but thou the thought movest alone. Who can be a companion of thy course? The oaks of the mountains fall, the mountains themselves decay with years, the ocean shrinks and grows again, the moon herself is lost in heaven, but thou art for ever the same, rejoicing in the brightness of thy course. When the world is dark with tempests, when thunder rolls and lightning flies, thou lookest in thy beauty from the clouds, and laughest at the storm But to Ossian thou lookest in vain, for he beholds thy beams no more, whether thy yellow hair flows on the eastern clouds, or thou tremblest at the gates of the west. But thou art perhaps like me, for a season, thy years will have Thou shalt sleep in thy clouds, careless of the voice of the morning Exult, then, O sun, in the strength of the vouth! Age is darl and unlovely, it is lile the glimmering light of the moon when it shines through broken clouds, and the mist is on the hills the blast of the north is on the plain, the traveller shrinks in the midst of his journey (From Carthon)

Desolation of Balclutha.

I have seen the walls of Balclutha, but they were desolate. The fire had resounded in the halls, and the voice of the people is heard no more. The stream of Clutha was removed from its place by the fall of the walls. The thistle shook there its lonely head, the moss whistled to the wind. The fox looked out from the windows, the rank grass of the wall waved round its head. Desolate is the dwelling of Moina, silence is in the house of her fathers Raise the song of mourning, O bards! over the land of strangers. They have but fallen before us, for one day we must full. Why dost thou build the hall, son of the winged days? Thou lookest from thy towers to-day yet a few years, and the blast of the desert comes, it howls in thy empty court, and v histles round thy half worn shield. And let the blast of the desert come! we shall be renowned in our day! The mark of my arm shall be in battle, my name in the song of bards. Raise the song, send round the shell let loy be heard in my hall. When thou, sun of heaven. shalt fail ! if thou shalt fail, thou mighty light ! if the brightness is but for a season, like Fingal, our same shall survive thy beams. Such was the song of Fingal in the day of his jov (From Carthon)

The Songs of Selma.

Star of descending night! fair is the light in the west! thou that liftest the unshorn head from the cloud the steps are stately on the hill. What dost thou behold in the plain? The stormy winds are laid. The murmur of the torrent comes from afar. Roaring waves climb the distant rock. The flies of evening are on their feeble wings, the hum of their course is on the field. What dost thou behold, fair light? But thou dost smile and depart. The waves come with joy around thee they bathe thy lovely hair. Farewell, thou silent beam! Let the light of Ossian's soul arise!

And it does arise in its strength! I behold my de parted friends. Their gathering is on Lora, as in the days of other, ears. Fingal comes like a watery column of mist, his heroes are around. And see the bards of song gray haired Ullin! stately Ryno! Alpin with the tuneful voice! the soft complaint of Minona! How are ye changed, my friends, since the days of Selma's feast? when we contended like gales of spring, as they fly along the hill, and bend by turns the feebly whistling grass.

Minona came forth in her beauty, with downcast look and tearful eye. Her hair flew slowly on the blast, that rushed infrequent from the hill. The souls of the heroes were sad when she raised the tuneful voice. Often had they seen the grave of Salgar, the dark dwelling of white-bosomed Colma. Colma left alone on the hill, with all her voice of song! Salgar promised to come but the night descended around. Hear the voice of Colma, when she sat alone on the hill!

Colma It is night, I am alone, forlorn on the hill of storms. The wind is heard in the mountain. The torrent pours down the rock. No hut receives me from the rain, forlorn on the hill of winds!

Rise, moon 'from belind thy clouds. Stars of the night, arise! Lead me, some light, to the place where my love rests from the chase alone! his bow near him, unstrung his dogs panting around him. But here I must sit alone, by the rock of the mossy stream. The stream and the wind roar aloud. I hear not the voice of my love! Why delays my Salgar, why the chief of the hill his promise? Here is the rock, and here the tree! here is the roaring stream! Thou didst promise vith hight to be here. Ah! whither is my Salgar gone? With thee I would fly from my father, with thee from my brother of pride. Our rice have long been foes, we are not foes, O Salgar!

Cease a little while, O wind 'stream, be thou sileut a while' let my voice be heard around! Let my wanderer hear me! Salgar, it is Colma who calls! Here is the tree and the rock Salgar, my love! I am here Why delayest thou thy coming? Lo' the calm moon comes forth. The flood is bright in the vale. The rocks are gray on the steep I see him not on the brow. His dogs come not before him with tidings of his near approach. Here I must sit alone!

Who lie on the heath beside me? Are they my love and my brother? Speak to me, O my friends! To Colma they give no reply Speak to me I am aloue! My soul is tormented with fears! Ah! they are dead! Their swords are red from the fight. O my brother! my brother' why hast thou slain my Salgar' why, O Salgar! hast thou slain my brother? Dear were ye both to me! what shall I say in your praise? Thou wert fair in the hill among thousands! he was terrible m fight. Speak to me, hear my voice, hear me, sons of my love! They are silent, silent for ever! Cold, cold are their breasts of clay! Oh! from the rock on the hill, from the top of the windy steep, speak, ye ghosts of the dead ' speak, I will not be afraid! Whither are ye gone to rest? In what cave of the hill shall I find the departed? No feeble voice is on the gale no answer half drowned in the storm !

I sit in my grief! I wait for morning in my tears! Rear the tomb, ye friends of the dead. Close it not till Colma come. My life flies away like a dream, why should I stay behind? Here shall I rest with my friends by the stream of the sounding rock. When night comes on the hill, when the loud winds arise, my ghost shall stand in the blast, and mourn the death of my friends. The hunter shall hear from his booth, he shall fear, but love my voice! for sweet shall my voice be for my friends pleasant were her friends to Colma!

Such was thy song, Miuona, softly blushing daughter of Torman. Our tears descended for Colma, and our souls were sad! Ullin came with his harp, he gave the song of Alpin. The voice of Alpin was pleasant, the soul of Rino was a heam of fire! But they had rested in a harrow house, their voice had ceased in Selma.

Ullin had returned one day from the chase before the heroes fell. He heard their strife on the hill, their song was soft but sad! They mourned the fall of Morar, first of mortal men! His soul was like the soul of Fingal, his sword like the sword of Oscar But he fell, and his father mourned, his sister's eyes were full of tears Minona's eyes were full of tears, the sister of car borne Morar She retired from the song of Ullin, like the moon in the west, when she foresees the shower, and hides her fair head in a cloud. I touched the harp, with Ullin, the song of mourning rose!

Ryno The wind and the rain are past, calm is the noon of day. The clouds are divided in heaven. Over the green hills flies the inconstant sun. Red through the stony vale comes down the stream of the hill. Sweet are thy murmurs, O stream! but more sweet is the voice. I hear. It is the voice of Alpin, the son of song, mourning for the dead! Bent is his head of age, red his tearful eye. Alpin, thou son of song, why alone on the silent hill? why complainest thou, as a blast in the wood, as a wave on the lonely shore?

Alpin My tears, O Ryno! are for the dead, my voice for those that have passed away Tall thou art on the hill, fair among the sons of the vale. But thou shalt fall like Morar, the mourner shall sit on thy tomb The hills shall know thee no more, thy bow shall lie in thy hall, unstrung!

Thou wert swift, O Morar! as a roe on the desert, terrible as a meteor of fire. Thy wrath was as the storm. Thy sword in hattle, as lightning in the field. Thy voice was a stream after rain, like thunder on distant hills. Many fell by thy arm, they were consumed in the flames of thy wrath. But when thou didst return from war, how peaceful was thy brow! Thy face was like the sun after rain, like the moon in the silence of night, calm as the breast of the lake when the loud wind is laid.

Narrow is thy dwelling now, dark the place of thine abode! With three steps I compass thy grave, O thon who wast so great before! Four stones, with their heads of moss, are the only memorial of thee. A tree with scarce a leaf, long grass which whistles in the wind, mark to the hunter's eye the grave of the mighty Morar Morar! thou art low indeed. Thou hast no mother to mourn thee, no maid with her tears of love. Dead is she that brought thee forth. Fallen is the daughter of Morglan.

Who on his staff is this? who is this, whose head is white with age? whose eyes are red with tears? who quakes at every step? It is thy father, O Morar! the father of no son but thee. He heard of thy fame in war, he heard of foes dispersed, he heard of Morar's renown, why did he not hear of his wound? Weep, thou father of Morar! weep, but thy son heareth thee not is the sleep of the dead, low their pillow of dust. No more shall he hear thy voice, no more awake at thy call. When shall it be morn in the grave, to bid the slumberer awake! Farewell, thou bravest of men! thou conqueror in the field! but the field shall see thee no more, nor the dark wood be lightened with the splendour of thy Thou hast left no son. The song shall preserve thy name. Future times shall hear of thee, they shall hear of the fallen Morar!

Such were the words of the bards in the days of song, when the king heard the music of harps, the tales of other times! The chiefs gathered from all their hills, and heard the lovely sound. They prused the voice of Conal the first among a thousand bards! But age is now on my tongue, my soul has failed! I hear at times the ghosts of bards, and learn their pleasant song. But memory fails on my mind. I hear the call of years! They say, as they pass along, why does Ossian sing? Soon shall he lie in the narrow house, and no bard shall ruse his fame! Roll on, ye dark brown years, ye bring no joy on your course! Let the tomb open to Ossian, for his strength his failed. The sons of song are gone to rest. My voice remains, like a blast that roars, lonely on a sea surrounded rock, after the winds are laid. The dark moss whistles there, the distant mariner sees the waving trees!

Other 'Ossianic poems' were published by Dr Smith of Campbeliown in 1780 in Gaelic, and in English in 1787 by Baron Edmund de Habiah, Spanish, Latin Polish, Dutch, and several German versions of Macpherson's Ossian are extant. Goethe gives a fine rendering of Selma's songs in Werther. A controversy somewhat resembling that circling round Macpherson has arisen over the Kalevala, the Finnish epic rescued by Lönntot (1835-49), and, as some think, much cooked and expanded by him.

Thomas Percy,

born, a grocer's son, at Bridgnorth, 13th April 1729, in 1746 entered Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1753 became vicar of Easton Maudit, Northamptonshire, in 1756 also rector of Wilby Till after his institution at Easton Maudit (when he began to try to count kin with the noble house) he spelt his name His leisure yielded fruit in Hau Kiou Chooann (1761), a Chinese novel translated from the Portuguese, and Miscellaneous Pieces relating to the Chinese (1762), as well as anonymously in Rume Poetry translated from Icelandic (1763), prompted by the success of Macpherson, and A New Translation of the Song of Solomon (1764) In 1765 Percy published his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, in which many rare old songs and ballads were mingled with lyrics from dramas, court poetry like that of Lord Vaux, and doggerel like Warner's He had long been collecting old ballads from every quarter, and a large folio manuscript had fallen into his hands, being found 'lying dirty on the Floor under a Bureau in the Parlour' of his friend Humphrey Pitt of Shiffnal, and 'being used by the maids to light the fire' This he claimed as the original of the Reliques, but of the one hundred and seventysix pieces in the first edition only forty-five were taken from the manuscript, and these were so touched up and tricked out in false ornament and conventional eighteenth-century poetic diction as often to bear but little likeness to their originals. Shenstone seems to have made the suggestion that Percy should publish the collection, and in gathering materials Percy had help from Thomas Warton, Garrick, Goldsmith, and others original folio manuscript was first printed in full by Furnivall and Hales (3 vols. 1867-68) Percy was himself a poet. 'O Nancy, wilt thou go with me?' (1758) was addressed to his first wife before their marriage in 1759, and was followed by his 'Hermit of Warkworth' (1771) and other detached pieces Made chaplain to the Duke of Northumberland and to George III, Percy in 1769 published his translation of Paul Henri Wallet's Northern Antiquities, in 1778 became Dean of Carlisle, in 1782 Bishop of Dromore, and died 30th September 1811 He enjoyed the friendship of Johnson and Goldsmith, and lived long enough to hail the genius of Scott.

The influence of Percy's collection was great and vide, it may be traced in many contemporary authors as plainly as in Coleridge and Wordsworth, this more than Ossian or the spirit of Hebrev poetry gave impulse to Herder and the German romantic movement, as well as to the genius of Sir Walter Scott A fresh fountain of poetry was opened up-a spring of sweet, tender, and heroic thoughts and imaginations, which could never be again turned back into the artificial channels in which the genius of poesy had been too long and too closely confined. It is interesting to remember that this great European literary revolution did undoubtedly come partly from Percy's studies in popular Chinese literature.

'O Nancy, wilt thou go with me?' was, in Johnson's Musical Museum, printed as a Scottish production, and is probably best known in the Scottified form. 'It is too barefaced,' says Burns, 'to take Dr Percy's charming song, and, by means of transposing a few English words into Scots, to offer to pass it for a Scots song' Mr Chappell had no doubt that Percy wrote (in 1771) Nancy (as above = Agnes), and that Tom Carter, the Irish musician who composed the tune to which the song is sung, took the liberty (disapproved by Percy) of altering it to Nanny (= Anne) Who changed go to gang, town and gown into toon and goon, and made the other adaptations to the modern Scotch spellings does not seem to be known On the other hand, it should be remembered that Percy's 'ballad' is little more than a paraphrase of 'The Royal Nun' (1682), repeated with slight variations in Nat Lee's Theodosius And in one of the songs in Allan Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellany (1733) we have

> O Katy! wiltu gang wi' me And leave the dinsome town awhile?

O Nancy, wilt thou go with me?
O Nancy, wilt thou go with me,
Nor sigh to leave the flaunting town?
Can silent glens have charms for thee,
The lowly cot and russet gown?

No longer dressed in silken sheen, No longer decked with jewels rare, Say, canst thou quit each courtly scene, Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

O Nancy, when thou'rt far away,
Wilt thou not cast a wish behind?
Say, canst thou face the parching ray,
Nor shrink before the wintry wind?
O can that soft and gentle mien
Extremes of hardship learn to bear,
Nor, sad, regret each courtly scene,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

From an Engraving by Dickinson after the Portrait by Reynolds.

O Nancy, canst thou love so true,
Through perils keen with me to go?
Or, when thy swain mishap shall rue,
To share with him the pang of woe?
Siy, should disease or pain befall,
Wilt thou assume the nurse's care,
Nor, wistful, those gay scenes recall,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

And when at last thy love shall die,
Wilt thou receive his parting breath?
Wilt thou repress each struggling sigh,
And cheer with smiles the bed of death?
And wilt thou o'er his breathless clay
Strew flowers, and drop the tender tear,
Nor then regret those scenes so gay,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

The Friar of Orders Gray

It was a friar of orders gray Walked forth to tell his beads, And he met with a lady fair, Clad in a pilgrim's weeds.

- 'Now Christ thee save, thou reverend friar'
  I pray thee tell to me,
  If ever at you holy shrine
  My true love thou didst see'
- 'And how should I know your true love From many another one?'
- 'Oh' by his cockle hat and staff, And by his sandal shoon
- 'But chiefly by his face and mich,
  That were so fair to view,
  His flaxen locks tha sweetly curled,
  And evice of lovely blue'
- 'O lady, he is dead and gone' Lady, he's dead and gone' At his head a green grass turf, And at his heels a stone.
- 'Within these holy cloisters long He languished, and he died, Lamenting of a lady's love, And 'plaining of her pride
- 'Here bore him barefaced on his hier Six proper vouths and tall, And many a tear bedewed his grave Within you kirl yard wall?'
- ' And art thou dead, thou gentle youth— And art thou dead and gone? And didst thou die for love of me? Breal, cruel heart of stone!'
- 'O weep not, lady weep not so, Some ghostly comfort seek Let not vain sorrow rive thy heart, Nor tears bedow thy check,'
- 'O do not, do not, holy frar, My sorrow now reprove, For I have lost the sweetest youth That e'er wan lady's love.
- 'And now, alas' for thy sad loss
  I'll evermore weep and sigh,
  For thee I only wished to live,
  For thee I wish to die'
- 'Weep no more, lady, weep no more
  Thy sorrow is in vain
  For violets plucked, the sweetest showers
  Will ne'er make grow again.
- 'Our joys as winged dreams do fly, Why then should sorrow last? Since gricf but aggravates thy loss, Grieve not for what is past.'
- 'O say not so, thou holy fnar!
  I pray thee say not so,
  For since my true love died for me,
  'Tis meet my tears should flow
- 'And will he ne'er come again—
  Will he ne'er come again?
  Ah, no! he is dead, and laid in his grave,
  For ever to remain
- 'His check was redder than the rose— The comeliest youth was he But he is dead, and laid in his grave, Alas ' and woe is me.'

- 'Sigh no more, lady, sigh no more, Men were deceivers ever, One foot on sen, and one on land, To one thing constant never
- 'Hadst thou been fond, he had been false, And left thee sad and heavy, I or young men ever were fiel le found, Since summer trees were leafy'
- 'Now say not so, thou holy friar,
  I pray thee say not so,
  My love he had the truest heart—
  O he was ever true!
- 'And art thou dead, thou much loved yo the And didst thou die for me? Then farewell home, for evermore

  A pilgram I will be.
- 'But first upon my true love's grave
  My weary limbs I ll lay,
  And thrice I'll kiss the green grass turf
  That wraps his breathles, elay'
- 'Yet stay, for lady, rest a while Beneath this eloister wall, The cold wind through the linwthorn blows, And drizzly run doth fall'
- 'O stay me not, thou holy friar, O stay me not, I pray, No drizzly run that falls on me, Can v ash my fault away'
- 'Vet stry, fair lady, turn again, And dry those pearly tears, For sec, beneath this gown of gray, Thy own true love appears
- 'Here, forced by grief and hopeless love,
  These holy weeds I sought,
  And here, aimid these lonely walls,
  To end my days I thought.
- 'But haply, for my year of grace
  Is not yet passed away,
  Might I still hope to win thy love,
  No longer would I stay'
- 'Now farewell grief, and welcome joy Once more unto my heart, For since I've found thee, lovely youth, We never more will part.'

Percy's ballad resembles Goldsmith's Edit in and Angelina, and Goldsmith had the priority. The seventeenth staura is borrowed, of course, from Shakespeare's Much ado aloud Aething. Act his See the Percy Ballads as a Romances edited by Furnivall and Itales, with Life by Pickford (1°67-65). H. L. Wheatley's edition of the Reliques (1876-77). Joseph and Thomas Warton both contributed to the reaction against Popian correctness in favour of a truer and deeper conception of poetic worth. The brothers, Joseph and Thomas, were the sons of Dr Thomas Warton of Magdalen College, Oxford, and vicar of Basingstoke, who was twice (1718 and 1723) chosen Professor of Poetry by his university, and wrote occasional verses half scholastic and half sentimental. In view of his sons life-work, it is worth noting that some of his poems are called 'runic odes.' After retiring from the Oxford professorship (for which he had but slender competence) he settled at Basingstole, where he was also master of the grammar-school and had Gilbert White for a pupil. A so-called sonnet by the elder Warton shows that he himself still belonged to the older school.

Written after seeing Windsor Castle

From beanteous Windsor's high and storied halls, Where Edward's chiefs start from the glowing walls, To my low co from work beds of state, Pleased I return unervious of the great. So the bee ranges o er the varied scenes Of corn, of heaths, of fallows, and of greens, Perva les the thicket, soars above the hill, Or murmurs to the meador's murmuring rill Nov liaunts old hollowed oaks, deserted cells, Nov seeks the lov vale hily's silver bells, Sips the warm fragrance of the greenhouse bowers, And tastes the myrtle and the citron's flowers, At length returning to the wonted comb, Prefers to all his little straw-built home

The Jacobitical poetry-professor and clerical pluralist died in 1745, aged fifty-eight. His sons had much in common, but it was the second v ho made the deepest mark on our literature.

Joseph (1722-1800), the elder, attended his father's school, and at Winchester was the schoolfellow of Collins He was afterwards a commoner of Oriel College, Oxford, and vas successively rector of Winslade, Thorley, Easton, and Upham In 1755 he was appointed second master of Winchester, from 1766 till 1793 he was head-master, and he was a prebendary of St Paul's and of Winchester His collections of odes and poems (1744 and 1746) explicitly avowed revolutionary dissent from the critical canons of the dominant school of Pope. An edition of Virgil (1753), with translation of the Eclogues and Georgies, gained him a high reputation. He vas much esteemed by Dr Johnson, at whose request he became a contributor to the Adventurer, and, like his brother Thomas, was one of the members of the famous Literary Club In 1757 appeared the first volume of his Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, the second and concluding volume following only in 1782, the distinction drawn between the poetry of reason and the poetry of imagination, and the enthronement of romanticism in the place of correctness, marked an important era in English criticism, Spenser and the Elizabethans had more of the spirit of poetry than Pope. theories were substantially sound, but his own poetry, artificial rather than truly spontaneous, illustrated them somes hat imperfectly vorks were an annotated edition of Pope (9 vols 1797) and a similar edition of Dryden, of which at his death he had published to o volumes

From the Ode to Fancy

O parent of each lovely muse!
Thy spirit o'er my soul diffuse,
O'er all my artless songs preside,
My footsteps to thy temple guide,
To offer at the turf built shrine
In golden cups no costly wine,
No murdered fatling of the flock,
But flowers and honey from the rock

O nymph with loosely flowing hair, With bushined leg and bosom bare, Thy waist vith myrtle girdle bound, Thy brows with Indian feathers crowned, Waving in the snowy hand An all commanding magic v and, Of power to bid fresh gardens blow 'Mid checrless Lapland's barren snow, Whose rapid wings thy flight convey Through air, and over earth and sea, While the various landscape lies Conspicuous to thy piercing eyes! O lover of the desert, hail Say in v hat deep and pathless vale, Or on what hoary mountains side, 'Mid falls of water, you reside, 'Mid broken rocks a rugged scene, With green and grassy dales between, 'Mid forests dark of aged oak, Ne or echoing with the woodman's stroke. Where never human art appeared, Nor e er one strav roofed cot was reared, Where Nature seems to sit alone, Majestie on a craggy throne, Fell me the path, sveet wanderer, tell, To thy unl nown sequestered cell, Where a coodbines cluster round the door, Where cells and moss o erlay the floor, And on v hose top an hav thorn blows, Amid whose thickly woven boughs Some nightingale still builds her nest, Each evening warbling thee to rest, There lay me by the haunted stream Wrapt in some wild poetic dream, In converse while methinks I rove With Spenser through a fairy grove, Till suddenly awaked, I hear Strange whispered music in my ear, And my glad soul in bliss is drowned By the sweetly soothing sound '

When young eyed Spring profusely throws
From her green lap the pink and rose,
When the soft turtle of the dale
To Summer tells her tender tale
When Autumn cooling caverns seeks,
And stains with wine his jolly cheeks,
When Winter, like poor pilgrim old,
Shal es his silver beard with cold,
At every season let my car
Thy solemn v hispers, Fancy, hear!

The second son, Thomas Warton (1728-90), began his studies under his father, and at sixteen was entered of Trinity College. He began early to write verses, and his Pleasures of Melar choly, published when he was nineteen, gave a promise of excellence which his riper productions hardly fulfilled He obtained a fellowship in 1751, and in 1757 was appointed Professor of Poetry He was also rector of Kiddington and He loved his of Hill Farrance in Somerset pipe and his tankard, and had, it is said, but two sermons-one of them his father's, and the other a printed one. Oxford remained his home, and the even tenor of his life was only varied by his occasional publications, one of which, The Traumph of Isis, in praise of Oxford (and in reply to Mason), mide his name widely known, and another, an claborate Essay on Spenser's Facin Queene (1754), gained for him a higher repute Long after (1785) he edited the minor poems of Milton, an edition which Professor Masson pronounced the best ever produced, and which Leigh Hunt said was a wilderness of sweets the notes show true insight, while others display W irton's taste for antiquities and for architecture, his sympathy with old world superstition, and his intimate acquaintance with the Elizabeth in In the famous History of English Poetry (1774-78), which finally established his reputation, Warton poured out the treasures of a full mind His antiquarian lore, his love of antique manners, and his enthusiasm found appropriate exercise in tracing the stream of our poetry from its fountain springs down to the luxuriant reign of Elizabeth, 'the most poetical age of our annals,' as he said—to the amaze of an age that thought itself vistly superior to all earlier periods, and had been accustomed to think of the older writers as merely unpolished and uncouth and Grav had planned schemes of a history of English poetry, in which the authors were to be arranged according to their style and merits Warton adopted the chronological arrangement, as giving freer scope for research, and as enabling him to exhibit, without transposition, the gradual development in our poctry and the progress of our language. The untiring industry and learning of the poet historian accumulated a mass of materials equally valuable and curious inevitable, many of his discoveries have been superseded by other discoveries, many of his theories have had to be corrected or largely expanded. His plan was defective, his translations from old French and English were by no means accurate, and he sometimes wanders from his subject or overlays it with extraneous But he was a sagnetous, far-sighted, and independent investigator of a new and wide field, and his work, variously judged by contemporary and subsequent critics, remains a vast storchouse of facts connected with our early literature, till then all but unknown even to the educated. The scheme excluded the drama, so rich a part of our early imaginative literature. The third volume comes down to the end of the Elizabethan period, the fourth, which would have included Pope, was never published. On the death of Whitehead in 1785, Warton was appointed poet laureate His learning gave dignity to an office then held in small esteem. The same year he was made Camden Professor of History. He wrote humorous verse and prose, satires on Newmarket and other places, and produced an edition of Theocritus and Lives of two college benefactors, and he was clearly the man to make the Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Rowley Poems of poor Chatterton, which gave an unfavourable verdict

Both as poet and critic Warton greatly promoted the new movement in English poetry his verse, though it was largely imitative of Spenser, Milton, or Gray, and even of Pope, there was evident a then unusual and unfeigned love of nature, of the romantic and chivalrous. His affection for Gothic architecture and the antique is highly significant, and comes out in many of his verses. As a critic he was really the first to use or appreciate the poetic treasures hid in our ancient libraries, and his History of English Poetrs may fairly he ranked with Percy's Reliques as having contributed to give a vital impulse to His mock heroics and burlesques were in their way admirable. His sonnets, not seldom awkward and even wooden, were thought his most perfect work, and they revised interest in sonnet-writing On the whole, his critical theories and sympathies were in advance of his practice. The Phasures of Melancholy, his poems on royal births, deaths, and marriages even before the laureate era, and even some of his odes belong almost wholly to the old school. His first official ode on the king's birthday provoked the clever squib, Probationary Odes for the Laureateship, some of which are almost Whitmanesque. some of his best things, such as the story of Blondel and Richard, and the poem given below, in which Henry II on his way to head the Irish expedition is entertained with the story of Arthur, breathe not a little of the spirit of romance. Warton unquestionably influenced Bowles, and after him or through him, Coleridge, and Lamb and Hazlitt were sincere These are passages from the Hisadmirers tory of English Poetry

Chaucer

Chaucer's vein of humour, although conspicuous in the Canterbury Tales, is chiefly displayed in the Characters with which they are introduced. In these his knowledge of the world availed him in a peculiar degree, and enabled him to give such an accurate picture of ancient manners as no cotemporary nation has transmitted to posterity. It is here that we view the pursuits and employments, the customs and diversions of our ancestors, copied from the life, and represented with equal truth and spirit, by a judge of mankind whose penetration qualified him to discern their foibles or discriminating peculiarities, and by an artist who understood that proper selection of circumstances, and those predominant characteristics, which form a finished portrait. We are surprised to find, in so gross and ignorant an age, such talents for satire and for observation on life, qualities which usually exert themselves at more civilised periods, when the improved state of society, by substituting our speculations, and establishing uniform modes of behaviour, disposes mankind to study themselves, and render deviations of conduct and singularities of character more immediately and necessarily the objects of censure and ridicule. These curious and valuable remains are specimens of Chaucer's native genius, unassisted and unalloyed. The figures are all British, and bear no suspicious signatures of classical, Italian, or French imitation. The characters of Theophrastus are not so lively, particular, and appropriated

The Reformation and Literature

It is generally believed that the reformation of religion in Lingland, the most happy and important event of our annals, was immediately succeeded by a flourishing state But this was by no means the case a long time afterwards in effect quite contrary was produced The reformation in Lingland was completed under the reign of I dward VI The rapacious courtiers of this young prince were perpetually grasping at the rewards of literature, which being discouraged or de spised by the rich, was neglected by those of moderate Avance and zeal were at once gratified in robbing the elergy of their revenues, and in reducing the church to its primitive apostolical state of purity and The opulent see of Wineliester was lowered to pos crty a bare title its amplest estates were portioned out to the lasty, and the bishop, a creature of the protector Somerset, was contented to receive an inconsiderable annual stipend from the exchequer. The bishoprick of Durham, almost equally neh, was entirely dissolved. A fasorite nobleman of the court occupied the deaners and treasurership of a cathedral with some of its best The ministers of this abused monarch, by these arbitrary, dishonest, and imprudent measures, only proved instruments, and furnished arguments, for restor ing in the succeeding reign that superstitious religion which they professed to destroy. By thus impoverish ing the coclesiastical dignities they countenanced the clamours of the catholics who declared that the reformation was apparently founded on temporal views, and that the protestants pretended to oppose the doc times of the church solely with a view that they might share in the plunder of its revenues. In every one of these sacrilegious robbenes the interest of learning also Lalubitions and pensions vere in the mean time subtracted from the students in the universities Ascham, in a letter to the Marquis of Northampton dated 1550, laments the rum of grammar schools through out Ingland, and predicts the speedy extinction of the universities from this growing calamity. At Oxford the public schools were neglected by the professors and pupils, and allotted to the lowest purposes. \endemical degrees were abrogated as antichristian Reformation was soon turned into franticism Al surd refinements concerning the mutility of human learning were super added to the just and rational purgation of chin- ianits from the papal corruptions. The sprittal reformers of these enligh ened days at a visitation of the las mun tioned university, proceeded to far in their ileas of a superior rectifude as totally to strip the pallie library, established by that munificent pair a Humpfires dule of Gloucester, of all its bords and MSS

Chapman's 'Homor'

But a complete and regular version of Homer was reserved for George Chapman He began with printing the Shield of Achilles in 1596. This was followed by seven books of the Iliut the same year books were printed in 1600. At length appeared, without date, an entire translation of the Iliad under the following title, 'The Iliads of Homer, Prince of Poets Neuer before in any language truely translated, With a comment uppon some of his chief places Done according to the Greeke by George Chapman. At London, printed for Nathaniell Butter' It is dedicated in Lngli h heroics to Prince Henry This circumstance proves that the book was printed at least after the ver 1603, in which James I neceded to the throne Then follows an anagram on the name of his gracious Viccenas prince Henry, and a sonnet to the sole empresse of leautie queen Anne. In n metrical address to the reader he remarks, but with little truth, that the I nglish language, abounding in consonant mono syllables, is eminently adapted to alightmical poetry doctrine that an allegorical sense was liid under the nar ratives of epic poetry had not vet censed, and he here promises a poem on the mysteries he had neily dis covered in Honier In the Preface, he declares that the last twelve books were translated in fifteen weeks we with the advice of his learned and valued friends. Master Robert Hews and Master Harriots. It is certain that the whole performance betruys the negligence of haste He pays his acknowledgments to his 'mo t ancient, learned, and right noble friend, Master Richard Stapilton, the first most desertfull mouer in the frame of our Homer' He endeavours to obviate a popular objection, perhaps not totally groundle s, that he consulted the prose Latin version more than the Greel original says, sensibly enough, 'it is the part of every I nowing and judicious interpreter, not to follow the miinber and order of words, but the materiall things themselves, and sentences to weigh diligently and to clothe and adorre them with words, and such a stile and forme of oration, as are most apt for the language into which they are connected. The danger lies in too lave h an application of this sort of clouding that it may not discuss what it should only adorn. I do not say that this is Chapman's full but he has by no means represented the dignity or the simplicity of Homer. He is sometimes para phrastic and redundant, bu more frequent retrerches or impoverishes what he could not feel and explesthe meantime, he labours with the inconvenience of an aukward, informations and unhero e rice ure, imposed by custom, but disgu tful to modern cars. Le 1 is not always without strength or affint. He has ear abed our languages with many compound epithete, so much in the manner of Homer, such as the surver f. by that sort of fustian which now disfigured the diction of our trugedy

My copy once belonged to Pope, in which he has noted many of Chapman's absolute interpolations, extending sometimes to the length of a paragraph of twelve lines. A diligent observer will easily discern that Pope was no careless reader of his rude predecessor. Pope complains that Chapman took advantage of an unmeasurable length of line. But in reality Pope's lines are longer than Chapman's. If Chapman affected the reputation of rendering line for line, the specious expedient of chusing a protracted measure which concatenated two lines together, undoubtedly favoured his usual propensity to periphrasis.

Written in a Blank Leaf of Dugdale's Monasticon

Deem not devoid of elegence the sage,
By Faney's genuine feelings unbeguiled,
Of painful pedantry the poring cluld,
Who turns of these proud domes the historic page,
Now sunk by Time and Henry's hereer rage
Think'st thou the warbling muses never smiled
On his lone hours? Ingenuous views engage His thoughts on themes unclassic falsely styled, Intent. While cloistered piety displays
Her mouldering roll, the piercing eye explores
New manners and the pomp of elder days,
Whence culls the pensive bard his pictured stores
Nor rough nor barren are the winding ways
Of hoar antiquity, but strown with flowers

To the River Lodon

All I what a werry race my feet have run Since first I trod thy banks with alders crowned, And thought my way was all through farry ground, Beneath the azure sky and golden sun— Where first my muse to hisp her notes begun I While pensive memory traces back the round Which fills the varied interval between, Much pleasure, more of sorrow marks the scene. Sweet native stream I those skies and sun so pure, No more return to cheer my evening road! Yet still one joy remains, that not obscure Nor useless all my vacant days have flowed From youth's gry dawn to manhood's prime mature, Nor with the muse's laurel unbestowed

Stately the feast, and high the cheer Girt with many an armed peer, And canopied with golden pall, Amid Cilgarran's eastle hall, Snbhme in formidable state And warlike splendour Henry sate, Prepar'd to stain the briny flood Of Shannon's lakes with rebel blood

Illumining the vaulted roof,
A thousand torches flam'd aloof
From massy cups, with golden gleam,
Sparkled the red metheglin's stream
To grace the gorgeous festival,
Along the lofty window'd hall,
The storied tapestry was hung
With ministrelsy the rafters rung
Of harps, that with reflected light
From the proud gallery glitter'd bright

Of Radnor's inmo t mountains rude,) To crown the banquet's solemn close, Themes of British glory chose, And to the strings of various chime. Attemper'd thus the fabling rhyme.

'O'er Cornwall's cliffs the tempest roar'd, High the screaming sea mew soar'd, On Tintaggel's topmost tower Darksome fell the sleety shower, Round the rough castle shrilly sung The whirling blast, and wildly flung On each tall rampart's thundering side The surges of the tumbling tide When Arthur rang'd his red cross ranks On conscious Camlan's crimson'd banks By Mordred's futliless guile decreed Beneath a Saxon spear to bleed! I et in vain a pavnim foc Arm'd with fite the nighty blow, For when he fell, an elfin queen, All in secret, and unseen, O'er the funting hero threw Her mantle of ambrosial blue, And bade her spirits bear him fur, In Merlin's agate axled car, To her green isks chaniel'd steep, Fir in the navel of the deep. O'er his wounds she sprinkl'd dew From flowers that in Arabia grew On a rich enchanted bed, She pillow'd his majestic head, O'er his brow, with whispers bland, Three she wav'd an opiate wand, And to soft music's airy sound, Her magic curtain clos d around. There, renew d the vital spring, Again lie reigns a mighty king, And many a fair and fragrant clime, Blooming in immortal prime, By gales of Eden ever fann'd, Owns the monarch's high command Thence to Britain shall return (If right prophetic rolls I learn), Borne on victors s spreading plunic, His ancient sceptre to resume, Once more, in old heroic pride, His barbed courser to bestride, His knightly table to restore, And the brave tournaments of yore.' ## Thomas Chatterton was horn at Bristol, 20th November 1752 fither, a sub-chanter in the cathedral, and master of a clianty school was a roistering fellow, yet a lover of books and coins, a dabbler in magic, he had died in the August before the poet was born The mother, a poor schoolmistress and needlewoman brought up her boy and his sister beneath the shadow of St Mary Redcliffe, that glorious church where their forefathers had been sextons since the days of Elizabeth. He seemed a dull, dreams child till his seventh year, then he 'fell in love, with an old illuminated music folio, and, quickly learning to read from a black-letter Bible, began to devour every book that fell in his way He was a scholar of Colston's Bluecoat Hospital from 1760 till 1767, and then he was bound apprentice to Lambert, an attorney In December 1762 he wrote his first poem, On the Last La frany, in 1763 borrowed Speght's black letter Chaucer from a lending library, and in the summer of 1764 produced the first of his pseedo antiques, Elinoure and Juga, which impused on the junior usher of his school, and which he professed to have got from Canjuge's Coffer in the muniment room of St Mary's Next, early m 1767, for one Burgum, a pewterer, he con corred a pedigree of the De Bergham family (this brought him ten shillings), and in 1768 he horsed the vhole city with a description, from an old manuscript,' of the opening of Bristol Bridge in 12,8

His life at Lambert's was a sorded one, he slept with the footbox, and took his meals in the litchen yet his duties over—and he discharged them well—he had ample leasure for his during studies, particle, history, heraldry, music, antiquities. An after particle draw Dodsley had failed, when, in March 1769, he sen' Horace Walpole a 'transcript' of Tie Rive of Periodesia ge, certifien by T. Recche, 1459, for March Conjuge. Walpole, quite taken in, wrote at once to his unknown corresponder expressing a thousand thanks for the manuscrip deploring his ignorance of the 'Saxon languag and half offering to usher the Rowley Poems to the Back came a fresh batch of manuscrij and with it a sketch of Chatterton's own histor The poems, however, being shown to Mason at Gray, were pronounced by them to be forgeric and Walpole's next letter was a letter of advito stick to his calling, that so, 'when he shou have made a fortune, he might unbend himse with the studies consonant to his inclinations? curt request for the return of the MSS lay s weeks unanswered during Walpole's absence Paris A second came, still curter, and, 'sna ping up poems and letters,' Walpole 'returne both to him, and thought no more of him them'-until, two years after, Goldsmith told hi of Chatterton's death

Was it jest or grim earnest, a boyish freak a suicide's farewell, that 'Last Will and Test ment of Thomas Chatterton executed in the presence of Omniscience this 14th of April 1770 Anyhow, falling into his master's hands, it pr cured the liasty cancelling of his indentures, at ten days later the boy quitted Bristol for Londo There he arrived with his poems, and perhal five guineas in his pocket, and lodged first at or Walmsley's, a plasterer, in Shoreditch, next, fro the middle of June, at Brooke Street, Holbor Abstemious, sleepless, he fell to work as will a hundred hands, pouring forth satires, squib stones, political essays, burlettas, epistles Junius's style (for 'Wilkes and liberty'), and th For a while h matchless Balade of Charitie prospects seemed golden The publishers spok him fair, he obtained an interview with the Loi Mayor Beckford, in the first two months he carne eleven guineas (at the rate of from a farthing t twopence a line), and he sent home glowing letter. with a box of presents for his mother and siste Then Beckford died, the 'patriotic' publisher took fright, the dead season set in, he had over stocked the market with unpaid wares, a last des perate application failed for the post of surgeon to a Bristol slaver He was penniless, starving, ye too proud to accept the meal his landlady offered him, when, on 24th August 1770, he locked himsel into his garret, tore up his papers, and was found the next morning dead-poisoned with arsenic They buried him in the prupers' pit of the Sho Lane Workhouse, a site usurped fifty six year later by Farringdon Market.

I or eighty years the Rowley controvers) wa waged with no less bitterness than ignorance, the Rowley and including Jacob Bryant (1781), Dea Milles (1782), and Dr S R Maitland (1857), the anti-Rowleyans, Tyrwhitt (1777–82) and Thoma Warton (1778–82). The subject was once and forever laid to rest by Professor Skeat in his edition of Chatterton's Pactical Works (2 vols 1875). Vol contains Cliatterton's acknowledged noems, seventy

King Edward saw the ruddy streaks

Of light eclipse the gray,

And heard the raven's croaking throat

Proclaim the fated day

'Thou rt right,' quoth he, 'for by the God That sits enthroned on high ' Charles Bawdin, and his fellows twain, To-day chall snrely die'

Then with a jug of nappy ale

His knights did on him wait,

'Go tell the traitor, that to-day

He leaves this mortal state'

Sir Canterlone then bended low, With heart brimful of woe, He journeyed to the castle gate, And to Sir Charles did go

But when he came, his children twain, And eke his loving wife, With briny tears did wet the floor, For good Sir Charles's life

'O good Sir Charles! said Canterlone,
'Bad tidings I do bring
'Speak boldly, man,' said brave Sir Charles,
'What says the traitor king?'

'I grieve to tell before von sun Does from the welkin fly, He hath upon his honour sworn l'hat thou shalt surely die

'We all must die,' quoth brave Sir Charles,
'Of that I'm not afeared,
What boots to live a little space?
Thank Iesu I'm prepared

'But tell thy king, for mine he's not, I'd sooner die to day, Than live his slave, as many are, Though I should live for aye.'

Then Master Canvinge sought the king, And fell down on his knee, '1 in come,' quoth he, 'unto your grace, 10 move your elemency'

'Then,' quoth the ling, 'your tale speak out,
You have been much our friend,
Whatever your request may be,
We will to it attend.'

'My noble liege! all my request
Is for a noble knight,
Who, though mayhap he has done wrong
He thought it still was right.

'He has a spouse and children twain,
All ruined are for aye,
If that you are resolved to let Charles Bawdin die to day'

'Speak not of such a traitor vile,'
The king in fury said,
'Before the evening star doth shine
Baydin shall lose his head

'by Mary, and all saints in heaven,
This sun shall be his last!'
Then Canynge dropped a bring tear,
And from the presence passed

With heart brimful of gnawing grief, He to Sir Charles did go, And sat him down upon a stool, And tears began to flow

'We all must die,' quoth brave Sir Charles,
'What boots it how or when'
Death is the sure, the certain fite
Of all we mortal men.

'Say why, my friend, the honest soul Runs over at thine eve, Is it for my most welcome doom That thou dost child like cry?'

Quoth godly Canvinge 'I do weep,
That thou so soon must die,
And leave thy sons and helpless wife,
"Tis this that wets mine eve."

'Then dry the tears that out thine eye From godly fountums spring Death I despise, and all the power Of Edward, trutor king

'When through the tyrint's welcome means I shall resign my life, The God I serve will soon provide For both my sons and wife.

'Before I saw the lightsome sun,
This was appointed me,
Shall mortal man repine or gradge
What God ordains to be?

'How oft in battle have I stood, When thousands died around, When smoking streams of crimson blood Imbrued the fattened ground

'How did I I now that every dart
That cut the airy way,
Might not find passage to my heart,
And close mine eves for ave?

'And shall I now, for fear of death Look wan and be dismayed? Nay! from my heart fly childish fear, Be all the man displayed

'My honest friend, my fault has been To serve God and my prince, And that I no time server am, My death will soon convince.

"In London city was I born, Of parents of great note, My father did a noble arms Emblizon on his coat.

'He taught me justice and the laws
With pity to unite
And eke he trught me how to know
The wrong cause from the right.

grow

Sweet his tongue as the throstle's note, Quick in dance as thought can be,
Deft his tabor, cudgel stout,
Oh! he lies by the willow tree.
My love is dead,
Gone to his death bed,
All under the willow tree.

Hark' the raven flaps his wing,
In the briered dell below,
Hark' the death owl loud doth sing,
To the nightmares as they go
My love is dead,
Gone to his death bed,
All under the willow tree.

See! the white moon shines on high,
Whiter is my true love's shroud,
Whiter than the morning sky,
Whiter than the evening cloud
My love is dead,
Gone to his death bed,
All under the willow tree

Here, upon my true love's grave,
Shall the barren flowers be laid,
Nor one holy saint to save
All the coldness of a maid
My love is dead,
Gone to his death bed,
All under the willow tree

With my hands I'll fix the briers,
Round his holy corse to gre,
Elfin fairies, light your fires,
Here my body still shall be
My love is dead,
Gone to his death bed,
All under the willow tree.

Come with acorn cup and thorn,
Drain my heart's blood all away,
Life and all its good I scorn,
Dance by night, or feast by day
My love is dead,
Gone to his death bed,
All under the willow tree.

Water witches, crowned with reytes, water flags
Bear me to your deadly tide
I die—I come—my true love waits —
Thus the damsel spake, and died

The Prophecy was an acknowledged poem. The Bristone Tragedie, first of the Rowley Poems, differed from the rest in being comparatively free from the iffectation of old words but 'of all ue, 'I m greater now than thee and other locutions illustrate Chatterion's grammatical eccentricities. Only in the last extract, n chorus from the unfinished tragedy of Godd-vyn is Chatterton's own purely fantastic spelling reproduced. There are Lives of Chatterton by Dix (1837), Sir Daniel Wilson (1869) Professor Masson (1874) and Professor Sheat (for the Works, 1875) and reference may also be made to Mr T Watts-Dunton's essay in vol in. of Ward's English Poets (1880), and Sir Herbert Crost's Love and Madness (1780) Professor Sleat modernised the spelling of the Rowley Poems in the edition above mentioned (1875), but Mr Steele edited them with the original spellings (1899). Of eight so-called portraits, one only is authentic-that by Morris, of Chatterton as n boy of eleven

FRANCIS HINDES GROOME

John Wilkes (1727-97), the son of a London distiller, studied at Leyden, and became a man of fashion and profligate. One of the infamous 'Monks of Medmenham,' he took up politics as a supporter of Pitt, and was returned for Aylesbury Lord Bute having declined to appoint him ambassador to Constantinople or Governor of Quebec, he attacked the Ministry in the North Briton (1762-63), a weekly journal he had founded In the famous forty-fifth number some strong comments were made upon the King's Speech on opening Parliament, and on a general warrant Wilkes was seized and committed to the Tower for libel in 1763, but soon released. He became the hero of the hour, and his popularity was only increased when the House of Lords condemned his 'Essay on Woman' (rightly enough) as an obscene libel, and the House of Commons expelled him on 19th January 1764 as author of No 45 of the North Briton A few years later (1769), as elected M P for Middlesex, he fought the battle of electoral freedom against the pretensions of the House of Commons, and, though thrice expelled and disqualified, was ultimately allowed to take his seat in 1774, while eight years afterwards the re solutions invalidating his previous elections were expunged. In the same year he was Lord Mayor Worthless as a man and a politician, Wilkes was famous for his wit and pleasantry, and the charm of his conversation made conquest even of Dr Johnson, as is recorded in the passage quoted from Boswell at page 473 He was a venomous and pertinacious assailant of the Government rather than a member of any constitutional Opposition

But his resistance to oligarchic domination made him an agent, however unworthy, of English constitutional development, and his North Briton was a humble follower of the political periodicals of Addison and Steele. See Percy Fitzgerald's Life and Times of John Wilkes (1888)

From 'No 45'

The King's Speech has always been considered by the legislature, and by the public at large, as the Speech of the minister It has regularly, at the beginning of every session of parliament, been referred by both houses to the consideration of a committee, and has been generally canvassed with the utmost freedom, when the minister of the crown has been obnoxious to the The ministers of this free country, conscious of the undoubted privileges of so spirited a people, and with the terrors of parliament before their eyes, have ever been cautious, no less with regard to the matter than to the expressions of speeches which they have advised the sovereign to make from the throne at the opening of cach session They well knew that an honest house of parliament, true to their trust, could not fail to detect the fallacious arts, or to remonstrate against the daring acts of violence, committed by any minister The Speech at the close of the session has ever been considered as the most secure method of promulgating the favourite court creed among the vulgar, because the parliament, which is the constitutional guardian of the liberties of the people, has in this case no opportunity of remonstrating, or of impeaching any wicked servant of the crown.

This week has given the public the most abandoned instance of ministerial effrontery ever attempted to be The minister's speech of last imposed on mankind I nesday is not to be paralleled in the annals of this I am in doubt whether the imposition is greater on the sovereign or on the nation. Every friend of his country must lament that a prince of so many great and amiable qualities, whom England truly reveres, can be brought to give the sanction of his sacred name to the most odious measures, and to the most unjustifi able public declarations, from a throne ever renowned for truth, honour, and unsullied virtue. I am sure all foreigners, especially the King of Prussia, will hold the ininister in contempt and abhorrence. He has made onr sovereign declare, My expectations have been fully answered by the happy effects which the several allies of my crown have derived from this salutary measure of the definitive Treaty The powers at war with my good brother the King of Prussia have been induced to agree to such terms of accommodation as that great prince has approved, and the success which has attended my negociation has necessarily and immediately diffused the blessings of peace through every part of Europe. The infamous fallacy of this whole sentence is appa rent to all mankind, for it is known that the King of Prussia did not barely approve, but absolutely dictated, as conqueror, every article of the terms of peace. No advantage of any 1 ind has accrued to that magnanimous prince from our negotiation, but he was basely deserted by the Scottish prime minister of England. He was known by every court in Europe to be scarcely on better terms of friendship here than at Vienna, and he was b-trayed by us in the treaty of peace. What a strain of insolence, therefore, is it in a minister to lay claim to what he is conscious all his efforts tended to prevent, and meanly to arrogate to himself a share in the fame and glory of one of the greatest princes the world has ever seen. The King of Prussia, however, has gloriously kept all his former conquests, and stipulated security for all his allies, even for the Elector of Hanover. I know in what light this great prince is considered in Europe, and in what manner he has been treated here, among other reasons, perhaps, from some contemptuous expressions he may have used of the Scot. expressions which are every day ecclosed by the whole body of Linglishmen through the southern part of this island.

Junius

On the 21st of January 1769 appeared the first of a series of seventy political letters, bearing the signature of 'Junius,' which soon took their place among the most famous and debatable works in the English language. Great excitement prevailed in the nation The contest with the American colonies, the imposition of new taxes, the difficulty of forming a steady administration, and the eloquence of the Opposition had spread a feeling of dissatisfaction throughout the country secution of Wilkes added fuel to the flame, Lord North said bitterly that 'the press overflowed the land with its black gall, and poisoned the minds of the people.' The Government was unequal to the emergency, it would have required a Cabinet of preternatural powers to triumph over the opposition of debaters like Chathim and Burke, and writers like Junius The most popular newspaper of that day was the Public Advertiser, published by Henry Sampson Woodfall, a man of education and standing, and it was in it that the letters of They attacked all the public Junius appeared characters of the day connected with the Government, they retailed much private scandal and personal history, and did not spare even royalty itself The compression, point, and brilliancy of their language, their unrivalled sarcasm, boldness, and tremendous invective, at once arrested the attention of the public, the principles of Junius were moderate compared with his personalities effort was made by the Government to discover their author, but in vain. 'It is not in the nature of things,' he writes to his publisher, 'that you or anybody else should know me, unless I make myself known all arts or inquiries or rewards would be ineffectual, ' 'I am the sole depositors of my secret, and it shall die with me? event verified the prediction, even now the more generally accepted theory of the authorship is strenuously denied by some of the most careful and competent inquirers The letters were published at intervals between the 21st of January 1769 and the 21st of January 1772. They were revised by the author, and reprinted two months later in two small volumes by Woodfall An edition which appeared in 1812 contained a hundred and thirteen letters in addition to the seventy in the author's edition, five only of the hundred and thirteen were signed Junius, and one of the file, dated 21st of

November 1768, was the first which bore that

Junius immediately attracted attention by his familiarity with State secrets and notable persons, and by his boldness in commenting upon them, the climan being reached by the letter to the king on the 16th of December 1769, when he bid George III remember that while the crown 'was acquired by one revolution, it may be lost by another' Woodfall was prosecuted for printing and publishing the letter in his paper, and acquitted on a teclinical point, while Almon, a bookseller, was punished for selling a reprint of it. Burke was generally supposed to be the pseudonymous censor till his denial was accepted as conclusive, among the many supposed authors of the letters were Lord Shelburne, Barré, Lord George Sackville, Wilkes, Horne Fooke, and Lord Lyttelton It was not till after the publication of the edition of 1812 that Sir Philip Francis was publicly affirmed to be Junius by John Taylor In the first of his two books on the subject (1813 and 1816) Taylor argued that the letters were from the pens of Dr Francis and his son, in the second, that the son was the sole author De Quincey, Earl Stanhope, and Lord Macaulay accepted the Franciscan theory 'The external evidence,' says Macaulay, 'is, we think, such as would support a verdict in a civil, nay, in a criminal proceeding. The handwriting of Junius is the very peculiar handwriting of Francis, slightly disguised As to the position, pursuits, and connections of Junius, the following are the most important facts which can be considered as clearly proved. First, that he was acquainted with the technical forms of the Secre tary of State's office, secondly, that he was intimately acquainted with the business of the War Office, thirdly, that he during the year 1770 attended debates in the House of Lords, and took notes of speeches, particularly of the speeches of Lord Chatham, fourthly, that he bitterly resented the appointment of Mr Chamier to the place of Deputy Secretary at War, fifthly, that he was bound by some strong tie to the first Lord Holland Now, Francis passed some years in the Secretary of State's office. He was subsequently chief clerk of the War Office. He repeatedly mentioned that he lind himself, in 1770, heard speeches of Lord Chatham, and some of these speeches were actually printed from his notes He resigned his clerkship at the War Office from resentment at the appointment of Mr Chamier It was by Lord Holland that he was first introduced into the public service. Now, here are five marks, all of which ought to be found in Junius They are all five found in Francis We do not believe that more than two of them can be found in any other person whatever If this argument does not settle the question, there is an end of all reasoning on circumstantial evidence?

Philip Francis, the son of the Rev Philip Francis, translator of Horace and political writer, was born in Dublin in 1740, and at sixteen was placed by Lord Holland in the Secretary of State's By the patronage of Pitt (Lord Chatham) he was made secretary to General Bligh in 1758, and was present at the capture of Cherbourg, in 1760 he accompanied Lord Kinnoull as secretary on his embassy to Lisbon, and in 1763-72 he was first clerk in the War Office In 1773 he was made a member of the Council of Bengal, whence he returned in 1781, after being perpetually at feud with the Governor General, Warren Hastings, and being wounded by him in a duel He afterwards sat in Parliament, supporting Whig principles, was one of the 'Friends of the People' in association with Fox, Tierney, and Grey, and died in 1818 He took part in the prosecution of Hastings, and wrote many pamphlets It should be added that Francis never acknowledged that he was Junius, still less claimed the distinction The speeches, letters, and pamphlets of Sir Philip display much of the talent found in Junius, though they are less rhetorical in style, while the history and temper of the man-his strong resentments, his arrogance, his keen interest to the last in public questions, are just what might be expected of Woodfall's veiled prophet. It was not till half a century after the publication of Junius's own edition of his letters that the theory of a disguised handwriting was started in order to get over the difficulty that the natural hand of Francis was unlike that of the Junian manuscripts. No direct or indisputable proof has yet connected Francis with Junius, but, whoever he was, he set a pattern for the leading articles (unknown in his day) through which newspapers now influence public opinion

From the Forty-second Letter

The ministry, it seems, are labouring to draw a line of distinction between the honour of the crown and the rights of the people. This new idea has yet been only started in discourse, for, in effect, both objects have been equally sacrificed. I neither understand the distinction, nor what use the ministry propose to make of it. The king's honour is that of his people. real honour and real interest are the same, I am not contending for a vain punctilio A clear, unblemished character comprehends not only the integrity that will not offer, but the spirit that will not submit to an injury, and whether it belongs to an individual or to a community, it is the foundation of peace, of independ ence, and of safety Private credit is wealth, public honour is security, the feather that adorns the royal bird supports its flight, strip him of his plumage and you fix him to the earth

George III. and Wilkes

He said more than moderate men would justify, but not enough to entitle him to the honour of your Majesty's personal resentment. The rays of royal indignation, collected upon him, served only to illuminate, and could not consume Animated by the favour of the people on one side, and heated by persecution on the other, his views and sentiments changed with his situation. Hardly serious at first, he is now an enthusiast. The coldest bodies warm with opposition, the hardest sparkle in collision. There is a holy mis taken zeal in politics as well as in religion. By persuading others, we convince ourselves. The passions are engaged, and create a maternal affection in the mind, which forces us to love the cause for which we suffer

To the Duke of Grafton.

The character of the reputed ancestors of some men has made it possible for their descendants to be vicious in the extreme, without being degenerate. Those of your Grace, for instance, left no distressing examples of virtue even to their legitimate posterity, and you may look back with pleasure to an illustrious pedigree in which heraldry has not left a single good quality npon record to insult or upbraid you. You have better proofs of your descent, my Lord, than the register of a marriage, or any troublesome inheritance of reputation. There are some hereditary strokes of character by which a family may be as clearly distinguished as by the blackest features of the human face Charles the First lived and died a hypocrite. Charles the Second was a hypocrite of another sort, and should have died upon the same scaffold. At the distance of a century, we see their different characters happily revived and blended in your Grace Sullen and severe without religion, profligate without gaiety, you live like Charles II with ont being an amiable companion, and for aught I know, may die as his father did, without the reputation of a martyr

To the Duke of Bedford.

My Lord, you are so little accustomed to receive any marks of respect or esteem from the public, that if in the following lines a compliment or expression of applause should escape me, I fear you would consider it as a mockery of your established character, and perhaps an insult to your understanding You have nice feelings, my Lord, if we may judge from your resentments. Cautious, therefore, of giving offence where you have so little deserved it, I shall leave the illustration of your virtues to other hands friends have a privilege to play upon the easiness of your temper, or possibly they are better acquainted with your good qualities than I am You have done The rest is upon record You have good by stealth still left ample room for speculation when panegyrie is exhausted

Let us consider yon, then, as arrived at the summit of worldly greatness, let us suppose that all your plans of avarice and ambition are accomplished, and your most sanguine wishes gratified in the fear as well as the hatred of the people. Can age itself forget that you are now in the list act of life? Can grey hairs make folly venerable? and is there no period to be reserved for meditation and retirement? For shame, my Lord! Let it not be recorded of you that the littest moments of your life were dedicated to the same unworthy pursuits the same busy agitations, in which your youth and manhood were exhausted. Consider that, although you cannot disgrace your former life, you are violating the character of age, and exposing the impotent imbecility, after you have lost the vigour, of the pission.

Your friends will ask, perhaps, Whither shall this unhappy old man retire? Can he remain in the metropolis, where his life has been so often threatened, and his palace so often attacked? If he returns to Woburn, scorn and mockery twait him life must create a solitude round his estate, if he would avoid the free of reproach and derision. At Plymouth, his destruction would be more than probable, at Exeter, inevitable No honest Englishman will ever forget his attachment, nor any honest Scotchman forgive his treachery, to Lord Bute. At every town he enters he must change his hiveness and his name. Whichever way he flies, the hue and cry of the country pursues him.

In another kingdom, indeed, the blessings of his administration have been more sensibly felt, his virtues better understood, or at worst, they will not for him alone forget their hospitality. As well might Verres have returned to Sicily. You have twice escaped, my Lord, beware of a third experiment. The indignation of a whole people, plundered, insulted, and oppressed as they have been, will not always le disappointed.

It is in vain therefore to shift the scene no more fly from your enemies than from yourself Persecuted abroad, you look into your own heart for consolation, and find nothing but reproaches and de spair But, my Lord, you may quit the field of business, though not the field of danger, and though you cannot be safe, you may cease to be ridiculous. I fear you have listened too long to the advice of those pernicious friends with whose interests you have sordidly united your own, and for whom you have sacrificed everything that ought to be dear to a man of honour They are still base enough to encourage the follies of your age, as they once did the vices of your youth acquainted with the rules of decorum as vith the laws of morality, they will not suffer you to profit liv experience, nor even to consult the propriety of a had character Even now they tell you that life is no more than a dramatic scene, in which the hero should pre serve his consistency to the last, and that, as you lived without virtue, you should die without repentance.

To the King

When the complaints of a brave and powerful people are observed to increase in proportion to the wrongs they have suffered, when, instead of sinking into submission, they are roused to resistance, the time will soon arrive at which every inferior consideration must yield to the security of the sovereign, and to the general safety of the state There is a moment of difficulty and danger at which flattery and falsehood can no longer deceive, and simplicity itself can no longer be misled Let us suppose it arrived. Let us suppose a gricious, well intentioned prince, made sensible at last of the great duty he owes to his people, and of his own disgraceful situation-that he looks round him for assistance, and asks for no advice but how to gratify the wishes and secure the happiness of his subjects. In these circum stances, it may be matter of curious speculation to consider if an honest man were permitted to approach a king, in what terms he would address himself to his sovereign. Let it be imagined, no matter how improb able, that the first prejudice against his character is removed, that the ccremonious difficulties of an authorice are surmounted, that he feels himself animated by the purest and most honourable affections to his king and country, and that the great person whom he addresses has spirit enough to bid him speak freely, and understanding enough to listen to him with a ention acquainted with the vain impertinence of forms, he would deliver his sentiments with dignity and firmness, but not without respect

'Sir,-It is the misfortune of your life, and originally the cause of every reproach and distress which has attended your government, that you should never have been requainted with the language of truth until you heard it in the complaints of your people. It is not, hos ever, too late to correct the error of your education We are still inclined to make an indulgent allowance for the permeious lessons you received in your youth, and to torm the most sanguine hopes from the natural benevo lence of your disposition We are far from thinking von capable of a direct, deliberate purpose to invade those original rights of your subjects on which all their civil and political liberties depend. Had it been pos sible for us to entertain a suspicion so dishonourable to your character, we should long since have adopted a style of remonstrance very distant from the humility of complaint. The doctrine inculcated by our laws, 'that the king can do no wrong,' is admitted without relue tince. We separate the amiable, good natured prince from the fully and treachery of his servants, and the private virtues of the man from the vices of his govern ment Were it not for this just distinction, I know not whether your Majesty's condition or that of the English nation would deserve most to be lamented. I would prepare your mind for a favourable reception of truth by removing every painful, offensive idea of personal reproach Your subjects, Sir, wish for nothing but that, as they are reasonable and affectionate enough to sepa rate your person from your government, so you, in your turn, should distinguish between the conduct which becomes the permanent dignity of a king and that which serves only to promote the temporary interest and miserable ambition of a minister

'You ascended the throne with a declared and, I doubt not, a sincere resolution of giving universal satis faction to your subjects I ou found them pleased with the novelty of n young prince whose countenance promised even more than his words, and loyal to you not only from principle but passion. It was not a cold profession of allegiance to the first magistrate, but a partial, animated attachment to a favourite prince, the native of their country They did not wait to examine your conduct, nor to be determined by experience, but give you a generous credit for the future blessings of your reign, and paid you in advance the dearest tribute of their affections. Such, Sir, was once the disposition of a people who now surround your throne with reproaches and complaints Do justice to yourself Banish from your mind those unworthy opinions with which some interested persons have laboured to possess you trust the men who tell you that the English are naturally light and inconstant—that they complain without a cause Withdraw your confidence equally from all parties-from ministers, favourites and relations and let there be one moment in your life in which you have consulted your oun understanding

'When you affectedly renounced the uame of English man [the king, in his first speech from the throne, had said he 'gloried in the name of Briton'], believe me, Sir, you were persuaded to pay a very ill judged compliment to one part of your subjects at the expense of another While the natives of Scotland are not in actual rebellion, they are undoubtedly entitled to protection, nor do I mean to condemn the policy of giving some encourage ment to the novelty of their affections for the house of Hanover. I am ready to hope for everything from their new born zeal, and from the future steadiness of their alleginee. But hitherto they have no claim to your favour. To honour them with a determined predilection and confidence, in exclusion of your English subjects who placed your family, and in spite of treachery and rebellion have supported it, upon the throne, is a mistake too gross even for the unsuspecting generosity of youth. In this error we see a capital violation of the most obvious rules of policy and prudence. We trace it, however, to an original bias in your education, and are ready to allow for your inexperience.

'To the same early influence we attribute it that you have descended to take a share not only in the narrow views and interests of particular persons, but in the fatal malignity of their passions. At your accession to the throne the whole system of government was altered, not from wisdom or deliberation, but because it had been adopted by your predecessor. A little personal motive of pique and resentment was sufficient to remove the ablest servants of the crown, but it is not in this country, Sir, that such men can be dishonoured by the frowns of a king. They were dismissed, but could not be disgraced.

'Without consulting your minister, call together your whole council Let it appear to the public that you can determine and act for yourself. Come forward to your people. Lay aside the wretched formulaties of a king, and speak to your subjects with the spirit of a man and in the language of a gentleman Tell them you have been fatally deceived The acknowledgment will be no disgrace, but rather an honour to your understanding Tell them you are determined to remove every cause of complaint against your government, that you will give your considence to no man who does not possess the confidence of your subjects, and leave it to themselves to determine, by their conduct at a future election, whether or no it be in reality the general seuse of the nation, that their rights have been arbitrarily invaded by the present House of Commons, and the constitution betrayed They will then do justice to their representa tives and to themselves

'These sentiments, Sir, and the style they are conveyed in, may be offensive, perhaps, because they are new to Accustomed to the language of courtiers, you measure their affections by the vehemence of their ex pressions, and when they only praise you indirectly, you But this is not a time to trifle admire their sincerity They deceive you, Sir, who tell you with your fortune that you have many friends whose affections are founded upon a principle of personal attachment. The first foundation of friendship is not the power of conferring benefits, but the equality with which they are received and may be returned The fortune which made you n It is a law of nature king forbade you to have a friend which cannot be violated with impunity. The mistaken prince who looks for friendship will find a favourite, and in that favourite the ruin of his affairs.

'The people of England are loyal to the house of Hanover, not from a vain preference of one family to another, but from a conviction that the establishment of that family was necessary to the support of their civil and religious liberties. This, Sir, is a principle of allegiance equally solid and rational, fit for Englishmen to adopt, and well worthy of your majesty's encouragement.

We cannot long be deleded by nominal distinctions. The name of Stuar of itself is only contemp tible, armed with the sovereign authority, their principles are formed able. The prince the imitates their conduct should be warned by example, and while he plumes himself upon the security of his title to the crom, should remember that, as it was acquired by one revolution, it may be lost by ano her

Ser Junius (2 vo.s. 17-2). Junius (3 vols. 1212). the Life of Francis by Parkes and Merivale (17-6). articles in Dike s. Papers of a Critic (17-12). articles in the Athenarum for 1282 and 17-97 by Mr. Fraver Rae. Chabo. and Twistleton, The Hardwriting of Junius (1871). H. R. Fraves. Junius Preveiled (1894). and The Francis Letters, edited by Beala Francis and Eliza Keary (1990).

Dr John Langhorne (1735-79), born at Kirl oy Stephen in Westmorland, was for two years a London curate, and then from 1766 rector of Blagdon, Somerset, with a prebend of Wells Langhorne wrote various prose works, the most successful being the Letters of Tleodosius and Constantia, and in conjunction with his brother, the Rev WILIIAM LANGHORNE (1721-72), he published a translation of Plutarch's Lives (1770) long the standard one. His efforts in satire and drama nere unsuccessful, his ballad Owen of Carron, founded on the old Scotush tale of Gil Morrice, is smooth and rhythmical, but in poetical value falls far below its original. The only poem of Langhorne's which has a true vein of originality is his Country Justice (1774-77), and there lic anticipated Crabbe in painting the rural life of His picture of the England in true colours Gypsies, and his sletches of venal clerks and i rapacious overseers, are genuine lil enesses has not the raciness or vividness of Crabbe, but he has all Crabbe's fidelity, and he pleads as varmly for the poor vagrant

Still mark if vice or nature prompts the deed, Still mark the strong templation and the need On pressing wan, on famine a powerful call, At least more leuient let the justice fall. For him who, lost to every hope of life, Has long with Fortune held unequal strife, Known to no human love, no human care, The friendle s, homeless object of despair For the poor vagrant feel, while he complains, Nor from ad freedom send to sadder chains. Alike if folly or misfortune brought Those last of woes his evil days have wrought, Believe with social mercy and with me, Foll, 's misfortune in the first degree.

Perhaps ou some inhospitable shore. The houseless wretch a widoved parent bore, who then, no more by golden prospects led. Of the poor Indian begged a leafy bed. Cold on Canadian hills or Minden's plain, Perhaps that parent mourned her soldier slain, Bent o'er her bake, her eye dissolved in dew, The big drops mingling with the mill he drew, Gare the sad presage of his future years, The child of misery, baptised in tears.

This allusion to the dead soldier and his widow on the field of battle was the subject of a print by Bunbury, under which vere engraved Langhorne's pathetic lines—Scott recorded that the only time he saw Robert Burns, a copy of this picture was in the room in Dr Adam Ferguson's house. Burns shed tears over it, and Scott, then a lad of fifteen, told him where the lines were to be found. The print seen by Burns is now in the Chambers Institution at Peebles, having been presented to Dr Robert Chambers by Sir Adam Ferguson, son of the historian and transferred by Dr R Chambers to Dr William Chambers for preservation in the Institution. The name of 'Langhorne,' though in very small characters, is engraved on the print below the quotation, and this had drawn Scott's attention to the poem

Appeal to Justices in behalf of the Poor

Let age no longer toil with feeble strife, Worn by long service in the war of life, Nor leave the head, that time liath whitened, nare To the rude insults of the searching air, Nor bid the linee, by labour hardened, bend, O thou, the poor man's hope, the poor man's friend!

If, when from heaven severer seasons fall, Fled from the frozen roof and mouldering wall, Each face the picture of a winter day, More strong than Teniers' pencil could portray, If then to thee resort the shivering train, Of cruel days, and cruel man complain, Say to thy heart—remembering him who said—'These people come from far, and have no bread'

Nor leave the venal clerk empowered to hear, The voice of want is sacred to the ear. He where no fees his sordid pen invite, Sports with their tears, too indolent to write, Life the fed monkey in the fable, vain To hear more helpless animals complain

But chief thy notice shall one monster claim, A monster furnished with a human frame—
The parish officer!—though verse disdain
Terms that deform the splendour of the strain,
It stoops to bid thee bend the brow severe
On the sly, pillering, cruel overseer,
The shuffling farmer, faithful to no trust,
Ruthless as rocks, insatiate as the dust!

When the poor hind, vith length of years decayed, Leans feebly on his once subduing spade, Forgot the service of his abler days, His profitable toil and honest praise, Shall this low wretch abridge his scanty bread, This slave, whose board his former labours spread?

When harvest's burning suns and sickening air From Iabour's unbraced hand the grusped hook tear, Where shall the helpless family be fed, That vainly languish for a father's bread? See the pale mother, sunk with grief and care, To the proud farmer fearfully repair, Soon to be sent with insolence away, Referred to vestries, and a distant day! Referred—to perish! Is my verse severe? Unfriendly to the human character? Ah! to this sigh of sad experience trust. The truth is rigid, but the tale is just.

If m thy courts this causiff wretch appear, Think not that patience were a virtue here. His low born pride with honest rage control, Sinite his hard heart, and shake his reputle soul But, hapless! oft through fear of future wee,

And certain vengernee of the insulting for, Oft, ere to thee the poor prefer their prayer, The last extremes of penury they bear

Wouldst thou then ruse thy patriot office higher? To something more than magistrate aspire! And, left each poorer pettier chase behind Step nobly forth, the friend of humankind! The game I start courageously pursue! Adicu to fear I to insolence adien! And first we'll range this mountain's stormy side, Where the rude winds the shepherd's roof deride As meet no more the wintry blast to bear, And all the wild hostilities of air That roof have I remembered many a year. It once give refuge to a hunted deer-Here, in those days, we found an aped pair But time untenants—had what seed thou there? 'Horror '- by Heaven extended on a bed Of maked fern, two human erestures dead " I inbracing as alive '-ali no '-no life ' Cold, breathless!

The the shepherd and his wife I knew the scene and brought thee to behold What speaks more strongly than the story told—I hey died through want

'By every power I swear,
If the wretch treads the earth, or breathes the air
Through whose default of duty, or design
These victims fell, he dies'

A Farewell Hymn to the Valley of Irwan

Farewell, the fields of Irwan's vale,
My infant years where I area led,
And soothed me with the western gale,
Her wild dreams waving round my head,
While the blittle blackbird told his rale
I arewell, the fields of Irwan's vale?

The primrose on the valley's side,

The green theme on the mountain's head, the wanton rose, the daisy pied,
The wilding's blossom blushing red

No longer I their sweets inhole I arewell, the fields of Irwan's vale

How off, within you vicant shade,
Has evening closed my carcless eve!
How off, along those banks I've strayed,
And watched the wave that wandered by,
Full long their loss shall I bewal
I arewell, the fields of Irwan's vale!

Yet still, within you vacant grove,
To murk the close of parting day,
Along you flowery banks to rove,
And watch the wave that winds away,
Fair Pancy sure shall never fail,
Though far from these and Irwan's vale

John Langhorne's Poetical 11 orks were collected by his son, the Rev John T Langhorne (2 vols 1804) and are included in the sixteenth volume of Chalmers's Fuglish Foets

William Julius Wickle (1735-88) i remem bered is in early translator of the Luxual from the Portugue a of Company, and was a poet of some natural raft, though of no sicil poses. He was son of the immeter of Lingholm in Dumfiles slare, and became clerk and then chief permer in in I dinbuigh brevery, but he fuled in bu mess, and in 1763 went tiel ondon's ith literary aubitions. Lord Lyttelian encouraged his poetic efforts, and Mielle was brosed up with dreams of patronage I wo years of mere ising destrution and eclebrate dispelled this vision, and the poet was glad to recept a situation as corrector of the Claimfon Press at Oxford (1765) Here he published Pellio an elem, and the Cor i have, a poem in the manner of Spenser, which he afters and reprinted such the title of Si*r Harlyi* Middle directed the archaic phrascology of Speas ray Inch was intigered even in the i, e of the Lacrie Queere and had been ilmost vibolly discreded by Thomson in his Cartle of Indoteric The first stand of the peem was quoted by Sir William Scott-diverted of its anuque spelling to sho that Mickle, with a vein of great ficility, united a power of verbal inclody, which might have been enough by bands of much greater renoun !

The poem was highly successful—not the less perhaps because it was printed anonymously and was isorphed to different authors, and it went Veltaire in the Studes through three editions (1770) was in ittack on Hume. In 1771 Mickle published the first canto of his Camoens, which was completed in 1775 and being supported by a long list of subscribers, was highly advantageous His somewhite both to his fame and fortune Popenn version of Os Iustadas is a fairly close rendering, with occasional expansions and para phrises, but in its smoothness loses much of the directness of the original. In 1779 he went out to Portugal as secretary to Commodore Johnstone, and was received with much distinction in Lisbon On the return of by the countrymen of Camoens the expedition Mickle was appointed joint agent for the distribution of the prizes. His own share and having received some was considerable money by his marriage with a farmer's daughter whom he had known in his obscure sojourn at Oxford, he spent his last years in ease and leisure He died at I orest Hill near Oxford

The most notable of Mickle's original poems is his balled of Cumnor Hall (1784), which acquired additional interest later on through its having suggested to Sir Walter Scott the groundwork of Kemlworth, it was Constable v ho proposed the title Kemlworth after Scott had intended to give the novel the same name as the ballad. Mickle also wrote a play on The Stege of Marseilles, which Garrick refused, and the Prophecy of Queen Emma, on American independence. He assisted in Evans's Collection of Old Balladsin which Cumnor Hall and other pieces of his first appeared in 1784, and though he did not reproduce the direct simplicity and unsophisticated ardour of the real old ballads, he attained to something of their tenderness and pathos a number of songs, the last being on his birthplace, Eskdale Braes The famous Scotch song originally called, somewhat absurdly, The Mariner's Wife, but usually named from its chorus There's nae Luck about the House, is almost certainly Mickle's, though in 1810 Cromek asserted it to be the work of Jean Adam (afterwards calling herself Miss Jane Adams), successively servant-maid in Greenock, schoolmistress, and hawker, who, born in 1710, died in 1765 in the Glasgow poorhouse, having published in 1734 a small volume of poor religious poems There's nae Luck was sung in the streets about 1772, and was first asserted to be Jean's by some of her old pupils, without evidence. An imperfect, altered, and corrected copy was found among Mickle's manuscripts after his death, and his widow confirmed the external evidence in his favour by an express declaration that her husband had said the song was his own, and that he had explained to her the It is the fairest flower in his Scottish words poetical chaplet, but was not published till after his death, by the editor of his works (1806) Beattie (a kinsman of Mickle's) added a double stanza to this song, containing a happy epicurean fancy-which Burns, who commended the whole song as 'one of the most beautiful songs in the Scots or any language,' said was 'worthy of the first poet '

Cumnor Hall.

The dews of summer night did fall,
The moon, sweet regent of the sky,
Silvered the walls of Cumnor Hall,
And many an oak that grew thereby

Now nought was heard beneath the skies, The sounds of busy life were still, Save an unhappy lady's sighs, That issued from that lonely pile.

- 'Leicester,' she cried, 'is this thy love That thou so oft has sworn to me, To leave me in this lonely grove, Immured in shameful privity?
- 'No more thou com'st, with lover's speed,
  Thy once beloved bride to see,
  But be she alive, or be she dead,
  I fear, stern Earl, 's the same to thee.

- 'Not so the usage I received
  When happy in my father's hall,
  No faithless husband then me grieved,
  No chilling fears did me appal.
- 'I rose up with the cheerful morn,
  No lark so blithe, no flower more gay,
  And, like the bird that haunts the thorn,
  So merrily sung the livelong day
- 'If that my beauty is but small,
  Among court ladies all despised,
  Why didst thou rend it from that hall,
  Where, scornful Earl, it well was prized?
- 'And when you first to me made suit,
  How fair I was, you oft would say!
  And, proud of conquest, plucked the fruit,
  Then left the blossom to decay
- 'Yes' now neglected and despised,
  The rose is pale, the lily's dead,
  But he that once their charms so prized,
  Is sure the cause those charms are fled.
- 'For know, when sickening grief doth prey And tender love's repaid with scorn, The sweetest beauty will decay What floweret can endure the storm?
- 'At court, I'm told, is beauty's throne,
  Where even lady's passing rare,
  That Eastern flowers, that shame the sun,
  Are not so glowing, not so fair
- 'Then, Earl, why didst thou leave the beds Where roses and where lilies vic, To seek a primrose, whose pale shades Must sicken when those gauds are by?
- ''Mong rural beauties I was one,
  Among the fields wild flowers are fair,
  Some country swain might me have won,
  And thought my passing beauty rare.
- 'But, Leicester—or I much am wrong— It is not beauty lures thy vows, Rather ambition's gilded crown Makes thee forget thy humble spouse.
- 'Then, Leicester, why again I plead— The injured surely may repine— Why didst thou wed a country maid, When some fair princess might be thine?
- 'Why didst thou praise my humble charms, And, oh! then leave them to decay? Why didst thou win me to thy arms, Then leave to mourn the livelong day?
- 'The village maidens of the plain Salute me lowly as they go Envious they mark my silken train, Nor think a countess can have woe.
- 'The simple nymphs! they little know How far more happy's their estate, To smile for joy, than sigh for woe, To be content, than to be great.
- * How far less blest am I than them, Daily to pine and waste with care! Like the poor plant, that, from its stem Divided, feels the chilling air

'Nor, cruel I arl' can I enjoy
The humble charms of solitude,
Your minions proud my peace de troy,
By sullen frowns or prating rude

"I ast night as and I chanced to stray
The village death bell smote my ear
They winked aside, and beined to my
"Counters, prepare—thy end remeat

And now, while happy personts 1 ep,
Here I sit lonely and forlorn
No one to soothe me as 1 weep,
Save Philomel on yonder thorn

'My spirits flas, my hope decay Still that dread death bell simites my car, And many a body cems to ay "Countess, propage thy end is near."

Thus sore and sad that lady given land Cumnor Hall, so lone and drear And many a heartfelt sigh she heaved, And let fall many a bitter tear.

And ere the dawn of day appeared,
In Cunnor Hall, so lone and dreat,
I all many a piereing scream was heard,
And many a cry of mortal fear

The death bell three was heard to mig, An actual voice was heard to call And three the raven flapped his ving Around the towers of Cumnor Hall

The mastiff howled at village door,
The oaks were shattered on the green.
Woe was the hour for never more
That hapless Counte's cer was seen

And in that manor, now no more
Is cheerful feast or sprightly ball
I or ever since that dream hour
Have spirits haunted Chimnor Hall

The village maids, with fearful glance
Avoid the ancient moss grown wall
Nor ever lead the merry dance
Among the groves of Cumnor Hall

Full many a traveller has sighed,
And pensive wept the Counters' fall,
As windering onwards they 've espied
The haunted towers of Cumnor Hall

The Spirit of the Cape -From the 'Lusiad.'

Now pro perou gales the ben hing canvas swelled. From these rude shores our fearless course we held. Beneath the clistening wave the god of day. Had now five times withdrawn the parting ray, When o er the prow a sudden darkne—spread. And slowly floating o'er the mast's tall head. A blief cloud hovered, nor appeared from far. The moon's pale glimpse, nor faintly twinkling star, So deep a gloom the lowering vapour east, Fransfixed with awe the bravest stood aghast. Meanwhile a hollow bursting roar resounds. As when hourse surges lash their rocky mounds, Nor had the blackening wave, nor frowning heaven, The wonted signs of gathering tempest given. Amazed ve stood—O thou, our fortnne's guide, Avert this omen, mighty God, I cried, Or through forhidden climes adventurous strayed, Have we the secrets of the deep survived, Which these wide solitudes of seas and sky Were doomed to hide from man's unhallowed eye? Whate'er this prodigy, it threatens more Than midnight tempests and the mingled roar, When sea and sky combine to rock the marble shore.

I spoke, when rising through the darkened air, Appalled, we saw a hideous pliantom glare, High and enormous o'cr the flood he towered, And thwart our way with sullen aspect lowered. Unearthly paleness o'er his cheeks was spread, Erect uprose his hairs of withered red, Writhing to speak, his sable hips disclose, Sharp and disjoined, his gnashing teeth's blue rows, His haggard heard flowed quivering on the wind, Revenge and horror in his mien coinhined, His clouded front, by withering lightning scarred, The inward anguish of his soul declared. His red eyes glowing from their dusky caves Shot livid fires far echoing o'er the waves His voice resounded, as the caverned shore With hollow groan repeats the tempest's roar Cold gliding horrors thrilled each hero's breast, Our bristling hair and tottering knees confessed Wild dread, the while with visage ghastly wan, His black lips trembling, thus the fiend began

"O you, the boldest of the nations, fired By daring pride by lust of fame inspired, Who, scornful of the bowers of sweet repose, Through these my waves advance your learless prows, Regardless of the lengthening watery way, And all the storms that own my sovereign st ay, Who 'mid surrounding rocks and shelves explore Where never hero braved my rage before, Ye sons of Lusus, who, with eyes profane, Have viewed the secrets of my awful reign, Have passed the bounds which jealous Nature drew, To veil her secret shrine from mortal view, Hear from my lips what direful woes attend, And bursting soon shall o'er your race descend

'With every bounding keel that dares my rage,
Eternal war my rocks and storms shall wage,
The next proud fleet that through my dear domain,
With daring search shall hoist the streaming vane,
That gallant navy by my whirlwinds tossed,
And raging seas, shall perish on my coast.
Then he who first my secret reign descried,
A naked corse wide floating o'er the tide
Shall drive Unless my heart's full raptures fail,
O Lusus' oft shalt thou thy children wail,
Each year thy shipwrecked sons shalt thou deplore,
Each year thy sheeted masts shall strew my shore.'

He spoke, and deep a lengthened sigh lie drew, A doleful sound, and vanished from the view, The frightened billows gave a rolling swell, And distant far prolonged the dismal yell, Faint and more faint the howling echoes die, And the black cloud dispersing, leaves the sky

There is an edition of Mickle's works with Life, by Sim (1809). Mickle's translation of the Lunad superseded that of Fanshawe and has been succeeded by those of Quillinan Musgrave, Mitchell and Sir Richard Burton

James Beattie (1735-1803) was the son of a small farmer and shopkeeper at Laurencekirk in Kincardine. He lost his father in childhood, but was assisted in his education by a kindly elder brother, and in his fourteenth year he obtained a bursary or exhibition (implying some proficiency in Latin) at Marischal College, Aberdeen Having graduated and been appointed schoolmaster of the parish of Fordoun (1753), he was placed amidst scenery which stirred his love of nature and poetry scenes sketched in his Minstrel were plainly those m which he had grown up, and the feelings and aspirations therein expressed were those of his own boyhood and youth In 1758 he was elected a master of the grammar-school of Aberdeen, and in 1760 Professor of Vloral Philosophy and Logic in Marischal College In 1761 he published a collection of poems and translations contributed from time to time to the Scots Magazine, the piece called Retirement being most noticeable 1765 appeared The Judgment of Paris, and some ungenerous verses on the death of Churchill His ardour for what he held to be the truth led him at times into intolerance, and he was too fond of courting the notice and approbation of the great. In 1770 the poet appeared as a metaphysician in his Essay on Truth, where orthodox principles vere defended in no very philosophical temper, and in a style which suffered by comparison with that of his illustrious opponent, David Hume. Next year the first part of The Minstrel was published, and was received with universal approbation. Honours flowed in on the fortunate author He visited London, and was admitted to all its brilliant and distinguished circles, Goldsmith, Johnson, Garrick, and Reynolds were numbered among his friends On a second visit in 1773 he had an interview with the king and queen, which resulted in a pension of £200 per annum Oxford made him LLD, and Revnolds painted his portrait in an allegorical picture, in which he was seen by the side of the angel of Truth, thrusting down Prejudice, Scepticism, and Folly (two of them meant for Hume and Voltaire) He was even promised preferment in the Church of England The second part of the Minstrel was published in 1774, the projected third Domestic sorrows marred part never appeared Beattie's otherwise happy lot. His wife became insane, and had to be confined in an asylum, and he lost both of his accomplished sons his last years he was overcome by despondency, and sank into mental and physical decay

To a new edition of the Essay on Truth in 1776, Beattie added essays on poetry and music, on laughter, and on the utility of classical learning, and in 1783 he published a series of moral and critical Dissertations, of which Cowper said that Beattie was the only author whose philosophical works were 'diversified and embellished by a poetical imagination that makes even the driest subject and the leanest a feast for epicures' The

The Minstrel, on which Beattie's fame now rests, is a diductic poem, in the Spenserian stanza, designed to 'trace the progress of a poetical genius, born in a rude ige, from the first dawning of fancy and reason till that period at which he may be supposed capable of appearing in the world as a minstrel' The idea was suggested by Percy's preliminary Dissertation to his Reliques The character of Edwin, the minstrel-in which Beattie embodied his own early feelings and poetical aspirations—is the most essential part of a rather plinless poem, the digressions and disqui sitions being more tedious than the descriptive passages Beattie was by nature a man of quick and tender sensibilities, and was well read in Gray, Collins, and other poets of the period no original poctic power, but here and there he shows a keener love for the romantic and grand in nature than is found in his predecessors (thus ranking amongst the promoters of Romanticism), and some of his really picturesque descriptions, in melodious verse, may yet be read with pleasure His verses to Alexander Ross, the author of The Fortunate Shepherdess, give him a minor place among Scottish vernacular poets The two first selections which follow are from the Minstel, the third from the ballad entitled The Hermit

Beginning of 'The Minstrel'

Ah! who can tell how hard it is to climb
The steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar, Ah! who can tell how many a soul sublime
Has felt the influence of malignant star,
And waged with Fortune an eternal war,
Checked by the scoff of Pride, by Livy's frown,
And Poverty's unconquerable bar,
In life's low vale remote has pined alone,
Then dropped into the grave, unpitted and unknown!

And yet the languor of inglorious days
Not equally oppressive is to all
Ilim, who ne'er listened to the voice of praise,
The silence of neglect can ne'er appal
There are, who, deaf to mad Ambition's call,
Would shrink to hear the obstreperous trump of Tame, Supremely blest, if to their portion fall
Health, competence, and peace. Nor higher aim
Had he, whose simple tale these artless lines proclaim

The rolls of fame I will not now explore, Nor need I here describe, in learned lay, llow forth the Minstrel fared in days of yore, Right glad of heart, though homely in array, llis waving locks and beard all hoars gray, While from his bending shoulder, decent hung llis harp, the sole companion of his way, Which to the whistling wind responsive rung And ever as he went some merry lay he sung

I ret not thyself, thou glittering child of pride, That a poor villager inspires my strain, With thee let Pageantry and Power abide, The gentle Muses haunt the sylvan reign Where through wild groves at eve the lonely swain Enraptured roams, to gaze on Nature's charms. They hate the sensual, and scorn the vain, The parasite their influence never warms, Nor him whose sordid soul the love of gold alarms. Though richest hues the peacock's plumes adorn, Yet horror screams from his discordant throat Rise, sons of harmony, and hail the morn, While warbling larks on russet pinions float

Rise, sons of harmony, and hail the morn,
While warbling larks on russet pinions float
Or seek at noon the woodland scene remote,
Where the gray linnets carol from the hill,
O let them ne'er, with artificial note,
To please a tyrant, strain the little bill,
But sing what Heaven inspires, and wander where they will.

Liberal, not lavish, is kind Nature's hand,
Nor was perfection made for man below
Yet all her schemes with nicest art are planned,
Good counteracting ill, and gladness woe
With gold and gems if Chilian mountains glow,
If bleak and barren Scotia's hills arise,
There plague and poison, lust and rapine grow,
Here peaceful are the vales, and pure the skies,
And freedom fires the soul, and sparkles in the eyes.

Then grieve not thou, to whom the indulgent Muse Vouchsafes a portion of celestral fire

Nor blame the partial Fates, if they refuse
The imperial banquet and the rich attire know thine own worth, and reverence the lyre.

Wilt thou debase the heart which God refined?

No, let thy heaven taught soul to Heaven aspire,
To fancy, freedom, harmony, resigned,

Ambition's grovelling crew for ever left behind

Canst thou forego the pure ethereal soul, In each fine sense so exquisitely keen, On the dull couch of Luxury to loll, Stung with disease, and stupefied with spleen, Frin to implore the aid of Flattery's screen, Even from thyself thy loathsome heart to hide—The mansion then no more of joy serene—Where fear, distrust, malevolence abide, And impotent desire, and disappointed pride?

O how canst thou renounce the boundless store
Of charms which Nature to her votney yields?
The warbling woodland, the resounding shore,
The pomp of groves, and garniture of fields,
All that the genial ray of morning gilds,
And all that echoes to the song of even,
All that the mountain's sheltering bosom shields,
And all the dread magnificence of heaven,
O how canst thou renounce, and hope to be forgiven?

Edwin.

There lived in Gothic days, as legends tell,
A shepherd swain, a man of low degree,
Whose sires, perchance, in Fairyland might dwell,
Sicilian groves, or vales of Arcady,
But he, I ween, was of the north countric,
A nation famed for song, and beauty's charms,
Zealous, yet modest, innocent, though free,
Patient of toil serene amidst alarms
Inflexible in faith invincible in arms

The shepherd swam of whom I mention made, On Scotia's mountains fed his little flock,

The sickle, scythe, or plough he never swayed,
An honest heart was almost all his stock,
His drink the living vater from the rock
The milky dams supplied his board, and lent
Their kindly fleece to baffle winter's shock,
And he, though oft with dust and sweat besprent, Did guide and guard their wanderings, wheresoe'er they went

And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy
Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye.
Dainties he heeded not, nor gaud, nor toy,
Save one short pipe of rudest minstrels;
Silent when glad, affectionate, though shy,
And now his look was most demurely sad,
And now he laughed aloud, yet none knew why
The neighbours stared and sighed, yet blessed the lad,
Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him

But why should I his childish feats display?
Concourse, and noise, and toil he ever fled
Nor cared to mingle in the clamorons fray
Of squabbling imps, but to the forest sped,
Or roamed at large the lonely mountain's head,
Or where the maze of some bewildered stream
To deep introdden groves his footsteps led,
There would he wander wild, till Phoebus' beam,
Shot from the western cliff, released the weary team

The exploit of strength, dextenty, or speed,
To him nor vanity nor joy could bring His heart, from cruel sport estranged, would bleed
To work the woe of any living thing,
By trap or net, by arrow or by sling,
These he detested, those he scorned to wield
He wished to be the guardian, not the king,
Tyrint far less, or truitor of the field,
And sure the sylvin reign unbloody joy might yield

Lo! where the stripling rapt in wonder, roves Beneath the precipice o'crhung with pine And sees on high, amidst the encircling groves, From chiff to chiff the foaming torrents shine While waters, woods, and winds in concert join, And echo swells the chorus to the skies. Would Edwin this majestic scene resign For aught the huntsman's puny craft supplies? Ah, no! he better knows great Nature's charms to prize.

And oft he traced the uplands to survey,
When o'er the sly advanced the kindling dawn,
The crimson cloud, blue main, and mountain gray,
And lake, dim gleiming on the smoky lawn
I ar to the west the long, long vale withdrawn, Where twilight loves to linger for a while
And now he faintly kens the bounding fawn,
And villager abroad at early toil
But, lo! the sun appears, and heaven earth ocean smile

And oft the craggy cliff he loved to climb,
When all in mist the world below was lost—
What dreadful pleasure there to stand sublime,
Like shipwrecked mariner on desert coast,
And view the enormous waste of vapour, tost
In billows, lengthening to the horizon round
Now scooped in gulfs, with mountains now embossed!
And hear the voice of mirth and song rebound.
Flocks, herds, and waterfalls, along the hoar profound!

In truth he was a strange and wayward a ight, I ond of each gentle and each dreadful scenc. In darkness and in storm he found delight, Nor less than when on ocean wave screne, The southern sun diffused his dazzling slicen. Even sad vicissitude amused his sout, And if a sigh would sometimes intervene. And down his cheek a tear of pity roll, A sigh, a tear, so sweet, he wished not to control.

The Hermit

At the close of the day, when the hamlet is still, And mortals the sweets of forgetfulness prove, When nought but the torrent is heard on the hill, And nought but the nightingale's song in the grove Twas thus, by the cave of the mountain afar, While his harp rung symphonions, a hermit began No more with himself or with nature at war, He thought as a sage, though he felt as a man

'Ah' why, all abandoned to darkness and woe, Why, ione Philomela, that languishing fall? I or spring shall return, and a lover bestow, And sorrow no longer thy bosom inthral But, if pity inspire thee, renew the sad lay, Mourn, sweetest complainer, man calls thee to mourn, O soothe him, whose pleasures like thine pass away Full quickly they pass—but they never return

'Now gliding remote on the verge of the sky, The moon half extinguished her crescent displays But lately I marked, when majestic on high She shone, and the planets were lost in her blaze kell on, thou fair orb, and with gladness pursue The path that conducts thee to splendour again But man's faded glory what change shall reney? Ah, fool' to exult in a glory so vain!

'Tis night, and the landscape is lovely no more, I mourn but, ye woodlands. I mourn not for you, For morn is approaching, your charms to restore, Perfunied with fresh fragrance, and glittering with dew Nor yet for the ravage of winter I mourn kind Nature the embryo blossom will save. But when shall spring visit the mouldering urn—O when shall it dawn on the night of the grave?

"Twas thus, by the glare of false science betrayed,
That leads, to bewilder and dazzles to blind
My thoughts wont to roun, from shade onward to shade, Destruction before me and sorrow behind
"O pits, great Father of I ight," then I cried
"The creature, who fun would not wander from thee, Lo humbled in dust, I relinquish my pride
From doubt and from darkness thou only canst free!"

'And darl ness and doubt are now fiving away
No longer I roam in conjecture forlorm
So breaks on the traveller, funt, and astray,
The bright and the balmy effolgence of morn
See Truth, Love and Mercy in troumph descending,
And Nature all glowing in Leen's first bloom'
On the cold cheek of death smiles and roses are Elending
And beauty immortal awakes from the tomb

The standard edition of Beatters points is that by Dyce in the Aldire Serie. Sir W. Forbes published a Life of him in 17 of 1 little es much about him in W. R. Frasers Hutt by el Laureure kirk (1982).

Michael Bruce (1746-67) was born at Kinnesswood in Kinross shire. His father, a poor weaver, trained his children to a knowledge of their letters and a deep sense of religious duty, and in the summer months Michael was put to herd cattle His education suffered, but as poet he found his account in solitary communion with nature, amidst scenery overlooking Lochleven and its ruined castle. In his fifteenth year the boy was judged fit for college, and at this time a relation of his father left him a legacy of 200 merks Scots-£11, 2s 2d sterling This sum the old weaver piously devoted to the education of his favourite son, who, enrolled in December 1762 a student at Edinburgh University, was soon distinguished for general proficiency and for taste in poetry. After three sessions at college, supported by parents, friends, and neighbours, he engaged to teach a school at Gairney Bridge on a salary of about £11 per annum He completed his arts course in 1765, and entered the Divinity Hill in connection with the Burgher, or Associate, Synod, intending to become a minister He obtained another school at Forest Mill near Tillicoultry in 1766, and taught for a time under equally depressing conditions His schoolroom was low-roofed and damp, and the poor youth, oppressed by poverty and disappointment, lost health and spirits. He wrote his poem of Lockleven at Forest Mill, but was at length forced to return to his father's cottage, a victim of consumption With death full in his view he wrote his Elegy-his best poem if we except the debated Cuckoo, whose authorship is discussed in the next article, where the poem is quoted, and he died on 5th July 1767, aged twenty one.

His poems were published in 1770 by his college friend John Logan, who warmly eulogised Bruce's character and talents Anderson's British Poets (1794) contained eleven of Bruce's poems 1807 Principal Baird published an edition by subscription for the benefit of Bruce's mother, then a nobin In 1837 a complete edition of the poems was issued, with a Life of the author, from original sources, by Mr Mackelvie, a Kinross shire minister The pieces left by Bruce have all the marks of youth-a style only half formed and immature, and resemblances to other poets so close and frequent that the reader is constantly stumbling on some familiar image or expression In Lochle in, a descriptive poem in blank verse, he obviously took Thomson as his model opening is a paraphrase of the commencement of Thomson's Spring, and epithets taken from the Seasons occur throughout the whole poem, with traces of Wilton Ossian, and many other fam liar poets. And it is argued that considerable passages are additions by Logan The Last Day, in blank verse, is inferior to Lochleven poems are a pastoral, a pastoral song, a rhymed fable, 'an Instorical ballad' (on Sir James the Ross), and an 'anacreontic'-not to speak of some or all of the hymns or Scripture paraphrases printed as Logan's, including The Complaint of Nature, given in the next article. The Elegy has many weak lines and borrowed ideas (thus the odd locution 'shut of eve' is straight from Blair, page 306), but attracts the reader and stirs sympathetic admiration for the young Christian philosopher who could thus describe the cheering aspects of reviving nature in the certain expectation of his own speedy dissolution.

Elegy-Written in Spring

'Tis past—the iron North has spent his rage, Stern Winter now resigns the lengthening day, The stormy howlings of the winds assuage, And warm o'er ether western breezes play

Of genial heat and cheerful light the source, From southern climes, beneath another sky, The sun, returning, wheels his golden course Before his beams all noxious vapours fly

Far to the north grim Winter draws his train,

To his own elime, to Zembla's frozen shore,

Where, throned on ice, he holds eternal reign,

Where whirlwinds madden, and where tempests roar

Loosed from the bands of frost, the verdant ground Again puts on her robe of cheerful green, Again puts forth her flowers, and all around Smiling, the cheerful face of spring is seen

Behold! the trees new deck their withered boughs,
Their ample leaves, the hospitable plane,
The taper elm, and lofty ash disclose,
The blooming hawthorn variegates the seene.

The lily of the vale, of flowers the queen,
Puts on the robe she neither sewed nor spun,
The birds on ground, or on the branches green,
Hop to and fro, and glitter in the sun

Soon as o'er eastern hills the morning peers,
From her low nest the tuited lark upsprings,
And, cheerful singing, up the air she steers,
Still high she mounts, still loud and sweet she sings.

On the green furze, clothed o'er with golden blooms
That fill the air with fragrance all around,
The linnet sits, and tricks his glossy plumes,
While o'er the wild his broken notes resound

While the sun journeys down the western sky,
Along the greensward, marked with Roman mound,
Beneath the blithsome shepherd's watchful eye,
The cheerful lambkins dance and frisk around

Now is the time for those who wisdom love, Who love to walk in Virtue's flower, road, Along the lovely paths of spring to rove, And follow Nature up to Nature's God

Thus Zoroaster studied Nature's laws,
Thus Socrates, the wisest of munkind,
Thus heaven taught Plato trueed the Almighty cause,
And left the wondering multitude behind

Thus Ashles gathered academic bays,
Thus gentle Thomson, as the seasons roll,
Trught them to sing the great Creator's praise,
And bear their poet's name from pole to pole.

Thus have I walked along the dewy lawn,
My frequent foot the blooming wild hath worn,
Before the lark I've sung the beanteous dawn,
And gathered health from all the gales of morn.

And, even when winter chilled the aged year,
I wandered lonely o'er the hoary plain
Though frosty Boreas warned me to forbear, Boreas, with all his tempests, warned in vain.

Then, sleep my nights, and quiet blessed my days,
I feared no loss, my mind was all my store,
No anxious wishes e'er disturbed my ease,
Heaven gave content and health—I asked no more.

Now spring returns but not to me returns

The vernal joy my better years have known,
Dim in my breast life's dying taper burns,
And all the joys of life with health are flown

Starting and shivering in the inconstant wind, Meagre and pale, the ghost of what I was, Beneath some blasted tree I lie reclined, And count the silent moments as they pass

The winged moments, whose unstaying speed No art can stop, or in their course arrest, Whose flight shall shortly count me with the dead, And lay me down in peace with them at rest.

Oft morning dreams presage approaching fate, And morning dreams, as poets tell, are true. Led by pale ghosts, I enter Death's dark gate, And hid the realms of light and life adieu.

I hear the helpless wail, the shriek of woe,
I see the muddy wave, the dreary shore,
The sluggish streams that slowly creep below,
Which mortals visit, and return no more.

Farewell, ye blooming fields 'ye cheerful plains ' Enough for me the church ard's lonely mound, Where melancholy with still silence reigns, And the ranl grass waves o er the cheerless ground.

There let me wander at the shut of eye,
When sleep sits dewy on the labourer's eyes
The world and all its busy follies leave,
And talk with Wisdom where my Daphnis lies

There let me sleep, forgotten in the clav,
When death shall shut these weary aching eyes,
Rest in the hopes of an eternal day,
Till the long night is gone, and the last morn arise.

John Logan (1748–88) was included by Isaac D'Israeli, in his Calamities of Authors, amongst un fortunate men of genius Logan had undoubtedly ambitions he never realised, but there is nothing to warrant the assertion that he died of a broken heart. Born at Soutra in East Lothian, the son of a small farmer, who educated him for the ministry, Logan, after he had finished his studies at Edinburgh, been duly 'licensed' to preach, and been for a time tutor at Ulbster to the afterwards famous Sir John Sinclair, was in 1773 appointed one of the ministers of South Leith Under the auspices of Principal Robertson and Dr Hugh Blair, he read a course of lectures in Edinburgh, an outline of which he published in 1781 as The Elements of the Philosophy of History, and in 1782 he printed one of his lectures on the Manners and Governments of Asia The same year he published his poems, and in 1783 Runnamede, 2 tragedy on the signing of Magna Charta. play was acted in Edinburgh, but only once-on account of its political references, it was said. His parishioners disapproved this exercise of his talents, and unfortunately Logan had lapsed into irregular and dissipated habits The consequence was that in 1786 he resigned his charge on receiving a small annuity, and settled in London, In London, Logan was a conwhere he died. tributor to the English Review, and wrote a pamphlet on the Charges against Warren Hastings -an eloquent defence and counter-attack on his accusers-which led to the trial of Stockdale the publisher, and to one of the most memorable of Erskine's speeches. Among Logan's manuscripts were found several unfinished tragedies, twenty-two lectures on ancient history, portions of a periodical work, and a collection of fervid sermons, two volumes of which were published by his executors By a perverse fate, what appear to have been Logan's lectures were printed (2 vols 1788-93), as his own, under the title of A View of Antient History, by Dr William Rutherford, who was headmaster of a school at Uxbridge

Logan it was who in 1770 published (see the preceding page) the poems of his dead college friend Michael Bruce. In doing so he exercised his editorial discretion by not printing several of the pieces amongst Bruce's manuscripts, as well as by making extensive alterations on and additions to Bruce's verses, and, as he states in his preface, 'to make up a miscellant, poems wrote by different authors are inserted' The best of these he afterwards claimed himself, and published as his own in 1781 spect to the vexed question of the authorship of the ode To the Cuckoo-which Burke admired so much that on visiting Edinburgh he sought out Logan to compliment him-the evidence seems to be as follows In favour of Logan, there is the open publication of the ode under his own name in 1781, the fact of his having shown it in manuscript to several friends before its publication, and declared it to be his composition, and that during Logan's life his claim to be the author was not disputed. In republishing the ode, Logan made corrections such as an author was likely to make in a piece written by himself eleven or twelve years before. In 1873 a careful and conscientious sifter of evidence, David Laing, in a tract on the authorship of this ode, defended Logan's claim, so did Dr John Small (British and Foreign L-ian gelical Review, 1877) and the Rev Robert Small (1b 1879), but Bruce's authorship was strenuously asserted by Dr Mackelvie (1837) and Dr A B Grosart (1865-86) There are certainly some arguments in support of Bruce's claim

The question has not been absolutely settled, and perhaps hardly admits of demonstrative It counts against Logan that he used in his sermons sentences or passages from Blair, Sherlock, Jeremiah Seed, and perhaps Zollikofer as translated And it should be remembered that questions of literary property were not in Logan's century so strictly regarded as now It is impossible to settle the authorship of some of the things by Swift and Arbuthnot and Pope. Great poets do not now incorporate with their own works, as Thomson did, passages by their friends, Mallet may have considerably altered and thought he had a claim to 'Rule Britannia,' though he did not write the first draft, and Erasmus Darwin unhesitatingly incorporated with the very opening of his Botanic Garden without remark, without her consent, and against her wish, a long passage that had already been published as a poem by his friend Miss Seward Apart from the ode To the Cuckoo, the best of Logan's things are his verses on a Visit to the Country in Autumn, his halfdramatic poem of The Lovers, and his fine ballad stanzas on the Braes of Yarrow Nine of the best of the Paraphrases adopted by the Church of Scotland in 1781, in several cases 'improved' versions of older hymns by Doddridge and others, are in their present shape attributed to him, but these also have been claimed by some for Michael Logan's principles of the philosophy of history -though in the end the book degenerates into jottings on the salient features of the history of Egypt, Persia, Sparta, Athens, Macedonia, and Rome-are sufficiently modern or 'advanced' to warrant a quotation. At the outset he insists that 'the physical causes are those qualities of the soil and climate which work insensibly on the temper,' and 'delivers the opinion' 'that the original character of nations arises chiefly from physical causes, and that the subsequent changes are almost entirely owing to moral? He recognises three stages in early social development savages who have no permanent possessions, barbarous tribes 'who have adopted the idea of permanent possession in their flocks and herds, but who, as they still continue to migrate, have no private property in land,' and the stage of 'nations when they forsake their roving life and, settling in the soil, appropriate land?

The arrangements and improvements which take place in human affairs result not from the efforts of individuals, but from a movement of the whole society

From want of attention to this principle, history hath often degenerated into the panegyrie of single men and the worship of names. Lawgivers are recorded, but who makes mention of the people? When, moved with curiosity, we enquire into the causes of the singular institutions which prevailed at Sparta, at Athens, or Rome, historians think it sufficient to mention the names of Lycurgus, Solon, or Romulus. They seem to have believed that forms of government were established with as much ease as theories of government were written. Such visionary systems are foreign to liuman affairs. No constitution is formed by a concert, no government is copied from a plan. Sociability and policy are natural to mankind. In the progress of society, instincts turn into arts, and original principles are converted into actual establishments. When an inequality of possessions takes place, the few that are opulent contend for power, the many defend their rights from this struggle of parties a form of government is established.

Illustrations of this observation from ancient and inodern states

The laws of a nation are derived from the same origin with their government.

Rising, in this manner, from society, all human improvements appear in their proper place, not as separate and detached articles, but as the various though regular phenomena of one great system Poetry, philosophy, the fine arts, national manners and eustonis, result from the situation and spirit of a people

All that legislators, patriots, philosophers, statesmen, and kings can do is to give a direction to that stream which is for ever flowing

It is this that renders history, in its proper form, interesting to all mankind, as its object is not merely to delineate the projects of princes or the intrigues of statesmen, but to give a picture of society and represent the character and spirit of nations.

Similar situations produce similar appearances, and, where the state of society is the same, nations will resemble one another

The want of attention to this hath filled the world with infinite volumes. The most remote resemblances in language, customs, or manners have suggested the idea of deriving one nation from another.

Nature directs the use of all the faculties that she hath given, in favourable circumstances every animal unfolds its powers, and man is the same being over the whole world

Illustrations both from savage and civilized nations.

Man is one animal, and, where the same situations occur, human nature is the same.

Hence the foundation of everything is in nature, polities is a science, and there is a system in human affairs

It is peculiar to the human race that the species improves as well as the individual

Hence a noble field presents itself to the philosophical historian, to trace the rise and progress of society and the history of civilization

All nations have been rude before they were refined The commencement of history is from the wood and the wilderness. Mankind appear everywhere, at first, a weak and infant species, and the most celebrated nations trace back their origin to a few wandering tribes

The early condition of our species, therefore, is a subject both of euriosity and importance. There are no records, however, of such a state. The youth of the society, like that of the individual, passes away unperceived

Happily for the historian, the discovery of America has supplied this defect

The history of the aborigines of America is eurious, and we deliver it not as the annals of the new world, but as it belongs to the antiquities of mankind, and delineates the picture of all nations in the rude state

To the Cuckoo

Hail, benuteous stranger of the grove! Thou messenger of Spring! Now Heaven repairs thy rural seat, And woods thy welcome sing

What time the daisy deels the green,
Thy certain voice we hear,
Hast thou a star to guide thy path,
Or mark the rolling year?

Delightful visitant! with thee
I had the time of flowers,
And here the sound of music sweet
From birds among the bowers

The school boy, wandering through the wood

Fo pull the primrose gay,

Starts, the new voice of Spring to hear,

And imitates thy by

What time the pea puts on the bloom, Thou fliest thy vocal vale, An annual guest in other lands, Another Spring to had

Sweet bird! thy bower is ever green,
This sky is ever clear,
Thou hast no sorrow in thy song,
No Winter in thy year!

Oh, could I fiv, 1 'd fly with thee !
We'd make, with joyful wing,
Our nanual visit o'er the globe,
Companions of the Spring

The third line of the fourth verse originally stood
'Starts thy curious voice to hear, which was doubtless altered by Logan as defective in quantity, though 'ennous has been defended as truer to fact than 'new

The Complaint of Nature

'Tew are thy days, and full of woe,
O man, of woman born l
Thy doom is written "Dust thou art,
And shalt to dust return"

'Determined are the days that fiv Successive o'er thy head, The numbered hour is on the wing That lays thee with the dead

Alas! the little day of life
Is shorter than a span,
Act black with thousand hidden ills
To miserable man

Gay is the morning, flattering hope. The sprightly step attends. But soon the tempest howls behind, And the dark night descends.

'Defore its splendid I our the cloud Comes o'er the beam of light, A pilgrim in a weary lan I, Man tornes but a night Behold! sad emblem of thy state,
The flowers that paint the field,
Or trees that crown the mountain's brow,
And boughs and blossoms yield.

'When chill the blast of Winter blows, Away the Summer flies, The flowers resign their sunny robes, And all their beauty dies

'Anpt by the vert the forest fades, And, shaking to the wind, The leaves toss to and fro, and streak The wilderness behind

'The Winter past, reviving flowers Anew shall paint the plain,
The woods shall hear the voice of Spring
And flourish green again

'But man departs this earthly scene, Ah' never to return! No second Spring shall e er revive The ashes of the urn

'The mexorable doors of death,
What hand can e er unfold?
Who from the cerements of the tomb
Can ruise the human mould?

'The mighty flood that rolls along lts torrents to the main, The waters lost can ne'er recall From that alwas again

'The days, the years, the ages, dark Descending down to night, Can never, never be re-leemed Pack to the gates of light

'So man departs the living scene,
To night's perpetual gloom
The voice of morning ne'er shall break
The slumbers of the tomb

'Where are our fathers? Whither gone The mighty men of old? The patriarchs, prophets, princes, king In sacred bool's enrolled?

'Gone to the resting place of man,
The everlasting home,
Where age, past have gone before
Where future ages come'

Thus nature poured the wail of wee,
And urged her came t cry
Her soice in agony extreme,
Ascended to the ky

The Almighty heard—then from his thone. In majesty he rose,
And from the beeven, that opened wife.
The voice in mercy flows.

When worth man reagn his breath And falls a clod of clay The soul immertal wings its flight fo never setting that 'Prepared of old for wicked men
The bed of torment lies,
The just shall enter into bliss
Immortal in the skies'

The Braes of Yarrow

'Thy bries were bonny, I arrow stream I
When first on them I that my lover,
Thy bries how dream, I arrow stream '
When now thy waves his body cover!
I or ever now, O I arrow stream!
Thou art to me a stream of sorrow,
For never on thy brinks shall I
Behold my love, the flower of I arrow

'He promised men milk white steed,
To bear me to his father's lowers,
He promised men little page,
To squire me to his father's towers,
He promised men wedding ring,—
The wedding day was fix'd to morrow,—
Now he is wedded to his grave,
Alas, his watery grave in Varrow!

'Sweet were his words when last we met,
My passion I as freely told him!
Clasp d in his arms, I little thought
That I should never more behold him!
Scarce was he gone, I saw his ghost,
It vanish'd with a shrick of sorrow,
Thrice did the water wraith ascend,
And gave a doleful groan through Varrow

'His mother from the window look d,
With all the longing of a mother,
His little sister weeping walk'd
The green wood path to meet her brother
They sought him east, they sought him vest,
They sought him all the forest thorough,
They only saw the cloud of night,
They only heard the roar of Varrow

'No longer from thy window look,
Thou hast no son, thou tender mother!
No longer walk, thou lovely maid!
Alas, thou hast no more a brother!
No longer seek him east or west,
And search no more the forest thorough,
For, wandering in the night so dark,
He fell a lifeless corse in Yarrow

'The tear shall never leave my cheek,
No other youth shall be my marrow.
I'll seek thy body in the stream,
And then with thee I'll sleep in Yarrow'
The tear did never leave her cheek,
No other youth became her marrow,
She found his body in the stream,
And now with him she sleeps in Yarrow

From 'Runnamede'

He is a traitor to his native land,
A traitor to mankind who in a cause
That down the course of time will fire the world, Rides not upon the lightning of the sky
To save his country
The voice of freedom's not a still, small voice
'Tis in the fire, the thunder and the storm

The goddes, I therty delights to dwell
If rightly I foresee Britannia's fate.
The hour of peril is the haleyon hour,
The shock of parties brings her best repose,
Like her wild waves when working in a storm,
That foam and iour and mingle earth and heaven,
I et guard the island which they seem to shake

Amongst the poems reprinted in whole or in part after the Psalter in Scottish Bibles as 'paraphrases or hymns are the well known ones, 'O God of Abraham [Bethell by whose hand, 'Few are thy days and full of woe (abrilged from the poem quised above), 'O happy is the man who hearn, 'Behold the mountain of the Lord and 'Where high the heavenly temple stands. These are ill amongst the nine hymns published in 1781 as by Logan. 'O God of Lethel is as Lord Selborne said, Dr Doddridge's 'rewritten and certainly improved by Logan. And it should be no ed that the most convinced defender of Logan's right to most of the disputed poems insists that Bruze inust have written something on the lines of 'The Complaint of Nature though as it stands it is largely or mostly Logan's the artistic rounding off being certainly his. Mr D J Maelagan in The Section Paraphr were (1879) takes Logan's side. Dr Julian in his great Pictionary of Hymn Lyg (1892) follows Grocart.

Nathaniel Cotton (1705-86) vrote Visions in Verse, for the Entertainment and Instruction of Younger Minds, which are, on the whole, more likely to instruct than to amuse. He was born in London, the son of a Levant merchant, and as a medical practitioner at St Albans was distinguished for his skill in the treatment of mental disorders Cowper, a patient in Cotton's happily named 'Collegium Insanorum' bears evidence to his 'well known humanity and sweetness of Both in his nine Visions (Friendship, Happiness, Slander, Marriage, Death, &c.) and in his seven Fables ('The Scholar and the Cat,' 'The Small and the Gardener,' &c ) he imitated Gay in verse and manner, though, as a contemporary said, 'with greater forcibleness of the moral spirit'. There are also tales, epitaphs, imitations, and miscellanies, in some of which there are anticipations of the nineteenth century spirit, though in eighteenth century words

To Children listening to a Lark.

See the lark prunes his active wings, Rises to heaven, and soars, and sings. His morning liymns, his mid-day lave, Are one continued song of pruse. He speaks his Maker all he can, And shames the silent tongue of man When the declining orb of light Reminds him of approaching night, His warbling vespers swell his breast, And as he sings he sinks to rest Shall birds instructive lessons teach, And we be deaf to what they preach?

Shall birds instructive lessons teach,
And we be deaf to what they preach?

No, ye dear nestlings of my heart,
Go, act the wiser songster's part
Spurn your warm couch at early dawn,
And with your God begin the morn
To Him your grateful tribute pay
Through every period of the day
To Him your evening songs direct,
His eye shall watch, His arm protect Though darkness reigns, He's with you still,
Then sleep, my babes, and fear no ill.

The Fireside

Dear Cloe, while the busy crowd,
The vain, the wealthy, and the prond,
In folly's maze advance,
Though singularity and pride
Be called our choice, we'll step aside,
Nor join the giddy dance.

From the gay v orld v e'll oft retire
To our own family and fire,
Where love our hours employs,
No noisy neighbour enters here,
Nor intermeddling stranger near,
To spoil our heartfelt joys.

If solid happiness we prize,
Within our breast this jewel lies,
And they are fools who roam
The world has no hing to lestow,
From our own selves our joys must flow,
And that dear liut, our home.

Of rest was Noah's dove bereft,
When with impatient wing she left
That safe retreat, the ark,
Giving her vain excursion o'er,
The disappointed bird once more
Fyplored the sacred bark

Though fools spurn Hymen's gentle powers, We, who improfe his golden hours,
By sweet experience know,
That marriage, rightly understood,
Gives to the tender and the good,
A paridise below

Onr babes shall richest comforts bring
If thiored right, they'll prove a spring
Whence pleasures ever rise
We'll form their minds with sindious care
To all that s manly, good, and fair,
And trun them for the skies.

While they our wisest hours engage,
They'll joy our youth, support our age,
And erown our hoary hairs
They ll grow in virtue every day,
And thus our fondest loves repay,
And recompense our cares

No borrowed joys! they're all our own,
While to the world we live unknown,
Or by the world forgot
Monarchs! we envy not your state,
We look with pity on the great,
And bless our humble lot

Our portion is not large, indeed,
But then how little do we need!
For nature's calls are ferr.
In this the art of living lies,
To want no more than may suffice,
And make that little do

We'll therefore relish with content
Whate'er kind providence has sent,
Nor aim beyond our power,
For, if our stock be very small,
'Tis prudence to enjoy it all,
Nor lose the present hour

To be resigned when ills betide,
Patient when favours are denied,
And pleased with favours given,
Dear Cloe, this is wisdom's part
This is that incense of the heart,
Whose fragrance smells to heaven.

We'll ask no long protracted treat,
Since winter-life is seldom sweet,
But when our feast is o'er,
Grateful from table we'll arise,
Nor grudge our sons with envious eyes
The relies of our store

Thus hand in hand through life we'll go,
Its cheekered paths of joy and woe
With cantious steps we'll tread,
Quit its vain scenes without a tear,
Without a trouble or a fear,
And mingle with the dead

While conscience, like a faithful friend, Shall through the gloomy vale attend, And cheer our dying breath, Shall, when all other comforts cease, Like a kind angel, whisper peace, And smooth the bed of death.

His works I arious Pieces in Prose and Verse, published after his death by his son fill two volumes (1791) and are included in some of the collections of the poets.

Samuel Bishop (1731-95), born in London and educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St John's, Oxford, became, after taking orders, master of his old school. His poems (which fill two volumes quarto') are none of them long, and deal with subjects as miscellaneous as spring, the man of taste, cricket, the library, Sunday, the privateer the east chair, arithmetic, landscape painting, and the English scalor. Many of his happiest verses were addressed to his wife and daughter.

To Mrs Bishop on the Anniversary of her Wedding-day with a Ring

'Thee, Mary, with this ring I wed'-So, fourteen years ago, I said Behold another ring '-' For what?' 'To wed thee o er again?' Why not? With that first ring I married youth, Grace, beauty, innocence, and truth Taste long admired sense long revered, And all my Molly then appeared If she, by ment since disclosed, Prove twice the woman I supposed, I plead that double ment now, To justify a double vow Here, then to day, with faith as sure, With ardour as intense, as pure, As when, nmidst the rites divine, I took thy troth, and plighted mine, To thee, sweet girl, my second ring A token and a pledge I bring With this I wed, till death us part, Thy riper virtues to my heart Those virtues which, before untried, The wife has added to the bride. Those virtues, whose progressive claim, Endearing wedlock's very name,

My soul enjoys, my song approves,
For conscience' sake as well as love's.
And why '-They shew me every hour
Honour's high thought, Affection's power, Discretion's deed, sound Judgment's sentence,
And teach me all things—but repentance.

Two hundred and ninety-seven short poems are classified—oddly enough, some of them—as 'epigrams,' of which these arc specimens

John Bull

John Bull whene'er the maggot bites, Cropsiek with ease and quiet, Raves about wrongs, roars about rights, All rumpus, rage, and riot

But if a foreign foe intrudes,
John tells a different story,
Away with fears! away with feuds!
All's Union, Triumph, Glory!

He scorns Dons, Dutchmen, and Mounseers, And spite of their alliance, With half the world about his ears, Bids t'other half defiance!

When England's foes her follies view, Luch day, each hour shews something new, But let them try in arms their skill, And England is—Old England still!

When Johnson the lives of our poets composed, [closed He scarce thought how his own would be hacked when it We've had life upon life without end or cessation, A perfect biographical superfetation Male, feinale, friend, foe have had hands in the mess, And the paper announces still more in the press—Not a cat, though for cats fate spins ninefold the thread, Has so many lives, living, as Johnson has dead.

Hugh Blair (1718-1800), an Edinburgh minister, was long regarded as the most famous exponent of 'sacred eloquence' both in theory and in practice The number of sets of volumes of his sermons still to be seen in book-stalls and at book-auctions testifies not less strongly to the popularity he once enjoyed than to the change of taste in that depart-He was at first minister of a country church in Fiscshire, but was successively preferred to the Canongate, Lady Yester's, and the High Church in Edinburgh In 1759 he commenced a course of lectures on rhetoric and belles-lettres, becoming professor of that subject at the university in 1762, and in 1763 he published his Dissertation on the Poems of Ossian, in which he zealously defended the authenticity of Macpherson's Ossianic dis-In 1777 appeared the first volume of his Sci mons, which was so well received that the author published three other volumes, and a fifth was printed after his death. A royal pension of £200 further rewarded the author Blair next pub lished his university Lectures (1783), and they also met with a favourable reception. Though somewhat feeble in style and manner, they were accepted as a supreme code of the laws of taste that prevailed at the time. The sermons are written with taste and elegance, wholly without fervour, force, or profundity, and, after the manner of the 'Moderates,' inculcate Christian morality without allusion to controversial topics.

On the Cultivation of Taste

Such studies have this peculiar advantage, that they exercise our reason without fatiguing it. They lead to inquiries acute, but not painful, profound, but not dry or abstruse They strew flowers in the path of science, and while they keep the mind bent in some degree and active, they relieve it at the same time from that more toilsome labour to which it must submit in the acquisi tion of necessary erudition or the investigation of abstract truth. The cultivation of taste is further recommended by the happy effects which it naturally tends to produce on human life The most busy man in the most active spliere cannot be always occupied by business Men of serious professions cannot always be on the stretch of serious thought. Neither can the most gay and flourishing situations of fortune afford any man the power of filling all his hours with pleasure always languish in the hands of the idle frequently languish even in the hands of the busy, if they have not some employment subsidiary to that which forms their main pursuit How, then, shall these vacant spaces, those unemployed intervals, which more or less occur in the life of every one, be filled up? How can we contrive to dispose of them in any way that shall be more agreeable in itself, or more consonant to the dignity of the human mind, than in the entertain ments of taste and the study of polite literature? He who is so happy as to have acquired a relish for these has always at hand an innocent and irreproachable amusement for his leisure hours, to save him from the danger of many a permicious passion He is not in hazard of being a burden to himself. He is not obliged to fly to low company, or to court the riot of loose pleasures, in order to cure the tediousness of existence

Providence seems plainly to have pointed out this useful purpose to which the pleasures of taste may be applied, by interposing them in a middle station between the pleasures of sense and those of pure intellect were not designed to grovel always among objects so low as the former, nor are we capable of dwelling con stantly in so high a region as the latter. The pleasures of taste refresh the mind after the toils of the intellect and the labours of abstract study, and they gradually raise it above the attachments of sense, and prepare it for the enjoyments of virtue So consonant is this to experience, that, in the education of youth, no object has in every age appeared more important to wise men than to tineture them early with a relish for the entertain ments of taste. The transition is commonly made with case from these to the discharge of the higher and more important duties of life. Good hopes may be enter tuned of those whose minds have this liberal and elegant turn. It is favourable to many virtues Whereas, to be entirely devoid of relish for eloquence, poetry, or any of the fine arts, is justly construed to be an un promising symptom of youth, and raises suspicions of their being prone to low gratifications, or destined to drudge in the more vulgar and illiberal pursuits of life

There are indeed few good dispositions of any kind with which the improvement of taste is not more or less connected. A cultivated taste increases sensibility to all the tender and humane passions, by giving them frequent exercise, while it tends to weaken the more violent and fierce emotions.

'Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes Emollit mores, nec smit esse feros'

The elevated sentiments and high examples which poetry, eloquence, and history are often bringing under our view naturally tend to nourish in our minds public spirit, the love of glory, contempt of external fortune, and the admiration of what is truly illustrious and great. I will not go so far as to say that the improvement of taste and of virtue is the same, or that they may always be expected to coexist in an equal degree. More power ful correctives than taste can apply are necessary for reforming the corrupt propensities which too frequently prevail among mankind Elegant speculations are sometimes found to float on the surface of the mind, while bad passions possess the interior regions of the heart. At the same time, this cannot but be admitted, that the exercise of taste is, in its native tendency, moral and From reading the most admired produc punfying tions of genius, whether in poetry or prose, almost every one rises with some good impressions left on his mind, and though these may not always be durable, they are at least to be ranked among the means of disposing the heart to virtue. One thing is certain, that without possessing the virtuous affections in a strong degree, no man can attain eminence in the sublime parts of eloquence He must feel what a good man feels, if he expects greatly to move or to interest mankind. They are the ardent sentiments of honour, virtue, magnani mity, and public spirit, that only can kindle that fire of genius, and call up into the mind those high ideas, which attract the admiration of ages, and if this spirit be necessary to produce the most distinguished efforts of cloquence, it must be necessary also to our relishing them with proper taste and feeling

Dugald Stewart (1753-1828), by his essays and treatises no less than by his lectures, gave lucidity and popularity to the Scottish Philosophy The son of the Professor of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh, he was born in the college buildings there. While yet a youth he was appointed his father's assistant and successor, and in 1785, when Dr Adam Ferguson retired from the Moral Philosophy chair, Stewart was appointed his successor, and discharged the duties of the office till 1810 The latter years of his life were spent in literary retirement at Kinneil House near Bo'ness His political friends, the Whigs, when in office in 1806, created for him the sinecure office of Gazette writer for Scotland Few lecturers have ever been more popular than Dugald Stewart-his eloquence, taste, and dignity rendered him both fascinating and impressive. His writings are marked by the same characteristics, and can be read with pleasure even by those who have no very keen interest in metaphysical studies. This, indeed, the secret of their success then, has helped to render them They deal not merely with metaobsolete now physics, but with logic, psychology, ethics, natural theology, the principles of taste, politics, and political economy He considerably developed the Scottish Philosophy, improving on its founder, Reid, by the fuller and more systematic exposition of the powers of the mind, and his contribution to the philosophy of taste was a notable advance The works include The Philosophy of the Human Mend (1792-1827), Philosophical Essays (1810), 1 Dissertation on the Progress of Metaphysical and Ethical Philosophy (originally for the Encyclo padia Britannica), and The Active and Moral Powers of Man, published a few weeks before his death Stewart also published Outhines of Moral Philosophy, and wrote colourless Memoirs of Principal Robertson, of Adam Smith, and of Reid 'All the years I remained about Edinburgh,' said James Mill, 'I used, as often as I could, to steal into Mr Stewart's class to hear a lecture, which was always a high treat. I have heard Pitt and Fox deliver some of their most admired speeches, but I never heard anything nearly so eloquent as some of the lectures of Professor Stewart. The taste for the studies which have formed my favourite pursuits, and which will be so to the end of my life, I owe to him? Other notable men who were taught by Stewart were Lords Jeffrey and Cockburn, Francis Homer, Sir Walter Scott, Lord Brougham, Sir James Mackintosli, the future Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Russell-for Stewart's fame and his philosophic Liberalism, as much as the Torvism of the English universities, attracted to Edmburgh many scions of the great English Whig houses Sydney Smith was an admiring auditor, and the Scottish metaphysician contributed in no small degree to the training of the next generation of English Whig statesmen and publicists His sym pathy with the Americans and, in the earlier stage, with the French Revolution provoked irritation and opposition amongst those of another way of thinking He had occasionally American colonials amongst his hearers, thus the father of James Russell Lowell studied under the Edinburgh philosopher

On Memory

It is generally supposed that, of all our faculties, memory is that which nature has bestowed in the most unequal degrees on different individuals, and it is far from being impossible that this opinion may be well founded. If, however, we consider that there is scarcely any man who has not memory sufficient to learn the use of language, and to learn to recognise, at the first glance, the appearances of an infinite number of familiar objects, besides acquiring such an acquirintance with the laws of nature and the ordinary course of human affairs as is necessary for directing his conduct in life, we shall be satisfied that the original disparities among men in this respect are by no means so immense as they seem to be at first view, and that much is to be ascribed to different habits of attention, and to a difference of selection among the various events presented to their curio ity

It is worthy of remark, also, that those individuals who possess unusual powers of memory with respect to any one class of objects are commonly as remarkably deficient in some of the other applications of that faculty I knew a person who, though completely ignorant of Latin, was able to repeat over thirty or forty lines of Virgil, after having heard them once read to him—not, indeed, with perfect exactness, but with such a degree of resemblance as (all circumstances considered) was truly astonishing, yet this person (who was in the condition of a servant) was singularly deficient in memory in all cases in which that faculty is of real practical utility. He was noted in every family in which he had been employed for habits of forgetfulness, and could scarcely deliver an ordinary message without committing some blunder

A similar observation, I can almost venture to say, will be found to apply to by far the greater number of those in whom this faculty seems to exhibit a preternatural or anomalous degree of force. The varieties of memory are indeed wonderful, but they ought not to be confounded with inequalities of memory. One man is distinguished by a power of recollecting names, and dates, and genealogies, a second, by the multiplicity of speculations and of general conclusions treasured up in his intellect, a third, by the facility with which words and combinations of words (the very words of a speaker or of an author) seem to lay hold of his mind. a fourth, by the quickness with which he seizes and appropriates the sense and meaning of an author, while the phraseology and style seem altogether to escape his notice, a fifth, by his memory for poetry, a sixth, by his memory for music, a seventh, by his memory for architecture, statuary, and painting, and all the other objects of taste which are addressed to the eye. All these different powers seem miraculous to those who do not possess them, and as they are apt to be supposed by superficial observers to be commonly united in the same individuals, they contribute much to encourage those evaggerated estimates concerning the original inequalities among men in respect to this faculty which I am now endeavouring to reduce to their first standard

As the great purpose to which this faculty is subservient is to enable us to collect and to retain, for the future regulation of our conduct, the results of our past experience, it is evident that the degree of perfection which it attains in the case of different persons must vary, first, with the faculty of making the original acquisition, secondly, with the permanence of the acquisition, and thirdly, with the quickness or readi ness with which the individual is able, on particular occasions, to apply it to use. The qualities, there fore, of a good memory are, in the first place, to be susceptible, secondly, to be retentive, and thirdly, to be ready

It is but rarely that these three qualities are united in the same person. We often, indeed, meet with a memory which is at once susceptible and ready, but I doubt much if such memories be commonly very retentive, for the same set of habits which are favour able to the first two qualities are adverse to the third. Those individuals, for example, who, with a view to conversation, make a constant business of informing themselves with respect to the popular topics of the day, or of turning over the ephemeral publications subservient to the amusement or to the politics of the times, are naturally led to cultivate a susceptibility and readiness of memory, but have no inducement to aim at that permanent retention of selected ideas which enables the scientific student to combine the most remote materials, and to concentrate at will, on a particular object, all the scattered lights of his experience and of his reflections. Such men (as far as my observation has reached) seldom possess a familiar or correct acquaintance even with those classical re mains of our own earlier writers which have ceased to furnish topics of discourse to the circles of fashion A stream of novelties is perpetually passing through their minds, and the faint impressions which it leaves soon vanish to make way for others, like the traces which the ebbing tide leaves upon the sand this all. In proportion as the associating principles which lay the foundation of susceptibility and readiness predominate in the memory, those which form the basis of our more solid and lasting acquisitions may be expected to be weakened, as a natural consequence of the general laws of our intellectual frame

Stewart's works edited by Sir William Hamilton, with a Life by Professor Vestch, appeared in 1854-58 in eleven volumes and see H G Graham's Scottish Men of Letters (1902).

Henry Mackenzie (1745-1831), long the Nestor of literary Edinburgh, was an imitator of Sterne in sentiment, pathos, and style, more care ful of the proprieties, less addicted to excursive ness, but vastly inferior in originality, force, and The son of an Edinburgh physician, he was educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh, and made the law his profession To qualify for work in the Exchequer Court, he went to London in 1765 and studied the English Exchequer practice, and on his return to Edin burgh he was made free of its literary circles, which then included men like Hume, Robertson, Adam Smith, and Blair In 1771 appeared his novel, The Man of Feeling, which was followed by The Man of the World (1773) and Julia de Roubigué (1777) Mackenzie was by far the most frequent and important contributor to the Mirror and Lounger, the first periodicals of the kind in Scotland, both of which he founded and edited (1779-80 and 1785-87), and he wrote some dramatic pieces, which were brought out at Edinburgh with but indifferent success Mirror and the Lounger he imitated Addison rather closely, and was even called by Scott 'the Northern Addison' At some time or another he imitated, deliberately or unconsciously, the most conspicuous writers of the century-not merely the Spectator group and Sterne, but Richardson, Fielding, and others He accordingly never attained to distinction or individuality, but his style is always good and wonderfully free from Scotti In the Lounger he had the glory of introducing Robert Burns to the Edinburgh wits and wider circles The friend of David Hume, he was still reading papers in the Royal Society of Edinburgh in 1812, and after 1820 was the life of the company and one of the most active sportsmen in shooting-parties at Abbotsford, along with Scott himself and Sir Humphry Davy And it was largely by a paper of his on the German theatre (1788) that interest had been awakened in Scotland in German literature He supported the Government of Pitt in pamphlets vritten with great acute-In real life the sentimental novelist was shrewd and practical, he had early exhausted his vein of romance, and was an active man of And it is curious to remember that the Man of Feeling was much addicted to cockfighting! In 1804 the Government appointed him to the office of comptroller of taxes for Scotland, a lucrative post which entailed much drudgery. In this office, enjoying the society of his family, his many friends, and his favourite sports of the field, writing occasionally on subjects of taste and literature (for 'the old stump,' he said, 'would still occasionally send forth a few green shoots'), Mackenzie hved to the age of eighty six.

His first novel is on the whole the best of his works, unless we rank above it some of his short contributions to the Mirror and Lounger, such as the tale of La Roche, an idealised sketch of David Hume. There is no regular story in the Man of Feeling, but the character of Harley, his bashfulness and excessive delicacy, entertain the reader, though the whole is very unlike real life. His adventures in London, the talk of club and park frequenters, his visit to Bedlam, and his relief of the old soldier and his daughter, are partly modelled on the affected sentimental style of the inferior romances, but show a facility in moral and pathetic portraiture that had till then been surpassed by Richardson alone. The character of Sir Thomas Sindall-Mackenzie's Lovelaceis forced and unnatural, his plots and intrigues imply a deliberate villainy and defiance of public opinion quite incredible in view of his rank and position in the world, and his deathbed sensibility and penitence are undoubtedly out of keeping with the rest of his character The 'romantic' adventures of young Annesly among the Indians are described with much spirit. Julia de Roubigné, still more melancholy than the Man of the World, has no gorgeous descriptions to relieve the misery and desolation which overwhelm a group of innocents whom for their virtues the reader would wish By this novel Mackenzie took a decided place amongst the literary abolitionists who followed Mrs Aphra Behn in denouncing West Indian slavery

On Negro Slavery

I have often been tempted to doubt whether there is not an error in the whole plan of negro servitude, and whether whites or creoles born in the West Indies, or perhaps cattle, after the manner of European husbandry, would not do the business better and cheaper than the slaves do The money which the latter cost at first, the sickness—often owing to despondency of mind—to which they are liable after their arrival, and the proportion that die in consequence of it, make the machine, if it may be so called, of a plantation extremely expensive in its operations. In the list of slaves belonging to a wealthy planter, it would astonish you to see the number unfit for service, pining under disease, a burden on their master. I am only talking as a merchant, but as a man—good Heavens! when I think of the many thousands of my fellow creatures groaming under servitude and misery!—great God! hast thou peopled those regions of thy world for the purpose of casting out their inhabitants to chains and torture? No, thou gavest them a land teeming with good things, and lightedst up thy sun to bring forth spontaneous plenty, but the refinements of man, ever at war with thy works, liave changed this scene of profusion and luxuriance into a theatre of rapine, of slavery, and of murder!

Forgive the warmth of this apostrophe! Here it would not be understood, even my uncle, whose heart is far from a hard one, would smile at my romance, and tell me that things must be so. Habit, the tyrant of nature and of reason, is deaf to the voice of either, here she stifles humanity and debases the species—for the master of slaves has seldom the soul of a man

Harley sets out on his Journey—The Beggar and his Dog

He had taken leave of his aunt on the eve of his intended departure, but the good lady's affection for her nephew interrupted her sleep, and early as it was, next morning when Harley came down stairs to set out he found her in the parlour with a tear on her cheek, and her candle cup in her hand. She knew enough of physic to prescribe against going abroad of a morning with an empty stomach. She gave her blessings with the draught, her instructions she had delivered the uight before. They consisted mostly of negatives, for London in her idea, was so replete with temptations, that it needed the whole armour of her friendly cautions to repel their attacks.

Peter stood at the door We have mentioned this

Harley's father had taken him faithful fellow formerly up an orphan, and saved him from being cast on the parish; and he had ever since remained in the service of him and of his son. Harley shook him by the hand as he passed, smiling, as if he had said 'I will not weep' He sprung hastily into the chaise that waited for him, 'My dear master,' said he, Peter folded up the step shaking the solitary lock that hung on either side of his head, 'I have been told as how London is a sad place.' He was choked with the thought, and his benediction could not be heard But it shall be heard, honest Peter! where these tears will add to its energy

In a few hours Harley reached the inn where he pro posed breakfasting, but the fulness of his heart would not suffer him to eat a morsel He walked out on the road, and guning a little height, stood gazing on the quarter he had left He looked for his wouted prospect, his fields, his woods, and his hills, they were lost in the distant clouds! He pencilled them on the clouds, and bade them farewell with a sigh !

He sat down on a large stone to take out a little pebble from his shoe, when he saw, at some distance, a beggar approaching him He had on a loose sort of coat, mended with different coloured rags, amongst which the blue and the russet were the predominant. He had a short knotty stick in his hand, and on the top of it was stuck a ram's horn, his knees (though he was no pilgrim) had worn the stuff of his breeches, he wore no shoes, and his stockings had entirely lost that part of them which should have covered his feet and ankles In his face, however, was the plump appearance of good humour he walked a good round pace, and a crook legged dog trotted at his heels

'Our delicacies,' said Harley to himself, 'are fantastic they are not in nature! that beggar walks over the sharpest of these stones barefooted, while I have lost the most delightful dream in the world from the smallest of them happening to get into my shoe.'-The beggir had by this time come up, and, pulling off a piece of hat, asked charity of Harley, the dog began to beg too -it was impossible to resist both, and, in truth, the want of shoes and stockings had made both unnecessary, for Harley had destined sixpence for him before. The beggar, on receiving it, poured forth blessings without number, and, with a sort of smile on his countenance, said to Hurley, 'that if he wanted his fortune told'-Harley turned his eye briskly on the beggar an unpromising look for the subject of a prediction, and silenced the prophet immediately 'I would much rather learn,' said Harley, 'what it is in your power to tell me your trade must be an entertaining one sit down on this stone, and let me know something of your profession, I have often thought of turning fortune teller for a week or two myself.'

'Master,' replied the beggar, 'I like your frankness much, God knows I had the humour of plain dealing in me from a child, but there is no doing with it in this world, we must live as we can, and lying is, as you call it, my profession but I was in some sort forced to the trade, for I dealt once in telling truth

'I was a labourer, sir, and gained as much as to make me live I never laid by, indeed, for I was reckoned a piece of a wag, and your wags, I take it, are seldom rich, Mr Harley ' 'So,' said Harley, 'you seem to know 'Ay, there are few folks in the county that I don't know something of, how should I tell fortunes else?'

'True, but to go on with your story you were a labonrer, you say, and a wag, your industry, I suppose, you left with your old trade, but your humour you preserve to be of use to you in your new?

'What signifies sadness, sir? a man grows lean on't, but I was brought to my idleness by degrees, first I could not work, and it went against my stomach to work I was scized with a jail fever at the time of the assizes being in the county where I lived, for I was always currous to get acquainted with the felons, because they are commonly fellows of much mirth and little thought, qualities I had ever an esteem for height of this fever, Mr Harley, the house where I lay took fire, and burnt to the ground, I was carried out in that condition, and lay all the rest of my illness in a barn I got the better of my disease, however, but I was so weak that I spat blood whenever I attempted to work I had no relation living that I knew of, and I never kept a friend above a week when I was able to joke, I seldom remained above six months in a parish, so that I might have died before I had found a settlement in any thus I was forced to beg my bread, and a sorry trade I found it, Mr Harley I told all my misfortunes truly, but they were seldom believed, and the few who gave me a halfpenny as they passed, did it with a shake of the head, and an injunction not to trouble them with a long In short, I found that people do not care to give alms without some security for their money, a wooden leg or a withered arm is a sort of draft upon Heaven for those who choose to have their money placed to account there, so I chauged my plan, and, instead of telling my own misfortunes, began to prophesy happiness to others. This I found by much the better way folks will always listen when the tale is their own, and of many who say they do not believe in fortune telling, I have known few on whom it had not a very sensible effect. I pick up the names of their acquaintance, amours and little squabbles are easily gleaned among servants and neighbonrs, and indeed people themselves are the best intelligencers in the world for our purpose, they dare not puzzle us for their own sakes, for every one is anxious to hear what they wish to believe, and they who repeat it, to laugh at it when they have done, are generally more serious than their hearers are apt to imagine. With a tolerable good memory and some share of cunning, with the help of walking a-nights over heaths and churchyards, with this, and shewing the tricks of that there dog, whom I stole from the sergeant of a marching regiment (and, by the way, he can steal too upon occa sion), I make shift to pick up a livelihood. My trade, indeed, is none of the houestest, yet people are not much cheated neither, who give a few halfpence for a prospect of happiness, which I have heard some persons say is all a man can arrive at in this world —But I must bid you good day, sir, for I have three miles to walk before noon, to inform some boarding school young ladies whether their husbands are to be peers of the realm or captains in the army, a question which I promised to answer them by that time '

Harley had drawn a shilling from his pocket Virtue bade him consider on whom he was going to bestow it.-Virtue held back his arm -but a milder form, a younger sister of Virtue's, not so severe as Virtue, nor so serious as Pity, smiled upon him his fingers lost their compression, -nor did Virtue offer to catch the money as it fell It had no sooner reached the ground, than the watchful cur (a trick he had been taught) snapped it up, and, contrary to the most approved method of s ewardship, delivered it immediately into the hands of his master (From The Man of Feeling)

Robert Burns

I I now not if I shall be accused of such enthusiasm and partiality, when I introduce to the notice of my readers a poet of our own country, with whose writings I have lately become requainted but if I am not greatly deceived, I think I may safely pronounce him a genius The person to whom I allude is of no ordinary rank Robert Burns, on Ayrshire ploughman, whose poems were some time ago published in a county town in the vest of Seo land, with no other ambition, it would seem, than to circulate among the inhabitants of the county where he was born, to obtain a little fame from those who had heard of his talents. I hope I shall not be thought to assume too much if I endersour to place him in a higher point of view, to call for a verdict of his country on the ment of his works, and to claim for him those honours which their excellence appears to deserve.

In mentioning the circumstance of his limble station, I mean not to rest his pretensions solely on that title, or to urge the merits of his poetry when considered in relation to the lowness of his birth, and the little oppor tunity of improvement which his education could afford These particulars indeed, might exeite our wonder at his productions, but his poetry considered abstractedly, and without the apologies arising from his situation, seems to me fully entitled to command our feelings, and to obtain our applause. One bar, indeed, his birth and education have opposed to his fame,-the language in which most of his poems are written. Even in Scot land, the provincial dialect which Ramsay and he have used is now read with a difficulty which greatly damps the pleasure of the reader in England it cannot be read at all, without such a constant reference to a glossary as [Here Mackenzie nearly to destroy that pleasure quotes a long extract from the 'Vision' and the whole of the 'Mountain Daisy ]

The power of genius is not less admirable in tracing the manners than in painting the passions, or in drawing the scenery of nature. That intuitive glance with which a writer like Sliake-peare discerns the characters of men, with which he catches the many changing hues of life, forms a sort of problem in the science of mind, of which it is easier to see the truth than to assign the cause. Though I am very far from meaning to compare our rustic bard to Shal espeare, yet whoever will read his lighter and more humorous poems, his Dialogue of the Dogs, his Dedica non to G- II-, Esq, his Epistles to a Young Friend, and to W S-n, will perceive with what un common penetration and sagacity this lieaven taught ploughman, from lus humble and unlettered station, has Against some passages looked upon men and manners of those last mentioned poems, it has been objected that they breathe a spirit of libertinism and irreligion If we consider the ignorance and functionsm of the lower class of people in the country where these poems were written, a fanaticism of that permicious sort which sets faith in opposition to good works, the fallacy and danger of which a mind so enlightened as our poets could not but perceive, we shall not look upon his lighter muse as the enemy of religion, (of which in several places he expresses the justest sentiments,) though she has some times been a little unguarded in her ridicule of hypoc rist. In this as in other respects it must be allowed that there are exceptionable parts of the volume he has given to the public, which caution would have sup pressed, or correction struck out, but poets are seldom cautious, and our poet had, alas! no friends or companions from whom correction could be obtained. When we reflect on his rank in life, the habits to which he must have been subject, and the society in which he must have mixed, we regret perhaps more than wonder that delicacy should be so often offended in perusing a volume in which there is so much to interest and to please us

Burns possesses the spirit as well as the fancy of That honest pride and independence of soul a poet which are sometimes the muse's only dower, break forth on every occasion in his works. It may be, then, I shall wrong his feelings while I indulge my own, in calling the attention of the public to his situation and circum That condition, humble as it was, in which he found content and wooed the muse might not have been deemed uncomfortable, but grief and misfortunes have reached him there, and one or two of his poems hint, what I have learnt from some of his countrymen, that he list been obliged to form the resolution of leaving his native land, to seek under a West Indian clime that shelter and support which Scotland has denied him But I trust means may be found to prevent this resolu tion from taling place, and that I do my country no more than justice when I suppose her ready to stretch out her hand to cherish and retain this native poet, whose 'wood notes wild' possess so much excellence. To repair the wrongs of suffering or neglected ment, to call forth genius from the obscurity in which it liad pined judignant, and place it where it may profit or de light the world, these are exertions which give to wealth an enviable superiority, to greatness and to patronage a laudable pride. Joseph Priestley (1733-1804), a great chem ist, an original and unorthodox theologian, and a Radical and unpopular political thinker, was born, a cloth-dresser's son, at Fieldhead in Birstall parish, near Leeds, 13th March 1733, and was carefully trained in the Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism by his pious mother He learnt French and High Dutch enough to translate and write business letters in both languages for an After four years at a Dissenting academy at Daventry, in 1755 he became Presbyterian minister at Needham Market, and wrote The Scripture Doctrine of Remission, denying that Christ's death was a sacrifice, and rejecting the Trinity and Atonement. In 1758 lie removed to Nantwich, where he ministered to a small congregation, several 'travelling Scotchmen' or pedlars who frequented the place he found to his surprise were none of them at all Calvinistical Priestley became a tutor at Warrington Academy in 1761 In yearly visits to London he met Franklin, who supplied him with books for his History of Electricity (1767) In 1764 he was made LLD of Edinburgh, and in 1766 F R S In 1767 he became minister of a chapel at Mill Hill, Leeds, where he took up the study of chemistry In 1774, as literary companion, he accompanied Lord Shelburne on a Continental tour, and published Letters to a Philosoplucal Unbeliever But at home he was branded as an atheist in spite of his Disquisition relating to Matter and Spirit (1777), affirming from revelation our hope of resurrection He was elected to the French Academy of Sciences in 1772, and to the St Petersburg Academy in 1780, and in 1780 too he became minister of a chapel at Birmingham His History of the Corruptions of Christianity (1782) and his History of Early Opinions concerning Jesus Christ (1786) occasioned renewed controversy His reply to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution secured him formal citizenship of the republic and election to the convention as deputy for Orne, an earlier and more important consequence for him was that it led a Birmingham mob first to wreck his chapel, and then break into his house and destroy its contents (1791) He now settled as a Unitarian minister and successor to Dr Price at Hackney, but in 1794 removed to America, where he was heartily received, and became a more con vinced Republican and a more pronounced Uni tarian, finally at Northumberland, in Pennsylvania, he died, believing himself to hold the doctrines of the primitive Christians, and looking for the second coming of Christ Priestley is justly called the father of the newer or pneumatic chemistry (as opposed to the phlogiston theory which his discoveries exploded), good authorities (see Nature, xlii 1890) defend the priority of his discovery of oxygen (1774) and of the composition of water (1781), and deny Lavoisier's claim to be considered an independent discoverer It was Priestley, not Bentham, who first coined the phrase 'The greatest happiness of the greatest number,' and the sentiment from the Corruptions of Christianity is characteristic 'As the greatest things often take rise from the smallest beginnings, so the worst things sometimes proceed from good intentions?

The following paragraphs are from Priestley's autobiographical Memoirs, the first extract having been written at Birmingham in 1787, the second in 1795, after he had settled in the United States

I esteem it a singular happiness to have lived in an age and country in which I have been at full liberty both to investigate, and by preaching and writing to propagate, religious truth, that though the freedom I have used for this purpose was for some time disadvantageous to me, it was not so long, and that my present situation is such that I can with the greatest openness urge whatever appears to me to be the truth of the gospel, not only without giving the least offence, but with the entire approbation of those with whom I am particularly con nected As to the dislike which I have drawn upon myself by my writings, whether that of the Culvinistic party in or out of the church of England, those who rank with rational dissenters (but who have been exceedingly offended at my carrying my inquiries farther than they wished any person to do), or whether they be unbelievers, I am thankful that it gives less disturbance to me than it does to themselves, and that their dislike is much more than compensated by the cordial esteem and approbation of my conduct by a few whose minds are congenial to my own, and especially that the number of such persons increases

About two years before I left Birmingham the question about the test act was much agitated both in and out of parliament. This, however, was altogether without any concurrence of mine. I only delivered, and published, a sermon on the 5th of November 1789, recommending the most peaceable method of pursuing our object. Mr Madan, however, the most respectable clergyman in the town, preaching and publishing a most inflammatory sermon on the subject, inveighing in the bitterest manner against the Dissenters in general, and myself in particular, I addressed a number of familiar letters to the inhabitants of Birmingham in our defence. This produced a reply from him, and other letters from me. All mine were written in an ironical and rather a pleasant manner, and in some of the last of them I introduced a farther reply to Mr Burn, another clergyman in Birmingham, who had addressed to me letters on the infallibility of the testimony of the Apostles concerning the person of Christ, after replying to his first set of Letters, in a separate publication

From these small pieces I was far from expecting any serious consequences. But the Dissenters in general being very obnoxious to the court, and it being imagined, though without any reason, that I had been the chief promoter of the measures which gave them offence, the elergy, not only in Birmingham, but through all Eng land, seemed to make it their business, by writing in the public papers, by preaching, and other methods, to inflame the minds of the people against me. And on occasion of the celebration of the anniversary of the French revolution on July 14th, 1791, by several of my friends, but with which I had little to do, a mob encouraged by some persons in power, first burned the meeting house in which I preached, then another meet ing house in the town, and then my dwelling house, demolishing my librari, apparatus, and, as far as they could, every thing belonging to me. They also burned, or much damaged, the houses of many Dissenters, chiefly my friends, the particulars of which I need not recite, as they will be found in two Appeals which I published on the subject written presently after the nots

Being in some personal danger on this occasion, I went to London, and so violent was the spirit of party which then prevailed, that I believe I could hardly have been safe in any other place. There, however, I was per fectly so, though I continued to be an object of trouble-some attention until I left the country altogether. It shewed no small degree of courage and friendship in Mr William Vaughan to receive me into his house, and also in Mr Salte, with whom I spent a month at Tottenham But it shewed more in Dr Price's congregation at Hackney, to invite me to succeed him, which they did, though not unanimously, some time after my arrival in London

In this situation I found myself as happy as I had been at Birmingham, and contrary to general expectation, I opened my lectures to young persons with great success, being attended by many from London, and though I lost some of the hearers, I left the congregation in a better situation than that in which I found it.

On the whole, I spent my time even more happily at Hackney than ever I had done before, having every advantage for my philosophical and theological studies, m some respects superior to what I had enjoyed at Birmingham, especially from my easy access to Mr Lindsey, and my frequent intercourse with Mr Belsham, professor of divinity in the New College, near which I lived. Never, on this side the grave, do I expect to enjoy myself so much as I did by the fire side of Mr Lindsey, conversing with him and Mrs Lindsey on theological and other subjects, or in my frequent walks with Mr Belsham, whose views of most important subjects were, lile Mr Lindsey's, the same with my own

I found, however, my society much restricted with respect to my philosophical acquaintance, most of the members of the Royal Society shunning me on account of my religious or political opinions, so that I at length withdrew myself from them, and gave my reasons for so doing in the Preface to my Observations and Experiments on the generation of air from water, which I published at Huckney. For, with the assistance of my friends, I had in a great measure replaced my Apparatus, and had resumed my experiments, though after the loss of near ty o years

Jean Louis De Loime (1740-1806) was somewhat maptly called by Isaac D'Israeli 'the English Montesquieu.' For, born at Geneva, he vas an advocate at home, and did not come to England till 1769, and there, in spite of his literary activity, he lived in great poverty, always in debt and repeatedly in prison Having inherited a small property, he returned to Geneva And the work by which he earned his solriquet, though Englished-by another hand, apparently, in 1775, as The Constitution of England-was written in French, and published The translation, which at Amsterdam (1771) flattered England, reached a tenth edition (with Life, 1853) The work shed no new light on the theory that the excellence English history of the English constitution depends on the beautiful equilibrium of the several departments or institutions has been not unjustly described as an expanded paraphrise of a single chapter of Montesquieu, and though for nearly a century it remained an authority for lack of better, it has long been superseded by works based on real historical research, and on scholarly and scientific study of records and original documents In 1772 there had been published anonymously A Parallel between the English Constitution and the former Government of Sweden, mainly an unauthorised translation of part of the Constitution A History of the Flagellants and Strictures on the Union were two of his half-dozen books and political pamphlets A quotation from De Lolme in the preface to the 'Junius' letters in 1771 (before any translation had appeared) led the musical literary Dr Thomas Busby to argue, incredibly enough, that De Lolme was concealed under that terrible nom de guerre

Robert Orme (1728-1801), historian of India, was born in Travancore, the son of an army doctor in the East India Company's service, was educated at Harrow, and from 1743 till 1758 was himself in the employment of the Company, at first as writer, and ultimately as commissary and accountant general His health failing, he settled in London in 1760, and wrote his History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in Indostan from the Year 1745 (1763-78), a work which furnished the favourite reading of Colonel Newcome, and was praised by Macaulay as one of the most authentic and best written in the English tongue, though tedious from its minute details Even now some prefer to Macaulay's, for their old-fashioned stateliness and vigour, Orme's account of Bengal, his version of the Black Hole tragedy, and his description of the battle of Plassey In 1782 he published Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire, of the Morattoes, and of the English Concerns in Indostan

The Black Hole of Calcutta.

[The Nawab of Bengal, Siraj ud Daula (Suraja Dowlah), having captured the fort of the Calcutta factory, caused all the prisoners, 146 in number, to be crowded into one small apartment 18 feet square.] In the mean time every minute had increased their sufferings effect of their sufferings was a profuse and continued sweat, which soon produced intolerable thirst, succeeded by exeruciating prins in the breast, with difficulty of breathing-little short of suffocation. Attempts were again made to force the door, which, failing as before, redoubled their rage but the thirst increasing, nothing but water' water' became soon after the general cry The good Jemantdar immediately ordered some skins of water to be brought to the windows, but, instead of relief, his benevolence became a more dreadful cause of destruction, for the sight of the water threw every one into such excessive agitations and ravings, that, unable to resist this violent impulse of nature, none could wait to be regularly served, but each with the utmost ferocity battled against those who were likely to get it from him, and in these conflicts many were either pressed to death by the efforts of others, or suffocated by their own scene, instead of producing compassion in the guard without, only excited their mirth, and they held up lights to the bars, in order to have the diabolical satisfac tion of seeing the deplorable contentions of the sufferers within, who, finding it impossible to get any water whilst it was thus furiously disputed, at length suffered those who were nearest to the windows, to convey it in their hats to those behind them. It proved no relief either to their thirst or other sufferings, for the fever increased every moment with the increasing depravity of the air in the dungeon, which had been so often respired, and was saturated with the hot and deleterious effluvia of putrefying bodies, of which the stench was little less than mortal Before midnight, all who were alive and had not partaken of the air at the windows, were either in a lethargic stupefaction or raving with delirium Every kind of invective and abuse was uttered, in hopes of provoking the guard to put an end to their miseries, by firing into the dungeon, and whilst some were blaspheming their Creator with the frantic execuations of the appearance of doing something, he falls into the dangerous habit of imitating without selecting, and of labouring without any determinate object, as it requires no effort of the mind, he sleeps over his work, and those powers of invention and composition which ought particularly to be called out and put in action he torpid, and lose their energy for want of exercise. It is an observation that all must have made, how incapable those are of producing any thing of their own, who have spent much of their time in making finished copies

These instructions I have ventured to offer from my own experience, but as they deviate widely from received opinions, I offer them with diffidence, and when better are suggested, shall retract them without regret. There is one precept, however, in which I shall only be opposed by the vain, the ignorant, and the idle. I am not afraid that I shall repeat it too often. You must have no dependence on your own genius. If you have great talents, industry will improve them if you have but moderate abilities, industry will supply their deficiency. Nothing is denied to well-directed labour nothing is to be obtained without it. Not to enter into metaphysical discussions on the nature or essence of genius, I will venture to assert, that assiduity unabated by difficulty, and a disposition eagerly directed to the object of its pursuit, will produce effects similar to those which some call the result of natural powers Though a man cannot at all times, and in all places, paint or draw, vet the mind can prepare itself by laying in proper materials, at all times, and in all places. Both Livy and Plutarch, in describing Philopoemen, one of the ablest generals of antiquity, have given us a striking picture of a mind always intent on its profession, and by assiduity obtain ing those excellencies which some all their lives vainly expect from Nature. I shall quote the passage in Lavy at length, as it runs parallel with the practice I would recommend to the Painter, Sculptor, or Architect.

I cannot help imagining that I see a promising young Painter, equally vigilant, whether at home, or abroad in the streets, or in the fields. Every object that presents itself is to him a lesson. He regards all Nature with a view to his profession, and combines her beauties. or corrects her defects He examines the countenance of men under the influence of passion, and often catches the most pleasing hints from subjects of turbulence or Even bad Pietures themselves supply him with useful documents, and, as Leonardo da Vinci has observed, he improves upon the fanciful images that are sometimes seen in the fire, or are accidentally sketched npon a discoloured wall. The Artist who has his mind thus filled with ideas, and his hand inide expert hy practice, works with ease and readiness, whilst he who would have you believe that he is writing for the Inspirations of Genius is in reality at a loss how to begin, and is at last delivered of his Monsters, with difficulty and pain The well grounded Painter, on the contrary, has only maturely to consider his subject, and all the mechanical parts of his Art follow without his exertion Conscious of the difficulty of obtaining what he possesses, he makes no pretensions to secrets, except those of closer applica tion. Without conceiving the smallest Jealousy against others, he is contented that all shall be as great as him self, who are willing to undergo the same fatigue and as his pre eminence depends not upon a trick he is free from the painful suspicions of a juggler, who lives in per petnal fear, lest his trick should be discovered stood high with his contemporaries as orator, politician, and author, and time has hardly abated his reputation, he still ranks as the most eloquent of our publicists, and, with the possible exception of Bacon, the most philosophical of English states Burke was born in Dublin, 12th January 1729, the son of a Protestant solicitor, his mother, whose name was Nagle, was a Roman Catholic. He was educated at a Quaker's school at Ballitore in Kildare, and afterwards (1743-48) at Trinity College, Dublin, where he read videly and desultorily In 1750 he removed to London, and entered himself as a student of the Middle Temple, but he seems soon to have abandoned his intention of prosecuting the law as a In 1756 he published anonymously a profession parody of Bolingbroke, a Vindication of Natural Society, in which the paradoxical reasoning of the noble sceptic is pushed to a ridiculous extreme, the majestic style was so skilfully imitated that many of the best judges believed the serious jeu-d'esprit to be Bolingbroke's In 1757 he published A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, which at once secured universal attention, all the more because of its novelty. It relied largely on physiological considerations, objects appear beautiful because they have 'the power of producing a peculiar relaxation of our nerves and fibres' The Inquiry was translated into French and German author was soon made free of the society of Johnson, Reynolds, Garrick, Goldsmith, and the other eminent men of the day, but he was still struggling with difficulties and compiling for booksellers He suggested to Dodsley the plan of an Annual Register, which that spirited publisher adopted, Burke furnishing a large portion of the original matter for the first year (1759), and he con tinued for nearly thirty years to write the 'Survey of Events' in the Register In 1761 Burke went to Ireland as private secretary to 'Single speech Hamilton' (Chief-Secretary to the Earl of Halifax, Lord - Lieutenant of Ireland) This connection lasted only three years, as Burke's literary impulses rebelled against the conditions imposed—that he must give all his time to his patron In 1765 he became secretary to the Marquis of Rockingham, and was returned to the House of Commons as member for the pocket-borough of Wendover He soon distinguished himself in Parliament, but the Rockingham administration was dissolved in 1760, and Burke joined the Opposition

Though he held no office till the downfall of the North Ministra in 1782, Burke's public activity never ceased till his death. His cloquence, political knowledge, and force of character give him a foremost place in public life. Lord North's long administration (1770-82) was marked by the unsuccessful coercion of the American colonies, by corruption, extra agance, and reaction Against this policy Burke and his Whig friends could only raise a strong protest. The best of Burke's writings and speeches belong to this period, and may be described as a defence of sound constitutional statesmanship against prevailing abuse and misgovernment. His first great pamphlet, Observations on the Present State of the Nation (1769), was a reply to George Grenville, On the Causes of the Present Discontents (1770) treats of the Wilkes controversy

Perhaps the finest of his many efforts are the speech on American Taxation (1774), the speech on Conciliation with America (1775), and the Letter to Sheriffs of Bristol (1777)—all advocating wise and liberal measures, which might have averted the mischief that cnsued In 1773 he made a visit to Paris, in 1774 he had to retire from his seat for Wendover, when he was elected by Bristol But his support of the proposals for relaxing the restrictions on the trade of Ireland with Great Britain, and for alleviating the laws against Catholics, cost him the seat in 1780, and from that time till 1794 he represented Malton When the disasters of the American war brought Lord North's Government to a close, Burke was Paymaster of the Forces under Rockingham (1782), as also under Portland (1783) After the fall of the Whig Ministry in 1783 Burke was never again in office, and, misled by party feeling, he opposed Pitt's measure for Free Trade with Ireland and the Commercial Treaty with France. In 1788 he opened the trial of Warren Hastings by the speech which will always rank among the masterpieces of English eloquence. He opposed Pitt's Regency Bill (1788), and from this time forward his energies were mainly absorbed by the French Revolution, then 'blackening the horizon'-to use one of his own metaphors His Reflections on the French Revolution (1790) reached an eleventh edition in a year, was read all over Europe, and powerfully ! encouraged its rulers in strenuous resistance to the Revolution Burke, alienated on this subject from Fox and the Whigs, became more and more vehiement in his denunciations of the French innovations. The Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs, Thoughts on French Affairs, and Letters on a Regicide Peace were married by the vehiemence with which he urged the Government not only to fight the Revolution, but to suppress free opinions at home. Burke died 9th July 1797, and was buried in the little church at Beacons field, where in 1768 he had purchased the estate of Gregories Dnring his whole political lifehis private affairs were sadly embarrassed, he had to borrow money to buy that estate, and he was always deep in debt. Two pensions were granted him in 1794, when a proposal to raise him to the peerage as Lord Beaconsfield was arrested by the death of his only son.

Burke ranks as one of the fore-most orators and political thinkers of England He had vast knowledge of affairs, a glowing imagination, passionate sympathies, and an inexhaustible wealth of powerful and cultured expression, but his delivery was awkward and ungainly, and speeches which captivate the reader only served to empty the benches of the House of Commons

The splendour of even his least happy disquisitions, the various knowledge which they display, the rich imagery with which they abound, and the spirit of philosophical reflection which pervades them all, stamp them among the foremost literary productions of their time, such a flood of rich illustration had never before been poured on questions of State policy and government. At the same time, Burke was eminently practical in his views. His greatest efforts will be found directed to the redress of some existing wrong or the preservation of some existing good—to hatred of actual oppression, to the removal of useless restrictions, and to the calm and sober improvement of the laws and government which he venerated, without 'coining to himself Whig principles from a French die, unknown to the impress of our fathers in the constitution' Where inconsistencies are found in his writings between his early and later opinions it may be argued that they consist largely in matters of detail or in expression. He wished, he says, to preserve consistency, but only by varying his means to secure the unity of his and '\\ hen the aguipoise of the vessel in which he sails may be endangered by overloading it upon one side, he is desirous of carrying the small weight of his reasons to that which may preserve its equipoise' When the Revolution broke out, his signeity enabled him to foresee the dreadful consequences which it would entail upon France and the world, he became the victim of a fixed idea, and his enthusiastic temperament led him to state his impressions in language sometimes overcharged and even bombastic, though sometimes full of proplicuc fire. In one of the debates on the Revolution, after mentioning that he understood that three thousand daggers had been ordered from Birmingham, Burke drew one from under his coat, and throwing it on the floor, melodramatically exclaimed, 'This is what you are to gain by an alliance with France-this is your fraternisation '' The orator's imagination was not always under the control of perfect taste, many of his utterances were absurdly hyperbolical, on the other hand, some of his similes and illustrations were—especially by chemies—accounted 'low' In his reply to Pitt on the Commercial Treaty with France in 1787, he maintained that the Minister had contemplated the subject with a narrowness peculiar to limited minds-ins an affair of two little counting-houses, and not of two great nations He seems to consider it as a contention between the sign of the Fleur de lis and the sign of the old Red Lion for which should obtain the best custom? Replying to the argument that the Americans were our children, and should not have revolted against their parent, he said 'They are our children, it is true, but when children ask for bread, we are not to give them a stone. When those children of ours wish to assimilate with their parent, and to respect the beauteous countenance of British liberty, are we to turn to them the shameful parts of our constitution? Are we to give them our weakness for their strength, our opprobrium for their glory, and the slough of slavery, which we are not able to work off, to scree them for their freedom?' His account of the illassorted administration of Lord Chatham is no less ludicrous than correct. 'He made an administration so checkered and speckled, he put together a piece of joinery so crossly indented and whimsuch a piece of diversified mostic, such a tesselated pavement without cement, here a bit of black stone, and there a bit of white, patriots and courtiers, king's friends and republicans,

Whigs and Tories, treacherous friends and open enemies; that it was indeed a very curious show but utterly unsafe to touch, and unsure to stand on The colleagues whom he had assorted at the same boards stared at each other, and were obliged to ask "Sir, your name?" "Sir, you have the advantage of me," "Vir Such a-one, I beg a thousand pardons" I venture to say it did so happen, that persons had a single office divided between them, who had never spoke to each other in their lives, until they found themselves, they knew not how, pigging together, heads and points, in the same truckle bed

From the Speech on Conciliation with America 1775

Mr Speaker, I cannot prevail on myself to hurry over the great consideration. It is good for us to be here We stand where we have an immense view of what is, and what is past. Clouds, indeed, and darkness, rest. upon the future Let us, however, before we descend from this noble eminence, reflect that this growth of our national prosperity has happened within the short period of the life of man. It has happened within sixty eight years. There are those alive whose memory might touch the two extremities. For instance, my Lord Bathurst [the first Earl, 1684-1775] might re member all the stages of the progress. He was in 1704 of an age at least to be made to comprehend such things He was then old enough acta parentum jam legere, et qua sit folerit cognoscere virtus Suppose, sir, that the angel of this auspicious youth, foreseeing the many virtues which made him one of the most annable, as he is one of the most fortunate men of his age, had opened to him in vision, that, when in the fourth generation, the third prince of the house of Brunswick had sat twelve years on the throne of that nation, which-by the happy issue of moderate and healing councils-was to be made Great Britain, he should see his son, lord chancellor of England, turn back the current of hereditary dignity to its fountiin, and ruse him to a higher rank of peerage, whilst he enriched the family with a new one. If amidst these bright and happy seenes of domestic honour and prosperity that angel should have drawn up the curtain, and unfolded the rising glories of his country, and whilst he was gazing with admiration on the then commercial grandeur of England, the Genius should point out to him a little speck, scaree visible in the mass of the national interest, a small seminal principle, rather than a formed body, and should tell him 'Young man, there is \merica-which at this day serves for little more than to amuse you with stories of savage men and uncouth manners, yet shall, before you taste of death, show itself equal to the whole of that commerce which now attracts the envy of the world Whatever Lugland has been growing to by a progressive increase of improvement, brought in by varieties of people, by succession of civilising conquests and civilising settlements in a series of seventeen hundred years, you shall see as much added to her by America in the course of a single life!' If this state of his country had been foretold to him, would lt not require all the sanguine credulity of youth, and all the fervid glow of enthusiasm, to make him believe it? Fortunate man, he has lived to see it! Fortunate, indeed, if he lives to see nothing that shall vary the prospect and cloud the setting of his day!

To impoverish the colonies in general, and in particular to arrest the noble course of their trainenterprise, would be a more cass tack. I freely can a fees it. We have shown a disposition to a system of this kind, a disposition even to continue the restrain after the offence looking on ourselve a rivals to our colonies, and persuaded that of course we must gain all that they shall lose. Much mischief we man certainly do. The power inadequate to all other things is often more than sufficient for this. I do no look on the direct and immediate power of the colomes to resist our violence as very formulable. In this, housever, I may be mistaken. But when I consider that we have colonies for no purpose but to be serviceable to us, it seems to my poor understanding a little preposterous to male them unserviceable in order to keep them obedient. It is, in truth, nothing more than the old and, as I thought, exploded problem of termina which proposes to beggar its subjects into submission But remember, when you have completed your system of impoverishment, that nature still proceeds in her ordinary course, and that discontent will increase with misery, and that there are entical moments in the for tunes of all states, when they who are too weak to contribute to your prosperity may be strong enough to complete your run Spoliatis arma sufersuit The Magnanimity in policies is not seldom the trues, wisdom and a great empire and little minds go ill to gether. If we are conscious of our situation, and glow with real to till our places as becomes our station and ourselve, we ought to anspirate all our public proceedings on America with the old warning of the church, sursuit cents. ## Destruction of the Carnatic.

When at length Hyder Alı found that he had to do with men who either would sign no convention, or whom no treaty and no signature could bind, and who were the determined enemies of human intercourse itself, he decreed to make the country possessed by these incorrigible and predestinated criminals a memorable example to mankind. He resolved, in the gloomy recesses of a mind capacious of such things, to leave the whole Carnatic an everlasting monument of ven geance, and to put perpetual desolation as a barrier between him and those against whom the faith which holds the moral elements of the world together was no pro ection. He became at length so confident of his force, so collected in his might, that he made no secret whatever of his dreadful resolution. Having termi nated his disputes with every enemy and every rival, who buried their mutual animosities in their common detestation against the creditors of the Nabob of Arcot, he drew from every quarter v hatever a savage ferocity could add to his new rudiments in the arts of destruction, and compounding all the materials of fury, havoc, and desolation into one black cloud, he hing for a while on the declivities of the mountains. Whilst the authors of all these evils were idly and stupidly gazing on this menacing me eor which blackened all their horizon, it suddenly burst and poured down the whole of its contents upon the plains of the Carnatic. Then ensued a scene of woe, the like of which no eye had seen, no heart conceived, and which no tongue can adequately tell. All the horrors of war before known or heard of were mercy to that new havoc. A storm of universal fire blasted every field, consumed every house, destroyed every temple The miserable inhabi tants flying from the flaming villages, in part were slaughtered others, without regard to sex, to age, to the respect of rank, or sacreduess of function, fathers torn from children, husbands from wives, enveloped in a whirlwind of cavalry, and amidst the goading spears of drivers and the trampling of pursuing horses, were swept into captivity in an unknown and hostile land Those who were able to evade this tempest fled to the walled cities, but, escaping from fire, sword, and exile, they fell into the jaws of famme.

The alms of the settlement, in this dreadful exigency, were certainly liberal, and all was done by charity that private charity could do but it was a people in beggary, it was a nation that stretched out its hands for food. For months together these creatures of sufferance, whose very excess and luxury in their most plenteous days halfallen short of the allowance of our austerest fasts, silent, patient, resigned, without sedition or disturbance, almost without complaint, perished by a hundred a day in the streets of Madras, every day seventy at least laid their bodies in the streets, or on the giacis of Tanjore, and expired of famine in the granary of India. I was going to awake your justice towards this nnhappy part of our fello--citizens, by bringing before you some of the circumstances of this plague of hunger. Of all the calamities which beset and waylay the life of man, this comes the nearest to our heart, and is that wherein the proudest of us all feels himself to be nothing more than he is but I find myself unable to manage it with decorum, these details are of a species of horror so nauseous and disgusting, they are so degrading to the sufferers and to the hearer, they are so humiliating to human nature itself, that, on better thoughts, I find it more advisable to throw a pall over this hideous object, and to leave it to your general conceptions.

For eighteen months, without intermission, this destruction raged from the gates of Vadras to the gates of Tanjore, and so completely did these masters in their art, Hyder Alı and his more ferocious son, absolve themselves of their impious vow, that when the British armies traversed, as they did, the Carnatic for hundreds of miles in all directions, through the whole line of their march did they not see one man, not one woman, not one child, not one four footed beast of any description whatever One dead uniform silence reigned over the The Carnatic is a country not much whole region inferior in extent to England Figure to yourself, Mr Speal er, the land in whose representative chair you sit, figure to yourself the form and fashion of your sweet and cheerful country from Thames to Trent, north and sonth, and from the Irish to the German Sea, east and west, emptied and embowelled (may God avert the omen of our crimes ') by so accomplished a desolation '

Marie Antoinette.

It is now stateen or seventeen years since I saw the queen of France, then the dauphiness, at Versailles, and surely never lighted on this orb, which she hardly seemed to touch, a more delightful vision. I saw her just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she just began to move m-glittering like the morning star full of life, and splendour, and joy Oh! what a revolution! and what an heart must I have to contem plate without emotion that elevation and that fall! Little did I dream, when she added titles of venera tion to that enthusiastic, distant, respectful love, that she should ever be obliged to carry the sharp antidote agains' disgrace concealed in that bosom, little did I dream that I should have lived to see such disasters fallen upon her in a nation of gallant men, m a nation of men of honour and of cavaliers I thought ten thousand swords must have leaped from their scabbards to aveuge even a look that threatened her with insult. But the age of chivalry is gone. That of sophisters, economists and calculators has succeeded, and the glory of Enrope is extinguished for ever. Never, never more shall we behold that generous loyalty to rank and sex, that proud submission, that dignified obedience, that subordination of the heart, which kept alive, even in servitude itself, the spirit of an exalted freedom. The unbought grace of life, the cheap defence of nations, the nnrse of manly sentiment and heroic enterprise is gone! It is gone that sensibility of principle, that chastity of honour, which felt a stain like a wound, which inspired courage whilst it mitigated ferocity, which ennobled whatever it tonched, and under which vice itself lost half its evil by losing all its grossness

From Burke's 'Letter to a Noble Lord' (the Duke of Bedford who had ep. self burke of a man a A.

I was not like his forace of Belford, swaddled, and rocked, and dandled into a legislatur -- A rive for sum is the motto for a man like me. I person ed no one of the qualities, nor cultivated one of the acts, that recommend men to the favour and protection of the creat I was not made for a minion or a tool. As little did I follow the tryle of winning the hearts by important on the understandings of the people. At every step of my progress in life-for in every step was I traver ed and opposed-and at every turnpike I met, I was obliged to shew my passport, and again and again to prove my sole title to the honour of being useful to my country, by a proof that I was not wholly unacquainted with its laws and the whole system of its interests both abroad and at home. Otherwise, no rank no toleration even for me I had no arts but manh arts. On them I have stood, and, please God, in spite of the Dule of Bedford and the Larl of Lauderdale, to the last gasp vill I stand

I know not how it has happened, but it really eems that, whilst his Grace was meditating his well considered consure upon me, he fell into a sort of sleep. Homer nods, and the Dule of Bedford may dream and as dreams—even his golden dreams—are apt to be ill piecel and incongrnously put together his Grace preserved his idea of reproach to me, but took the subject matter from the crown grants to his own family. This is 'the stuff of which his dreams are inade.' In that way of putting things together, his Grace is perfectly in the right. The grants to the liouse of Russell were so enormous as not

The tire peer of the name, the first pure laser of the trants was a Mr I weell a person of an ancient gentle man's family, reised by being a minion of Henry VIII. As there penerally is some resemblance of character to create these relations the favourite was in all likelihood much such another as his inaster. The first of those immoderate prants was not taken from the ancient demesne of the croyin, but from the recent confidence of the ancient nobility of the land. The first hiving sucked the blood of his prey, threw the offil carcass to the jackal in waiting. Having tasted once the food of confiscation, the favourites became fierce and revenous. This worthy favourites first grant was from the lay nobility. The second, infinitely improving on the enormity of the first was from the plunder of the church

In truth, his Grace is somewhat excusable for his nishike to a grant like mine, not only in its quantity, but in its kind, so different from his own

Mine was from a mild and benevolent sovereign, his, from Henry VIII. Mine had not its fund in the murder of any innocent person of illustrious rank, or in the pillage of any body of unoffending men, his grants were from the aggregate and consolidated funds of judgments iniquitonsly legal, and from possessions voluntarily surrendered by the lawful proprietors with the gibbet at their door

The ment of the grantee whom he derives from, was that of being a prompt and greedy instrument of a levelling tyrant, who oppressed all descriptions of his people, but who fell with particular fury on everything that was great and noble. Mine has been in endeavouring to screen every man, in every class, from oppression, and particularly in defending the high and eminent, who in the bad times of confiscating princes, confiscating chief governors, or confiscating demagogues, are the most exposed to jealousy, avarice, and envy

The merit of the original grantee of his Grace's pensions was in giving his hand to the work, and par taking the spoil with a prince who plundered a part of the national church of his time and country. Mine was in defending the whole of the national church of my own time and my own country, and the whole of the national churches of all countries, from the principles and the examples which lead to ecclesiastical pillage, thence to a contempt of all prescriptive titles, thence to the pillage of all property, and thence to universal desolation.

The ment of the origin of his Grace's fortune was in being a favourite and chief adviser to a prince who left no liberty to his native country. My endeavour was to obtain liberty for the municipal country in which I was born, and for all descriptions and denominations in it. Mine was to support, with unrelaxing vigilance, every right, every privilege, every franchise, in this my adopted, my dearer, and more comprehensive country, and not only to preserve those rights in this ebief seat of empire, but in every nation, in every land, in every elimate, language, and religion in the vast domain that still is under the protection, and the larger that was once under the protection, of the British crown

Had it pleased God to continue to me the hopes of succession, I should have been, according to my medi ocrity, and the mediocrity of the age I live in, a sort of founder of a family, I should have left a son, who, in all the points in which personal merit can be viewed, in science, in erudition, in genius, in taste, in honour, in generosity, in humanity, in every liberal sentiment and every liberal accomplishment, would not have shewn himself inferior to the Duke of Bedford, or to any of those whom he traces in his line. His Grace very soon would have wanted all plausibility in his attack upon that provision which belonged more to mine than to me He would soon have supplied every deficiency, and symmetrised every disproportion. It would not have been for that successor to resort to any stagnant wast ing reservoir of ment in me, or in any ancestry had in himself a salient living spring of generous and manly action. Every day be lived, he would have repurchased the bounty of the crown, and ten times more, if ten times more he had received. He was made a public creature, and had no enjoyment whatever but in the performance of some duty. At this exigent moment the loss of a finished man is not easily supplied

But a Disposer, whose power we are little able to resist, and whose wisdom it behoves us not at all to dispute, has ordained it in another manner, andwhatever my querulous weakness might suggest-a far better The storm has gone over me, and I lie like one of those old oaks which the late hurricane has scattered I am stripped of all my honours, I am about me torn up by the roots, and he prostrate on the earth! There, and prostrate there, I must unfeignedly recognise the divine justice, and in some degree submit to it. But whilst I humble myself before God, I do not know that it is forbidden to repel the attacks of unjust and inconsiderate men The patience of Job is proverbial After some of the convulsive struggles of our irritable nature, he submitted himself, and repented in dust and But even so, I do not find him blamed for reprehending, and with a considerable degree of verbal asperity, those ill natured neighbours of his who visited his dunghill to read moral, political, and economical lectures on his misery I am alone I have none to meet my enemies in the gate Indeed, my lord, I greatly deceive myself if in this hard season I would give a peck of refuse wheat for all that is called fame and honour in the world. This is the appetite but of It is a luxury, it is a privilege, it is an indulgence for those who are at their ease. But we are all of us made to shun disgrace, as we are made to shrink from pain, and poverty, and disease. It is an instinct, and under the direction of reason, instinct is always in the right. I live in an inverted order ought to have succeeded me have gone before me, they who should have been to me as posterity are in the place of ancestors. I one to the dearest relationwhich ever must subsist in memory—that act of piety which he would have performed to me, I owe it to him to shew that he was not descended, as the Duke of Bedford would have it, from an unworthy parent.

George Steevens (1736-1800), dramatic critic and biographer, was associated with Johnson in the second edition of his Shakespeare (1773), which was republished with additions by Malone in 1780 In 1793 he published a completely new edition of Shakespeare, in which, instead of showing 'servile adherence to the ancient copies,' he took large liberties with the text, such as 'the expulsion of useless and supernumerary syllables, and an occasional supply of such as might fortuitously have been omitted.' He was acute and well read in dramatic literature, but prone to literary mystification, and, according to Johnson, was mischievous though not malignant. He it was who concocted the famous legend of the death dealing terrors of the upas-tree, which so completely hoaxed Erasmus Darwin (see page 576)

Edward Gibbon,

historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, was by birth, education, and social standing distinctively an English gentleman, his father's family being an ancient Kentish house, though not (as Sir Egerton Brydges argued) descended from the Barons Say and Seale Born at Putney, 27th April 1737, Gibbon was at first, on account of delicate health, privately educated, at fifteen he was entered of Magdalen College, Oxford Almost from infancy he was a close student, but his indiscriminate appetite for books 'subsided by degrees in the historic line.' He arrived at Oxford, he line himself told us, with a stock of erudition that might have puzzled a doctor, and a degree of ignorance of which a schoolboy would have been ashamed, and he spent fourteen months at college idly and unprofitably. At no period in its history had Oxford reached such a depth of degeneracy.' The fellows of my time,' says Gibbon, 'were decent easy men who supinely enjoyed the gifts of the founder, their days were filled by a series of uniform employments, the chapel and the hall, the coffee-house and the common room, till they retired, wears and well satisfied, to a long slumber I rom the toil of reading, or thinking, or writing, they had absolved their conscience, and the first shoots of learning and ingenuity withered in the ground, without yielding any fruits to the owners Their conversation stagnated or the public in a round of college business, Tory politics, personal anecdotes, and private scandal, their dull and deep potations excused the brisk intemperance of youth, and their constitutional toasts were not expressive of the most lively loyalty for the house of Hanover' After studying Bossuet and Parsons the Jesuit, young Gibbon became a convert to the Roman Catholic religion, and at the feet of a priest in London, on the 8th of June 1753, he 'solemnly, though privately, abjured the errors of heresy' In order to reclaim him his father placed him under the care of the deist and poet Mallet, by whose philosophy the young inquirer was rather scan dalised than reclaimed He was next sent for some years to Lausanne to be under the charge of M Pavilliard, a Calvinist clergyman, whose judicious guidance brought his pupil back to Protestantism, and on Christmas Day 1754 he received the sacrament in the Protestant church at Lausanne. 'It was here that I suspended my religious inquiries, acquiescing with implicit belief in the tenets and mysteries which are adopted by the general consent of Catholics and Protestants' Here he began and carried out with rare stead fastness of purpose those studies in French litera ture and in the Latin classics which, aided by his prodigious memory, made him a master of erudition without a superior And here too he fell in love with Mademoiselle Suzanne Curchod, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of the minister of Crassy, who lived to become the wife of the great French Minister and financier, M Necker, and the mother of the gifted Madame de Stael He found on his return to England that his father would not hear of the 'strange alliance,' and, like the more emotional Chateaubriand in the same case, submitted meekly to the family law. In the calni reflection of thirty years later he adds, 'After a painful struggle I yielded to my fate, I sighed as a lover, I obeyed as a son, my wound was insen sibly healed by time, absence, and the habits of a new life.' The pair remained constant friends in later life. In 1758 Gibbon returned to England, and three years afterwards appeared as an author in a slight French treatise on the study of literature. accepted the commission of captain in the Hampshire militia, and though his studies were interrupted, 'the discipline and evolutions of a modern battle gave me a clearer notion of the phalanx and the legion, and the captain of the Hampshire grenadiers was not useless to the historian of the Roman Empire' Released from his military duties at the peace of 1762, he paid a visit to France and Italy He had long been meditating some historical work, and whilst at Rome in 1764 'As I sat musing his choice was determined amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the bare footed friars were singing vespers in the temple of Jupiter, the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started into my mind, but years were to clapse before he realised his intentions On returning to England in 1765 he seems to have been fish onable and idle, his father died in 1770, and he then began to form the plan of an independent life. The Hampshire estate of Buriton, his home off and on for the last twenty years, was left by his father much in debt, so that he deter mined to quit the country and live in London and it was then he undertook the first volume . It the outset all was dark and of his history doubtful even the title of the vork, the true err of the decline and fall of the empire, the limits of the introduction, the division of the chapters, and the order of the narrative, and I was often tempted to cast away the labour of seven years The style of an author should be the image of his mind, but the choice and command of language is the fruit of evereise Many experiments were made before I could but the middle tone between a dull chronicle and a rhetorical declaration three times did I compose the first chapter, and twice the second and third, before I was tolerably satisfied with their effect?

In 1774 he was returned for the borough of Liskeard, and sat in Parliament eight sessions during the memorable contest between Great Britain and Anierica Prudence he says, condemned him to acquiesce in the humble station of a mute, the great speakers filled him with despair, the bad ones with terror But he supported by his vote the administration of Lord North, by whom he was appointed one of the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations In 1776, after seven years of unremitting toil and much fastidious polishing of the style, the first quarto volume of his history was given to the world. For a grave 1 historical work its success was almost unprece dented. 'The first impression was exhausted in a few days, a second and third edition were scarcely adequate to the demand, and the bookseller's property was twice invaded by the pirates of Dublin the book was on every table, and almost His elder brother historians, on every toilette." Hume and Robertson generously greated him with warm applicase 'Whether I consider the dignity of your style,' said Hume, 'the depth of your matter, or the extensiveness of your learning I must regard the work as equally the object of esteem' [There was another bond of sympathy between the English and the senior of the Scottish historians Gibbon had unmistakably worked from quite anti-orthodox views as to the origins of 'The various modes of worship Christianity which prevailed in the Roman world were all considered by the people as equally true, by the philosopher as equally false, and by the magistrate as equally useful? This dictum pretty clearly in dicates Gibbon's own religious belief the philoso phers of France had triumphed over the Calvinist divinity of Lausanne Gibbon treated the growth of Christianity as he did other historical phenomena, without reference to supernatural guidance, and his own temperament intensified the eighteenth century distrust and dislike of 'enthusiasm self devoting zeal was hardly distinguished from functions. It was not for some time that the religious world awakened to the very far reaching issues of Gibbon's view of the growth and spread of Christianity in the fifteenth and sixteenth chapters, which, while not formally denying the 'convincing evidence of the doctrine itself, and the ruling providence of its great author,' nevertheless accounted for the rapid growth of the early Christian Church by 'secondary' or merely human causes. Of these Cabbon reckoned five the inflexible and intolerant zeal of the Christians, the doctrine of a future life, the miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive Church, the virtues of the primitive Christians, and the union and discipline of the Christian republic. Ere long fierce controversy mevitably arose, and, as in the debates about Darwinism in the next century, thousands took i keen interest in the discussion and a strong side against the innovator who never had in their hands the book that raised the questions supposed to have been routed from the field by the orthodox had reasserted itself in a more formidable shape, and multitudes of 'answers' to Gibbon were written-perhaps the most noteworthy that by Watson Bishop of Llandaff Gibbon deigned to reply only when a critic—the unfortunate 'Mr Davies of Oxford'-impugned 'not the futh but the fidelity of the historian'?

The authors modest claim for himself in the matter of style was amply justified the statch and rhythmical roll of his sonorous periods stood out in contrast to anything yet attempted in Ling lish prose, though antithesis of sense and balance of phrase were at times too insistent, the style, in wonderful accord with the majestic and continuous march of the story, was at once less artificial and more English than Johnson's, more harmonious, more varied, and less tedious than Johnson is apt to become

The second and third volumes of the history did not appear till 1781 After their publication, being disappointed of a place looked for from Ministerial patronage, Gibbon resolved to retire to Lausanne, where he was offered a residence by a friend of his youth, W. Deyverdun hard very happily for about four years, devoting his mornings to composition, and his evenings to the enlightened and polished society which had gathered in that city and neighbourhood completion of the history must be described in his own memorable words 'It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th of June 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page in a summer house in my garden After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a herceau, or covered walk of acaci is, which commands a prospect of the country,

The Magnificonce of the Caliphs

Almansor, the brother and successor of Saffali, Ind the foundations of Bagdad (762 A D), the imperial seat of his posterity during a reign of five hundred years The chosen spot is on the eastern bank of the Tigris, about fifteen miles above the runs of Modain the double wall was of a circular form, and such was the rand increase of a capital now dwindled to a provincial town, that the funeral of a popular saint might be attended by eight hundred thousand men and sixty thousand women of Bagdad and the adjacent villages. In this eity of peace, amidst the riches of the east, the Abba sides soon disdrined the abstinence and frigality of the first caliplis and aspired to emulate the magnificence of the Persian kings. After his wars and buildings, Almansor left behind him in gold and silver about thirty millions sterling, and this treasure was exhausted in a few years by the vices or virtues of his children His son Milhadi in a single pilgrimage to Mecca expended six millions of dinars of gold. A pious and charitable motive may sanetify the foundation of cisterns and carryinseris, which he distributed along a measured road of seven hundred miles, but his trun of camels, laden with snow, could serve only to astonish the natives of Arabia, and to refresh the fruits and liquors of the royal banquet. The courtiers would surely praise the liberality of his grandson Alinamon, who gave as ay four fifths of the income of a province-a sum of two millions four hundred thousand gold dinars-before he drew his foot from the stirrup. At the nuptials of the same prince, a thousand pearls of the largest size were showered on the head of the bride, and a lottery of lands and houses displayed the capricious bounts of fortune The glories of the court were brightened rather than impaired in the decline of the empire, and a Greek ambassador might admire or pity the magnificence of the feeble Moctader 'The caliph's whole army' says the historian Abulfeda, 'both horse and foot, was under arms, which together made a body of one hundred and sixty thousand men His state officers, the favourite slaves, stood near him in splendid apparel, their belts glittering with gold and gems. Near them vere seven thousand cunuehs, four thousand of them white, the remunder black. The porters or door keepers were in number seven hundred Barges and bonts with the most superb decorations were seen swimming upon the Nor was the prince itself less splendid, in which were hung up thirty eight thousand pieces of tapestry, twelve thousand five hundred of which were of silk embroidered with gold. The carpets on the floor were twenty two thousand. A hundred hons were brought out, with a keeper to each hon. Among the other spectacles of rare and stupendous luxury was a tree of gold and silver spreading into eighteen large branelies, on which, and on the lesser boughs, sat a variety of birds made of the same precious metals, as well as the leaves of the tree. While the machinery affected spontaneous motions, the several birds warbled their natural harmony Through this seene of magni ficence the Greek ambassador was led by the virier to the foot of the caliph's throne. In the west, the Ommiades of Spain supported with equal point the title of commander of the faithful. Three rules from Cordova, in honour of his favourite sultana, the third and greatest of the Ablahalmans constructed the cuy pulace, and gardens of John. Twenty five years, and above three nullions sterling, were employed by the founder his liberal to to invited the artists of Constantinople, the mot skilful seulptors and architects of the age, and the buildings were sustained or adorned by twelve hundred columns of Spanish and African, of Greel and Italian marble. The hall of audience was ineristed with gold and pearls and a great lessin in the centre was surrounded with the curious and costs figures of birds and quadrupeds. In a lofty pavilion of the pardens one of these basins and founturs, so delightful in a sultry climate, vas replenished not with water but with the purest quiel silver. The scraplio of Abdalrahman, his vives, concubines and black conuchs amounted to six thousand three hundred persons, and he was attended to the field by a guard of ty elve thon sand hor e, who e lights and scimitar were studded with

In a private condition, our deares are perpetually repressed by poverty and subordination, but the lives and labours of millions are devoted to the service of a despotie prince, while laws are blindly obeyed and whose wishes are instantly gratified. Our imagination is drazled by the splendid pieture, and whiteser may be the cool dictates of rea on, there are few among us who would obtinately refuse a trial of the comforts and the cares of royalts. It may therefore be of some use to borrow the experience of the same Abdalrahman, whose magnificence has perhaps excited our admiration and envy and to transcribe an authentic memorial which was found in the closet of the deceased caliph 'I have now reigned above fifty years in victory or peace, beloved by my subjects, dreaded by my enemies, and respected by my allies. Riches and honours, power and pleasure, have waited on my call, nor does any earthly bles ing appear to have been wanting to my felicity. In this situation I have diligently numbered the days of pure and genuine happiness which have fallen to my lot they amount to fourteen. O man! place not the confidence in this present world'

Conquest of Jerusalem by the Crusaders.

Jerusalem has derived some reputation from the number and importance of her memorable steges. It was not till after a long and obtinate contest that Bibylon and Kome could prevail against the obstinacy of the people, the eraggy ground that might supersede the necessity of fortifications, and the walls and towers that would have fortified the most accessible plain These obstacles were diminished in the age of the crusades. The bulwarks had been completely destroyed and imperfectly restored the Jews, their nation and worship, were for ever banished, but nature is less changeable than man, and the site of Ierusalem, though somewhat softened and somewhat removed, was still strong against the assaults of an enemy. By the experience of a recent siege, and a three years' possession, the Sarreens of Egypt had been taught to discern, and in some degree to remedy, the defects of n place which religion as well as honour forbade them to resign.

Aladin or Iftikhar, the caliph's lieutenant, was intrusted with the defence, his policy strove to restrain the native Christians by the dread of their own ruin and that of the holy sepulchre, to animate the Moslems by the assurance of temporal and eternal rewards. His garri son is said to have consisted of forty thousand Turks and Arabians, and if he could muster twenty thousand of the inhabitants it must be confessed that the besieged were more numerous than the besieging army diminished strength and numbers of the Latins allowed them to grasp the whole circumference of four thousand yards-about two English miles and a half-to what useful purpose should they have descended into the valley of Ben Himmon and torrent of Cedron, or approached the precipices of the south and east, from whence they had nothing either to hope or fear? Their siege was more reasonably directed against the northern and western sides of the city Godfrey of Bouillon erected his standard on the first swell of Mount Calvary, to the left, as far as St Stephen's gate the line of attack was continued by Tancred and the two Roberts, and Count Raymond established his quarters from the citadel to the foot of Mount Sion, which vas no longer included within the precincts of the city. On the fifth day the crusaders made a general assault, in the fanatic hope of battering down the walls without engines, and of scaling them without ladders. By the dint of brutal force, they burst the first barrier, but they were driven back with shame and slaughter to the camp the influ ence of vision and prophecy was deadened by the too frequent abuse of those pious stratagems, and time and labour were found to be the only means of victory time of the siege was indeed fulfilled in forty days, but they were forty days of calamity and anguish petition of the old complaint of famine may be imputed in some degree to the voracious or disorderly appetite of the Franks, but the stony soil of Jerusalem is almost destitute of water, the scanty springs and hasty torrents were dry in the summer season, nor was the thirst of the bestegers relieved, as in the city, by the artificial supply of cisterns and aqueducts. The circumjacent country is equally destitute of trees for the uses of shade or building, but some large beams were discovered in a cave by the crusaders a wood near Sichem, the enchanted grove of Tasso, was cut down necessary timber was transported to the camp by the vigour and dexterity of Tancred, and the engines were framed by some Genoese artists, who had fortunately landed in the harbour of Jassa. Two movable turrets were constructed at the expense and in the stations of the Duke of Lorraine and the Count of Tholouse, and rolled forwards with devout labour, not to the most accessible, but to the most neglected parts of the fortifi cation Raymond's tower was reduced to ashes by the fire of the besieged, but his colleague was more vigilant and successful, the enemies were driven by his archers from the rampart, the drawbridge was let down, and on a Friday, at three in the afternoon, the day and hour of the Passion, Godfrey of Bouillon stood victorious on the walls of Jerusalem His example was followed on every side by the emulation of valour, and about four hundred and sixty years after the conquest of Omar, the holy city was rescued from the Mohammedan yoke. In the pillage of public and private wealth, the adventurers had agreed to respect the exclusive property of the first occupant, and the spoils of the great mosqueseventy lamps and massy vases of gold and silverrewarded the diligence and displayed the generosity of Tancred. A bloody sacrifice was offered by his mistaken votaries to the God of the Christians resistance might provoke, but neither age nor sex could mollify their implacable rage, they indulged themselves three days in a promiscuous massacre, and the infection of the dead bodies produced an epidemical disease. After seventy thousand Moslems had been put to the sword, and the harmless Jews had been burnt in their synagogue, they could still reserve a multitude of captives whom interest or lassitude persuaded them to spare. Of these savage heroes of the cross, Tancred alone betrayed some senti ments of compassion, yet we may praise the more selfish lenity of Raymond, who granted a capitulation and safe conduct to the garrison of the citadel. sepulchre was now free, and the bloody victors prepared to accomplish their vow Bareheaded and barefoot, with contrite hearts, and in a humble posture, they ascended the hill of Calvary amidst the loud anthems of the clergy, lassed the stone which had covered the Saviour of the world, and bedewed with tears of joy and penitence the monument of their redemption

Mohammed.

According to the tradition of his companions, Moham med was distinguished by the beauty of his person-an outward gift which is seldom despised, except by those to whom it has been refused. Before he spoke, the orator engaged on his side the affections of a public or private audience. They applauded his commanding presence, his majestic aspect, his piercing eye, his gracious smile, his flowing beard, his countenance that painted every sensation of the soul, and his gestures that enforced each expression of the tongue. In the familiar offices of life he scrupulously adhered to the grave and ceremonious politeness of his country lus respectful attention to the rich and powerful was dignified by his condescension and affability to the poorest citizens of Mecca, the frankness of his manner concealed the artifice of his views, and the habits of courtesy were imputed to personal friendship or universal benevolence. His memory was capacious and retentive, his wit easy and social, his imagination sublime, his judgment clear, rapid, and decisive. He possessed the courage both of thought and action, and although his designs might gradually expand with his success, the first idea which he entertained of his divine mission bears the stamp of an original and superior genius. The son of Abdallah was educated in the bosom of the noblest race, in the use of the purest dialect of Arabia, and the fluency of his speech was corrected and enhanced by the practice of discreet and seasonable silence. With these powers of eloquence, Mohammed was an illiterate barbarian, his youth had never been instructed in the arts of reading and writing, the common ignorance exempted him from shame or reproach, but he was reduced to a narrow circle of existence, and deprived of those faithful mirrors which reflect to our mind the minds of sages and heroes, Yet the book of nature and of man was open to his view, and some fancy has been indulged in the political and philosophical observations which are ascribed to the Arabian traveller. He compares the nations and religions of the earth, discovers the weakness of the Persian and Roman monarchies, beholds with pity and indignation the degeneracy of the times, and resolves to unite, under one God and one king, the invincible spirit and primitive virtues of the Arabs. Our more accurate inquiry will suggest, that instead of visiting the courts, the camps, the temples of the east, the two journeys of Mohammed into Syria were confined to the fairs of Bostra and Daniascus, that he was only thirteen years of age when he accompanied the caravan of his uncle, and that his duty compelled him to return as soon as he had disposed of the merchandise of Cadipale In these hasty and superficial excursions, the eve of genius niight discern some objects invisible to his grosser companious, some seeds of I nowledge might be east upon a fruitful soil, but his ignorance of the Syrac language must have eliceked his euriosity, and I cannot perceive in the life or writings of Mohammed that his prospect was far extended beyond the limits of the Arabian world I rom every region of that solitary world the pilgrims of Mecca were annually assembled by the calls of devotion and commerce in the free concourse of multitudes, a simple citizen, in his native tongue, might study the political state and character of the tribes, the theory and practice of the Jews and Christians. Some useful strangers might be tempted or forced to implore the rites of hospitality, and the enemies of Mohammed have named the Jew, the Persian. and the Syrian monk, whom they accuse of lending their secret aid to the composition of the Koran. Convenation enriches the understanding, but solitude is the school of genius, and the uniformity of a worl denotes the hand of a single artist. From his earliest youth Mohammed was addicted to religious contemplation each verr, during the month of Runadan, he withdrew from the world and from the arms of Cadijali in the cave of Hera, three miles from Mecca, he consulted the spirit of fritid or enthusiasm, whose abode is not in the hervens but in the mind of the prophet. The futh which under the name of Islam lie preached to his family and nation, is compounded of an eternal truth and a necessary fiction -that there is only one God, and that Mohammed is the apostle of God (From The Decline and I all, Chap. 1)

Timour the Tartar

The standard was unfurled for the invasion of China, the emirs made their report of two hundred thousand veteran soldiers of Iran and Touran, their baggage and provisions were transported by five hundred great wagons, and an immense train of horses and camels, and the troops might prepare for a long absence, since more than six months were employed in the trinquil journey of a caravan from Samarcand to Pekin Neither age nor the severity of the winter could retard the im patience of famour, he mounted on horseback, passed the Sihoon on the ice, marched seventy six parasangs (three hundred miles) from his capital, and pitched his last camp in the neighbourhood of Otrar, where he was expected by the angel of death Tatigue, and the indiscreet use of iced water, accelerated the progress of his fever, and the conqueror of Asia expired in the seven tieth year of his ago, thirty five years after he had ascended the throne of Zagatu His designs were lost, his armies were disbanded, China was saved, and fourteen years after his decease, the most powerful of his children sent an embassy of friendship and com merce to the court of Pekin.

The fame of Timour has pervaded the ext and west; his posterity is still invested with the imperial title, and the admiration of his subjects, who revered him almost as a deity, may be justified in some degree by the praise or confession of lus bitterest enemles. Although he was Irme of a hand and foot, his form and stature i ere not unworthy of his rank, and his vigorous health, so essential to himself and to the world, was corroborated in temperance and exercise. In his familier di course, he vas grave and modest, and if he was ignorant of the Arabic language, he spike with fluence and elegance the Persian and Turkish idioins. It is his delight to converse with the learned on topic of history and science, and the amu ement of his leisure hours was the game of the , which he improved or corrul ea with new refinements. In his religion he was a realous, though not perhaps on or hodox, Mussulman, but his sound understanding may tempt us to believe that a superstitious reservace for omens and prophecies for saints and astrologers, was only affected as an instrument of policy. In the povernment of a vast empire le stood alone and absolute, without a relief to appose his power, a favourite to seduce his affectious, or a mini. er to inistend his judgment. It was his firme to maxim that whatever might be the consequence, the word of the prince should never be disputed or realled, but his foes have maliciously observed that the commands of anger and destruction were more strictly executed than those of beneficence and favour. His cons ar I grand sons, of whom Timour left six and thirty at his decease, vere his first and most submissive subjects, and when ever they deviated from their duty, they were en rected, according to the laws of Zingis, with the bastonade and afterwards restored to honour and command his heart was not devoid of the social ristues, perhaps lie was not incapable of loving his friends and pardon ing his enemies, but the rules of morthly are founded on the public interest, and it may be sufficient to appland the wisdom of a monarch for the hierality by which he is not impoverished, and for the justice by which he is strengthened and enriched the harmony of authority and obedience to chastise the proud, to protect the weak, to reward the deserving to banish vice and idleness from his dominions, to secure the traveller and merchant, to restrain the depredations of the soldier, to elerish the labours of the husbandman, to encourage industry and learning, and, by an equal and moderate assessment, to increase the revenue with out increasing the taxes, are indeed the duties of a prince, but, in the discharge of these duties, he finds an ample and immediate recompense. Timour might boast that, at his accession to the throne, Asia was the prey of anarchy and rapine, whilst under his prosperous nion archy, a child, fearless and unhurt, might carry a purse of gold from the east to the west. Such was his confi dence of ment, that from this reformation he derived an excuse for his victories, and a title to universal dominion The four following observations will serve to appreciate his claim to the public grititude, and perhaps we shall conclude that the Mogul emperor was rather the sconrge than the benefactor of mankind 1 If some partial disorders, some local oppressions, were healed by the sword of Timour, the remedy was far more permicious than the disease By their rapine, cruelty, and discord, the petry tyrants of Persia might afflict their subjects, but whole nations were crushed under the footsteps of the reformer The ground which had been occupied by flourishing cities was often marked by his abominable trophies-by columns or pyramids of human heads. Astracan, Carizme, Delhi, Ispahan, Bagdad, Aleppo, Damascus, Boursa, Smyrna, and a thousand others, were sacked, or burned, or utterly destroyed in his presence, and by his troops, and perhaps his conscience would have been startled if a priest or philosopher had dared to number the millions of victims whom he had sacri ficed to the establishment of peace and order 2. His most destructive wars were rather inroads than con quests He invaded Turkestan, Kipzak, Russia, Hindostan, Syna, Anatolia, Armenia, and Georgia, without a hope or a desire of preserving those distant provinces From thence he departed laden with spoil, but he left behind him neither troops to awe the continuacious, nor magistrates to protect the obedient natives he had broken the fabric of their ancient government, he abandoned them to the evils which his invasion had aggravated or caused, nor were these evils compensated by any present or possible benefits. 3 The kingdoms of Transoxiana and Persia were the proper field which he laboured to cultivate and adorn, as the perpetual inheritance of his family But his peaceful labours were often interrupted, and sometimes blasted, by the absence of the conqueror While he triumphed on the Volga or the Ganges, his servants, and even his sons, forgot their master and their duty. The public and private injuries were poorly redressed by the tardy rigour of inquiry and punishment, and we must be content to praise the institutions of Timour as the specious idea of a perfect monarchy 4. Whatsoever might be the blessings of his administration, they evaporated with his life. To reign, rather than to govern, was the ambition of his children and grandchildren, the enemies of each other and of the people. A fragment of the empire was upheld with some glory by Sharokh, his youngest son, but after his decease, the scene was again involved in darkness and blood, and before the end of a century, Transoviana and Persia were trampled by the Uzbeks from the north, and the Turkmans of the black and white The race of Timour would have been extinct, if a hero, his descendant in the fifth degree, had not fled before the Uzbek arms to the conquest of Hindostan His successors-the great Moguls-extended their sway from the mountains of Cashmir to Cape Comonn, and from Candahar to the Gulf of Bengal. Since the reign of Aurungzebe, their empire has been dissolved, their treasures of Delhi have been rifled by a Persian robber, and the richest of their kingdoms is now possessed by a company of Christian merchants, of a remote island in the northern ocean (From The Decline and Fall Chap. Ixv)

Death of Julian.

While Julian stringsled with the almost insuperable difficulties of his situation, the silent hours of the night were still devoted to study and contemplation. When ever he closed his eyes in short and interrupted slumbers, his mind was agitated with punful anxiety, nor can it be thought surprising that the Genius of the empire should once more appear before him, covering with a funeral veil his head and his horn of abundance, and slowly retiring from the Imperial tent. The monarch started from his couch, and stepping forth to refresh his wearied spirits with the coolness of the midnight air, he beheld a fiery meteor, which shot athwart the sky and suddenly vanished. Julian was convinced that he had seen the menacing countenance of the god of war, the council which he summoned, of Tuscan Harus pices, unanimously pronounced that he should abstain from action, but on this occasion necessity and reason were more prevalent than superstition, and the trum pets sounded at the break of day. The army marched through a hilly country, and the hills had been secretly occupied by the Persians. Julian led the van with the skill and attention of a consummate general, he was alarmed by the intelligence that his rear was suddenly The heat of the weather had tempted him attacked to lay aside his cuirnss, but he snatched a shield from one of his attendants, and hastened, with a sufficient reinforcement, to the relief of the rear guard A similar danger recalled the intrepid prince to the defence of the front, and, as he galloped between the columns, the centre of the left was attacked, and almost overpowered, by a furious charge of the Persian cavalry and elephants. This huge body was soon defeated by the well timed evolution of the light infantry, who aimed their weapons with desterity and effect against the backs of the horse men and the legs of the elephants. The Barbarians and Julian, who was foremost in every danger, animated the pursuit with his voice and gestures. His trembling guards, scattered and oppressed by the dis orderly throng of friends and enemies, reminded their fearless sovereign that he was without armour, and conjured him to decline the full of the impending ruin As they exclaimed, a cloud of darts and arrows was discharged from the flying squadrons, and a javelin, after razing the skin of his arm, transpierced the ribs, and fixed in the inferior part of the liver Julian attempted to draw the deadly weapon from his side, but his fingers were cut by the sharpness of the steel, and he fell senseless from his horse. His guards flew to his relief, and the wounded emperor was gently raised from the ground, and conveyed out of the tumult of the battle into an adjacent tent. The report of the melan cholv event passed from rank to rank, but the grief of the Romans inspired them with invincible valour and the desire of revenge. The bloody and obstinate conflict was maintained by the two armies till they were separated by the total darkness of the night. The Persians derived some honour from the advantage which they obtained against the left wing, where Anatolius, master of the offices, was slain, and the præfect Sallust very nar rowly escaped But the event of the day was adverse to the Barbarians They abandoned the field, their two generals, Meranes and Nohordates, fifty nobles or satraps, and a multitude of their bravest soldiers [fell] and the success of the Romans, if Julian had survived, might have been improved into a decisive and useful victory

The first words that Julian intered, after his recovery from the fainting fit into which he had been thrown by loss of blood, were expressive of his martial spirit. He called for his horse and arms, and was impatient to rush into the battle. His remaining strength was exhausted by the painful effort, and the surgeons who examined his wound discovered the symptoms of approaching death. He employed the awful moments with the firm temper of a hero and a sage, the philosophers who had accompanied him in this fatal expedition compared the tent of Julian with the prison of Socrates, and the spectators whom duty, or friendship, or curiosity, liad assembled round his couch listened with respectful grief to the fineral oration of their dying emperor Triends and fellow soldiers, the seasonable period of my departure is now arrived, and I discharge with the cheerfulness of a ready debtor the demands of nature I have learned from philosophy how much the soul is more excellent than the body, and that the separation of the nobler substance should be the subject of joy rather than of affliction. I have learned from religion that an early death has often been the reward of piety and I accept as a favour of the gods the mortal stroke that secures me from the danger of disgracing a character which has lutherto been supported by virtue and fortitude. I die without remorse as I have lived without guilt. I am pleased to reflect on the innocence of my private life, and I can affirm with confidence that the supreme authority, that emana tion of the Divine Power, has been preserved in my hands pure and immaculate Detesting the corrupt and destructive maxims of despotism. I have considered the happiness of the people as the end of government Submitting my netions to the laws of prudence, of justice, and of moderation, I have trusted the event to the care of providence Peace was the object of my counsels, as long as peace was consistent with the public welfare. but when the imperious voice of my country summoned me to arms. I exposed my person to the dangers of war, with the clear fore knowledge (which I had acquired from the art of divination) that I was destined to fall by the sword. I now offer my tribute of gratitude to the Eternal Being who has not suffered me to perish by the erucity of a tyrant, by the secret dagger of conspiracy, or by the slow tortures of lingering disease given me in the midst of an honourable career a splendid and glorious departure from this world, and I hold it equally absurd, equally base, to solicit or to decline the stroke of fite. Thus much I have attempted to say, but my strength fails me, and I feel the approach of death -I shall cautiously refrain from any word that mny tend to influence your suffrages in the election of an emperor My choice might he imprudent or injudi cious, and if it should not be ritified by the consent of the army, it might be fital to the person whom I should recommend I shall only, as a good citizen, express my hopes that the Romans may be blessed with the government of a virtuous sovereign' After this discourse, which Juhan pronounced in a firm and gentle tone of voice, he distributed by a military testament the remains of his private fortune, and inaking some inquiry why Anatolius was not present, he understood from the answer of Sallust that Anntohus was killed, and bewniled with annible inconsistency the loss of his friend At the same time he reproved the im moderate grief of the spectators, and conjured them not to disgrace by unmanly tears the fate of a prince who in a few moments would be united with heaven and with the stars The specintors were silent, and Julian entered into a metaphysical argument with the philoso phers Priscus and Maximus on the nature of the soul The efforts which he made, of mind as well as body, most probably hastened his death. His wound begin to bleed with fresh violence his respiration was embar rassed by the swelling of the veins lie called for n draught of cold water, and, as soon as he had drank it, expired without pain, about the hour of midnight. Such was the end of that extraordinary man, in the thirty second year of his age, after a reign of one year and about eight months from the death of Constantius. In his last moments he displayed, perhaps with some osten tation, the love of virtue and of fame which had been the ruling passions of his life.

From the 'Autobiography'

Wherever the distinction of farth is alloyed to form a superior order in the state, education and example should always, and will often, produce among them a dignity of sentiment and propriety of conduct, a luch is guarded from dishonour by their own and the public If we read of some illustrious line so ancient that it has no beginning, so worthy that it ought to have no end, we sympathize in its various fortures nor can we blame the generous enthusiasm, or cren the hamiless vanity, of those who are allied to the honours of its name. For my own part, could I draw my pedipree from a peneral, a statesman, or a celebrated author I should study their lives with the diligence of filial love In the investigation of past events, our currosity is stimulated by the immediate or indirect reference to ourselves, but in the estimate of honour we should learn to value the gifts of Nature above those of Fortune, to esteem in our ancestors the qualities that best promote the interests of society and to pronounce the descendant of a king less truly noble than the offspring of a man of genius, whose writings will instruct or delight the latest postenty The family of Confucius is, in my opinion, the most illustrious in the world. After a painful ascent of eight or ten centuries our larons and princes of Lurope are lo t in the darknes of the middle ages, but, in the vist equality of the empire of Clinia the posterity of Confucius have maintained above two thousand two hundred years their peaceful honours and perpetual succession. The chief of the family is still revered by the sovereign and the people as the lively image of the wrest of mankind. The nobility of the Spencers has been illustrated and enriched by the trophies of Marlborough, but I exhort them to con sider the Fairy Queen as the most precious jewel of their coronet Our immortal Fielding was of the younger branch of the Larls of Denbigh, who draw their origin from the Counts of Halsburg, the lineal descendants of Flirico, in the seventh century, Duke of Alsace [an error, see page 347, note] Far different have been the fortunes of the Inglish and German divisions of the family of Habsburg the former, the knights and sheriffs of Leicestershire, have slowly risen to the dignity of a peerige the latter, the Emperors of Germany and Lings of Spain have threatened the liberty of the old, and invaded the treasures of the new The successors of Charles the Fifth may disdain world their brethren of Ligland, but the romance of Tom Jones, that exquisite picture of human manners, will outhve the palace of the Escurni and the imperial eagle of the house of Austria.

That these sentiments are just, or at least natural, I am the more inclined to believe, as I am not myself in terested in the cause, for I can derive from my anecstors neither glory nor shame. Yet a sincere and simple narrative of my own life may amuse some of my leisure hours, but it will subject me, and perhaps with justice, to the imputation of vanity. I may judge, however, from the experience both of past and of the present times, that the public are always eurious to know the men who have left behind them any image of their minds the most scanty accounts of such men are compiled with diligence and perused with caterness, and the student of every class may derive a lesson or an example from the lives most similar to his own My name may hereafter be placed among the thousand articles of a Biographia Britannica, and I must be conscious that no one is so well qualified as myself to describe the series of my thoughts and actions The authority of my master, of the grave Thuanus and the philosophic Hume, might be sufficient to justify my design, but it would not be difficult to produce a long list of ancients and moderns who in various forms have exhibited their own portraits. Such portraits are often the most interesting, and sometimes the only interesting parts of their writings, and if they be sincere, we seldom complain of the minuteness or prolixity of these personal memorials. The lives of the younger Plmy, of Petrareh, and of Lrusmus are expressed in the epistles which they themselves have The essays of Montaigne and given to the world Sir William Temple bring us home to the houses and bosoms of the authors we smile without contempt at the headstrong passions of Benvenuto Cellini and the gay follies of Colley Cibber The confessions of St Austin and Rousseau disclose the secrets of the human heart the commentaries of the learned Huet have sur vived his evangelical demonstration, and the memoirs of Goldoni are more truly dramatic than his Italian comedies. The heretic and the churchman are strongly marked in the characters and fortunes of Whiston and Bishop Newton, and even the dulness of Michael de Marolles and Anthony Wood acquires some value from the faithful representation of nien and manners. That I am equal or superior to some of these, the effects of modesty or affectation cannot force me to dissemble

Lord Sheffield collected Gibbon's Muscellaneous Borl's (2 vols 1766 enlarged ed. 5 vols. 1814). The Pacline and Fall had the honour of heins bowdlensed by the original Mr Houdler in his last years and was published (12.6) after his death, "with the care ful omis ion of all passages of an irreligious or immoral ten lency Sir W Smith's edition of the Decline at 4 Fall (8 vols. 1854-55) contains the notes of Guizot and Milman a magnetral edition, in 7 vols, edited by Mr J D Bury was published in 1899-1909 A German translation in 1805-7 anticipated the French one, and there was a new one by Sporschil (4th ed. 1865). There have also been two German translations (1-96 and 1801) of the Autvergraft's There are Italian Magyar and modern Greek tran lations of the In 1897 another Lord Sheffield published the six ver sions of the Autobi graphy, from which Mis Helioyd pieced together the text till then accepted. Mr Birkbeck Hill gave us another edition in 1901 and two volumes of the letters were edited by I rofes or Protlero. See the monograph by J. C. Thomas Paine wis for a century and more the most abhorred name in England and was almost universally cited by way of assumed contempt is 'Tom Paine This most formidable of deists and Radicals-he was called atheist and held to be the most destructive of revolution irres - nas born at Theiford in Norfolk on 29th January 1737, the son of a Quaker stasmaker The son surely the most ur friendly of those that he was much influenced by Quaker viewsas does the revolutionity novelist Robert Bant, who, though 'barely a Christian,' retained a strong affection for the Quaker faith in which he was brought up. Tom Prine was by turns starmiker and marine, schoolm ister, excisenian, and tobacco nist. His first publication was a truet in aid of the excisemen's agitation for increase of wages in He had married twice, losing his first wife. and soon separating from the second, when in 1774, with introductions from Franklin, he sailed for Philadelphia. On 10th January 1776 appeared his pamphlet Common Sense, which argued simply but strongly for complete independence and which, in Washington's words, 'worked a powerful change in the minds of many men? His Crisis, a twelve month later, gave the battle cro, 'These are the times that try men's souls,' for the Americans' first victory at Trenton, where Paine himself was serving as a private, and Congress rewarded him with the post of Secretary to the Committee of Foreign Affairs He wrote fifteen Crises in all before 1783 to keep up the hearts of the rebels. He lost his post in 1779 for polemically discussing-and so divulging-State secrets about French supplies in a Pennsylvinia paper, but was appointed clerk of the Pennsylvania legislature. In 1781 he was secretary of a mission to France, which returned with 2,500,000 livres and military stores and soon after he received a public salary, and from the State of New York 1 gift of the confiscated farm of New Rochelle.

In 1787 he returned, by way of Paris, to England, where in 1791-92 he published The Rights of Man, most famous of all the replies to Burke's Reflections upon the Frence Revenution The work, of which a million and a half copies were sold in England alone involved many in heavy penalties, Thomas Muir, for instance for circulating it got fourteen years' transportation Paine, however, had slipped off to Paris, hising been elected by the department of Pas de C las its deputy to the National Convention. Here he voted with the Girondists, and at Louis XVI s trial he 'alone,' says Midame de Stack, proposed what would have done France honour-the offer to the king of an asylum in America? He thereb, offended the Robespierre faction, and in 1794 was thrown into prison -possibly by the procurement of the American Minister Gouverneur Morris, who dishked the French Revolution and the alliance between the new republics- just before his arrest bring written Part I of Lie Leofheric a anst atheism and against Christianity and in fivour of deism. Part II appeared in 1705 and a port on of Part III in 1807. The book all enated most of his old friends, and it is no full after an impressament of eleven months that he is released as he request of Monroe, the new Imerican Marker and resored to his sent in the Conventor. he som became disjusted with French politics descended from the Friends expressly testifies t and occupied lumself chiefly with the early of finance, and, irite at the long acquiescence of the American Government in his imprisonment, he violently attacked Washington as a comminder and as a statesman In 1802 he returned to America, refusing to go by a ship placed at his service by President Jefferson In America he was welcomed by his own party, but hooted by orthodox mobs and tabooed by society. He was embarrassed in finances, constintly embroiled in controversy theological and political, and scems to have taken to drinking—though doubtless the stories about his intemperance were greatly exag-He died at New York 8th June 1809 In 1819 his bones were removed by Cobbett (q 1) from New Rochelle to England, they were serred as part of the property of Cobbett's son, a bank rupt, in 1836, their whereabouts since 1844 is unknown

Replies to Prine's theological views were much fiercer than those against his political doctrines-Gilbert Wakefield's and Bishop Watson's being famous As in apologist for the American rebels, 'Tom' was hated by patriotic Englishmen, his Rights of Man was the text book of all the extreme Radicals and sympathisers with the I rench Revolution - another ground for hatred, and his deism was hiteful to many who shared his Radicalism He was sincere and courageous, but vain and bigoted, he held that his pen had done as much for the United States as Washington's sword, he thought his opponents knives and fools, and his attacks on revelation are rather shrewd and bold than scholarly or profound Paine's ignorance,' says Mr Leslie Steplien, 'was vast and his language brutal, but he had the gift of a true demagogue—the power of wielding a fine vigorous English' The two following sciections are from the Rights of Man

Order due to Society, not to Government.

Great part of that order which reigns among mankind is not the effect of government. It has its origin in the principles of society and the natural constitution of man It existed prior to government, and would exist if the formality of government was abolished The inutual dependence and reciprocal interest which man has upon man, and all the parts of a civilised community upon each other, create that great chain of connection which holds it together The land holder, the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, the tradesman, and every occupation prospers by the aid which each receives from the other and from the whole Common interest regu lates their concerns and forms their law, and the laws which common usage ordains have a greater influence than the laws of government. In fine, society per forms for itself almost everything which is ascribed to

To understand the nature and quantity of government proper for man, it is necessary to attend to his character. As Nature created him for social life, she fitted him for the station she intended. In all cases she made his natural wants greater than his individual powers. No one man is capable, without the aid of society, of supply ing his own vants, and those wants acting upon every individual impel the whole of them into society, as naturally as gravitation acts to a center

Put she has gone further. She has not only forced man into society by a diversity of wants which the reciprocal aid of cach other can supply, but she has implanted in him a system of social affections, which, though not necessary to his existence, are essential to his happine. There is no period in life when this love for society ceases to act. It begins and ends with our being

If we examine with attention into the composition and constitution of man, the diversity of his wants, and the diversity of talents in different men for reciprocally accommodating the wants of each other, his propensity to society, and consequently to preferve the advantages resulting from it, we shall easily discover that a great part of a hat is called government is mere imposition.

Government is no farther neces any than to supply the few cases to which society and civilization are no een veniently competent, and instances are not wanting to show that everything which government can a efully add there'o has been performed by the common consent of society, without government

For upwards of two vers from the commencement of the American war, and to a fonger per oil in exercial of the American States, there were no established forms of government. The old governments had been abolished, and the country was too much occupied in defence to employ its attention in each belong new governments yet during this interval order and harmony were preserved as inviolate as in any country in Lurope. There is a indured aptress in man, and more so in society, because it embraces a greater variety of abilities and resource, to accommodate itself to whatever situation it is in. The instant formal government is aboliched, society begins to act. A general as occation takes place, and common interest produces common security.

So far is it from being true, as his been pretended, that the abolition of any formal government is the dissolution of society, that it acts by a contrary impulse and brings the latter the closer together. All that part of its organization which it had committed to its government devolves again upon itself, and acts through its inedium. When men, as well from natural instinct as from reciprocal benefits, ha e habitanted themselves to social and civilized life, there is always enough of its principles in practice to carry them through any changes they may find necessary or convenient to make in their government. In short, man is so naturally a creature of society that it is almost impossible to put him out of it.

Formal government makes but a small part of evalued life, and when even the best that human wisdom can devise is established, it is a thing more in name and idea than in fact. It is to the great and findamental principles of society and evaluation—to the common usage universally consented to, and inutually and recipro cally maintained—to the uncersing circulation of interest which, passing through its million channels, invigorates the whole mass of civilized man—it is to these things, infinitely more than to anything which even the best instituted government can perform, that the safety and prosperity of the individual and of the whole depends

The more perfect civilization is, the less occasion has it for government, because the more does it regulate its own affairs and govern itself, but so contrary is the practice of old governments to the reason of the case, that the expences of them increase in the proportion they ought to diminish. It is but few general laws that civilized life requires, and those of such common useful ness, that whether they are enforced by the forms of government or not, the effect will be nearly the same. If we consider what the principles are that first condense men into society, and what the motives that regulate their mutual intercourse afterwards, we shall find, by the time we arrive at what is called government, that nearly the whole of the business is performed by the natural operation of the parts upon each other

The Landed Interest.

It is difficult to discover what is meant by the landed interest, if it does not mean a combination of aristocratical land-holders opposing their own pecuniary interest to that of the firmer and every branch of trade, commerce, and manufacture. In all other respects it is the only interest that needs no partial protection enjoys the general protection of the world Every indi vidual, high or low, is interested in the fruits of the earth, men, women, and children, of all ages and degrees, will turn out to assist the farmer, rather than a harvest should not be got in, and they will not act thus by any other property It is the only one for which the common prayer of mankind is put up, and the only one that can never fail from the want of means. It is the interest, not of the policy, but of the existence of man, and when it ceases, he must cease to be No other interest in a nation stands on the same united support Commerce, manufactures, arts, sciences, and everything else, compared with this, are supported but in parts Their prosperity or their decay has not the same uni versal influence. When the valleys laugh and sing, it is not the farmer only, but all creation that rejoices. It is a prosperity that excludes all envy, and this cannot be said of anything clse.

The completest editions of Paine's works are those by Mendum (3 vols. Boston, 1850) and Mr Moncure D Conway (4 vols. London 1895-96) of his numerous biographies may be mentioned those by 'Francis Oldys' (i.e. George Chalmers, 1791) Cheetham (1809), Rickman (1814) Sherwin (1819), Vale (1842) Blanchard (1860), and especially that hy Moncure D Conway (2 vols. 1892). See also Leslie Stephens History of English Thought in the Eighteeith Century (1880) and Alger's Englishmen in the French Revolution (1889).

George Colman 'the Elder' (1732-94), playwright and manager, was the son of the English envoy at Florence, was educated at Westminster and Oxford, and called to the Bar in 1755 theatrical proclivities were much hampered by his mother's aristocratic connections, the Earl of Bath and General Pulteney, but in 1760 his first piece, Polly Honeycombe, was produced at Drury Lane with great success, next year came The Jealous Wife, and in 1766 The Claudestine Marriage, written in conjunction with Garrick In 1767 he purchased, with three others, Covent Garden Theatre, and held the office of manager for seven years, when he sold his share. During his management he had quarrels with his partners, and with Garrick and Macklin, a pamphlet war and a succession of lawsuits followed. In 1776 he purchased the Haymarket Theatre from Foote. He wrote many minor comedies, produced

'acting' versions of plays by Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, Ben Jonson, Terence, of Milton's Comus, and of some French pieces own translation of Terence was received with enthusiasm, and so was his translation, with notes, of Horace's De Arte Poetica essays, edited Beaumont and Fletcher's works, and Ben Jonson's, and was author of some poems, criticisms, and other prose pieces (published in Many of his plays are not merely 3 vols 1787) clever, but brilliant, and though a collection of his Dramatic Works was published in four volumes in 1777, many of his things have never been printed Peake's Memoirs of the Colman Family (1841) and his own son's Random Recollections (1830) contain biographical materials, and Some Particulars of the Life of the Late George Colman (1795) is largely autobiographical 1785 he had a stroke of paralysis, and he died in confinement. His son, George Colman 'the Younger,' was perhaps even more famous on the same lines well into the next century

Richard Cumberland (1732-1811), novelist and essavist, was the son of the Bishop of Clonfert and great grandson of Dr Richard Cumberland (see page 47), and was born in the lodge of Trinity College, Cambridge His mother was Joanna, daughter of Dr Bentley, crroneously said to be the Phæbe of Byrom's pastoral (see page 279), and he inherited not a little of his grandfather's combative temper From Bury St Edmunds and Westminster, where he was contemporary with Cowper, Churchill, and Warren Hastings, he passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, and was a Fellow at twenty Becoming private secretary to Lord Halifax, he gave up his intention of taking orders Through the influence of his patron, he was made Crown agent for the province of Nova Scotia, and he was afterwards appointed, by Lord George Germain, secretary to the Board of Trade. His popularity as a writer of plays introduced him to all the literary and distinguished society of his day In 1780 he was employed on a secret mission to Spain, in order to endeavour to detacli that country from the hostile confederacy against England, but after a twelvemonth at Madrid lie was recalled, and payment of his drafts refused A sum of £5000 was due to him, but as Cumberland had failed in the negotiation, and had exceeded his commission through excess of zeal, the Minister refused to reiniburse him fortunate dramatist diplomatist was accordingly compelled to sell his paternal estate and retire into private life He took up his abode at Tunbridge, and there poured forth farces, comedies, tragedies, pamphlets, essays, and poems, among them two epics, Calvary and The Exodiad, the latter written in conjunction with Sir James Bland Burgess None of these was above mediocrity the vivifying power of genius was shown only in two or three of his plays In the Memoirs of his Own Life

Cumberland is graphic and entertining but too many of his ancedotes of contemporaries are imperfectly authenticated. His fime rests on two or three of his plays, which include The West Indian (1771)—his best, produced with much success by Garrick, The Brothers (1769), The Lashionable Lover (1772), The Jew and The Wheel of Lorume

One would have thought that the inquestion ible dramatic gift manifested in the best place his I nowledge of life and manners at home and ibroad, would have made Cumberland a notable But it was not so His first novel, novelist Arundel (1789) was hurrically composed, but the scene being partly in college and at court, and dealing with high life, the author drea upon his recollections, and painted vigorously what he had felt and witnessed. His second work, Henry (1795), carefully elaborated in imitation of Fielding was less happy, Cumberland was not it home in the humbler walks of life and his portraits are grossly overcharged The character of Ezekiel Dow, a Methodist preacher, was praised by Sir Walter Scott as exquisite and just resemblance to Lielding's Parson Adams as too marked, and the Methodistic clements are less convincing than the learned simplicity and bonhomic of the worths parson. And is Scott said 'He had a peculiar tiste in love affairs, which induced him to reverse the natural and usual practice of courtship, and to throw upon the softer sex the task of woong, which is more gracefully, as well as naturally, the province of the man'. In these woring scenes there is inevitably a lack of delicacy, Scott, who ranked his comedies next to Sheridan's, thought his romances indecent third novel, John de Lancaster was the inferior work of his advanced years. In the Retaliation Goldsmith somewhat hyperbolically prused him as

The Terence of Lngland, the mender of hearts

-surely one of the finest compliments over paid by one author to another, were it not obviously saturical, though not perhaps unkindly meant Actually Goldsmith does not seem to have been drawn to him, thought he had over refined coniedy, and set himself to succeed by avoiding his mal's defect, while Sheridan made the world laugh at him as 'Sir Fretful Plagian' The West Indian is a comedy of intrigue, and its scheme of honour and morals is by no means unexceptionable The hero, arriving rich and libertine from Jamaica, falls in love with a beautiful girl, addresses her in the street, pursues her to her lodging, and importunes her to a dishonourable alliance. Some trouble ensues, but so soon as the hero has had an opportunity of explaining in a dignified manner that a disreputable landlady had hinted to him that the lady was not the sister but the mistress of the secondary hero, the mistake is at once seen to be natural and venial, the lady, her brother and futher, and friends on both sides regard the prin cipal hero's conduct on the whole as generous and | admirable in a high degree, and the insulted lady recepts, not increly without heat thou but with outhusiasm, his formal suit for her hand

Mr Johnson and Tea-Drinking

At the tea table he made considerable demand upon his favorate beverage, and I remember then Sir Joshua Keynolds at my house reminded him that is had drunk eleven cups, he rephel "Sir, I did not count your plasses of time why should you number up my cupe of tea? And then, laughner in perfect good humour, he added "Sir, I should have released the lady from any further trouble if it had not been for your remarl, but you have reminded me that I a cut one of the dozen, and I must reque t Mr. Cumberland to room! up my number? When he are the readiness and complacency with which my wife obeyed his call, he turned a kind and cheerful look on her, and said. 'Madam, I must tell you for your comfor you have escaped much better than a certain lade did a while ago, upon where patience I introded greatly more than I have slone on yours but the Indiansked me for no other purpose than to make a rang of me, and set me galiding to a parcel of people I have no lung of so, malam I lad my revenue on her, for I swallowed five and twent cups of her tea, and did not treat her with as many words."

From 'The West Indian.'

Mrs Fulner Why, how you cit, mu ing and mopmg, sighing and desponding! I m ashamed of rou, Mr I olmer is this the country you described to me, 2 second I ldorado rivers of gold and rocks of diamones? You found me in a pretty snug retird way of 1 k at Boulogne, out of the noise and buttle of the world and wholly at my eac, you indeed was upo the sung with a fiery persecution at your lack. but life a true son of I evola, to thad then a thou and ingenious devi ex to repair your foitune, and this your native country was to be the scene of noir performances fool that I was to for what have we got, be invergled into it by you whom have we gull d but ourselves? which of all your truns has taken fire? even this poor expedient of your boolsellers shop seems abandoned, for if a chance customer drops in, who is there, pray, to help him to what he wants?

In there Party, you know it is not upon sligh grounds that I despair, there had us'd to be a hychhood to be pick'd up in this country, both for the honest and dishonest. I have tried each walk, and am likely to starve at last, there is not a point to which the wat and freality of man can turn, that I have not set mine to but in yain, I am beat through every quarter of the compass

Mrs Ful. All common efforts all strike me a master stroke, Mr I tilmer, if you wish to male any figure in this country.

Ful But where, how, and what? I have bluster d for prerogative I have bellowed for freedom. I have offer'd to serve my country. I have engaged to betray it—a master stroke truly, why, I have talked treason, writ treason, and if a man can't live by that he can live by nothing. Here I set up as a bookseller, why men left off reading, and if I was to turn butcher, I believe o' my conscience they'd leave off cating

Mrs Iul Why, there now's your lodger, old Captain Dudley, as he calls lumiself there's no flint without fire, something might be struck out of him, if you'd the wit to find the way

Ful Hang him, an old dry skin'd curmudgeon, you may as well think to get truth out of a courtier, or candour out of a critic. I can make nothing of him, beside, he's poor, and therefore not for our purpose.

Mrs Ful The more fool he' Won'd any man be poor that had such a prodigy in his possession?

Ful His daughter, you mean, she is, indeed, nincom monly beautiful.

Mrs Ful. Beantiful! Why, she need only be seen, to have the first men in the kingdom at her feet Egad, I wish I had the leasing of her beauty, what would some of your young Nabobs give——?

Ful Hush! here comes the captain, good girl, leave us to ourselves, and let me try what I can make of him.

Mrs Ful Captain, trult! i' faith I'd have a regiment, had I such a daughter, before I was three months older

[Exit as Captain Dudles enters

Ful Captain Dudley, good morning to you

Dudley Mr Fillmer, I have borrowed a book from your shop, 'its the sixth volume of my deceased friend Tristram be is a flattering writer to us poor soldiers and the divine story of Le Fevre, which makes part of this book, in my opinion of it, does honour not to its author only, but to human nature

Ful He's an anthor I keep in the way of trade, but one I never relish'd he is much too loose and profligate for my taste.

Dud That s being too severe I hold him to be a moralist in the nohlest sense, he plays indeed with the fancy and sometimes perhaps too wantonly, but while he thus designedly makes his main attack, he comes at once upon the heart, refines, amends it, softens it, beats down each selfish barrier from about it, and opens every sluice of pity and benevolence.

Ful We of the catholic persuasion are not much bound to him —Well, Sir, I shall not oppose your opinion, a favourite author is lile a favourite mistress, and there you know, Captain, no man likes to have his taste arranged

Dud Upon my word, Sir, I don't know what a man likes in that case, 'tis an experiment I never made

Ful Sir '-Are you serious

Dud 'Tis of little consequence whether you think so ful What a formal old prig it is! [aside]. I appreliend you, Sir, you speak with cautiou, you are married? Dud I have been

Ful And this young lady, which accompanies you— Dud Passes for my daughter

Ful Passes for his daughter 'humph—[aside] She is exceedingly beautiful, finely accomplished, of a most enchanting shape and air

Dud I ou are much too partial, she has the greatest defect a woman can have.

Ful How so, pray?

Dud. She has no fortune.

Ful Rather say that you have none, and that's a sore defect in one of your years, Captain Dudley you've served, no doubt?

Dud Familiar coxcomb! But I'll humour him [ande].

Ful A close old fox! But I'll unkennel him [aside].

Dud Above thirty years I've beeu in the service,

Mr Fulmer

Ful I guess'd as much I laid it at no less why,

'tis a wearisome time, 'tis an apprenticeship to a profes sion fit only for a patriarch. But preferment must be closely followed you never could have been so far behind hand in the chace unless you liad palpably mistaken your way. You'll pardon me, but I begin to perceive you have lived in the world, not with it.

Dud It may be so, and you, perhaps, can give me better counsel I'm now soliciting a favour, an exchange to a company on full pay, nothing more, and yet I meet a thousand bars to that tho', without boasting, I should think the certificate of services which I sent in might have purchased that indulgence to me.

Ful Who thinds or cares about 'em? Certificate of services, indeed! Send in a certificate of your fair daughter, carry her in your hand with you Dud What! Who! My daughter! Carry my daughter! Well, and what then?

Ful Why, then your fortune's made, that's all.

Dud I understand you and this you call knowledge of the world? Despicable knowledge, but, sirrali, I will have you know—[threatening him]

Ful Help! Who's within? Wou'd you strike me, Sir, wou'd you lift up your hand against a man in his own house?

Dud In a church, if he dare insult the poverty of a man of honour

Ful Have a care what von do, remember there is such a thing in law as an assault and battery, ay, and such trifling forms as warrants and indictments.

Dud Go, Sir, you are too mean for my resentment 'tis that, and not the law, protects you. Hence!

Ful An old, absurd, incorrigible blockhead! I'll be reveng'd of him [aside]

Richard Brinsley Sheridan,

dramatist and political orator, was the most brilliant of a gifted family representing an old native Irish clan in County Cavan His great-grandson, Lord Dufferin, reckoned that in two hundred and fifty years the family had produced twenty seven authors and upwards of two hundred books, and the author of Letters from High Latitudes was fully entitled to include himself and his gifted mother, the author of The Lament of the Irish Emigrant Thomas Sheridan, DCL and Jacobite historical writer, suffered for the cause of James II., and was father of the Chevalier Sheridan, Prince Charlie's tutor and comrade in arms, Thomas's nepliew, another Thomas, D D and friend of Swift, was a schoolmaster in Dublin, and translator His son, a third Thomas (1719-88), became a teacher of elocution in Dublin and author of a Life of Swift, but was first an actor and playwright, and at this stage of his career married the poetess Frances Chamberlaine, who as Mrs Frances Sheridan (1724-66) was to be a notable novelist and dramatist, her works comprise three unimportant comedies and two novels-The Memoirs of Miss Sidney Biddulph (1761), which was praised by Johnson, approved by the public, and translated into French by the Abbé Prevost, and The History of Nourjahad, an Oriental tale adapted for the stage by Sophia Lee (see page 653) The son of this couple was the brilliant dramatist, who also attained his ambition of becoming a statesman

Richard Brinsley Sheridan was born in Dublin on the 30th of October 1751, and was educated partly in Dublin and then at Harrow, his parents had settled in London, and Richard never revisited his old home. After leaving school, he and a school friend named Hallied wrote a three act farce called Jupiter, and he tried a verse translation of the Epistles of Arista netus In 1771 the Sherid ins removed to Bath, where they made acquaintance with the fimily of Linley the com poser, and, after a romantic courtship, Richard married Elizabeth Linley in 1773 The young couple settled in London to a life much beyond their means, and Sheri dan now made more serious efforts at dramatic composition In 1775 The Rivals was pro duced at Covent Garden, and, though at first it failed, was after some revision universally recognised as a great and admirable comedy In the same year appeared the poor farce called

Patrick's Day, and also The Duenna, which had a run of over seventy nights in the first season. In 1776 Sheridan, with the aid of Linley and another friend, bought half the patent of Drury Lane Theatre for £35,000 from Garrick, and in 1778 the remaining share for £45,000, the money being largely raised on mortgage. His first production was the Rivals, his second a purified edition of Vanbrugh's Relapse, under the title of A Irip to Scarborough Three months later appeared his greatest work, The School for Scandal, which, if somewhat lacking in cohesion, presents a series of extraordinarily brilliant scenes and a succession of wonderfully witty dialogues The Critic (1779), teeming with sparkling wit, was Sheridan's last dramatic effort, with the exception of a poor tragedy, Pizarro, much altered from the German of Kotzebuc. On the dissolution of Parliament in 1780 Slicridan was elected for Stafford, and in 1782 became Under-Scerctary for 1 oreign Affairs under Rockingham, he was afterwards Secretary to the Treasury in the Coalition Ministry (1783) parliamentary reputation dates from his great speeches in the imperchanent of Warren Hastings (1787-94) In 1794 he again electrified the House by a magnificent oration in reply to Lord Morning ton's denunciation of the I rench Revolution, but lic urged uncondition il resistance to Bonaparte, sympathused with the Spaniards and others who rose against French tyranny mained till the end the devoted frierd and adherent of Fox, and was also the defender and spol esman of the Prince Regent On For's death (180) he was disappointed in his hope of being made leader of the Whigs but under the 'Ministry of all the Talents' he vas made treasurer to the navy In 1807 he was defeated at Westminster, and though he found a seat for Ilchester, parliamentara career came to an end in 1812 1792 his first wife and three died. later 1 ears married a daughter of the Dean of who Winchester, The affairs of the theatre had survived him The old building had to be closed gone badly as unfit to hold large audiences, and a new one, opened in 1794, was burned in 1809. This last calumity put the finishing touch to Sheridan's pecuniary difficulties, which had long been serious He died 7th July 1816, but Mr Friser Rae has proved that the story is not true that at the end he suffered severe privation or was in want of His funeral in Westminster ordinary comforts Abbcy was exceptionally magnificent

His inconsiderate and happy-go-lucky ways led all his life long to greatly exaggerated or unfounded stories about his convivial excesses But it was always acand other extravagances knowledged that as a politician he was incorrupt in a corrupt age, independent, and intrepid He eagerly opposed the war with America and the Irish Union, and zealously defended the liberty of the press. On Dr Johnson's motion, he was made a member of the famous Literary Club, and he was a member of Brooks's, and eminently popular in society. His political orations, if they erred on the side of exuberance, were many of them great oratorical triumphs. His bitterness against Warren Hastings was doubtless the outcome of sincere conviction that the Indian proconsul merited the worst that could befall him, for 'Sherry' was always transparently free from envy or malice, and was charitable to a fault.

As dramatist, he ranks in popularity next to Shakespeare, and is the last great writer of English He represents that comedy of manners, of wit and repartee, of which Etherege and Wycherley were the first notable exponents, Congreve the supreme master, and Goldsmith the reviver And if in sheer brilliancy of wit Congreve surpasses all of them, Sheridan is surpassed by none in truly mirth-provoking situations and collocations, in entertaining dialogue, or in the fascination which is the dramatist's highest triumph satire is not that of the moralist, indeed, it has been objected to the School for Scandal that, as in Tom Jones-with which it has some points of resemblance—the extravagant libertine is generous and warm-hearted, the grave and decorous character a mean hypocrite If the School for Scandal has borrowed some features from Tom Jones and Blifil, the Rivals owes not a little to Humphry Clinker Captain Absolute has a prototype in testy Matthew Bramble, and Mrs Malaprop's immortal allegory on the banks of the Nile has not a few congeners in Mrs Winifred Jenkins's derangement On the other hand, some of the of epitaphs speeches in Pizarro were said to have a closer resemblance to Sheridan's own oratory in the House of Commons than to that of the sixteenth century Spaniards or Kotzebue's Peruvians the maiden of bashful fifteen,' sung in the School for Scandal, became a standard English song 'Had I a heart for falsehood framed' is the only one in the score of songs and 'airs' in the Duenna that is still remembered. 'I own the soft impeachment' is another of Mrs Malaprop's sayings which, in whole or in part, is now an essential part of the Philistine vocabulary, and it was Sir Benjamin Backbite who first spoke of 'a beautiful quarto page, where a neat rivulet of text shall meander through a meadow of margin' 'The malice of a good thing is the barb that makes it stick,' and 'When ingratitude barbs the dart of injury, the wound has double danger in it,' occur both in the School for Scandal 'Love gilds the scene and women guide the plot' is from the epilogue to the Rivals, and at least one saying of the playwrightpolitician in his own proper character has become proverbial 'The right honourable gentleman is indebted to his memory for his jests and to his imagination for his facts' was a retort by Sheridan to Dundas in the House of Commons It rarely happened that Sheridan's stage characters were identified with actual persons, but it was universally taken for granted that Sir Fretful Plagiary was a caricature of Cumberland the dramatist. Pizarro is forgotten, but no comedies have a stronger hold on modern play going Englishmen of all classes than the Rivals and the School for Scandal, as strong as in the days when Kemble and Mrs Siddons were still playing for the genial dramatist-manager

Song from 'The Duenna'

Had I a heart for falsehood framed,
I ne'er could myure you,
For though your tongue no promise claim'd,
Your charms would make me true.
To you no soul shall bear deceit,
No stranger offer wrong,
But friends in all the aged you'll meet,
And lovers in the young

But when they learn that you have blest Another with your heart, They 'll bid aspiring passion rest, And act a brother's part Then, lady, dread not here deceit, Nor fear to suffer wrong, For friends in all the aged you 'll meet, And brothers in the young

From 'The Critic.'

Servant [entering] Sir Fretful Plagiary, sir

Dangle Beg him to walk up -Now, Mrs Dangle,
Sir Fretful Plagiary is an author to your own taste.

Mrs Dangle I confess he is a favourite of mine, be cause everybody else abuses him

Sneer Very much to the credit of your charity, madam, if not of your judgment

Dan But, egad ' he allows no ment to any author but himself, that's the truth on 't, though he's my friend

Sneer Never He is as envious as an old maid verging on the desperation of six and thirty, and then the insidious humility with which he seduces you to give a free opinion on any of his works, can be exceeded only by the petulant arrogance with which he is sure to reject your observations.

Dan Very true, egad I though he's my friend Sneer Then his affected contempt of all newspaper strictures, though, at the same time, he is the sorest man alive, and shrinks like scorehed parchment from the fiery ordeal of true criticism vet is he so covetous of popularity, that he had rather be abused than not mentioned at all

Dan There's no denying it, though he's my friend Sneer You have read the tragedy he has just finished, haven't you?

Dan O yes, he sent it to me yesterday

Sneer Well, and you think it execrable don't you?

Dan Why, between ourselves, egad! I must own—though he's my friend—that it is one of the most—he's here!—[Aside]—finished and most admirable per form——

Sir Fretful Mr Sneer with him, did you say? [Enters] Dan Ah, my dear friend! Egad! we were just speaking of your tragedy Admirable, Sir Fretful, admirable!

66

Sucer You never did anything beyond it, Sir I retful, ever in your life

Sir I You make me extremely happy, for, without compliment, my dear Sneer, there isn't a man in the orld whose judgment I value as I do yours, and Mr angle's

Mrs D They are only laughing at you, Sir Pretful, er it was but just now that----

Dan Mrs Dangle '- Mr Sir Fretful, you I now Mrs My friend Sneer was rallying just now ringle nows how she admires you, and-

Su F No, egad or I should wonder how he came Mis D. Because his jest is always at the expense of his icnd

Dan But, Sir I retful, have you sent your play to the anagers yet? or can I be of any service to you?

Sir I Sincerely, then, you do like the piece? Sucer Wonderfully!

Sir I But, come now there must be something that on think might be mended, ch's-Mr Dangle has othing struck you?

Dan Why, faith, it is but an ungracious thing for the iost part to-

Sir I With most authors it is just so indeed they e in general strangely tenacious but, for my part, I m never so well pleased as when a judicious critic points. ut any defect to me, for what is the jurpose of shewing work to a friend if you don't mean to profit his his f notatd

Sucer Very true Why, then, though I seriously dmire the piece upon the whole yet there is one small bjection which, if you Il give me leave, I Il mention

Sir T Sir, you can t oblige me more Sneer I think it wants incident

Sir  $\Gamma$  Good God! you surprise me! wants meident?

Sneer Yes, I own I think the incidents are too

Sir I Good God! Believe ine, Mr Sneer, there is o person for whose judgment I have a more implicit eference, but I protest to you, Mr Sneer, I am only ppreheusive that the incidents are too crowded - 1/3 ear Dangle, how does it strike you?

Dan Kerlly, I can't agree with my friend Sneer hink the plot quite sufficient, and the four first nets by nany degrees the best I ever read or saw in my life Ιſ might venture to suggest anything, it is that the interest ather falls off in the fiftle,

Sir I Rises, I believe you mean, sir

Dan No, I don't, upon my word

Sir I I cs, yes, you do, upon my soul, it certainly ion't full off, I assure you, no, no, it don't fall off

Dan Now, Mrs Dangle, didn't you say it struck you n the same light?

Mrs D No, indeed, I did not I did not see n fault n any part of the play from the beginning to the end

Steer Why, he roundly asserts that you have not the slightest invention or original penius whatever, though you are the greatest traducer of all o her authors living

Sir I IIn ha, ha! very good!

Succe That, as to comedy you have not one idea of your own, he believes, even in your commonplace book, where stray jokes and pilfered wittiersms are kept with as much method as the ledger of the Lost and Stolen Office

Sir F Ha, ha, ha t very pleasant t

Sucer Nav. that you are so unlinely as not to have Mrs D Or if I made any objection, I am sure it was I the skill even to stail with taste, but that you glean from the refuse of obscure volumes, where more judicious plagranists have been before you, so that the body of your work is a composition of dregs and sediments, like a bid tavern's worst wine.

Ser F Ha, hal

Sneer In your more serious efforts, he says, your bombast would be less intolerable if the thoughts were ever suited to the expressions, but the homeliness of the sentiment stares through the fantastic encumbrance of its fine language, like a clown in one of the new uniforms

Sir F Ha, ha !

Sneer That your occasional tropes and flowers suit the general coarseness of your style, as tambour sprigs would a ground of linsey woolsey, while your imita tions of Shakespeare resemble the mimicry of Falstaff's page, and are about as near the standard of the original.

Sir I IIa !--

Sneer In short, that even the finest passages you steal are of no service to you, for the poverty of your own language prevents their assimilating, so that they lie on the surface like lumps of marl on a barren moor, encumbering what it is not in their power to fertilise

Sir F [After great agitation] Now, another person would be vexed at this Sneer. Oh, bat I wouldn't have told you, only to divert you

Str F I know it I am diverted—ha, ha, ha ' Not the least invention' ha, ha, ha '—very good, very good'

Sneer Yes, no genius! ha, ha, ha!

Dan A severe rogue, ha, ha, ha !-but you are quite right, Sir Fretful, never to read such nonsense.

Sir I' To be sure, for if there is anything to one's praise, it is a foolish vanity to be gratified at it, and if it is abuse, why, one is always sure to hear of it from one d—d good natured friend or another!

From The School for Scandal'

Lady Sneervell Maria, my dear, how do you do? What's the matter?

Maria Oh, there is that disagreeable lover of mine, Sir Benjamin Backbite, has just called at my guardian's with his odious uncle, Crabtree, so I slipt out, and ran hither to avoid them.

Lady S Is that all?

Joseph Surface If my brother Charles had been of the party, madam, perhaps you would not have been so much alarmed

Lady S Nay, now you are severe, for I dare swear the truth of the matter is, Maria heard you were here—But, my dear, what has Sir benjamin done that you should avoid him so?

Maria Oh, he has done nothing—but 'tis fer what he has said his conversation is a perpetual libel on all his acquaintance

Joseph Ay, and the worst of it is, there is no advantage in not knowing him—for he'll abuse a stranger just as soon as his best friend, and his uncle Crabtree's as lead

Lady S Nay, but we should ninke allowance. Sir Benjamin is a wit and a poet

Maria For my part, I own, madam, wit loses its respect with me when I see it in eo npany with maliee—What do you think, Mr Surface?

Just Certainly, madam, to smile at the jest which I plants a thorn in another's breast is to become a principal in the misch of Lady S Pshaw!—there's no possibility of being with without a little ill nature the malice of a good thing is the barb that males it stiel —What's your opinion, Mr Surface?

Joseph To be sure, madam, that conversation vilere the spirit of rullery is suppressed will ever appear tedious and insignd

Maria Well, I ll not debate how far scandal may be allowable, but in a man, I am sure it is always contemptible. We have pride, envy, rivalship, and a thousand little motives to depreciate each other, but the male slanderer must have the cowardice of a woman before he can triduce one.

Ser-ant [enterin,]. Madam, Mrs Candour is below, and if your ladyship's at leisure, will leave her carriage.

Indy S Beg her to walk in -Now, Marra, however, here is a character to your taste, for though Mrs Candour is a little talkative, everybody allows her to be the best natured and best sort of woman

Maria Yes-with a very gross inflictation of good nature and benevolence, she does more mischief than the direct malice of old Crabtree.

Joseph 1' faith, that's true, Lady Sneerwell, when ever I hear the current running against the characters of my friends, I never think them in such danger as when Candour undertakes their defence.

Lady S Hush !-here she is !

Mrs Candour [entering] My dear Lady Sneerwell, how have you been this century?—Mr Surface, what news do you hear?—though indeed it is no matter, for I think one hears nothing else but scandal

Joseph Just so, indeed, ma'am

Mrs C O Maria! child—what! is the whole affair off between you and Charles! His extravagance, I presume—the town talks of nothing else

Maria I am very sorry, ma am, the town has so little to do

Mrs C Irue, true, child but there's no stopping people's tongues. I own I was hurt to hear it, as I indeed was to learn, from the same quarter, that your guardian, Sir Peter and Lady Teazle, have not agreed lately as well as could be wished.

Maria 'Tis strangely impertment for people to busy themselves so

Mrs C Very true, child but v hat s to be done? People will talk—there's no preventing it. Why, it was but yesterday I was told that Miss Gadabout had cloped with Sir Filligree I hit. But there's no minding what one hears, though, to be sure, I had this from very good authority.

Maria Such reports are highly scandalous

Mrs C So they are, child—shameful, shameful! Lut the world is so censorious, no character e-capes. Well, now, who would have suspected your friend, Miss Prim, of an indiscretion? Yet, such is the ill nature of people that they say her uncle stopt her last week, just as she was stepping into the York mail with her dancing master.

"Maria I'll answer for 't there are no grounds for that Mrs C. Ali, no foundation in the world, I dare swear no more, probably, than for the story circulated in a month of Mrs. Festino's affair with Colonel Cassino though, to be sure, that matter was never rightly cleared up

Joseph. The license of invention some people take is monstrous indeed

Maria 'Ti so-but in my opinion, tho e who report such things are equally culpable.

Mrs. C. To be sure they are tale bearers are as Irid as the tale maler—tis an old observation, and a very true one. But what is to be done, as I said before? how will you prevent people from talling? To day Mrs. Clackitt assured me Mr and Mrs. Honeymoon were at last become mere man and wife like the rect of their acquaintance. No not tale bearers, as I said before, are just a bad as the tale makers.

for the Mr. Mrs Candour, if everybody had your forbearance and good nature!

Mrs. C. I confess. Mr. Surface. I cannot bear to hear people attacked behind their backs, and when nelly circumstances come out again tour acquaintance. I own I always love to think the best. By the live, I hope its not true that your brother is absolutely ruined?

foreph. I am afraid his circumstances are very b.d. indeed, ma am

Mrs. C. Alt. I heard so-but you must tell him to keep up in spirits, everybody almost i in the same way -1 ord spindle. Sir. Thomas splint, Captain Quin e and Mr. Nickit -all up. I hear, within the week, so if Charles is undone he. Il find half his acquaintance ruined too, and that, you I now is a consolution.

Josef! Doubtles manm-a very great one

Lady S. I wonder, Sir Benjamin, you never publish anything

Sir B To say truth, ma'am, 'tis very vulgar to print, and as my little productions are no thy satures and lampoons on particular people, I find they circulate more by giving copies in confidence to the friends of the parties. However, I have some love elegies, which, when favoured with this lady's smiles, I mean to give the public. [Pointing to Maria]

Sheridan's son Tom, who was Colonial treasurer at the Cape of Good Hope was something of a poet and two of his three beau tiful and accomplished daughters attained literary fame Lady Dufferin and Mrs Norton (Lady Surling Maxwell). Memoirs were prefixed to editions of Sheridan's works by Leigh Hunt (1840), Browne (1873-75) and Stainforth (1874) and there were Lives by Walkins (1817) and Thomas Moore (1825). See also Sheridan and his Times (1859) Memoirs of Mrs Frances Sheridan, by her granddaughter Alicia Le Fanit (1824) short Lives by Mrs Oliphant (1883) and Lloyd Sanders (with a full bibliography 1891) Percy Fitzgerald Lives of the Sheridaus (1887). It should be added that most of the earlier Lives according to Mr Fraser Rae, retail many facts as fictions. Sheridan's representatives (including Lord Dufferin who wrote an introduction to it) recognised as authori tative only the Memoir by Mr Fraser Rae (2 vols. 1896). The editions of the works and of the principal plays are innumerable

Returning at sixteen years to London, he worked with his father as a shoemaker, but now a passion for books was predominant, and as the confinement of the shoe maker's stall did not agree with him, he attempted to start a school in the country Becoming in 1770 a provincial actor, he spent seven years in strolling about England in every variety of wretchedness, then settling in London lie took gradually to authorship Alwan, or the Gentleman Comedian (1780), was the first of four novels the

See Holcroft's interesting Memoirs written by himself and continued by Hazlitt (1815) also kegan Paul's Life of Godwin (1876). Gifford treated him with contempt, real or assumed.

Hugh Kelly (1739-77), the son of a Dublin publican, was bred a staymaker, and in London from 1760 on was successively staymaker, attorney's clerk, writer for the newspapers, essavist, and scurnlous theatrical critic. He had written a novel, Memoirs of a Magdalen (1767), which had the honour of translation into French, when in 1768 he surprised the public by producing a sentimental comedy, False Delicacy, which, though without much point or power, had a remarkable influence both on the fortunes and character of the author, the profits of his first third night realised £150—the largest sum of money he had ever before seen-'and from a low, petulant, absurd, and ill-bred censurer' says Davies, 'Kelly was transformed to the humane, affible, good natured, well bred man? The play had the benefit of a prologue and epilogue from Garrick, it was repeated twenty times in the same season that produced Goldsmith's Good Natur'd Man, and a printed edition of ten thousand copies was sold within the year, so that kelly netted £700 by his lineky stroke. I rench, German, and Portuguese translations made his name known on the Continental stage. This other coincides, I Word to the Wise, I School for II was, and The Man of Reason, and a tragedy, Clementina had little or no success. Kelly had withdrawn from stage work in 1774, and became an unsuccessful burister. An edition of his works, with a Life, by Hugh Humilton, was published the year after his de th

His manufactory was at Elford near 1 un worth, and there he realised a decent competence During the last eight years of his life he had in Timworth His works are Mount Kenreth (1781), Barham Dorous (1784), Lie Lair Syriai (1787), James II allace (1788), Man as He is (1792), and Hermsprong, or Man as He is Not (1796) Baye's novels are distinctly inferior to those of Holcroft, and it can only surprise us that Sir Walter Scott should have admitted them into his British Novelists when he was excluding so many better stories Barham Dorons and Hermsfrong, upon the whole the most interesting contain good i saturical portraits, though the plots of both are crude and defective

Erasmus Darwin (1731-1802) born at Elston Hall, Newark, was educated at Chesterfield and St John's College, Cambridge, and then studied medicine at Edinburgh After trying a practice for two months in Nottingham, he removed (Novem ber 1756) to Lichfield, where he long remained a successful and distinguished physician After his first wife's death (1770) he devoted himself largely to botanical and literary pursuits, though at first afraid that the reputation of poet would injure him in his profession. At this time he hired in a pretty villa in the neighbourhood of Lichfield, with a grotto and fountain, and here he began to arrange a botanic garden in a spot he described as 'adapted to love seenes, and as being thence a proper residence for the modern goddess of botany' His Botanic Garden, a poem in polished heroic verse, was designed to describe, glorify, and allegorise the Linn can system of botany Rosicrucian doctrine of gnomes, sylphs, nymplis, and salamanders seemed to 'afford a proper machinery for a botanic poem, as it is probable they were originally the names of liveroglyphic figures representing the elements. In 1778 the poet was called to attend the children of Colonel |

Star after star from heaven a high arch shall rush, Suns sink on suns, and sistems systems crush. Headlong, extinct, to one dark centre fall. And death, and night, and chaos mingle all!

Till o'er the wreck, emerging from the storm, Immortal nature lifts her changeful form, Mounts from her fineral pyre on wings of flame, And soars and shines, another and the same <sup>1</sup>

A description of the cassia plant, 'cinctured with gold,' committing its 'infant loves,' or seeds, to be borne by Ontario's floods and sea-currents to the coasts of Norway, naturally suggests Moses in his Nile cradle, as that does African slavery

Moses on the Nile and Slavery

So the sad mother at the noon of night, From bloody Memphis stole her silent flight, Wrapped her dear babe beneath her folded vest, And clasped the treasure to her throbbing breast, With soothing whispers hushed its feeble cry, Pressed the soft kiss, and breathed the secret sigh. With dauntless step she seeks the winding shore, Hears unappalled the glimmering torrents roar, With paper flags a floating cradle weaves, And hides the smiling boy in lotus leaves, Gives her white bosom to his eager lips, The salt tears mingling with the milk he sips, Waits on the reed crowned brink with pious guile, And trusts the scaly monsters of the Nile Erewhile majestic from his lone abode, Embassador of heaven, the Prophet trod, Wrenched the red scourge from proud oppression's hands, And broke, curst slavery, thy iron bands

Hark! heard ye not that piercing cry, Which shook the waves and rent the sky? E'en now, e en now, on yonder western shores Weeps pale despair, and writhing anguish roars, E'en now in Afric's groves, with hideous yell, Fierce slavery stalks, and slips the dogs of hell, From vale to vale the gathering cries rebound, And sable nations tremble at the sound 1 Le band of senators! whose suffrage sways Britannia's realms, whom either Ind obeys, Who right the injured and reward the brave, Stretch your strong arm, for ye have power to savel Throned in the vaulted heart, his dread resort, Inexorable conscience holds his court, With still small voice the plots of guilt alarms, Bares his masked brow, his lifted hand disarms, But wrapped in night with terrors all his own, He speaks in thunder when the deed is done. Hear him, ye senates ! hear this truth sublime, 'He who allows oppression, shares the crime 13

(From The Loves of the Plants, Canto sil.)

The two halves of the poem have no very close connection, Part II only justifies the general and special title of the book, and in Part I the section of Canto iv addressed to the sylphs, the first three cantos of Part I (addressed to fire-spirits, gnomes or earth-spirits, and water-nymphs respectively) deal with the forces of nature in general, and specially with the formation of the world. The plan of the book thus allows Darwin to bring in any subject he likes—'Lock lomond by Moonlight,' Montgolfier's balloon, the pictures of Wright of Derby, compliments to Wedgwood and Brindley the canal-maker, and a really eloquent tribute to

John Howard, the prisoners' friend The following passage on the power of the steam engine (written about 1780 in an invocation to the nymphs of fire, who are responsible for many chemical, electrical, and industrial inventions) goes beyond the achievements of M Santos-Dumont and almost rivals in brief the visions of Mr H G Wells

Nymphs! you erewhile on simmering cauldrons play'd, And call'd delighted Savery to your aid, Bade round the youth explosive Steam aspire, In gathering clouds, and wing'd the vave with fire, Bade with cold streams the quick expansion stop, And sink the immense of vapour to a drop—Press'd by the ponderous air the Piston falls Resistless, sliding through its iron walls, Quick moves the balanced beam, of giant birth, Wields his large limbs, and nodding shakes the earth

Soon shall thy arm, Unconquered Steam ' afar Drag the slow barge, or drive the rapid car, Or on wide waving wings expanded bear The flying-chariot through the fields of air—Fair crews triumphant, leaning from above, Shall wave their fluttering kerchiefs as they move, Or warnor bands alarm the gaping crowd, And armies shrink beneath the shadowy cloud.

Darwin's parallels are sometimes both extravagant and gross, there is a constant throng of startling metaphors, and the descriptions are worked out with tiresome minuteness. A third part of the Botanic Garden was added in 1792, for the copyright of the whole he received £900 Darwin next published Zoonomia, or the Laws of Organic Life (1794-96), partly written long before, a curious and original physiological prose treatise. Sympathising with his aim here to establish the physiological basis of mental phenomena, G H Lewes credits him with 'a profounder insight into psychology than any of his contemporaries and the majority of his successors' Johannes Muller quotes and corrects him, and the Zoonomia directly influenced medical science by insisting on the (only recently recognised) importance of stimulants in fever, and on the rational treatment of the insine In 1801 Dirwin issued another philosophical disquisition, Phytologia, or the Philosophy of Agriculture and Gardening He also wrote a short treatise on Fimale Lducation, intended for the instruction and assistance of part He praised, practised, and of his own family preached teetotalism, and died of gout in his seventy-first year. Shortly after his death was published a poem, The Temple of Nature, which is even more didactic than the Botanic Garden, and more inverted in style and diction

The poetical reputation of Darwin was as bright and transient as the blooming of his plants and flowers. Cowper said his verse was as 'strong' as it was 'learned and sweet'. He really evercised an influence which may be traced in the Pleasures of Hope and other poems of the closing century His command of poetic diction, elaborate metaphors, and sonorous versification was well seconded by his curious and multifarious knowledge, but the effect of the whole was artificial. The Rosicrucian machinery of Pope gave scope for wit and satire in the delineation of human passions and pursuits, but who can sympathise with the loves and metamorphoses of the plants? Multitudinous metaphors are less trying to faith and patience than long-drawn-out and fantastic allegory such as But it seems generally admitted that it was an external accident that mainly blasted Darwin's fair fame. The personification of the plants and their 'pledging their nuptial vows' (not uncomplicated by polygrmy and polyandry) gave a fital opportunity to a parodist, and in the 'Loves of the Triangles' in George Canning's Anti-Jacobin (1799-1801) was too obviously and mercilessly burlesqued Friends and critics, from Miss Seward to Charles Darwin, agree that the sudden collapse of Darwin's poctic credit was due to the ingenuity and pro digious popularity of the burlesque.

Horace Walpole in his letters repeatedly alludes with admiration to Dr Darwin's poetry, and writes thus in a letter of May 14, 1792

The 'Triumph of Flora,' beginning at the fifty ninth line, is most beautifully and enchantingly imagined, and the twelve verses that by miracle describe and comprehend the creation of the universe out of chaos, are in my opinion the most sublime passages in any author, or in any of the few languages with which I am acquainted. There are a thousand other verses most charming, or indeed all are so, crowded with most poetic imagery, gorgeous epitheis and style and yet these four cantos do not please me equally with the Loves of the Plants

The 'Triumph of Flora' begins with the line 'She comes' the goddess' in the passage quoted below, the other twelve verses commended are last in the same extract, from 'Let there be light' on

Invocation to the Goddess of Botany

'Winds of the north' restrain your icy gales Nor chill the bosom of these happy vales I Hence in dark heaps, ye gathering clouds, revolve! Disperse, ye lightnings, and ye mists, dissolve! Hither, emerging from you orient skies, Botanic goddess, bend thy radiant eyes, O'er these soft seenes assume thy gentle reign, Poniona, Ceres, Flora in thy train, O'er the still dawn thy pineid sinile effuse, And with thy silver sandals print the dews, In noon's bright blize thy vermeil vest unfold, And wave thy emerald banner starred vith gold 1 Thus spoke the genius as he stept along, And bade these lawns to peace and truth belong, Down the steep slopes he led vith modest skill The villing pathway and the truant rill, Stretched o'er the marshy vale you willowy mound, Where shines the lake amid the tufted ground, Raised the young woodland, smoothed the wavy green, And gave to beanty all the quiet seene She comes! the goddess! through the whispering air, Bright as the morn descends her blushing car, Lach circling wheel a wreath of flowers enty ines, And, gemmed with flowers, the silken harne's shimes, The golden bits with flowery study are decked, And knots of flowers the crimson reins connect. And now on earth the silver axle rings, And the shell sinks upon its slender springs, Light from her airy seat the goddess bounds, And steps colestial press the pansied grounds. Fair Spring advancing calls her feathered quire, And times to softer notes her laughing lyre, Bids her gay hours on purple pinions move, And arms her zephyrs with the shafts of love. Pleased gnomes, ascending from their carthly beds, Play round her graceful footsteps as she treads, Gay sylphs attendant beat the fragrant air On winnowing wings, and wast her golden liair, Blue nymphs emerging leave their sparkhug streams, And fiery forms alight from orient beams, Musi 'd in the rose's lap fresh dews they shed, Or breathe celestial lustres round her head Tirst the fine forms, her dulcet voice requires, Which bitlie or bask in elemental fires, From each bright gem of day's refuigent car, From the pale sphere of every twinkling star, From each nice pore of ocean, earth, and air, With eye of flame the sparkling hosts repair, Mix their gav hues, in changeful circles play, Like motes, that tenant the meridian May-So the clear lens collects with magic power The countless glories of the midnight hour, Stars after stars with quivering lustre fall, And twini ling glide along the whitened will-Pleased as they pass, she counts the glittering bands, And stills their murmur with her waving hands, Each listening tribe with fond expectance liurns, And now to these, and now to those, she turns 'Nymphs of primeval fire ' your vestal train Hung with gold tresses o'er the vast mane, Pierced with your silver shafts the throne of night, And charmed young Nature's opening eyes with light,

When love divine, with brooding wings unfurled, Called from the rude abyss the living world. 'Let there be light!' proclaimed the Almighty Lord, Astomshed Chaos heard the potent word, Through all his realms the kindling ether runs, And the mass starts into a million suns. Earths round each sun with quick explosions hurst, And second planets issue from the first, Band, as they journey with projectile force, In bright ellipses their reluctant course, Orbs wheel in orbs, round centres centres roll, And form, self balanced, one reluctant whole, Onward they move amid their bright abode, Space without bound, the bosom of their God.

(From exordium of the Economy of Vegetation) The thirt, eight lines that immediately precede this passage are almost verbatim Mrs Seward's and in this extract the eight lines from Thus spoke are also hers. The rest is Darwin's

Destruction of Senacherib's Army by a Pestilential Wind.

From Ashnr's vales when proud Senacherih trod, Poured his swoln heart, defied the living God, Urged with incessant shouts his glittering powers, And Judah shook through all her massy towers Round her sad altars press the prostrate crowd, Hosts beat their breasts, and suppliant chieftains bowed, Lond shricks of matrons thrilled the troubled air, And trembling virgins rent their scattered hair High in the midst the kneeling king adored, Spread the blaspheming scroll before the Lord, Raised his pale hands, and breathed his pausing sighs, And fixed on lieaven his dim imploring eyes 'O mighty God, amidst thy scraph throng Who sit'st sublime, the judge of right and wrong, Thine the wide earth, bright sun, and starry zone, That twinkling jonrney round thy golden throne, Thine is the crystal source of life and light, And thine the realms of death's eternal night. O bend thine ear, the gracious eye incline, Lo! Ashur's ling blasphemes thy holy shrine, Insults our offerings, and derides our vows O strike the diadem from his impious brows, Tear from his murderous hand the bloody rod, And teach the trembling nations "Thou art God "" Sylphs 1 m what dread array with pennons broad, Onward ve floated o er the ethereal road, Called each dank steam the reeking marsh exhales, Contagious vapours and volcanic gales, Gave the soft sonth vith poisonous breath to blow, And rolled the dreadful whirlwind on the foe ! Hark 1 o'er the camp the venomed tempest sings, Man falls on man, on buckler buckler rings, Groan answers groan, to anguish anguish yields, And death s loud accents shake the tented fields! High rears the fiend his grinning jaws, and wide Spans the pale nations with colossal stride, Waves his broad falchion with uplifted hand, And his vast shadow darkens all the land (From the Economy of Vegetation, Canto iv )

Eliza at the Battle of Minden.

So stood Eliza on the wood-crowned height, O er Minden's plain, spectatress of the fight, Songht with bold eye amid the bloody strife Her dearer self, the partner of her life, From hill to hill the rushing host pursued, And viewed his banner, or believed she viewed

Pleased with the distant roar, with quicker tread Fast by his hand one lisping boy she led, And one fair girl amid the loud alarm Slept on her kerchief, cradled by her arm, While round her brows bright beams of Honour dart, And Love's warm eddies circle round her heart Near and more near the intrepid beanty pressed, Saw through the driving smoke his dancing crest, Saw on his helm her virgin hands inwove Bright stars of gold, and mystic knots of love, Heard the exulting shont, 'They run ' they run ' 'Great God '' she cried, 'he 's safe ! the battle 's won!' A ball now hisses through the airy tides, (Some fury winged it, and some demon guides!) Parts the tine locks her graceful head that deck, Wounds her fur ear, and sinks into her neck, The red stream, issuing from her aznre veins, Dyes her white veil, her ivory bosom stains. 'Ah me'' she cried, and sinking on the ground, kissed her dear babes, regardless of the wound, 'Oh cease not yet to beat, thou vital urn 1 Wait, gushing life, oh wait my love s return ! Hourse banks the wolf, the vulture screams from far 1 The angel Pity shuns the walks of war ! Oh spare, ye war hounds, spare their tender age, On me, on me,' she cried, 'exhrust your rige!' Then with weak arms her weeping babes caressed, And, sighing hid them in her blood stained vest

From tent to tent the impatient warrior flies, Fear in his heart, and frenzy in his eyes, Eliza's name along the camp he calls 'Eliza' echoes through the ennuas walls, Quick through the murmuring gloom his footsteps tread, O'er groaning licaps, the dving and the dead, Vault o'er the plain, and in the tangled wood, Lo! dead Eliza weltering in lier blood 1 Soon hears his listening son the welcome sounds, With open arms and sparkling eye he hounds 'Speak low,' he cries, and gives his little hand, 'Eliza sleeps upon the dew cold sand,' Poor weeping babe with bloody fingers pressed And tried with ponting lips her milkless breast, 'Alas ' we both with cold and hunger quake-Why do yon weep?—Mama will soon awake.' 'She'll wake no more 'the hapless mourner cried, Upturned his eyes, and clasped his hands and sighed, Stretched on the ground, a while entranced he lay, And pressed warm kisses on the lifeless clay, And then upsprung with wild convulsive start, And all the father kindled in his heart, "O heavens "he cried, 'my first rash yow forgive, These bind to earth, for these I pray to live I' Round his chill babes he wrapped his crimson vest, And clasped them sobbing to his aching breast.

Song to May

Born in you blaze of orient sky, Sweet May, thy radiant form unfold, Unclose thy blue voluptuous eye, And wave thy shadowy locks of gold

For thee the fragrant zephyrs blow, For thee descends the sunny shower, The rills in softer murmurs flow, And brighter blossoms gem the bower Light graces dressed in flowers wreaths And tiptoe joys their hands combine, And Love his sweet contagion breathes, And laughing dances round thy shrine

Warm with new life the glittering throngs
On quivering fin and rustling wing
Delighted join their votive songs,
And hail thee Goddess of the spring!

(From The Loves of the Plants, Canto n.)

Song to Echo

Sweet Echo! sleeps thy vocal shell, Where this high arch o'erhangs the dell, While Tweed, with sin reflecting streams, Checkers thy rocks with dancing beams?

Here may no clamours harsh intrude, No brawling hound or clarion rude, Here no fell heast of midnight prowl, And teach thy tortured cliffs to bowl

Be thine to pour these vales along Some artless shepherd's evening song, While night's sweet bird from you high spray Responsive listens to his lay

And if, like me, some love form maid Should sing lier sorrows to thy shade, Oh, soothe her breast, ye rocks around, With softest sympathy of sound

(From The Loves of the Plants, Canto sv )

Naturally it is 'fair Avena (i.e. oats) that brings the poet to the brinks of Tweed

If Darwin's poetic glories have been allowed to rest in oblivion, full justice has of late been done to his singular scientific and speculative insight Dr Ernst Krause in his work on the subject compares him thus with his famous grandson

Almost every single work of the younger Darwin may be paralleled by at least a chapter in the works of his ancestor, the mystery of heredity, adaptation, the pro tective arrangements of animals and plants, sexual selection, insectivorous plants, and the analysis of the emotions and sociological impulses, nay, even the studies on infants are to be found already discussed in the writings of the elder Darwin But at the same time we remark a material difference in their interpreta tion of nature. The elder Darwin was a Lamarckian, or, more properly, Jean Lamarck was a Darwinian of the older school, for he has only carried out further the ideas of Erismus Darwin, although with great acumen, and it is to Darwin, therefore, that the credit is due of having first established a complete system of the theory of evolution. The evidence of this I shall adduce here after

The unusual circumstance that a grandfather should be the intellectual precursor of his grandson in questions which nowadays more than any others move the minds of men, must of itself suffice to excite the liveliest interest. But at the same time it must be pointed out that in this fact we have not the smallest ground for depreciating the labours of the man who has shed a new lustre upon the name of his grandfather. It is one thing to establish hypotheses and theories out of the fullness of one's fancy, even when supported by a very considerable knowledge of nature, and another to demonstrate them by an enormous number of facts, and carry them to such a degree of probability as to satisfy those most capable of judging. Dr Erasmus Darwin could not satisfy his contemporaries with his physio philosophical ideas, he was a century ahead of them, and was in consequence obliged to put up with seeing people, shrug their shoulders when they spoke of his wild and eccentric fancies, and the expression 'Darwinising' (as employed, for example, by the poet Coleridge when writing on Stillingflect) was accepted in England nearly as the antithesis of sober biological investigation

Darwin had the inisfortune to be one of the many victims of the 'practical' and mischievous jokes of George Steevens the Shakespearean commentator. In the fourth canto of the Loves of the Plants Darwin gives rather an extrivagant version of the upas tree superstition and prints as pièce justificative a long article in the London Magazine for 1783, said to be from the Dutch of a physician resident in Java, but subsequently discovered to be a pure fabrication by Steevens.

See Krause's essay on Darwin's scientific works translated by Dallas, and the prefatory Life by Charles Darwin (1879) and ed 1887). The earliest Life was that by Miss Seward

Anna Seward (1747–1809), born at Evam rectory, Derbyshire, was the daughter of the Rev Thomas Seward, from 1754 canon residentiary of Lichfield, who, himself a poet, was one of the editors of Beaumont and Fletcher She was early trained to a taste for poetry, and before she was nine could repeat the first three books of Paradise Her own earliest verses were elegate poems -on Captrin Cook, Garrick, Major André, and others—which, spite of their artificial and inflated style, attained some measure of celebrity complimented her as 'the inventress of epic elegy,' Johnson highly praised some of her things, and she was known by the name of the Swan of Lich Miss Mitford, less complimentary, called her 'a sort of Dr Darwin in petticoats,' but she had more in common with Hayley and Gifford's other victims in the Baviad A poetical novel, Louisa (1782), passed through several editions Her Memoir of Di Darwin appeared in 1804. After bandying compliments with the poets of one generation, Miss Seward in the next engaged Sir Walter Scott in a literary correspondence, and bequeathed to him for publication three volumes of her poetry, which he issued, with a memoir, in 1810-not without misgivings. At the same time she left her correspondence to Constable, who published the letters from 1784 and 1807 (6 vols 1811) Both collections were unsuccessful applauses of Miss Seward's early admirers were only calculated to excite ridicule, and the vanity and affectation which were her besetting sins destroyed alike her poetry and her prose. Some of her letters, however, are written with spirit and discrimination, and Macaulay, writing to his sister Hannah, reported, 'The books which I had sent to the binder are come, and Miss Seward's letters are in a condition to bear twenty more reperusals?

Hannah More (1745-1833), adopting fiction as a means of conveying religious instruction, can scarcely be said to have been ever 'free of the corporation' of no class, non vould she perhaps ha e cared to ove her distinction solely to her con rection "7th so motles and "arrous a band uthdrew from the fascinations of London society, the theatres and opera, in obedience to what she concer ed to be the call of duty, and, latterly at any rate, much of contemporary literature became taboo to her This lovable woman was the fourth of the five daughters of Jacob More, who taugh, a school in the Gloucestershire village of Stapleton (now absorbed in Bristol, where Hannah was At t elve she was sent to a boardingschool just started by her eldest sister in Bristol. In 1773 she published a pastoral drama, The Search after Happiness, which by 1796 had reached an ele enth edition, in 1774 she brought out a tragedy, The Inflexible Captive In 1773 or 1774 she made her entrance into the society of Lordon, and as domest cated ath Garrick, who proved one of her lindest and s'eadiest friends She vas received with favour by Johnson, Reynolds, Burie, and heir set. In 1777 Garrick brought out her tragedy of Percy at Drury Lane, where it had a run of tventy one nights, the theatrical profits amounted to £600, and for the copyright of the play she got £150 more. She had already published two legendary poems, Sir Eldred of the Bower and The Bleeding Ro F, and in 1779 her third and last tragedy, The Fatal Falsehood was acted, but only for three nights this time she lost her friend Garrick by death In 1782 appeared a volume of Sacred Dramas, vith a poem Sensibility All her works were successful, and Johnson, with a friend's partiality, declared she was 'the mos por crful versificatrix in the English language.' Her poetry is non forgotten, but Percy has so many good points that one cannot help thinking the venerable Mrs Hannah More might have been remembered as i a playwright had she settled down seriously to dramatic vorl. In 1786 she issued another olume of verse, Florio, a Tale for Fine Gentlemen and I'me Ladies, and The Bas Bleu, or The latter-v luch Johnson com-Conversation plimented as 'a great performance' - was an claborate culogs on the Bas Bleu Club, a literary assembly that met at Mrs Montagu's (see page 418) About this time Hannah resolved to devote her abundant good sense and keen observation exclusively to high objects. The gay life of the fashionable vorld had lost its charms, and, having published her Bas Blen, she retired to the small cottage of Covslip Green in Blandon parish in Somerset. Her first prose publication was Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great to General Society (1788), and, published anonymously, was by Co vper assumed to be the production of one of the most scholarly and tell-born men of the time, presumably Wilberforce. This was followed in 1791 by an Estimate of the Religion of the Tashionable World As a means of counteracting the political tracts and evertions of Jacobins and levellers, 'Mrs' More (for so she came, in the fashion of the day, to be styled) in 1795-98 wrote a number of tales, published monthly under the title of The Cheap Repository, which attained to a sale of about a million each number, of these the best-known has The Slepherd of Salisbury Plain With the same object, she published a volume on I illage Politics Her other principal works were Strictures on the Modern System of Lemale Education (1799), Hints towards forming the Chara ter of a Young Princess (1805, written at the queen's request for belioof of the Princess Charlotte), Cahbs in Search of a 11 ife (1809), Practical Piets (1811), Christian Morals (1812), Lssay on the Character and Writings of St Paul 1815), and Moral Stetches of Prevailing Opinions and Manners, Foreign and Domistic, with Reflections on Prayer (1819: Her collected works (1830) fill cleven volumes octavo Of Calebs ten editions were sold in one year. The tale has a fine yein of delicate iron and sarcasm, and some of the characters are admirably drawn, but the didactic aim and tone repel ordinary novel readers, the story vas not unfairly called 'a dramatic sermon'

The popularity of her books enabled her to live in ease, and to dispense charities generously sisters also secured a competency, and they all lived together at Barley Wood, a house in the neighbouring parish of Wrington, Locke's birth place, whither Hannah moved in 1802 'From the day that the school was given up, the existence of the whole sisterhood appears to have flowed on in one uniform current of peace and contentment, diversified only by new appearances of Hannah as an authoress, and the ups and downs which she and the others met with in the prosecution of a most brave and human experiment-namely, their zealous effort to extend the blessings of education and religion among the inhabitants of certain villages situated in the wild Cheddar district some ten miles from their abode, who, from a concurrence of unhappy local and temporary circumstances, had been left in a state of ignorance hardly conceivable at the present day? And their labours so prospered that ere long the sisterhood had the pleasure of vitnessing a yearly festival celebrated on the hills of Cheddar, where above a thousand children, with the members of women's industrial clubs-also established by them-after attending church service, were regaled at the expense of their benefactors. In Hannah's latter days there was perhaps a tincture of supercrogatory severity in her religious views. But her unfeigned sincerity, her exertions to instruct miners and cottagers, and the untiring zeal with which she laboured, even amidst severe bodily infirmities. to spread sound principles and intellectual culture from palace to cottage, entitle her to rank amidst the self devoting benefactors of her time and her country. In 1828, nine years after the death of her fourth sister, Hannah More moved to Clifton, and here she died at the age of eighty-eight. They are all five buried at Wrington 'Mrs More' formed a link with the earlier Victorian age it was this revered friend of his father and the Clapham sect that little Tom Macaulay, alone at the moment in the house, asked 'if he might not have the pleasure of offering a glass of old spirits'—having at four read that this was one of the customary refreshments of Robinson Crusoe. She left about £30,000, chiefly in legacies to charitable and religious institutions

The third sister, Sally (1743-1817), thus described Hannah's first interview—which founded a warm friendship—with the great English moralist during her London sojourn in 1773-74

We have paid another visit to Miss Reynolds, she had sent to engage Dr Percy-Percy's Collection, now you know him-quite a sprightly modern, not a rusty antique, as I expected, he was no sooner gone than the most amiable and obliging of women, Miss Reynolds, ordered the coach to take us to Dr Johnson's very own house yes, Abyssinia's Johnson! Dictionary's Johnson! Rambler's, Idler's, and Irene's Johnson 1 Can you pic ture to yourselves the palpitation of our hearts as we approached his mansion? The conversation turned on a new worl of his just going to the press-the Tour to the Hebrides-and his old friend Richardson Mrs Williams, the blind poet who lives with him, was introduced to us. She is engaging in her manners, her conversation lively and entertaining Miss Reynolds told the doctor of all our rapturous exclamations on the road He shook his scientifie head at Hannah, and said 'she was a silly thing!' When our visit was ended, he called for his hat, as it rained, to attend us down a very long entry to our coach, and not Rasselas could have acquitted himself more en cavalter. We are engaged with lim at Sir Joshua's, Wednesday evening. What do you think of us? I forgot to mention, that not finding Johnson in his little parlour when we came in, Hannah seated hirself in his great chair, hoping to catch a little ray of his genus when he heard it he laughed heartily, and told her it was a chair on which he never sat. He said it reminded him of Boswell and himself when they stopped a night, as they imagined, where the weird sisters appeared to Macbeth. The idea so worked on their enthusiasm, that it quite deprived them of rest. However, they learned the next morning, to their mortification, that they had been deceived, and were quite in another part of the country

In a later letter (1776), after the publication of Hannah's Sir Eldred, the same lively writer Boswellised still further

If a wedding should take place before our return, don't be surprised—between the mother of Sir Eldred and the father of my much loved Irene, may, Mrs Montagu says if tender words are the precursors of connulnal engage ments, we may expect great things, for it is nothing but 'child,' 'little fool,' 'love,' and 'dearest' After much eritical discourse, lie turns round to me, and with one of his most annable looks, which must be seen to form the least idea of it, he says 'I have heard that you are engaged in the useful and honourable employment of teaching young ladies ' Upon which, with all the same erse, familiarity, and confidence we should have done had only our own dear Dr Stonehouse been present, we entered upon the history of our birth, parentage, and education, showing how we were born with more desires than guineas, and how, as years increased our appetites, the cupboard at home began to grow too small to gratify them, and how, with a bottle of water, a bed, and a blanket, we set out to seek our fortunes, and how we found a great house with nothing in it, and how it was like to remain so till, looking into our know ledge boxes, we happened to find a little larning, a good thing when land is gone, or rather none, and so at last, by giving a little of this little larning to those who had less, we got a good store of gold in return, but how, alas! we wanted the wit to keep it 'I love you both,' cried the inamorato-'I love you all five. I never was at Bristol-I will come on purpose to see you five women live happily together! I will come and see you-I have spent a happy evening-I am glad I came -God for ever bless you I you live lives to shame He took his leave with so much warmth duchesses.' and tenderness, we were quite affected at his manner If Hannah's head stands proof against all the adulation and kindness of the great folks here, why then I will venture to say nothing of this kind will hurt her here A literary anecdote Mrs Medalla-Sterne's daughter-sent to all the correspondents of her deceased father, begging the letters which he had written to them, among other wits, she sent to Wilkes with the same request He sent for answer, that as there happened to be nothing extraordinary in those he had received, he had burnt or lost them On which the faithful editor of her father's works sent back to say, that if Mr Wilkes would be so good as to write in few letters in imitation of her father's style, it would do just as well, and she would inscrt them

In a letter Hannah thus comments on

Garrick's Death

From Dr Cadogan's I intended to have gone to the Adelphi, but found that Mrs Garrick was at that moment quitting her house, while preparations were making for the last sad ceremony, she very wisely fixed on a private friend's house for this purpose, where she could be at her ease. I got there just before her, she was prepared for meeting me, she ran into my arms, and we both re mained silent for some initutes, at last she whispered *I have this moment embraced his coffin, and you come next.' She soon recovered herself, and said with great composure 'The goodness of God to me is inexpres sible, I desired to die, but it is his will that I should live, and He has convinced me He will not let my life be quite miserable, for He gives astoni hing strength to my body, and grace to my heart, neither do I deserve, but I am thankful for both' She thanked me a thousand times for such a real act of friendship, and hade me be comforted, for it was God's will She told me they had just returned from Althorp, Lord Spencer's, where he had been reluctantly dragged, for he had felt unwell for some time, but during his visit he was often in such fine spirits, that they could not believe he was ill his return home, he appointed Cadogan to meet him, who ordered him an emetic, the warm bath, and the usual remedies, but with very little effect Sunday he was in good spirits and free from pain, but as the suppression still continued, Dr Cadogan became extremely alarmed, and sent for Pott, Heberden, and Schomberg, who gave him up the moment they saw Poor Garrick stared to see his room full of doctors, not being conscious of his real state change happened till the Tuesday evening, when the surgeon v ho was sent for to blister and bleed him made light of his illness, assuring Mrs Garrick that he would be well in a day or two, and invisted on her going to lie Towards morning, she desired to be called if there was the least change. Every time that she ad ministered the draughts to him in the night, he always squeezed her hand in a particular manner, and spoke to her with the greatest tenderness and affection. Immediately after he had taken his last medicine, he softly said 'O dear' and yielded up his spirit with a groan, and in his perfect senses. His behaviour during the night was all gentleness and patience, and he frequently made apologies to those about him for the trouble he I paid a melancholy visit to the coffin gave them yesterday, where I found room for meditation till the mind 'burst with thinking' His new house is not so pleasant as Hampton, nor so splendid as the Adelphi, but it is commodious enough for all the wants of its inhabitant, and, besides, it is so quiet that he never will be disturbed till the eternal morning, and never till then will a sweeter voice than his own be heard. May he then find mercy! They are preparing to liang the house with black, for he is to lie in state till Monday dislike this pageantry, and cannot help thinking that the disembodied spirit must look with contempt upon the farce that is played over its miscrable relics. But a splendid funeral could not be avoided, as he is to be laid in the Abbey with such illustrious dust, and so many are desirous of testifying their respect by attend ing I can never cease to remember with affection and gratitude so warm, steady, and disinterested a friend. and I can most truly bear this testimony to his memory, that I never witnessed in any family more decorum, propriety, and regularity than in his, where I never saw a card, nor even met—except in one instance—a person of his own profession at his table, of which Mrs Garnek by her elegance of taste, her correctness of manners, and very original turn of humour, was the brightest ornament. All his pursuits and tastes were so decidedly intellectual, that it made the society and the conversation which was always to be found in his circle interesting and delightful

The following couplets from Bas Bhu have been often quoted and are still remembered

In men this blunder still you find, All think their little set mankind Small habits well pursued, betimes May reach the dignity of crime.

This is a fragment from Piris

If there's a sin more deeply black than others, Distinguished from the list of common crimes, A legion in itself and doubly dear To the dark Prince of Hell, it is—Hypocrisv

From the Ode to Charity comes

O Charity, divinely wise, Thou meek eved daughter of the skies

In Calebs (1809, 16th ed 1826) a young northcountry squire loses in succession a revered fither and an adored mother, and setting forth into the world on his quest of a wife, endeavours to keep their maxims constantly in mind He reports on a perfect galaxy of excellent women, young and older, set off by a much larger number who have very pronounced or less conspicuous faults or foibles, and has room for disquisitions not increly on women's duties and rights and women's education, but on the indispensable qualifications of a model clergyman, Antinomianism, and the beauties of Akenside's verse (than some of which 'there is nothing more splendid in the whole mass of our poetry,' and from which Thomson might to his advantage have learnt melody and rhythm) In the midst of amusing, lively, and witty accounts of his experiences, he sometimes interpolites a page or two on such somewhat irrelevant topics as grace and works, or the true principles of Sabbath keeping Mrs Hannah's mouthpiece, he is more severe on 'high professors' who are selfish inconsistent, and censorious than on kindly worldlings, and while disapproving 'irreligion' in all shapes, reserves the hottest indignation for what is really base and contemptible. We learn that children are now brought too much forward, that too much time is wasted by girls on music, that dozens of superfluous subjects are taught them (including a smattering of Italian and of German), while from the heiress of the man of rink to the daughter of the opulent tradesman there is no one subject in which young women are so generally deficient as in domestic economy? The following quotations are from Calits

Conversation at Dinner

From my fondness for conversation, my imagination had been early fired with Dr Johnson's remark, that there is no pleasure on earth comparable to the fine full flow of London talk I who, since I had quitted college, had seldom had my mind refreshed but with the petty rills and penurious streams of knowledge which country society afforded, now expected to meet it in a strong and rapid current, fertilizing wherever it flowed, producing in abundance the rich fruits of argument and the gay flowers of rhetoric. I looked for an uninterrupted course of profit and delight I flattered myself that every dinner would add to my stock of images, that every debate would clear np some difficulty, every discussion elucidate some truth, that every allusion would be purely classical, every sentence abound with instruction, and every period be pointed with wit

On the tiptoe of expectation I went to dine with Sir John Belfield in Cavendish square I looked at my witch fifty times. I thought it would never be six I did not care to shew my country breeding by going too early, to incommode my friend, nor my town breeding by going too late, and spoiling his dinner Sir John is a valuable, elegant minded man, and, next to Mr Stanley, stood highest in my father's esteem for his mental accomplishments and correct As I knew he was remarkable for assembling at his table men of sense, taste, and learning, my expectations of pleasure were very high 'Here at least,' said I, as I heard the name of one elever man announced after another, 'here at least I cannot fail to find

"The feast of reason and the flow of soul"

here, at least, all the energies of my mind will be brought into exercise. From this society I shall carry away documents for the improvement of my taste, I shall treasure up hints to enrich my understanding, and collect aphorisms for the conduct of life.'

At first there was no fair opportunity to introduce any conversation beyond the topics of the day, and to those, it must be confessed, this eventful period gives a new and powerful interest. I should have been much pleased to have had my country politics rectified, and any prejudices which I might have contracted removed or softened, could the discussion have been carried on without the frequent interruption of the youngest man in the company. This gentleman broke in on every remark, by descanting successively on the merits of the various dishes, and, if it be true that experience only can determine the judgment, he gave proof of that best right to peremptory decision by not trusting to delusive theory, but by actually eating of every dish at table

His animadversions were uttered with the gravity of a German philosopher and the science of a French cook. If any of his opinions happened to be controverted, he quoted, in confirmation of his own judgment, I Almanac des Gourmands, which he assived us was the most valuable work that had appeared in France since the revolution. The author of this book he seemed to consider of as high authority in the science of eating as Coke or Hale in that of jurisprudence, or Quintihan in the art of criticism. To the credit of the company, however, be it spoken, he had the whole of this topic to himself. The rest of the party were, in general, of quite a different calibre, and as little acquainted with his favourite author as he probably was with theirs

The lady of the honse was perfectly amnable and well bred. Her dinner was excellent, and everything about her had an air of elegance and splendour of course she completely escaped the disgrace of being thought a scholar, but not the suspicion of having a very good taste. I longed for the removal of the cloth, and was eagerly anticipating the pleasure and improvement which awaited me.

As soon as the servants were beginning to withdraw, we got into a sort of attitude of conversation, all except the eulogist of l'Almanac des Gourmands, who, wrapping himself up in the comfortable consciousness of his own superior judgment, and a little piqued that he had found neither support nor opposition, (the next best thing to a professed talker,) he seemed to have a perfect indifference to all topics except that on which he had shewn so much eloquence with so little effect

The-last tray was now carried out, the last lingering servant had retired. I was beginning to listen with all my powers of attention to an ingenious gentleman who was about to give an interesting account of Egypt, where he had spent a year, and from whence he was lately returned. He was just got to the catacombs,

the mahogany folding doors, and in at once, struggling who should be first, rushed half a dozen children, lovely, fresh, gny, and noisy This sudden and violent irruption of the pretty barbanans necessarily caused a total inter ruption of conversation The sprightly creatures ran round the table to chuse where they would sit length this great difficulty of courts and cabinets, the choice of places, was settled The little things were jostled in between the ladies, who all contended who should get possession of the liftle beauties. One was in rapthres with the rosy cheeks of a sweet girl she held in her lap A second exclained aloud at the beautiful lack with which the frock of another was trimmed, and w g h she was stre-mamma had given her for being gotivi A profitable, and doubtless a lasting and insepar ab wassociation was thus formed in the child's mind between lace and goodness A third cried out, 'Look at the pretty angel !--do but observe-her bracelets are as blue as her eyes Did you ever see such a match?" 'Surely, Lady Belfield,' cried a fourth, 'you carried the eyes to the shop, or there nust have been a shade of difference' I myself, which am passionately fond of children, eyed the sweet little rebels with compla cency, notwithstanding the nnseasonableness of their interruption

At last, when they were all disposed of, I resumed my enquiries about the resting place of the mummies. But the grand dispute who should have oranges and who should have almonds and raisins, soon raised such a clamour that it was impossible to hear my Egyptiun friend. This great contest was, however, at length settled, and I was returning to the antiquities of Memphis, when the important point, who should have red wine and who should have white, who should have half a glass and who a whole one, set us again in an uproar. Sir Joha was visibly uneasy, and commanded silence. During this interval of peace, I gave up the catacombs and took refuge in the pyramids.

But I hal no sooner proposed my question about the serpent said to be found in one of them, than the son and heir, a fine little fellow just six years old, reaching out his arm to dart an apple across the table at his sister, roguishly intending to overset her glass, unlinkily overthrew his own, brimful of port wine. The whole contents were discharged on the elegant drapery of a white robed nymph.

All was now agitation and distress, and disturbance and confusion, the gentlemen ringing for napkins, the ladies assisting the dripping fair one, each vying with he other who should recommend the most approved specific for getting out the stain of red wine, and com forting the sufferer by stories of similar misfortunes. The poor little culprit was dismissed, and all difficulties and disasters seemed at last surmounted But you cannot heat up again an interest which has been so often cooled. The thread of conversation had been so frequently broken that I despaired of seeing it tied together again. I sorrowfully gave up catacombs, pyramids, and serpent, and was obliged to content myself with a little desultory chat with my next neighbour, sorry and disappointed to glean only a few scattered ears, where I had expected so abundant a harvest, and the day from which I had promised myself so much benefit and delight passed away with a very slender acquisition of either

The Majesty and Meanness of Man.

I returned to town at the end of a few days. To a speculative stranger, a London day presents every variety of circumstance in every conceivable shape of which human life is susceptible. When you trace the solicitude of the morning countenance, the anxious exploring of the morning paper, the eager interrogation of the morning guest, when you hear the dismal enumeration of losses by land and perils by sea—taxes trebling, dangers multiplying, commerce annihilating, war protracted, invasion threatening, destruction impending—your mind catches and communicates the terror, and you feel yourself 'falling with a falling state'

But when, in the course of the very same day, you meet these gloomy prognosticators at the simptious, not 'dinner but Hecatomb,' at the gorgoous fite, the splendid spectacle, when you hear the frivolous discourse, witness the luxurious dissipation, contemplate the boundless indulgence, and observe the ruinous gaming, you would be ready to exclaim, 'Am I not supping in the Antipodes of that land in which I breakfasted' Surely this is a country of different men, different characters, and different circumstances. This at least is a place in which there is neither fear nor danger, nor want, nor miscry, nor war'

If you observed the overflowing subscriptions raised, the innumerable societies formed, the committees appointed, the agents employed, the royal patrons engaged, the noble presidents provided, the palace like structures erected, and all this to alleviate, to cure, and even to prevent every calamity which the indigent can suffer or the affluent conceive, to remove not only want but ignorance, to suppress not only miscry but vice—vould you not exclaim with Hamlet, 'What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! How infinite in faculties! In action how like an angel! in compassion how like a God!'

If you look into the whole comet like eccentric orb of the human character, if you compared all the struggling contrariety of principle and of passion, the clashing of opinion and of action, of resolution and of performance, the victories of evil over the propensities to good, if you contrasted the splendid virtue with the disorderly vice, the exalted generosity with the selfish narrowness, the provident bounty with the thoughtless produgality, the extremes of all that is dignified, with the excesses of all that is abject, would you not exclaim, in the very spirit of Pascal, O' the grandeur and the littleness, the excellence and the corruption, the majesty and the meanness of man'

The Music Nuisance

'I look upon the great predominance of music in female education,' said Mr Stanley, 'to be the source of more mischief than is suspected, not from any evil in the thing itself, but from its being such a gulph of time as really to leave little room for solid acquisitions I love music, and were it only cultivated as an amuse ment should commend it. But the monstrous propor tion, or rather disproportion of life which it swallows up, even in many religious families, and this is the chief subject of my regret, has converted an innocent diversion into a positive sin. Only figure to your self my six girls daily playing their four hours a picce, which is now a moderate allowance! As we have but one instrument they must be at it in succession, day and night, to keep pace with their neighbours. If I may compare light things with serious ones, it would resemble,' added he, smiling, 'the perpetual psalmody of good Mr Nicholas Terrar, who had relays of musicians every six hours to sing the whole Psalter through every day and night! I mean not to ridi culc that holy man, but my girls thus leeping their useless vigils in turn, we should only have the melody without any of the piety No, my friend! I will have but two or three singing birds to cheer iny little grove. If all the world are performers, there will soon be no hearers. Now, as I am resolved in my own family that some shall listen, I will have but fer to perform.

Besides the Memotrs of the Life and Correspondence of Mrs Hannah Varr, by William Roberts (4 vols. 1834) there is a pleasant little sketch by Miss Yonge in the Eminent Women series (1838) Her collected works have been repealedly reissued (8 vols. 1801, 19 vols. 1818 11 vols. 1830, &c.).

Anna Letitia Barbauld (1743-1825) was born at Kibworth Harcourt in Leicestershire. Her father, the Rev John Aikin, DD, then kept a boys' school, and Anna received the same instruction as the pupils, including a thorough knowledge of Greek and Latin In 1758 Dr Aikin (whose father was a London Scot) undertook the office of classical tutor in a Dissenting academy at Warrington, and there his daughter lived for fifteen years. In 1773 she published a volume of poems, of which four editions were called for in the first year In May 1774 she was married to the Rev Rochemont Barbauld, of Huguenot ancestry, who became minister of a Dissenting congregation at Palgrave near Diss, and there opened a boarding-school, which throve under his wife's capible assistance. In 1775 she commenced authoress with a volume of devotional pieces compiled from the Psalms, and with Hymns in Prose for Children. In 1786 Mr and Mrs Barbauld removed to Hampstead, and there the industrious helpmeet wrote several tracts in support of Whig principles. She also aided her brother (John Aikin, 1747–1822, physician and author, father of Lucy Aikin) in preparing a series of papers for children, the famous I canings at Home (1796)—the bulk of the work being the brother's, and she wrote critical essays on Akenside and Collins for editions of their works. After compiling a selection of essays from the Spectator, Tatler, and Guardian, she edited the correspondence of Richardson, and wrote a Life of the novelist. Her list great enterprise was a collection of the British novelists, published in 1810, with an introductory essay and biographical and critical notices Her husband drowned himself in a fit of insanity in 1808 Some of her brienl pieces are flowing and harmonious, and her Ode to Spring was plainly an initiation of Collins's manner Charles James For was a great admirer of Mrs Barbauld's poems, but most of them are artificial and unimpassioned In one, Eighteen Hundred and Eleven, she anticipated Macaulay's New Zenlander with a youth 'from the Blue Mountrins or Ontario's Lake' who views the ruins of London (both Horace Walpole and Volney had already brought Peruvians or other wanderers Her hymns were long popular, and some of her lighter things, like The Washing Day, are amusing Lord Selborne included four of her pieces in his Book of Praise, the best known that of which the first three verses run

Pruse to God, unmortal pruse
For the love that crown our day?
Bounteous once of every joy,
Fet thy prine our tongues employ
For the Fle sing of the field,
For the stores the gindens yield
For the vine's evalted juice
For the generous olives use.
Flocks that whiten all the plain,
Yello's showes of ripened grein
Clouds that drop their fattening dews,
Suns that temperate warmth diffue

By far her best serious poem is that on Life, of which the last exquisite stairs was so much admired by Wordsworth Ropers, and Madam D'Arblay like I latinan's 'Thought of Death' an Popes 'Death' Christian, the poem was inspire by Emperor Hadran's 'Animal's sigula, blandula

Odo to Spring

Sweet daughter of a rough and storms sire,
Hoar Winter's blooming child delightful Spring!
Whose unshorn locks with leaves
And swelling buds are crowned,
From the green islands of eternal youth—
Crowned with fresh blooms and ever springing shade—

Aurn, luther turn thy step, O thou, whose powerful voice,

More sweet than softest touch of Done reed Or Ladian flute can soothe the madding winds, And through the storms deep Breathe thy own tender calm Thee, best beloved! the virgin train await With songs and festal rites, and joy to rove Thy blooming wilds among, And vales and dewy lawns,

With untired feet, and cull thy earliest sweets
To weave fresh garlands for the glowing brow
Of him, the favoured youth
That prompts their whispered sigh

Unlock thy copious stores, those tender showers
That drop their sweetness on the infant buds,
And silent dews that swell
The milky ear's green stem,

And feed the flowering osier's early shoots,

And call those winds which through the whispering boughs

With warm and pleasant breath

Salute the blowing flowers

Now let me sit beneath the whitening thorn, And mark thy spreading tints steal o'er the dale, And watch with patient eye Thy fair unfolding charms

O nymph, approach! while yet the temperate Sun With bashful forehead, through the cool moist air Throws his young maiden beams, And with chaste kisses woos

The Earth's fair bosom, while the streaming veil Of lucid clouds, with kind and frequent shade Protects thy modest blooms From his severer blaze.

Sweet is thy reign, but short—the red dog star Shall scoreh thy tresses, and the mower's scythe I hy greens, thy flowerets all, Remorseless shall destroy

Reluctant shall I bid thee then farewell,
For oh' not all that Autumn's lap contains,
Nor summer's ruddiest fruits,
Can aught for thee atone,

Fair Spring! whose simplest promise more delights. Than all their largest wealth, and through the heart. Each joy and new born hope. With softest influence breathes.

To a Lady, with some Painted Flowers

Flowers to the fair to you these flowers I bring, And strive to greet you with an earlier spring Flowers sweet, and gay, and delicate like you, Emblems of innocence, and beauty too With flowers the Graces bind their yellow hair, And flowery wreaths consenting lovers wear Flowers, the sole luxury which nature knew, In Lden's pure and guiltless garden grew To loftier forms are rougher tasks assigned, The sheltering oak resists the stormy wind, The tougher yen repels invading foes, And the tall pine for future navies grows But this soft family to cares unknown, Were born for pleasure and delight alone. Gas s ithout toil, and lovely without art, They spring to cheer the sense and glad the heart Nor blush, my fair, to own you copy these, Your best, your sweetest empire is-to please.

Hymn to Content

O thou, the nymph with placed eye!
O seldom found, yet ever nigh!
Receive my temperate vow
Not all the storms that shake the pole
Can e'er disturb thy haleyon soul,
And smooth the undtered brow

O come, in simple vest arrayed, With all thy sober cheer displayed, To bless my longing sight, Thy mien composed, thy even pace, Thy meek regard, thy matron grace, And chaste subdued delight

No more by varying passions bent, O gently guide my pilgrim feet To find thy hermit cell, Where in some pure and equal sky, Beneath thy soft indulgent eye, The modest virtues dwell

Simplicity in Attie vest,
And Innocence with candid breast,
And clear indaunted eye,
And Hope, who points to distant years,
Fair opening through this vale of tears,
A vista to the sky

There Health, through whose calm bosom glide The temperate joys in even tide, That rarely clib or flow, And Patience there, thy sister meek,

Presents her mild unvarying cheek
To nicet the offered blow

Her influence taught the Phrygian sage
A tyrant master s wanton rage
With settled smiles to wait
Inured to toil and bitter bread,
He bowed his meek submissive head,
And kissed thy sainted feet

But thou, O nymph retired and cov!
In what brown hamlet dost thou joy
To tell thy tender tale?
The lowliest children of the ground,
Moss rose and violet blos-om round,
And hly of the vale

O say what soft propitious hour I best may choose to hail thy power, And court thy gentle sway? When autumn, friendly to the Muse, Shall thy own modest tints diffuse, And shed thy milder day

Mrs Elizabeth Inchbald (1753-1821), actress, dramatist, and novelist, was born at Stanningfield near Bury St Edmunds, the daughter of a Roman Catholic farmer At eighteen, full of giddy romance, she ran off to London, having a few things in a band box, but very little money After many adventures and even some indignities, the unprotected girl applied for advice to Mr Inchbald, an actor she had known Inchbald counselled marriage 'But who would marry me?' she asked 'I would,' replied her friend, 'if you would have me' 'Yes, sir, and I would for ever be grateful'-and married they were in June The union thus singularly brought about was happy enough, but Inclibild died seven years afterwards Mis Inchbald played leading parts in the Scottish theatres for four years, and continued acting in London, Dublin, and elsewhere till 1789, when she retired from the stage Her exemplary prudence and the profits of her works enabled her not only to live, but to save money, the applause and distinction she earned never led her to deviate from her simple-almost ostentatiously simplehabits 'Last Thursday,' she writes, 'I finished scouring my bedroom, while a coach with a coronet and two footmen waited at my door to take me an airing' She allowed a sister who was in ill health £100 a year 'Many a time this winter,' she records in her Diary, 'when I cried for cold, I said to myself "But, thank God, my sister has not to stir from her room, she has her fire lighted every morning all her provisions bought and brought ready cooked, she is now the less able to bear what I bear, and how much more should I suffer but for this reflection"' Her income was only £172 ? year, and after the death of her sister she went to live in a boarding-house in which she enjoyed more of the comforts of life. Traces of feminine weakness break out in her private memoranda amidst the sterner records of her struggle for in dependence. Thus '1798 London Rehearsing Lovers' Vows, happy but for a suspicion, amount ing to a certainty, of a rapid appearance of age in my face' Her two tales, A Simple Story (1791) and Nature and Art (1796), are the supporters of her fame, but her light dramatic pieces were marked by various talent. Her first production was a farce entitled The Mogul Tale (1784), and from this time down to 1805 she wrote nine other plays and farces Her last literary labour was writing biographical and critical prefaces to a collection of plays, in twenty-five volumes, a collection of farces, in seven volumes, and the Modern Theatre, in ten volumes Phillips the publisher offered her £1000 for an autobiography she had written, but she declined the tempting offer, and the manuscript was, by her orders, destroyed after her death She died as she had lived, a devout Catholic.

Of this remarkable woman many interesting facts are recorded in Kegan Paul's Life of Godwin (1876) Mrs Shelley (Godwin's daughter) says of |

'Living in mean lodgings, dressed with an economy allied to penury, without connections, and alone, her beauty, her talents, and the charm of her manners gave her entrance into a delightful circle of society. Apt to fall in love and destrous to marry, she continued single because the men who loved and admired her were too worldly to take an actress and a poor author, however lovely and charming, for a wife Her life was thus spent in an interchange of hardship and amusement, privation and luxury Her character partook of the same contrast fond of pleasure, she vas pru dent in her conduct, penurious in her personal expenditure, she was generous to others. Vain of her beauty, we are told that the gown she wore was not worth a shilling, it was so coarse and Very susceptible to the softer feelings, she could yet guard herself against passion, and though she might have been called a flirt, her character was unimpeached. I have heard that a rival beauty of her day pettishly complained that when Mrs Inchbald came into a room, and sat in a cliair in the middle of it, as was her wont, every man gathered round it, and it was vain for any other woman to attempt to gain attention Godwin could not ful to admire her, she became and con tinued to be a favourite. Her talents, her beauty, her manners were all delightful to him. He used to describe her as a piquante mixture between a lady and a milkmaid, and added that Sheridan declared she was the only authoress whose society pleased him? The extract is from Aature and

Judge and Victim

The day at length is come on which Agnes shall have a sight of her beloved William! She who has watched for hours near his door, to procure a glimpse of him going out or returning home, who has walked miles to see his chariot pass, she now will behold him, and he will see her, by command of the laws of his country Those laws, which will deal with ingour towards her, are in this one instance still indulgent.

The time of the assizes at the country town in which she is imprisoned is arrived—the prisoners are demanded at the shire hall—the jail doors are opened—they go in sad procession. The trumpet sounds-it speaks the arrival of the judge, and that judge is William

The day previous to her trial, Agnes had read, in the printed calendar of the prisoners, his name as the learned Judge before whom she was to appear For a moment she forgot her perilous state in the excess of joy which the still unconquerable love she bore to him permitted her to taste, even on the brunk of the grave! After reflection made her check those worldly transports, as unfit for the present solemn occasion. But, alas ' to her, earth and William were so closely united, that till she forsook the one, she could never cease to think, with ont the contending passions of hope, of fear, of love, of shame, and of despur, on the other

Now fear took the place of her first immoderate joy, she feared that, although much changed in person since he had seen her, and her real name now added to many an alias—yet she feared that some well known glance of the eye, turn of the action, or accent of speech, might recall her to his remembrance, and at that idea, shame overcame all her other sensations—for still she retained pride, in respect to his opinion, to wish him not to know Agnes was that vactch she felt she was! Once a ray of hope beamed on her, that if he knew her—if he recognised her—he might possibly befriend her cause, and life bestowed through William's friendship seemed a precious object! but, aguin, that rigorous honour she had often heard him boast, that firmness to his word, of which she had fatal experience, taught her to know he would not, for any improper compassion, any unmanly weakness, forfeit his oath of impartial justice. In meditations such as these she passed the sleepless night

When, in the morning, she was brought to the bar, and her guilty hand held up before the rightcous judgment seat of William, imagination could not form two figures or it o situations more incompatible with the easi ener of former familiarity than the judge and the culprit and vet, these very persons had passed together the most blusful moments that either ever tasted! Those hours of tender dalliance were now present to her mind—his thoughts were more nobly employed in his high office, nor could the laggard face, hollow eye, desponding countenance, and meagre person of the poor prisoner once call to his memory though her name was uttered among a list of others which she had assumed, his form a voithful, lovely Agnes!

She heard herself arraigned with trembling limbs and downeast looks, and many witnesses had appeared against her before she ventured to lift her eyes up to her awful judge, she then gave one fearful glance, and discovered William, unpitying but beloved William, in every feature? It was a face she had been used to look on with delight, and a kind of absent smile of gladness now beamed on her poor van visage.

When every witness on the part of the protecutor had been examined, the judge addressed himself to her 'What defence have you to make?' It was William spoke to Agnes! The sound was sweet, the voice was mild, has soft, compassionate, encouraging. It almost charmed her to a love of hife! Not such a voice as when William last addressed her, when he left her undone and pregnant, voving never to see or speak to her more. She would have hung upon the present word for ever She did not call to mind that this gentleness was the effect of practice, the art of his occupation, which at times is but a copy, by the un feeling, of the benevolent brothren of the bench present judge, tenderness was not designed for consola tion of the culprit, but for the approbation of the auditors

There were no spectators, Ignes, by your side when last he parted from vou—if there had, the awful William would have been awed to marks of pity

Stunned with the enchantment of that well I nown tongue directed to her, she stood like one just petrified—all vital por er seemed suspended. Again he put the question, and with these additional sentences, tenderly and emphatically delivered. 'Recollect yourself, have you no vitnesses? no proof on your behalf?' A dead silence followed these questions. He then mildly but forcibly added. 'What have you to say?' Here a flood of tears burst from her eyes, which she fixed earnestly upon him, as if pleading for mercy, while she faintly articulated. 'Nothing, my lord.' After a short pause, he asked her, in the same forcible but benevolent tone.

'Have you no one to speak to your character?' The prisoner answered 'No' A second gush of tears followed this reply, for she called to mind by whom her character had first been blasted

He summed up the evidence, and every time he was obliged to press hard upon the proofs against her, she shruhl, and seemed to stagger with the deadly blowwrithed under the weight of his minute justice, more than from the prospect of a shameful death The jury consulted but a few minutes, the verdict was, 'Guilty' She heard it with composure But when William placed the fatal velvet on his head, and rose to pronounce the fatal sentence, she started with a kind of convulsive motion, retreated a step or two back, and lifting up her hands, with a scream exclaimed 'Oh, not from you!' The piercing shriek which accompanied these words prevented their being heard by part of the audience, and those who heard them thought little of their mean ing, more than that they expressed her fear of dying Serene and dignified, as if no such evelamation had been uttered, William delivered the final speech ending with 'Dead, dead, dead ' She fainted as he closed the period, and was carried back to prison in a swoon, while he adjourned the court to go to dinner

If, unaffected by the scene he had witnessed, Wilham sat down to dinner with an appetite, let not the reader conceive that the most distant suspicion had struck his mind of his ever having seen, much less familiarly known, the poor offender whom he had just condemned ball, this forgetfulnes did not proceed from the want of memory for Agnes. In every peevish or heavy hour passed with his wife, he was sure to think of her, vet it was self love, rather than love of her, that gave use to these thoughts. He felt the lack of female sympathy and tenderness to soften the fatigue of studious labour, to soothe a sullen, a morose disposition—he felt he vanted counfort for himself, but never once considered what were the wants of Agnes

In the chagrin of a barren bed, he sometimes thought, too even on the child that Agnes bore him, but whether it were male or female, whether a beggar in the streets or dead, various and important public occupation forbade him to inquire. Yet the poor, the widow, and the orphian frequently shared William's ostentatious bounty. He was the president of many excellent charities, gave largely, and sometimes instituted benevolent societies for the unhappy, for he delighted to load the poor with obligation, and the rich with praise

There are persons like him who love to do everything good but that which their immediate duty requires There are servants that will serve every one more cheer fully than their minsters, there are men who will distri bute money liberally to all except their creditors, and there are wives the will love all mankind better than their own husbands Duty is a familiar word which has little effect upon an ordinary mind, and as ordinary minds make a vast majority, we have acts of generosity, self denial, and honesty where smaller pains would constitute greater virtues. Had William followed the common dietates of charity, had he adopted private pity instead of public munificence, had he east an eye at home before he sought abroad for objects of compassion, Agnes had been preserved from an ignominious death, and he had been preserved from-remorse, the tortures of which he for the first time proved on reading a printed sheet of paper, accidentally thrown in his way

7 few days after he had lest the town in which he had condemned her to die

' March 10, 179-

'The last dying Words, Speech, and Confession, birth, parentage, and education, life, character, and behaviour, of Agnes Primrose, who was executed this morning between the hours of ten and twelve, pursuant to the sentence passed upon her by the Honourable Justice Norwynne.

'Agnes Primrose was born of honest parents, in the village of Anfield, in the county of ——' [William started at the name of the village and county], 'but being led astray by the arts and flattery of seducing man, she fell from the paths of virtue, and took to bad company, which instilled into her young heart all their evil ways, and at length brought her to this untimely end. So she hopes her death will be a warning to all young persons of her own sex, how they listen to the praises and courtship of young men, especially of those who are their betters, for they only court to deceive But the said Agnes freely forgives all persons who have done her injury or given her sorrow, from the young man who first von her heart, to the jury who found her guilty, and the judge who condemned her to death

'And she acknowledges the justice of her sentence, not only in respect of her crime for which she suffers, but in regard to many other licinous sins of which she has been guilty, more especially that of once attempting to commit a murder upon her own licipless child, for which guilt she now considers the vengeance of God has overtaken her, to which she is patiently resigned, and departs in peace and charity with all the world, praying the Lord to have mercy on her parting soul?

IOSTSCRIPT TO THE CONFESSION

'So great was this unhappy woman's terror of death and the awful judgment that was to follow, that when sentence was pronounced upon her she fell into a swoon, from that into convulsions, from which she never entirely recovered, but was delirious to the time of her execution, except that short interval in which she made her confession to the clergyman who attended She has left one child, a youth almost sixteen, who has never forsaken his mother during all the time of her imprisonment, but waited on her with true filial duty, and no sooner was her final sentence passed than he began to droop, and now lies dangerously ill near the prison from which she is released by death During the loss of lier senses, the said Agnes Primrose raved continually of her child, and, asking for pen, ink, and paper, wrote an incoherent petition to the judge, recommending the youth to his protection and mercy, but notwithstanding this insanity, she behaved with composure and resignation when the fatal morning arrived in which slie was to be launched into eternity She prayed devoutly during the last hour, and scemed to have her whole mind fixed on the world to which she was going A crowd of spectators followed her to the fatal spot, most of whom returned weeping at the recol lection of the fervency with which she prayed, and the impression which her dreadful state seemed to make upon her'

No sooner had the name of 'Anfield' struck William than a thousand reflections and remembrances flushed on his mind to give him full conviction who it was he had judged and sentenced He recollected the sad remains of Agnes, such as he once had known her, and now he wondered how his thoughts could have been absent from an object so pitiable, so worthy of his attention, as not to give him even suspicion who she was, either from her name or from her person, during the whole trial. But wonder, astonishment, horror, and every other sensition was absorbed by—remorse. It wounded, it stabbed, it rent his hard heart as it would do a tender one it havocked on his firm inflex thle mind as it would on a weak and plant brain! Spirit of Agnes! look down, and behold all your wrongs revenged! William feels—remorse

Fanny Burney (Madame D'Arblay).

The author of Lvelina and Cecilia was the wonder and delight of the generation of novel readers after that of Fielding and Smollett. Frances Burney was the second daughter of Charles Burney, Mus Doc. (1726-1814), author of the History of Music, who seems to have been of Scottish origin, the grandson of James MacBurney, a land-steward in Shropshire, whose son dropped the Mac, and was ultimately a dancing master Fanny was born at Lynn Regis, 13th June 1752 Her father was then organist in Lynn, but in 1760 he returned to London, among his familiar friends and visitors were David Garrick, Sir Robert Strange the engraver, the poets Mason and Armstrong, and Barry the painter One is not surprised to learn that all Burney's children distinguished themselves the eldest, Rear-Admiral James Burney (1750-1821), accompanied Captain Cook in two of his voyages, and was author of a History of Voyages of Discovery and an Account of the Russian Lastern Voyages, the second, Dr Charles Burney (1757-1817), wrote critical works on the Greek classics, was a prebendary of Lincoln, and one of the king's chaplains, and Sarah, the youngest daughter, was also a novelist. Fanny was long held to be a sort of prodigy At eight she did not even know her letters, but was shrewd and observant, at fifteen she had written several stories, plays, and poems, and was a great reader, even a critic. Her authorship was continued in secret, her sister only being admitted to her confidence Thus she sketched out the plot of Evelina, but it was not published till January 1778, when 'little Fanny' was in her twenty-sixth When it was offered to Dodsley, the worthy publisher 'declined looking at any thing anony mous ' Another bookseller, named Lowndes, gave £20 for the manuscript, and Evelina, or a Young Lady's Entrance into the World, soon became the talk of Dr Burney, in the fullness of his heart, the town told Mrs Thrale that 'our Fanny' was the author, and Dr Johnson, whom Fanny had met first on 20th March 1777, protested to Mrs Thrale that there were passages in it which might do honour to Richardson Miss Burney was invited by the

Thrales to Streatham, and there she met the illustrious band of friends of whom we have ample notices in the Diary Wherever she went, to London, Brighton, Bath, or Tunbridge, Evelina was the theme of praise, and Miss Burney the happiest of authors. In 1782 appeared her Cecilia, or Memoirs of an Heiress, for whose first edition of two thousand copies she received £250 more highly finished—and laboured—than Evelina, but less rich in amusing characters and dialogue. In 1785 Miss Burney went on a visit to Mrs Delany, a venerable lady, the friend of Swift, once connected with the court, who now lived on a pension at Windsor, here she was introduced to the king and queen, and speedily became a favourite. The result was that in 1786 she was appointed second keeper of the robes to Queen Charlotte, with a salary of £200 a year, a footman, apartments in the palace, and a coach between her and her colleague. The post was but splendid 'I was averse to the union,' said Miss Burney, 'and I endeavoured to escape it, but my friends interfered—they prevailed—and the knot is tied.' The queen was a considerate mistress, but the etiquette and formality of the court, and the unremitting attention its irksome duties required, rendered the position peculiarly disagreeable to one who had been so long flattered and courted by the brilliant society of her day colleague, Mrs Schwellenberg, a coarse minded, jealous, disagreeable German favourite, was also a perpetual source of annovance, and poor Fanny at court was worse off than her heroine Cecilia was in choosing among her guardians. Her first official duty was to mix the queen's snuff, and keep her box always replenished, then she was admitted to the great business of the toilet, helping Her Majesty off and on with her dresses, and being in strict attendance from six or seven in the morning till twelve at night! At length in July 1791 she was permitted to retire with a pension of £100 a year, and in 1793 she married a French émigré, General D'Arblay, whom she had met when staying with a married sister near Dorking Resuming her pen, in 1795 she produced a tragedy, Edwin and Elgitha, which was brought out at Drury Lane, it had at least one novelty-there were three bishops among the dramatis persona Mrs Siddons played the heroine, but in the dying scene, where the lady is brought from behind a hedge to expire before the audience, and is afterwards carried once more to the back of the hedge, the house was convulsed with laughter Her next effort was her novel of Camilla (1796), which she published by subscription, and realised by it no less than three thousand guineas, out of the proceeds she built Camilla Cottage, Mickleham, near Dorking In 1802 Madame D'Arblay joined her husband in Paris Napoleon gave him a small civil appointment, and Madame D'Arblav lived at Passy till, in 1812, she returned with their son to England Her success in prose fiction urged her to another trial, and in 1814 she produced The Wanderer, or Female Difficulties, a tedious tale in five volumes, which had no other merit than that of also bringing the authoress the large sum of £3000. The only other literary labour of Madame D'Arblay was a stilted Memoir of her father, Dr Burney, published in 1832. Her husband and her son—the Rev Adexander D'Arblay of Camden Town Chapel—both predeceased her, the former in 1818, and the latter in 1837. Three years after her bereavement, Madame D'Arblay herself died at Bath, 6th January 1840, at the great age of eighty-seven. Her Diary and Letters, edited by her niece, was published in 1842-46 in seven volumes It might with great advantage have been judiciously condensed, with its clever sketches of society and court manners, and its anecdotes of Johnson, Burke, Reynolds, and the rest, it is in any case exceptionally entertaining and valuable, but at least half of it is filled with unimportant details and private gossip, and the self admiring weakness of the authoress shines out in almost every page Miss Burney's early novels have left the most pleasing memorials of her name and history them we see her quick in discernment, lively in invention, and in her own way inimitable at portraying the humours and oddities of English Her good sense and correct feeling are more noticeable than her passion scenes are prostic enough, but in 'shewing up' a party of 'vulgarly genteel' persons, painting the characters in a drawing-room, or catching the follies and absurdities that float on the surface of fashionable society, she has rirely been equalled She deals with the palpable and familiar, and though society has changed since the time of Evelina, and the glory of Ranelagh and Marylebone Gardens has departed, there is enough of life in her personages and point in her lessons to interest, amuse, and instruct—her sarcasm, drollery, and rich humour must always be relished. The first extract is from Evelina, the others are all from the Diary

A Game of Highway Robbery

When we had been out near two hours, and expected every moment to stop at the place of our destination, I observed that Lady Howard's servant, who attended us on horseback, rode on forward till he was out of sight, and soon after returning, came up to the chariot window, and delivering a note to Madame Duval, said he had met a boy who was just coming with it to Howard Grove, from the clerk of Mr Tyrell

While she was reading it, he rode round to the other window, and making a sign for secreey, put into my hand a ship of paper, on which was written, 'Whatever happens, be not alarmed, for you are safe, though you endanger all mankind!'

I really imagined that Sir Clement must be the author of this note, which prepared ine to expect some disagree able adventure—but I had no time to ponder upon it, for Madame Duval had no sooner read her own letter, than, in an angry tone of voice, she exclaimed 'Why, now, what a thing is this, here we're come all this way for nothing '

She then give me the note, which informed lier that she need not trouble herself to go to Mr Tvrell's, as the prisoner had had the address to escape. I congritulated her upon this fortunate incident, but she was so much concerned at having rode so far in vain that she seemed less pleased than provoked. However, she ordered the man to make what haste he could home, as she hoped at least to return before the captain should suspect what had passed.

The carriage turned about, and we journeyed so quietly for near an hour that I began to flatter myself we should be suffered to proceed to Howard Grove without further molestation, when, suddenly, the foot man called out 'John, are we going right'?'

'Why, I am't sure,' said the coachman, 'but I'm afrud we turned wrong'

'What do you mean by that, sirrah?' said Madame Duval 'Why, if you lose your way, we shall be all in the dark.'

'I think we should turn to the left,' said the foot man

'To the left!' answered the other pretty sure we should turn to the right'

'You had better make some inquiry,' said I

'Ma for,' cried Madame Duval, 'we're in a fine hole here, they neither of them know no more than the post. However, I'll tell my lady, as sure as you're born, so you'd better find the way'

'Let's try this road,' said the footman

'No,' said the coachman, 'that's the road to Canter bury, we had best go straight on'

'Why, that's the direct London road,' returned the footman, 'and will lead us twenty miles about'

'Pardie'' eried Madame Duval, 'why, they won't go one way nor t'other, and, now we're come all this jaunt for nothing, I suppose we shan't get home to night.'

'Let's go back to the public house,' said the footman, 'and ask for a guide'

'No, no,' said the other, 'if we stay here a few minutes, somebody or other will pass by, and the horses are almost knocked up already'

'Well, I protest,' cried Madame Duval, 'I'd give a guinea to see them sots horsewhipped. As sure as I'm ahve, they're drunk. I'en to one but they'll overturn us next'

After much debating, they at length agreed to go on till we came to some inn, or met with a passenger who could direct us. We soon arrived at a small farm house, and the footman alighted and went into it.

In a few minutes he returned, and told us we might proceed, for that he had procured a direction 'But,' added he, 'it seems there are some thieves hereabouts, and so the best way will be for you to leave your watches and purses with the fariner, whom I know very well, and who is an honest man, and a tenant of my lady's'

'Theves!' cried Madame Duval, looking agliast, 'the Lord help us! I've no doubt but we shall be all murdered!'

The farmer came to us, and we gave him all we were worth, and the servants followed our example. We then proceeded, and Madame Duval's anger so entirely subsided that, in the mildest manner imaginable, she entreated them to make liste, and promised to tell their lady how diligent and obliging they had been She perpetually stopped them to ask if they apprehended any danger, and was at length so much overpowered by her fears that she made the footman fasten his horse to the back of the carriage and then come and seat himself within if My endeavours to encourage her were fruitless, she sat in the middle, held the man by the arm, and protested that if he did but save her life, she would make his fortune. Her uneasiness gave me much concern, and it was with the utmost difficulty I forbore to acquaint her that she was imposed upon, but the mutual fear of the captum's resentment to me, and of her own to him, neither of which would have any moderation, deterred me. As to the footman, he was evidently in torture from restraining his laughter, and I observed that he was frequently obliged to make most horrid grimaces from pretended fear, in order to conceal his risibility

Very soon after, 'The robbers are coming!' cried the conchunan.

The footman opened the door, and jumped out of the chariot

Madame Duval gave a loud scream

I could no longer preserve my silence. 'For Heaven's sake, my dear madam,' said I, 'don't be alarmed, you are in no danger, you are quite safe, there is nothing but'——

Here the chariot was stopped by two men in masks, who at each side put in their hands, as if for our purses. Madame Duval sank to the bottom of the chariot, and implored their mercy. I shricked involuntarily, although prepared for the attack one of them held me fast, while the other tore poor Madame Duval out of the carriage, in spite of her cries, threats, and resistance.

I was really frightened, and trembled exceedingly

'My angel!' cried the man who held me, 'vou cannot surely be alarmed Do you not know me? I shall hold myself in eternal abhorrence if I have really terrified you?'

'Indeed, Sir Clement, von have,' cried I, 'but, for Heaven's sake, where is Madame Duval?—why is she forced away?'

'Slie is perfec'ly safe, the captain has her in charge, but suffer me now, my adored Miss Anville, to take the only opportunity that is allowed me to speak npon another, a much dearer, much sweeter subject.'

And then he hastily came into the chariot, and seated himself next to me. I would fain have disengaged myself from him, but he would not let me 'Deny me not, most charming of vomen,' cried he—'deny me not this only moment lent me to pour forth my sonl into your gentle ears, to tell you how much I suffer from your absence, how much I dread vour displeasure, and how cruelly I am affected by your coldness'

'Oh sir, this is no time for such language, pray, leave me, pray, go to the relief of Madame Duval, I cannot bear that she should be treated with such indignity'

'And will you—can you commind my absence? When may I speak to you, if not now?—does the captain suffer me to breathe a moment out of his sight?—and are not a thousand impertinent people for ever at your elbor?'

'Indeed, Sir Clement, you must change your style, or I will not hear you. The impertinent people you mean are among my best friends, and you would not, if you really wished me well, speak of them so disrespectfully'

'Wish you well! O Miss Anville, point but out to me how, in what manner, I may convince you of the fervour of my passion—tell me hut what services you will accept from me, and you shall find my life, my fortune, my whole soul at your devotion'

'I want nothing, sir, that you can offer I beg you not to talk to me so—so strangely Pray, leave me, and pray, assure yourself you cannot take any method so successless to shew any regard for me as entering into schemes so frightful to Madame Duval, and so disagreeable to myself'

'The scheme was the captain's, I even opposed it, though I own I could not refuse myself the so long wished for happiness of speaking to you once more without so many of—your friends to watch me. And I had flattered myself that the note I charged the footman to give you would have prevented the alarm you have received'

'Well, sir, yon have now, I hope, said enough, and if you will not go yourself to seek for Mudame Duval, at least suffer me to inquire what has become of her'

'And when may I speak to you again?'

'No matter when, I don't know, perhaps'---

'Perhaps what, my angel?'

'Perlians never, sir, if you torment me thus'

'Never' O Miss Anville, how criel, how piercing to my soul is that icy word' Indeed, I cannot endure such displeasure'

'Then, sir, you must not provoke it Pray, leave me directly'

'I will, madam, but let me at least make u merit of my obedience—allow me to hope that you will in future be less averse to trusting yourself for a few moments alone with me.'

I was surprised at the freedom of this request, but while I hesitated how to answer it, the other mask came up to the chariot door, and in a voice almost stifled with laughter, suid 'I've done for her! The old buck is safe, but we must sheer off directly, or we shall be all aground'

Sir Clement instantly left me, mounted his horse, and rode off. The captain, having given some directions to his servants, followed him

I was both uneasy and impatient to know the fute of Madame Daval, and immediately got out of the churiot to seek her I desired the footman to shew me which way she was gone, he pointed with his finger, by way of answer, and I saw that he dared not trust his voice to make any other I walked on at a very quiel pace, and soon, to my great consternation, perceived the poor lady seated upright in a ditch I flew to her, with unfeigned concern ut her situation She was sobbing. nay, almost roaring, and in the utmost agony of rage and terror. As soon as she saw me she redoubled her cries, but her voice was so broken, I could not under stand a word she said I was so much shocked that it was with difficulty I forbore exclaiming against the cruelty of the captain for thus wantonly ill treating her, and I could not forgive myself for having passively suffered the deception I used my utmost endeavours to comfort her, assuring her of our present safety, and begging her to rise and return to the chariot

Almost bursting with passion, she pointed to her feet, and with frightful violence she actually beat the ground with hier hands

I then saw that her feet were tied together with a strong rope, which was fastened to the upper branch of a tree, even with a hedge which ran along the ditch where she sat I endeavoured to until the knot, but soon found it was infinitely beyond my strength. I was therefore obliged to apply to the footman, but being very unwilling to add to his mirth by the sight of Madame Duval's situation, I desired him to lend me a knife. I returned with it, and cut the rope. Her feet were soon disentangled, and then, though with great difficulty, I assisted her to rise. But what was my astonishment, when, the moment she was up, she hit me a violent slap on the face! I retreated from her with precipitation and dread, and she then loaded me with reproaches, which, though almost unintelligible, con vinced me that she imagined I had voluntarily deserted her, but she seemed not to have the slightest suspicion that she had not been attucked by real robbers

I was so much surprised and confounded at the blow that for some time I suffered her to rave without maling any unswer, but her extreme agitation and real suffering soon dispelled my anger, which all turned into compassion. I then told her that I had been forcibly detained from following her, and assured her of my real sorrow at her ill usage.

She began to be somewhat appeased, and I ugain entreated her to return to the earringe, or give me leave to order that it should draw up to the place where we stood. She made no answer, till I told her that the longer we remained still, the greater would be the danger of her ride home. Struck with this hint, she suddenly, and with hasty steps, moved forward.

Her dress was in such disorder that I was quite sorry to have her figure exposed to the servants, who all of them, in imitation of their master, hold her in decision, however, the disgrace was unavoidable. The ditch, happily, was almost dry, or she must have suffered still more seriously, yet so forlorn, so miserable a figure I never before saw. Her head dress had fallen off, her linen was torn, her negligee had not a pin left in it, her pettieoats she was obliged to hold on, and her shoes were perpetually slipping off. She was covered with dirt, weeds, and filth, and her face was really horrible, for the pomatum and powder from her head, and the dust from the road, were quite pasted on her skin by her tears, which, with her rouge, made so frightful a mixture that she hardly looked human.

The servants were ready to die with laughter the moment they saw her, but not all my remonstrances could prevail on her to get into the carringe till she liad most vehemently reprotched them both for not rescuing The footman, fixing his eyes on the ground, as if fearful of again trusting himself to look at her, protested that the robbers avowed they would shoot him if he moved an inch, and that one of them had stayed to watch the chariot, while the other carried her off, adding that the reason of their behaving so barbarously was to revenge our living secured our purses withstanding her anger, she gave immediate credit to what he said, and really imagined that her want of money had irritated the pretended robbers to treat her with such erucliv I determined therefore to be care fully on my guard not to betray the imposition, which could now answer no other purpose than occasioning an irreparable breach between her and the captain.

Just as we were seated in the chariot, she discovered the loss which her head lind sustained, and called out 'My God' what is become of my hair? Why, the villain has stole all my curls'

She then ordered the man to run and sec if he could find any of them in the ditch. He went, and presently returning, produced a great quantity of hair in such a nasty condition that I was amazed she would take it, and the man, as he delivered it to her, found it impossible to leep his countenance, which she no sooner observed than all her stormy passions were again raised. She flung the battered curls in his face, saying 'Sirrali, what do you grin for? I wish you'd been served so yourself, and you wouldn't have found it no such joke, you are the impudentest fellow ever I see, and if I find you dare grin at me any more, I shall make no ceremony of boxing your cars'

Satisfied with the threat, the man hastily retired, and we drove on

Fanny tells George III. how she came to write 'Evelina'

The king went up to the table, and looked at a book of prints, from Claude Lorraine, which had been brought down for Miss Dewes, but Mrs Delany, by mistake, told him they were for me. He turned over a leaf or two, and then said

'Pray, does Miss Burney draw too?'
The too was pronounced very civilly

'I believe not, sir,' answered Mrs Delany, 'at least she does not tell'

'Oh,' cried he, laughing, 'that's nothing, she is not apt to tell, she never does tell, you know. Her father told me that himself. He told me the whole history of her Ezelina. And I shall never forget his face when he spoke of his feelings at first taking up the book, he looked quite frightened, just as if he was doing it that moment. I never can forget his face while I live?

Then coming up close to me, he said 'But what' what' how was it?'

"Sir" cried I, not well understanding him

'How came you-how happened it-what-what'

'I-I only wrote, sir, for my own amusement-only in some odd idle hours'

"But your publishing-your printing-hov was that?"

'That was only, sir-only because'-

I hesitated most abominably, not knowing how to tell him a long story, and growing terribly confused at these questions, besides, to say the truth, his own 'what' what' so reminded me of those vile Probationary Odes [by Wolcot] that, in the midst of all my flutter, I was really hardly able to keep my countenance.

The 'chat' was then repeated, with so earnest a look, that, forced to say something, I stammeringly answered 'I thought, sir, it would look very well in print'

I do really flatter my-clf this is the silliest speech I ever made. I am quite provoked with myself for it, but a fear of laughing made me eager to utter anything, and by no means conscious, till I had spoken, of what I was saving

He laughed very heartily himself—well he inight—and walked away to enjoy it, crying out 'Very fair indeed, that's being very fair and honest'

Then returning to me again, he said 'But your father —how came you not to shew him what you wrote?'

'I was too much ashamed of it, sir, seriously'

Literal truth that, I am surc 'And how did he find it out?'

'I don't know myself, sir He never would tell me. Lateral truth again, my dear father, as you can testify

'But how did you get it printed?'

'I sent it, sir, to a bookseller my father never em ployed, and that I never had seen miself, Mr Lowndes, in full hope that by that means he never would hear of it'

'But how could you manage that?'

'By means of a brother, sir'

'Oh, you confided in a brother, then?'

'Yes, sir-that is, for the publication'

'What entertainment you must have had from hearing people's conjectures before you were known! Do you remember any of them?'

'Yes, sir, many '

'And what?'

'I heard that Mr Buretti laid a wager it was written by a man, for no woman, he said, could have kept her own counsel'

This diverted him extremely

'But how was it,' he continued, 'you thought it most likely for your father to discover you?'

'Sometimes, sir, I have supposed I must have dropt some of the manuscripts, sometimes, that one of my sisters betrayed me'

'Oh, your sister? What ' not your brother?'

'No, sir, he could not, for '---

I was going on, but he laughed so much I could not be heard, exclaiming 'Vastly well' I see you are of Mr Baretti's mind, and think your brother could keep voir secret, and not your sister. Well, but,' cried he presently, 'how was it first known to you, you were betraved?'

By a letter, sir, from another sister I was very ill, and in the country, and she wrote me word that my father had taken up a review in which the book was mentioned, and had put his finger upon its name, and said "Coutrive to get that book for me."

'And when he got it,' cried the king, 'he told me he was afraid of looking at it, and never can I forget his face when he mentioned his first opening it. But you have not lept your pen unemployed all this time?'

'Indeed I have, sir'

'But why?'

'I-I believe I have exhausted myself, sir'

He laughed aloud at this, and went and told it to Mrs Delany, enally treating a plain fact as a mere bon mo'

Then returning to me again, he said more seriously 'But you have not determined against writing any more?'

' N-o, sır

'I on have made no vow-no real resolution of that sort?'

'No, sir'

'You only wait for inclination?'

How admirably Mr Cambridge's speech might have come in here

'No, sir'

A very civil little bow spoke him pleased with this answer, and he went again to the middle of the room, where he chiefly stood, and, addressing us in general, talked upon the different motives of writing, concluding with 'I believe there is no constraint to be put upon real genius, nothing but inclination can set it to work. Miss Burney, however, knows best' And then hastily returning to me, he cried 'What! what?'

'No, sir, I—I—believe not, certainly,' quoth I very awkwardly, for I seemed taking a violent compliment only as my due, but I knew not how to put him off as I would another person

Margaret Nicholson's Attempt on the Life of George III.

An attempt had just been mide [August 1786] upon the life of the king! I was almost petrified with horror at the intelligence. If this king is not safe—good, pious, beneficent as he is—if his life is in danger from his own subjects, what is to guard the throne? and which way is a monarch to be secure?

Mrs Goldsworthy had taken every possible precaution so to tell the matter to the Princess Elizabeth as least to alarm her, lest it might occasion a return of her spasms, but, fortunately, she cried so exceedingly that it was hoped the vent of her tears would save her from those terrible convulsions.

Madame La Fite had heard of the attempt only, not the particulars, but I was afterwards informed of them in the most interesting manner, namely, how they were related to the queen And as the newspapers will have told you all else, I shall only and briefly tell that

No information arrived here of the matter before His Majesty's return, at the usual hour in the afternoon, from the levee. The Spauish minister had hurried off instantly to Windsor, and was in waiting at Lady Charlotte Finch's, to be ready to assure Her Majesty of the king's safety, in case any report auticipated his return.

The queen had the two eldest princesses, the Duchess of Ancaster, and Lady Charlotte Bertie with her when the king came in. He hastened up to her, with a coun tenance of striking vivacity, and said 'Here I am '—safe and well, as you see—but I have very narrowly escaped being stabbed!' His own conscious safety, and the pleasure he felt in thus personally shewing it to the queen, made liim not aware of the effect of so abrupt a communication. The queen was seized with a consternation that at first almost stupefied her, and, after a most painful silence, the first words she could articulate were, in looking round at the duchess and Lady Charlotte, who had both hurst into tears, 'I envy you—I can't ery!' The two princesses were for a little while in the same state, but the tears of the duchess proved infectious, and they then wept even with violence.

The king, with the gayest good humour, did his utmost to comfort them, and then gave a relation of the affair, with a calminess and unconcern that, had any one hut himself been his hero, would have been regarded as totally unfeeling

You may have heard it wrong, I will concisely tell it right. His carriage had just stopped at the garden door at St James's, and he had just alighted from it, when a decently dressed woman, who had been waiting for him some time, approached him with a petition. It was rolled up, and had the usual superscription—'For the king's Most Excellent Majesty.' She presented it with her right hand, and, at the same moment that the king bent forward to take it, she drew from it, with her left hand, a knife, with which she aimed straight at his heart!

The fortunate awkwardness of taking the instrument with the left hand made her design perceived before it could be executed, the king started back, scarce believing the testimony of his own eyes, and the woman made a second thrust, which just touched his waisteoat hefore he had time to prevent her, and at that moment one of the attendants, seeing her horrible intent, wrenched the knife from her hand

'Has she cut my waisteoat?' eried he, in telling it 'Look' for I have had no time to examine.'

Thank Heaven, however, the poor wretch had not gone quite so far 'Though nothing,' added the king in giving his relation, 'could have been sooner done, for there was nothing for her to go through but a thin linen and fat'

While the guards and his own people now surrounded the king, the assassin was seized by the populace, who were tearing her away, no doubt to fall the instant sacrifice of her murtherous purpose, when the king, the only calm and moderate person then present, called aloud to the mob. 'The poor creature is mad.' Do not hurt her.' She has not hurt me.' He then came forward, and shewed himself to all the people, declaring he was perfectly safe and unhurt, and then gave positive orders that the woman should be taken care of, and went into the palace, and had his levee.

There is something in the whole of this behaviour upon this occasion that strikes me as proof indisputable of a true and noble courage for in a moment so extraordinary—an attack, in this country, unheard of before—to settle so instantly that it was the effect of insanity, to feel no apprehension of private plot or latent conspiracy—to stay out, fearlessly, among his people, and so benevolently to see himself to the safety of one who had raised her arm against his life—these little traits, all impulsive, and therefore to be trusted, have given me an impression of respect and reverence that I can never forget, and never think of but with fresh admiration chimnes! Do you remember, Miss Thrale, how, one day at dinner, you burst out a laughing because I said a très bon goose?

The Diary and Letters (7 vols. 1842-46) was twice reprinted in 1800-91 and was edited by Mrs Barrett vith preface and notes by Mr Austin Dobson in 6 vols. in 1905 See Mr Austin Dobson s monograph (Men of Letters 1903) Macaulay & famous Essay and the editions of Exclina and Cecilia (1893) by Brimley John on, selections from the Days, edited by Seeley 1889, Mrs Walford Twelve English Authoresses (1892).

Charlotte Smith (1749 – 1806), the elder daughter of Mr Nicholas Turner of Stoke House in Surrey, was early remarkable for a playful humour shown in conversation and in prose and verse composition. Having lost her mother at three, she was brought up carelessly though expensively by an aunt, and introduced into society at a very early age. After her father's second marriage, the aunt sought hurriedly to establish Charlotte in life, and in 1765 she was married to Benjamin Smith, son and partner of a rich West India merchant—the husband being twenty-Smith was careless one years, the wife fifteen and extravagant, and his father, dying in 1776, left a will so complicated that lawsuits and embarrassments were the portion of this illstarred pair for all their after lives. Smith was ultimately forced to sell the greater part of his property, after being for seven months in prison in 1782, when his wife shared his confinement. In 1788, after an unhappy union of twenty three years, Mrs Smith separated from her husband, and applied herself to her literary occupations with cheerful assiduity, supplying to her eight children She had already the duties of both parents published Llegiac Sonnets (1784), and translated Prévost's exquisite Manon Lescaut, and now in eight months she completed her novel Emineline, or The Orphan of the Castle, to which in 1790 succeeded Lthelinde, and in 1792 Celestina Having adopted the doctrines of the French Revolution, she embodied them in Desmond, a romance which arrayed against her many of her friends and readers But she regained the public favour by the Old Manor House (1793), the best Part of it was written at Eartham, of her novels the residence of Hayley, during Cowper's visit to that poetical retreat 'It was delightful,' says Hayley, 'to hear her read what she had just written, for she read, as she wrote, with simpli city and grace' Cowper was also astonished at the rapidity and excellence of her composition Mrs Smith, whose poetry is mostly pathetic in tone, continued her literary labours amidst private and family distress, and wrote a valuable little compendium for children, Conversations, in which she was aided by her sister, Mrs Catharine Ann Dorset, known for The Peacock 'at Home' (1807) and other poems

On the Departure of the Nightingale.

Sweet poet of the woods, a long adien!

Farewell, soft minstrel of the early year!

Ah! 'twill be long ere thou shalt sing anew,

And pour thy music on the night's dull car

Whether on spring thy wandering flights await,

Or whether silent in our groves you dwell,

The pensive Muse shall own thee for her mate,

And still protect the song she loves so well

With cautious step the love lorn youth shall glide

Through the lone brake that shades thy mossy nest,

And shepherd girls from eyes profune shall hide

The gentle bird who sings of pity best

For still thy voice shall soft affections move,

English Scenery

And still be dear to sorrow and to love!

Haunts of my youth! Scenes of fond day dreams, I behold ye yet! Where 'twas so pleasant by thy northern slopes, To climb the winding sheep path, aided oft By scattered thorns, whose spiny branches bore Small woolly tufts, spoils of the vigrant lamb, There seeking shelter from the noondry sun And pleasant, seated on the short soft turf, To look beneath upon the hollow way, While heavily upward moved the labouring wain, And stalking slowly by, the sturdy hind, To case his panting team, stopped with a stone The grating wheel.

Advancing higher still,
The prospect widens, and the village church
But little o'er the lowly roofs around
Rears its gray belfry and its simple vane,
Those lowly roofs of thatch are half concealed
By the rude arms of trees, lovely in spring,
When on each bough the rosy unctured bloom Sits thick, and promises autumnal plenty
For even those orchards round the Norman farms,
Which, as their owners marked the promised fruit,
Console them, for the vineyards of the south Surpass not these

Where woods of ash and beech, And partial copses fringe the green hill foot, The upland shepherd rears his modest home, There wanders by a little nameless stream That from the hill wells forth, bright now, and clear, Or after rain with chalky mixture gray, But still refreshing in its shallow course The cottage garden, most for use designed, 1 et not of beauty destitute The vine Mantles the little casement, yet the brier Drops frigrant dew among the July flowers, And pansies rayed, and freaked, and mottled pinks, Grow among balm and resemany and rue, There honey suckles flaunt, and roses blow Almost uncultured, some with dark green leaves Contrast their flowers of pure unsulfied white, Others like velvet robes of regal state Of richest crimson, while, in thorny moss Lushruned and cradled, the most lovely wear The hues of youthful beauty s glowing check With fond regret I recollect e en now part of the church, which perhaps prevents your distinguishing what I mean.'

The Englishman looked whither his friend pointed, and observed a confessional of oak, or some very dark wood, adjoining the wall, and remarked also that it was the same which the assassin had just entered. It consisted of three compartments covered with a black canopy. In the central division was the chair of the confessor, elevated by several steps above the pavement of the chirch, and on either hand was a small closet or box, with steps leading up to a grated partition, at which the penitent might lineel, and, concealed from observation, pour into the car of the confessor the consciousness of crimes that lay heavy on his heart

'You observe it?' said the Italian

'I do,' replied the Englishman, 'it is the same which the assassin has passed into, and I think it one of the most gloomy spots I ever beheld—the view of it is enough to strike a criminal with despair'

'We in Italy are not so apt to despair,' replied the Italian smilingly

'Well, but what of this confessional?' inquired the Englishman The assassin entered it.'

'He has no relation with what I am about to men tion,' said the Italian, 'but I wish you to mark the place, because some very extraordinary circumstances belong to it.'

'What are they?' said the Englishman

'It is now several years since the confession which is connected with them was made at that very confessional,' added the Italian, 'the view of it, and the sight of this assassin, with your surprise at the liberty which is allowed him, led me to a recollection of the story. When you return to the hotel, I will communicate it to you, if you have no pleasanter way of engaging your time'

'After I have taken another view of this solemn edifice,' replied the Englishman, 'and particularly of the confessional you have pointed to my notice'

While the Englishman glanced his eye over the high roofs and along the solemn perspectives of the Santa del Pianto, he perceived the figure of the assassin stealing from the confessional across the choir, and, shocked on again beholding him, he turned his eyes, and hastily quitted the chirch.

The friends then separated, and the Englishman, soon after returning to his hotel, received the volume. He read as follows

After such an opening, who would not go on with the story? Most of Mrs Radcliffe's novels abound in pictures and situations as striking and as well grouped as those of the scenic artist and the playwright. Her latter years were spent in retirement, and it was an attack of the asthma which had long afflicted her that at last proved fatal. A posthumous romance entitled Gaston de Blondeville, containing a memoir of her, was published under the editorial superintendence of Serjeant Talfourd, and her Poems were collected and published in 1834.

Mrs Radcliffe was one of the most popular novelists of her day. Sir Walter Scott himself felt the charm of her 'utopian scenes and manners,' and Crabbe Robinson the diarist preferred her stories to the Waverley Novels—a preference not easy to be understood by the present generation Her characters to us seem as unreal as the surroundings in which she places them, and one can as little believe in the actuality of Emily and Adeline as in the solidity of the pasteboard castles wherein they are immured by sinister barons whose moustachios are obviously corked. Her heroines are all young Englishwomen trained by Mrs Chapone, who, when they are carried off, tell their ravishers that they 'can no longer remain here with propriety,' and must 'ask by what right' they are detained Even the supernatural machinery which plays so great a part in her books is a mere arrangement of trap-doors and sliding panels, and she is most fatally punctilious in her explanations that there is really nothing after all in her diablerie Real passion and genuine pathos are as little evident in her pages as a sense of humour, but she shows a very respectable melodramatic skill style, though stilted, is more correct than that of most women novelists of the Victorian period, but her once admired descriptions have lost their It is noteworthy that she had never been in Italy when the Mysteries of Udolpho was written Udolpho has many non-Italian features, Gothic castles are not common in Italy, and the name itself has not the form of a normal Italian word The development of the art of fiction has inevitably antiquated her popularity, and, though Miss Christina Rossetti was a warm admirer, few readers nowadays can endure the weakness of her sentiment and the artificiality of her method But her work must always remain historically interesting, as marking an important stage in the evolution of the romantic novel Mr Andrew Lang has recently argued that in Mrs Radcliffe's Sicilian Romance are to be found the genus not only of Byron's Giaour and of Aorthanger Abber, but of Jane Eyre—surely an extraordinary progeny 'Northanger Abbey was begun on a parody of Mrs Radcliffe, and developed into a real novel of character So, too, Byron's gloomy, scowling adventurers, with their darkling past, are mere repetitions in rhyme of Mrs Radcliffe's Schedoni is so obvious that, in discussing Schedoni, Scott adds parallel passages from Byron's Giaour'

The Castle of Udolpho

Towards the close of the day, the road wound into a deep valley Mountains, whose shaggy steeps appeared to be inaccessible, almost surrounded it. To the east, a vista opened, and exhibited the Apennines in their darkest horrors, and the long perspective of retiring summits rising over each other, their ridges clothed with pines, exhibited a stronger image of grandcur than any that Emily had yet seen. The sun had just sunk below the top of the mountains she was descending whose long shadow stretched athwart the valley, but his sloping rays, shooting through an opening of the chiffs, touched with a yellow gleam the summits of the forest that hing upon the opposite steeps, and streamed in full splendour upon the towers and battlements of a eastle that spread its extensive ramparts along the hrow of a precipice above. The splendour of these illumined objects was heightened by the contrasted shade which involved the valley below.

'There,' said Montoni, speaking for the first time in several hours, '1- Udolpho'

Emili gazed with melancholy awe upon the castle, which she understood to be Montonis, for, though it was now lighted up by the setting sun, the Gothic greatness of its feature- and its mouldering walls of dark grev stone rendered it a gloomy and sublime As she gazed the light died away on its walls, leaving a meiancholy purple tint, which spread deeper and deeper as the thin vapour crept up the mountain, while the buttlements above were still tipped with splendour. From the e, 100, the rays soon faded and the whole editice was invested with the solemn duski Silent, lonely and sublime, it seemed ness of evening to stand the sovereign of the scene, and to frown defiance on all who dared to invide its solitary reign. the twilight deepened, its features became more awful in obscurity and Emily continued to gaze till its clustering towers were alone teen rising over the tops of the woods, beneath whose thick shade the carriages soon after began to ascend

The extent and darkness of these tall woods awakened terrific images in her mind and she almost expected to see banditti start up from under the trees. At length tne carriages emerged upon a heathy rock, and soon af er reached the castle gates, where the deep tone of the portal bell which was struck upon to give no ice of their arrival increased the fearful emotions that had assailed Emily While they waited till the servant within should come to open the gates, she anxiously surreved the edifice, but the gloom that overspread it allowed her to distinguish little more than a part of its outline, with the massy walls of the ramparts, and to know that it was vast, ancient, and dreary From the parts she ear, she judged of the heavy strength and extent of the whole. The rateway before her, leading into the courts, was of gigantic size, and was defended by two round towers, crowned by overhanging turrets emba tled, where, in lead of banners, now waved long grass and wild plants that had taken rook among the mouldering stones, and which seemed to sigh, as the breeze rolled past, over the desolution around them. The towers were united by a curtain, pierced and em battled also, below which appeared the pointed arch of a huge portcullis surmounting the gates, from these the walls of the ramparts extended to other towers, overlook ing the precipice, whose shattered online, appearing on a gleam that lingered in the west, told of the rivages ner lo Beyond these, all was lost in the obscurity of evening

An Italian Landscape.

These excursions sometimes led them to Puzzuoli, Bain, or the woody cliffs of Pausilippo, and as, on their return, they glided along the moonlit bay, the melodies of Italian a runs seemed to give enchantinent to the scenery of its shore. At this cool hour the voices of the vire-dressers were frequently heard in trio, as they reposed from the labour of the day on some pleasant promontory under the shade of poplars, or the brisk music of the dance from fishermen on the margin of the waves below. The boutinen rested on their cars, while their company listened to voices modulated by sensible v to finer eloquence than is in the power of art alone to display and at others, while they observed the airy natural grace which distinguishes the dance of the hishermen and peasants of Naples. Frequently, as ther glided round a promontory whose shaggy masses im pended far over the sea, such magic scenes of beau v unfolded adorned by these dancing groups on the bay beyond, as no pencil could do justice to The deep clear wa ers reflected every image of the landscape, the cliffs branching into wild forms, crowned with grove, whose rough foliage often spread down their steeps in picture-que luxuriance the ruined villa on some bold point peeping through the trees, peasants' cabins many ing on the precipices, and the duncing figures on the strand—all touched with the silvery tint and soli On the other hand, the sea, shadows of moonlight trembling with a long line of radiance, and sheving ir the clear distance the sails of vessels stealing in every direction along its surface, presented a prospect as granias the landscape was beautiful.

Two of Mrs Raddiffe's books the Remarce of the Form and the Iss eries of Ud 1424 were included in Mrs Barbauld's Library of British Novelists, and Ballantynes. There are critical estimates in Sir Waller Scott's Biographical Noveless of Emiliary Novelists, and Professor Raleigh's The English Novel (1894). # From The Highlander'

Where vonder ridgy mountains bound the scene, The narrow opening glens that intervene Still shelter, in some lowly nook obscure One poorer than the rest—where all are poor, Some widowed matron, hopeless of rehef, Who to her searct breast confines her gref, Dejected sighs the wintry night away. And lonely muses all the summer day

Her gallant sons, "ho, smit with honour's charms, Pursued the phantom Tame through wars alarms, Return no more, stretched on Hindostan's plain, Or sun! beneath the unfathomable main, In vain her eyes the watery vaste explore For heroes-fated to return no more ' Let others bless the morning's reddening beam, Foe to her peace-it breaks the illusive dream That, in their prime of manly bloom confessed, kes cred the long lo t warriors to her breast, And as they strove, a ith smiles of filial love, Their vidowed parent's anguish to remove, Through her small casement broke the intrusive day, And chased the pleasing images away ! #### Foyers in 1778

I lost a good conveyance for a letter, and that a letter to Lad. Isabella, by going on a grand party of pleasure on the Loch. There was the Governor and his new espoused love, who, by the bye, is very well considering, frant and cheerful, and so forth, and there were the two Miss Campbells of Duntroon, blithe bonnie lasses, and there was the noble Admiral of the lake, and his fair sister, and the Doctor, and another beau, whom you have not the honour to know. We went on board our galley, which is a fine little vessel, with a commodious and elegant cabin

The da was charming the scene around was in itself sublime and cheerful, enlivened by sunshine and the music of the birds, that answered each other loudly from the woody mountains on each side of the Loch. On leaving the fort, we fired our swivels and displayed our colours. On our arrival opposite Glenmonston, we repeated this ceremony, and sent out our boat for as many of the family as chose to come on board. The Laird himself, his beautiful daughter, and her admirer obeyed the summons they dined with us, and then we proceeded to the celebrated Fall of Fyers.

I had seen this wonder before, but never to such Strangers generally come from the high road, and look down upon it, but the true sublime and beautiful is to be attained b, going from the lake by Fyers House, as we did, to look up to it at the rivers mouth, and had to walk up near a mile, through picturesque openings, in a grove of weeping birch, so fresh with the spray of the fall that its odours exhale constantly We arrived at one of the most singular and romantic scenes the imagination can conceive. At the foot of the rock over which the river falls is a small circular bottom, in which rise, as it were, a little verdant hillock of a triangular form, which one might imagine an altar erected to the impetuous Naiad of this overwhelming stream, this rustic shrine, and the verdant sanetuary in v hich it stands, are adorned by the hand of nature with a rich profusion of beautiful flowers and luxuriant herbage No wonder, overhung as it is 1 ith gloomy woods and abrupt precipices, no rude blast visits this sacred solitude, while perpetual mists from the cataract that thunders above it keep it for ever fresh with dews moisture, and the 'showery prism' bends its splendid arch continually over the humid flowers that adorn its entrance. Now do not think me romancing, and I shall account to you in some measure for the formation and fertility of this charming little Delta. Know then, that the nymph of the Fyers, abundantly clamorous in summer, becomes in winter a most tre mendous furt, sweeping every thing before her with inconceivable violence. The little eminence which rises so oddly in 'nature's softest freshest lap,' was most probably at first a portion of rock forced down by the violence of the wintry torrent, and as the river covers this spot in floods, successive winters might bring down rich soil, which, arrested by the fragment above said, in process of time formed the altar I speak of Along with this rich sediment left by the subsiding waters, are cou veyed the seeds and roots of plants from all the varieties of soil which the torrent has ravaged hence 'flowers of all hues and without thorn the rose,' at least I could expect flowers worthy of Paradise in this luxuriant re While you stand in this enchanted vale, there is nothing but verdure, music, and tranquillity around you, but if you look to either side, abrupt rocks and unsupported trees growing from their clefts threaten to overwhelm you. Looking back, you see the river foaming through a narrow opening, and thundering and raging over broken crags almost above your heads, looking downwards, you see the same river, after having been collected in a deep basin at your feet, rolling rapidly over steep rocks, like steps of stairs, till at last it winds quietly through the sweet peaceful seene at Fyers House, and loses itself in Loch Ness Now to what purpose have I taken up my own time and yours with this techous description, which, after all, gives you no just idea of the place?

When we returned on board, our spirits, heing by this time exhausted with walking and wonder, and talking and thunder, and so forth, began to flag One lady, always delicate and nervous, was seized with a fit, a hysterical one, that frightened us all I cut her laces, suppressed her struggles, and supported her in my arms during the paroxysm, which lasted near two hours. What you must allow to be very generous in the company, not one of them seemed to envy my place, or made the smallest effort to supplint me in it. drank tea most sociably, however, landed our Glen moriston friends, and tried to proceed homeward, but adverse fate had determined we should sup there too, and so arrested us with a dead ealm four miles from Now midnight approached, and with it gloomy discontent and drowsy insipidity. Our chief took a fit of the fidgets, and legan to cry Poh, Poh, his lady took a fit of yawning, his little grandson took a fit of crying, which made his daughter take a fit of anger, the Doctor took a fit of snoring, even the good natured Admiral took a fit of fretting, because the sailors had taken a fit All of n sudden the Miss C's took a fit of drinking of singing, to the great annoyance of the unharmonious group, when I went to the deck, fell into a fit of meditation, and began to say, 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank 12 Indeed nothing could be more inspiring, now silvery calmness slumbered on the deep, the moonbeams quivered on the surfree of the water, and shed a mild radiance on the trees, the sky was unclouded, and the sound of the distant waterfull alone disturbed the universal stillness. But the general ill humour disturbed my rising rapture, for it was now two o'clock, and nobody cared for poetry or moonlight but myself Well, we saw the wind would not rise, and so we put out the boat, some growling, others vapid, and the rest half asleep The gentlemen, however, rowed us home, and left the galley to the drunken sailors

You may judge how gaily we arrived I fancy Solomon had just returned from a long party of pleasure on the sea of Tiberias, where one of his Mistresses had the hysterics, when he drew the pensive conclusion that 'all is vanity and veration of spirit' Adieu'

Mrs Amelia Opic (1769-1853) was born at Norwach, the only child of James Alderson, MD, a Radical and Unitarian, in 1798 she married the painter John Opie, RA. (1761-1807) While very young she had written songs and tragedies, but her first acknowledged work was the domestic and pathetic tale of The Father and Daughter (1801) To this story of ordinary life, which went through a dozen editions, she contrived to give deep interest by her genuine painting of nature and passion and her animated dialogue Mowbray, or the Mother and Daughter (1804), Simple Tales (1806), Temper, or Domestic Scenes (1812), Tales of Real Life (1813), New Tales (1818), Tales of the Heart (1820), Madeline (1822), all show the same characteristics—the portraiture of domestic life with the express aim of regulating the heart and affections, Godwin's political and social theories occasionally intrude Detraction Displayed was written to expose that 'most common of all vices, which is found in every class or rank in society, from the peer to the peasant, from the master to the valet, from the mistress to the maid, from the most learned to the most ignorant, from the man of genius to the meanest capacity' Mrs Opie's tales were soon thrown into the shade by the greater force of Miss Edgeworth, the fascination of Scott, and the more masculine temper of our modern literature. Like Henry Mackenzie, Mrs Opie was too uniformly pathetic and tender 'She has not succeeded,' said Jeffrey, 'in copying either the concentrated force of weighty and deliberate reason, or the severe and solemn dignity of majestic virtue. To make amends, however, she represents admirably everything that is amiable, generous, and gentle' And she possessed power of exciting and harrowing the feelings in no ordinary degree, some of her short tales are full of gloomy and terrific painting, alternately resembling those of Godwin and Mrs Radcliffe

After the death of her husband in 1807, Mrs Opic resided chiefly in her native city of Norwich, but often visited London, where her company was courted by literary and fashionable circles 1825 she was formally admitted into the Society of Friends or Quakers, whose services she had attended for eleven years, but her liveliness of character was in no whit thereby diminished, or the singular happiness of her old age clouded Miss Sedgwick, in her Letters from Abroad (1841), declared 'I owed Mrs Opie a grudge for having made me in my youth cry my eves out over her stories, but her fair, cheerful face forced me to forget it She long ago forswore the world and its vanities, and adopted the Quaker faith and costume, but I fancied that her elaborate simplicity, and the fashionable little train to her pretty satin gown, indicated how much easier it is to adopt a theory than to change one's habits' Miss Thackerry's Book of Sibyls gives a delightful picture of her An interesting volume of Methorials from her letters, diaries, and other manuscripts, by Miss Brightwell, was published in 1854. Mrs Opie's best-known poem, long included in schoolbook selections, is

The Orphan Boy's Tale
Stay, lady, stay, for mercy's sake,
And hear a helpless orphan's tale,
Ah' sure my looks must pity wake,
'Tis want that makes my cheek so pale.
Yet I was once a mother's pride,
And my brave father's hope and joy,
But in the Nile's proud fight he died,
And I am now an orphan boy

Poor foolish child ' how pleased was I
When news of Nelson's victory came,
Along the crowded streets to fly,
And see the lighted windows flame!
To force me home my mother sought,
She could not bear to see my joy,
For with my father's life 'twas bought,
And made me a poor orphan boy

The people's shouts were long and loud,
My mother, shuddering, closed her ears,
'Rejoice' rejoice' still cried the crowd,
My mother answered with her tears.
'Why are you crying thus,' said I,
'While others laugh and shout with joy?'
She Lissed me—and, with such a sigh'
She called ine her poor orphan boy

'What is an orphan boy?' I cried,
As in her face I looked, and smiled,
My mother through her tears replied
'You'll know too soon, ill fated child!'
And now they 've tolled my mothers knell,
And I'm no more a parent's joy,
O lady, I have learned too vell
What 'tis to be an orphan boy!'
Oh, were I by your bounty fed!—

Oh, were I by your bount; fed '—
Nav, gentle lady, do not chide—
Trust me, I mean to carn my bread,
The sailor's orphan boy has pride.
Lady, you weep '—ha '—this to me?
You'll give me clothing, food, employ!
Look down, dear parents' look, and see
Your happy, happy, orphan boy!

Mrs Hunter (1742-1821), the wife of the great physician John Hunter, was the daughter of Dr Home, an army surgeon, and Anne Home had become distinguished as a poetess years before her marriage. Her most famous song, My Mother bids me bind my Hair, was originally written to an air of Pleydell's, but owes its immortality largely to its having been set by Haydn to the tune everybody knows. Her other songs are mostly tender and natural, but hardly remarkable.

Song

The season comes when first we met,
But you return no more,
Why cannot I the days forget,
Which time can ne'er restore?
O days too sweet, too bright to last,
Are you indeed for ever past?
The fleeting shadows of delight,
In memory I trace,
In fancy stop their rapid flight,
And all the past replace
But, ah! I wake to endless woes
And tears the fading visions close!

Death song written for an Original Indian Air
The sun sets in night, and the stars shun the day,
But glory remains when their lights fade away
Begin, you tormentors, your threats are in vain,
For the son of Alknomook will never complain
Remember the arrows he shot from his bow,
Remember your chiefs by his hatchet laid low

Why so slow? Do you wait till I shrink from the pain? No, the son of Alknomook shall never complain Remember the wood where in ambush we lay, And the scalps which we bore from your nation away Now the flame rises fast, you exult in my pain,

But the son of Alknomook can never complain.

I go to the land where my father is gone,
His ghost shall rejoice in the fame of his son,
Death comes, like a friend, to relieve me from pain,

And thy son, O Alknomook, has seemed to complain The Lot of Thousands.

When hope lies dead within the heart,
By secret sorrow close concealed,
We shrink lest looks or words impart
What must not be revealed

Tis hard to smile when one would weep,
To speak when one would silent be,
To wake when one should wish to sleep,
And wake to agony

Yet such the lot by thousands cast Who wander in this world of care And bend beneath the bitter blast, To save them from despair

But nature waits her guests to greet,
Where disappointment cannot come,
And time guides with unerring feet
The weary wanderers home,

Mrs Tighe (1772-1810), born Mary Blachford, was the daughter of a Wicklow clergyman, and married (unhappily) her cousin, who sat for Kil-Lenny in the Irish Parliament. She was a beautiful and accomplished woman, whose society was greatly prized Of her poems, by far the most famous v as a version, in melodious Spenserian stanzas, of the tale of Cupid and Psyche from the Golden Ass Mackintosh said of the last three cantos that they were beyond all doubt the most faultless series of verses ever produced by a woman Moore complimented her in song Mrs Hemans wrote in her memory 'The Grave of a Poetess' and another elegy, and Keats seems to have been moved and even influenced by Psyche which by 1853 had passed through half a dozen editions Of less interest were her other poems, such as her moralisation on a lily, beginning-

From 'Psyche'

She rose, and all enchanted gazed
On the rare beauties of the pleasant scene Conspicuous far, a lofty palace blazed
Upon a sloping bank of softest green,
A fairer edifice was never seen,
The high ranged columns own no mortal hand,
But seem a temple meet for beauty s queen,
Like polished snow the marble pillars stand,
In grace attempered majesty, sublimely grand

Gently ascending from a silvery flood,
Above the palace rose the shaded hill,
The lofty eminence was crowned with wood,
And the rich lawns, adorned by nature's skill,
The passing breezes with their odours fill,
Here ever blooming groves of orange glow,
And here all flowers, which from their leaves distil
Ambrosial dew, in sweet succession blow,
And trees of matchless size a fragrant shade bestow

The sun looks glorious, 'mid a sky serene,
And linds bright lustre sparkle o'er the tide,
The clear blue ocean at a distance seen,
Bounds the gay landscape on the western side,
While closing round it with majestic pride,
The lofty rocks 'mid citron groves arise,
'Sure some divinity must here reside,'
As traneed in some bright vision, Psyche cries,
And scarce believes the bliss, or trusts her charméd eyes.

When lot a voice divinely sweet she hears, I rom unseen hips proceeds the heavenly sound 'Psyche, approach, dismiss thy timid fears, At length his bride thy longing spouse has found, And bids for thee immortal joys abound, For thee the palace rose at his command, I or thee his love a bridal banquet crowned, He bids attendant nymphs around thee stand, I'rompt every wish to serve—a fond obedient band'

Increasing wonder filled her ravished soul,

I or now the pompous portals opened wide,
There, prusing of, with timid foot she stole—[pride,
Through halls high doined, enriched with sculptured
While gay saloons appeared on either side,
In splendid vista opening to her sight,
And all with precious gems so beautified,
And furnished with such exquisite delight,
That scarce the beams of heaven emit such lustre bright

The amethyst was there of violet hue,
And there the topaz shed its golden ray,
The chrysoberyl, and the sapphire blue
As the elerr azure of a sunny day,
Or the mild eyes where amorous glances play,
The snow white jasper, and the opal's flaine,
The blushing ruby, and the agate gray,
And there the gern which hears his lucilless name Whose death, by Phæbus mourned, insured him deathle's frame

There the green emerald, there cornelians glow And rich carbuncles pour eternal light, With all that India and Peru can shew, Or Labrador can give so flaining bright To the charmed mariner's half dazzled sight The coral pived baths with diamonds blaze, And all that can the female heart delight Of fair attire, the last recess displays, And all that luxury can ask, here eye surveys

Now through the hall melodious music stole, And self prepared the splendid banquet stands, Self poured, the nectar sparkles in the bowl, The lute and viol, touched by unseen hands, Aid the soft voices of the choral bands, O'er the full board a brighter lustre beams. Than Persia's monarch at his feast commands. For sweet refreshment all inviting seems. To taste celestial food, and pure ambrosial streams.

But when meek eve hung out her dewy star,
And gently vailed with gradual hand the sky,
Lo! the bright folding doors retiring far,
Display to Psyche's captivated eye
All that voluptuous case could e'er supply
To soothe the spirits in screne repose
Beneath the velvet's purple canopy,
Divinely formed, a downy couch arose,
While alabaster lamps a milky light disclose

Once more she hears the hymeneal strain, Far other voices now attine the lay. The swelling sounds approach, a while remain, And then retiring, faint dissolved away. The expiring lamps emit a feebler ray, And soon in fragrant death extinguished lie. Then virgin terrors Pysche's soul dismay, When through the obscuring gloom she nought can spy, But softly rustling sounds declare some being nigh.

Oh, you for whom I virte ' whose hearts can melt, At the soft thirdling voice whose power you prove, You I now what charm, unutterably felt, Attends the inexpected voice of love Above the lyre, the lute's soft notes above, With si ect enchantment to the soul it steals, And bears it to I lysium's happy grove, You lest can tell the repture Psyche feels, When love's ambroard lip the voy's of Hymen seals.

"Its he, its my deliverer to deep imprest.

Upon my heart the e sound, I well recall,"

The blushing maid exclaime I and on his breast.

A tear of trembling cestacy let fall.

Put, ere the breezer of the morning call.

Aurora from her purple, himid bed,

Psyche in vain explores the vican hall,

Her tender lover from her arms is fled,

While sleep his downy vings had o'er her eyelids spread.

Helen Maria Williams (1762-1827), daugh ter of an officer, was brought up at Berwick, but in 1781 came to London with a versetale, Ed can and a Itrada, which attracted some notice and led to her producing a succession of poems (Ode to Peau, Peru, &c , collected 17%, In 1788 she went to stay with her sister the wifof Atlanaec Coquerel, Huguenot pastor in Pars, and became a fanatical supporter of re-obtton principles A friend of Madame Roland, slie was imprisoned by Robespierre, and was all but made a Grondist martir I rom 1794 till 1796 she was understood to be living under the protection of a Mr Stone, by whose side at Pere-Lachaise she was buried, and was said to have at one time lived with that same Inday who did not project Mars Wollstonecraft. Yet she remained a devout Christian and wrote admirable homins, though by Royalists in Lance and Tones in England, like the Anti Jacobin set she was treated as a dis-Her long series of letters, reputable person narratues, sketches, and tours dealing with the state of I rance (1790-1815) are transparently sin cere, but utterly and ignorantly one sided, worth reading 'not as history but as a phase of opinion,' according to Professor Laughton, who pronounces her account of affairs at Naples in Nelson's time to be 'distinctly false in every detail'. She translated Humbolde's Personal Narratics of Tra- Is (1814), and spent most of her last years at Amsterdam with her nephew, the fainous rationalist preacher, A L C Coquerel The best-known of her hymns are 'My God all Nature owns The sway,' and 'While Thee I seek, protecting Power' On her Percuron, or the Bellows-mender, Lord Lytton's Lady of Lyons was based - Her friend time Plumptre (1760-1818), daughter of the President of Queen's College, Cambridge, was also an enthusinstic revolutionist. She took a conspicuous part in naturalising German literature in England, by translating from Kotzebue, Musaus, &c, and by her own Letters from Germany She wrote two or three novels and narratives of a sojourn in France and in Ireland

William Cowper,

the most popular poet of his generation, and the best of English letter-writers,' as Southey called him, belonged to the English aristocracy, his father was the son of one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, and a younger brother of the first Earl Cowper, Lord Chancellor The name is the same as Cooper, and by the family is so pronounced. Cowper's mother, Anne Donne, was also well born, and through her he claimed the famous Dean of St Paul's as an ancestor -father, a chaplain to George II, was rector of Great Berkhampstead in Hertfordshire, and there the poet was born, 26th (15th OS) November In his sixth year he lost his mother—whom he tenderly and affectionately remembered his life long-and was sent to a boarding-school There the tyranny of a schoolfellow terrorised the timid and home sick boy, and led after two years to his removal At Westminster, where Vincent Bourne, the Latin poet, was one of his masters, he had Churchill and Warren Hastings as schoolfellows, and, as he says, served a seven years' apprenticeship to the classics. At eighteen he was articled to an attorney, having the future Lord Chancellor Thurlow as fellow-clerk, and in 1754 was called to the Bar He never made law a study in the solicitor's office he and Thurlow were 'constantly employed from morning to night in giggling and making giggle,' in his chambers in the Temple he wrote lively verses, and idled with Bonnell Thornton, Colman, Lloyd, and other wits He contributed a few papers to the Connoisseur and to the St James's Chronicle, both conducted by his friends, and in 1759 vas appointed to a small sinecure as Commissioner of Bankrupts (worth  $f_{0}$ 60 a year) Darker days were at hand. When he was in his thirty second year, almost 'unprovided with an aim,' his kinsman, Major Cowper, presented him to the office of Clerk of the Journals to the House of Lords, a desirable and lucrative appointment. Cowper accepted it, but the labour of studying the forms of procedure, and the dread of having to stand an examination (though often a mere form) at the bar of the House of Lords, plunged him into the deepest The seeds of insanity were then in his frame, and after brooding over imaginary terrors till reason and self-control had fled, he made several attempts to commit suicide. The appointment was given up, and Cowper was removed to the quaintly named 'Collegium Insanorum' at St Albans, kept by Dr Cotton (see page 532) cloud of horror (from the conviction that he was eternally damned) gradually passed away, and on his recovery a few months later he resolved to withdraw entirely from the society and business of the world, and conscientiously resigned even his Commissionership He had still a small fund left, and his family and friends subscribed a further sum to enable him to live frugally in retirement.

He retired to Huntingdon in order to be near Cambridge, where his brother was a Fellow, and there formed an intimacy with the family of the Rev Morley Unwin. He was adopted as one of the family, became almost wholly devoted to spiritual interests, and when in 1767 Mr Unwin died, of a fall from his horse, he continued to live in the house of the widow, engaged mainly in religious exercises, reading, and correspondence. Mary Unwin's name will ever be associated with Cowper's. Death only could sever a tie so strongly knit—cemented by mutual faith and friendship, and by sorrows of which the world knew nothing.

After the death of Mr Unwin the family were advised by the Rev John Newton to fix their abode at Olney, in northern Buckinghamshire, where Mr Newton was curate, and Cowper removed with them to a spot for ever consecrated by his genius He had still the river Ouse with him, as at Huntingdon, but the scenery was more varied and attractive, with many delightfully retired walks. His life was that of a religious recluse, he corresponded less regularly with his friends, and associated only with Mrs Unwin and the evangelical curate who strove-not always judiciously, it may be-to cheer the gentle invalid, engaged his help in writing the famous 'Olney Hymns,' Cowper's share including sixty seven. Cowper further aided Newton in parochial work, visiting the sick, and taking part in meetings, but his morbid melancholy grined ground, and in 1773 became once more decided When after about two years in this unhappy state Cowper began to recover, he took to gardening, rearing hares, sketching landscapes, and composing poetry Poetry was fortunately his chief enjoyment, and its fruits appeared in a volume of poems published in 1782-poems on abstract subjects, the dialogue called Table Talk being added to enliven the tone. The sale was slow, but his friends were enger in praise of the book, which received the approbation of Johnson and Franklin His correspondence had been resumed, and cheerfulness revived at Olney, whence Newton had now removed to a London rectory This happy change was greatly promoted by the presence of Lady Austen, a widow who came to live near Olney, and by her conversation for a time charmed away the melancholy spirit. She told Cowper the story of John Gilpin, and 'the famous horseman and his feats were an inexhaustible source of merriment.' She it was also who prevailed upon the poet to try his powers in blank verse, and from her suggestion sprang the noble poem of The Task This memorable friendship was at length disturbed, perhaps a shade of jealousy on the part of Mrs Unwin (to whom for a time he had been formally engaged, his mental condition alone having stood in the way of marriage) intervened, and before the Task was finished, its fair inspirer had finally (1783) left Olney In 1785 the new volume was published Its success was instant and decided, and it left its mark on the literary taste of the time Eighteenth century readers were glad to hear the frunk and spontaneous voice of poetry and of nature, and in the rural descriptions and fireside scenes of the Task they saw English scenery and domestic life faithfully and tenderly delineated 'The Task,' said Southey, 'was at once descriptive, moral, and saturical The descriptive parts everywhere bore evidence of a thoughtful mind and a gentle spirit, as well as of an observant eye, and the moral sentiment which pervaded them gave a charm in which descriptive is often poetry found wanting The best didactic poems, when compared with the Task, are like formal gardens in comparison with " oodland scenery ' The blank verse has nothing of Milton's grandeur, indeed, but possesses a sweetness and serious power of itsown-though Couper's rhymed couplets are neater and more masterly than his blank verse_ He next undertook a translation of Homer, having, after critical study in the Temple, formed a poor opinion of Pope's translation Setting himself to a daily task of forty lines, he at length accomplished the forty thousand verses, and published by subscription, his friends being generously active in supporting the work, which appeared in 1791 in two volumes The modest translator's confident expectation that he had for ever superseded Pope has not been fulfilled, baldness has proved a worse fault than ornament. Meanwhile the now successful author and Mrs Unwin had removed to Weston Underwood, a beautiful village about a nule from Olney His fascinating cousin, Lady Hesketli, had cheered him and encouraged him in the Homeric labour, he had also formed a friendly intimacy with the Catholic family of the Throckmortons, to whom Weston belonged, and his circumstances were comparatively easy. Yet his malady returned upon him in 1787, and Mrs Unwin being rendered helpless by paralytic attacks in 1791 and 1794, the task of nursing her fell upon the sensitive and dejected poet. He had translated poems from the French of Madame de Guyon, from the Greek poets, from Milton's Latin and Italian verse, and from Vincent Bourne's Latin, and now a careful revision of his Homer and an engagement to edit a new edition of Milton were his last literary undertakings. The Homer he did revise, but without improving the first edition, the second task was never finished. A deepening gloom settled on hıs mind, with occasional bright intervals A visit to his friend Hay ley, at Eartham, gave him a lucid interval, and in 1794 a pension of £300 was granted to him from the Crown He was induced, in 1795, to remove with Mrs Unwin to East Dereham in Norfolk, and there Mrs Unwin died in December 1796. Cowper heard of his friend's death, it was said, 'not without emotion' He lingered on for more than three years, still under the same dark shadow of relidespondgious ency and terror, but occasionally writing, and listening attentively to works read to him by his friends His last poem was The Castaway, in touching and beautiful verse, which showed no decay of poetical power, and death came to his release on the 25th of April 1800

So sad and strange a destiny has seldom befallen a man of genius. With wit and humour at will, he was nearly all his life weighed down by the deepest melancholy. Innocent, pious, and confiding, he lived in perpetual dread of everlasting punishment he saw between him and heaven a high wall he could not scale, yet his intellectual vigour was not subdued by affliction. What he wrote for amusement or relief in the midst of 'supreme distress' shows no sign of mental disturbance, and in the very winter of his days, his fincy was often as fresh and blooming as in the spring and morning of existence. That he was constitutionally prone to melancholy and insanity is undoubted, but the predisposing causes were probably aggravated by his strict and secluded His life was strangely isolated, and his position in the history of English literature is in many ways unique. He was in the eighteenth century, but not of it. He manifestly stands at the parting of the ways, and did not fully embody, though he heralded, the new spirit. He was neither Burns nor Byron nor Wordsworth, but had something of all of them. He was too much of a recluse, too little audacious or profound, to head a revolution or found a school of thought Not very deeply impressed with the in poetry importance of his art or the value of his poetic message, he looked on poetry mainly as a means of enforcing morals and rendering religion attractive, his specific puritanism limited for him the world of life and joy and legitimate enterprise, with the eighteenth century he is accordingly eminently diductic in purpose, though the sweet spontaneity and simplicity of much of his work are his most conspicuous characteristics. The naturalness and transparent sincerity of his letters are hardly more remarkable than their easy grace and brightness of expression. Cowper was fifty years of age ere he became a poet the found little pleasure then in reading poetry, English or other, though his mind was stored with fresh memories of youthful studies, he depended greatly on casual suggestions from others, which he accepted as his themes mainly in the hope of relieving his own melancholy, and when he sought to entertain others by his verse, it was with the hope of clevating and instructing, not in order to produce an artistic creation, secure fame, or establish an asthetic renaissance. Yet everywhere in his poetry we see a spirit at work wonderfully different from that of his predecessors-from Pope or Johnson, from Goldsmith or Thomson a true and genial joy in nature and natural objects (for no two poets seem to love nature and its aspects quite in the same way), a tender and kindly interest in the simple domestic affections, a sense of the brotherhood of man, a horror of cruelty or vice, a devout and warm religious heart. He does not expressly proclaim a revolt against the conventions of the artificial, critical, classical school, but good naturedly takes his own independent way when he is didactic he is not logically argumenta tive so much as friendly and communicative, the ideas come, as it were, of their own accord, and the clear simple English, the natural words and phrases, are manifestly his own and inevitable, as little designed to overthrow one school of poetic diction as to found another. He is not one of the greatest but one of the truest poets, his influence vas deep and effective and for those who can taste it there is a perennial charm in his poetra

It is scarcely to be wondered at that Cowpers first volume was somewhat coldly received. The subjects (Talle Talk, The Progress of Error, Truth, Expositulation, Hope, Charity, and the like) did not promise much, and his manner of handling them was not calculated to conciliate the man about town. He was both too plain and too spiritual for general readers Johnson had written moral poems in the same form of verse, but they possessed a rhetorical grandeur and wealth of illustration which Cowper did not attempt, and probably would on principle have rejected. Yet there are in these simple, subdued, unobtrusive works passages of masterly execution and lively Selkirl's 'I am monarch of all I survey and Boadicea are among the most frequently quoted The character of Chatham in Table Talk -where the interlocutors are the impersonal 'in dividuals' A and B-is somewhat on the lines of Pope or Dryden

1 Patriots, alas! the few that have been found, Where most they flourish, upon English ground, The country's need have scantily supplied, And the last left the scene when Chatham died

B Not so, the virtue still adorns our age, Though the chief actor died upon the stage. In him Demosthenes was heard again, Liberty taught him her Athenian strain, She clothed him with authority and awe. Spoke from his lips, and in his looks gave law. His speech, his form, his action full of grace, And all his country beaming in his free, He stood as some inimitable hand. Would strive to make a Paul or Fully stand. No sycophant or slave that dared oppose. Her sacred cause, but trembled when he rose, And every venal stickler for the yole, Left himself crushed at the first word he spoke.

This is from the same poem

Conversation, in this volume, is rich in Addisonian humour and quiet satire, and formed no unworthy prelude to the Tisk. In Hope and Retirement we see traces of the descriptive powers and kindly pleasantry afterwards more fully developed. A very characteristic passage is the sletch of the Greenland missionaries, from Hope

In this pleasing (rather than powerful) blending in plain-sailing verse of argument and piety, poetry and sound sense, we have distinctive traits of Cowper's genius Practice in composition and Lady Austen's influence were obvious gains to him, and when he entered upon the fast, he was far more disposed to look at the sunny side of things, and to attempt more detailed and picturesque description His versification underwent a like iniprovement His former poems were often rugged in style and expression, and were made so on purpose to avoid the polished uniformity of Pope and his imitators He was now sensible that he had erred on the opposite side, and accordingly the Task was made to unite strength and freedom with elegance and harmony Few poets have introduced so much idiomatic expression into a grave poem of blank verse, but the higher passages are all carefully finished, and rise or fall, according to the nature of the subject, with grace and melody of their own, in contrast to Thomson, whose pompous march is never relaxed, however trivial be the theme. The variety of the Task in style and manner, no less than in subject, is one of its greatest charms. The mock-heroic opening illustrates his humour, and from this he glides naturally into description and reflection The scenery of the Ouse, described with the detail of painting, leads up to higher themes

Nor rural sights alone, but rural sounds, Exhibarate the spirit, and restore The tone of languid nature. Mighty winds That sweep the skirt of some far spreading wood

Of ancient growth, make music not unlike The dash of ocean on his winding shore, And full the spirit while they fill the mind, Unnumbered branches waving in the blast And all their leaves fist fluttering all at once. Nor less composure whits upon the roar Of distant floods, or on the softer voice Of neighbouring fountain, or of rills that slip Through the cleft rock, and elaming as they fall Upon loo e pebbles, lose themselves at length In matted grass, that with a livelier green Betrays the secret of their silent cour e Nature inanimate employs sweet sounds, But animited nature sweeter still, To soothe and satisfy the human ear I en thousand warbiers cheer the day, and one The livelong night nor these alone whose notes Nice fingered art must emulate in vun, But enving rooks, and I ites that swim sublime In still repeated circles, screaming load, The jay, the pie, and even the boding oul That hails the rising moon, have charms for me. Sounds inharmonious in themselves and harsh, Let hear I in scenes where peace for ever reigns, And only there, please highly for their sake

The earth vas made so various, that the mind Of desultors man, studious of change And pleased with novelty, might be included Prospects, however lovely, may be seen Till half their beauties fade, the weary sight, Too well requrinted with their smiles slides of Institutions, seeking less familiar scene-Then snug enclosures in the sheltered vale, Where frequent hedges intercept the eye, Delight u, happy to renounce a while Not senseless of its cliarms, what still we love, That such short absence may endear it more Then forests, or the savage rock may please That hides the sea men in his hollow elefts Move the reach of man his hoary head Conspicuous many a league, the manner Bound homeward, and in hope already there, It his waist Greets with three cheers exulting A girdle of half withered shrubs he shew, And at his feet the baffled billows die. The common overgrown with fern, and rough With prickly gorse, that, shapeless and deform, And dangerous to the touch, has yet its bloom, And decks itself with ornaments of gold, Yields no unpleasing ramble, there the turf Smells fresh, and rich in odoriferous herbs And fungous fruits of earth, regules the sense With luxury of unexpected sweets

From the beginning to the end of the Task we never lose sight of the author. His old boxish love of country rambles, his walks with Mrs Unwin, when he had exchanged the Thames for the Ouse, and had 'grown sober in the vale of verrs,' his playful sature and tender admonition, his denunciation of slavery, his noble patriotism, his devotional earnestness and sublimity, his tenderness to animals, his affection for his pets, his warm sympathy with his fellow-men, and his exquisite paintings of doniestic peace and happiness are all so much self portraiture, drawn with the ripe skill of a master and the modesty and good The very rapidity of his transitaste of the man tions, where things light and sportive are ranged alongside the most solemn truths, is characteristic of his mind and temperament in ordinary life The inimitable case and colloquial freedom which tend such a charm to his letters are never long He never concealed his absent from his poetry strongly Calvinistic tenets, yet they are not much obtruded in his great work, his piety is of the kind which wins sympathy, and if his temperament (he was 'a stricken deer that left the herd') tinged the prospect of life with too deep a shade, it also imparted a more inipressive weight to his solemn appeals Of his lighter things, John Gilpin is universally recognised as a masterpiece, and The Dog and the Water Lily is in another Most of his hymns are inmanner exquisite. trospective, plaintive rather than joyous or confident, 'There is a fountain filled with blood,' 'Jesus, where'er Thy people meet,' 'The Spirit breathes upon the word,' and 'The Lord will happiness divine On contrite hearts bestow? are all in various ways representative, even 'Sometimes a light surprises,' 'Hark, my soul, it is the Lord,' and 'God moves in a mysterious way are not without a touch of sadness, and 'O for a closer walk with God' is largely humiliation and prayer

And give us in recitals of disease
A doctor's trouble, but without the fees,
Relate how many weeks they kept their bed,
How an emetic or cathartic sped,
Nothing is slightly tonched, much less forgot,
No.e, ears, and eyes seem present on the spot.
Now the distemper, spite of dranght or pill,
Victorious seemed, and now the doctor's skill,
And now—alas for unforeseen mishaps'
They put on a damp night cap, and relapse,
They thought they must have died, they were so bad,
Their peevish hearers almost wish they had

Some fretful tempers wince at every touch, I on always do too little or too much You speak with life, in hopes to entertain-I our elevated voice goes through the brain, You fall at once into a lower key-That's worse-the drone pipe of an humble bee. The southern sash admits too strong a light, You rise and drop the curtain-now 'tis night. He sliakes with cold-you stir the fire, and strive To make a blaze-that's roasting him alive. Serve him with venison, and he chooses fish . With sole-that's just the sort he would not wish. He takes what he at first professed to loathe And in due time feeds heartily on both, I et still o'erclouded with a constant frown, Hc does not swallow, but he gulps it down Your hope to please him vain on every plan, Himself should work that wonder, if he can. Alas! his efforts double his distress He likes yours little, and his own still less Thus always teasing others, always teased, His only pleasure is to be displeased

I pity bashful men, who feel the pain Of fancied scorn and undeserved disdain, And bear the marks upon a blushing face Of needless shame and self imposed disgrace Our sensibilities are so acute, The fear of being silent males us mute. We sometimes think we could a speech produce Much to the purpose, if our tongues were loose, But being tied, it dies upon the lip, Faint as a chicken's note that has the pip, Our wasted oil unprofitably burns, Like hidden lamps in old sepulchral urns

On receiving his Mother's Picture

Oh that those lips had language! Life has passed With me but roughly since I heard thee last Those lips are thine—thy own sweet smiles I see, The same that oft in childhood solaced me, Voice only fails, else, how distinct they say 'Grieve not, my child, chase all thy fears away! The meek intelligence of those dear eyes—Blest be the art that can immortalise, The art that baffles time's tyrannic claim To quench it—here shines on me still the same.

Faithful remembrancer of one so dear,
O welcome guest, though unexpected here?
Who bidd'st me honour, with an artless song
Affectionate, a mother lost so long
I will obey, no willingly alone,
But gladly, as the precept were her own
And while that face renews my filial grief,
Fancy shall weave a charm for my relief,

Shall steep me in Elysian reveric, A momentary dream, that thou art she

My mother I when I learned that thou wast dead, Say, wast thou conscious of the tears I shed? Hovered thy spirit o'er thy sorrowing son, Wretch even then, life's journey just begun? Perhaps thou givest me, though unfelt, a kiss, Perhaps a tear, if souls can weep in bliss-Ah, that maternal smile! it answers-yes I heard the bell tolled on thy burnal day, I saw the hearse that bore thee slow away, And turning from my nursery window, drew A long, long sigh, and wept a last adieu l But was it such? It was Where thou art gone, Adicus and farewells are a sound unknown. May I but meet thee on that peaceful shore, The parting word shall pass my lips no more l Thy maidens grieved themselves at my concern, Oft gave me promise of thy quick return What ardently I wished, I long believed, And, disappointed still, was still deceived, By expectation every day beguiled, Dupe of to morrow even from a child Thus many a sad to morrow came and went, Till, all my stock of infant sorrow spent, I learned at last submission to my lot, But, though I less deplored thee, ne'er forgot.

Where once we dwelt our name is heard no more, Children not thine have trod my nursery floor, And where the gardener Robin, day by day, Drew me to school along the public way, Delighted with my hauble coach, and wrapt In scarlet mantle warm, and velvet capt, 'Tis now become a history little known, That once we called the pastoral house our own. Short lived possession I but the record fair, That memory keeps of all thy kindness there, Still outlives many a storm, that has effaced A thousand other themes less deeply traced. Thy nightly visits to my chamber made. That thou mightst know me safe and warmly laid, Thy morning bounties ere I left my home, The biscuit or confectionary plum, The fragrant waters on my cheeks bestowed By thy own hand, till fresh they shone and glowed All this, and more endearing still than all, Thy constant flow of love, that knew no fall. Ne'er roughened by those cataracts and breaks, That humour interposed too often makes All this, still legible in memory's page, And still to be so to my latest age, Adds joy to duty, makes me glad to pay Such bonours to thee as my numbers may, Perhaps a frail memorial, but sincere, Not scorned in heaven, though little noticed here.

Could Time, his flight reversed, restore the hours, When, playing with thy vesture's tissued flowers, The violet, the pink, and jessamine, I pricked them into paper with a pin—And thou wast happier than myself the while, Wouldst sofily speak, and stroke my head and smile—Could those few pleasant days again appear, llight one wish bring them, would I wish them

I would not trust my heart—the dear delight Seems so to be desired, perhaps I might. But no—what here we call our life is such, So little to be loved, and thou so much, That I should ill requite thee to constrain Thy unbound spirit into bonds again

Thou, as a gallant bark from Albion's coast-The storms all weathered and the ocean crossed-Shoots into port at some well havened isle, Where spices breathe and brighter seasons smile There sits quiescent on the floods, that show Her beauteous form reflected clear below, While airs impregnated with incense play Around her, fanning light her streamers gay, So thou, with sails how swift! hast reached the shore 'Where tempests never beat nor billows roar,' And thy loved consort on the dangerous tide Of life, long since has anchored by thy side. But me, scarce hoping to attain that rest, Always from port withheld, always distressed— Me howling blasts drive devious, tempest tossed, Sails ript, seams opening wide, and compass lost And day by day some current's thwarting force Sets me more distant from a prosperous course. Yet oh the thought, that thou art safe, and he! That thought is joy, arrive what may to me. My boast is not that I deduce my birth From loins enthroned, and rulers of the earth, But higher far my proud pretensions rise-The son of parents passed into the skies And now, farewell—Time unrevoked has run His wonted course, yet what I wished is done. By contemplation's help, not sought in vain, I seem to have lived my childhood o'er again To have renewed the joys that once were mine, Without the sin of violating thine, And, while the wings of fancy still are free, And I can view this mimic show of thee, Time has but half succeeded in his theft-Thyself removed, thy power to soothe me left.

Voltaire and the Lace-worker

Yon cottager, who weaves at her own door, Pillow and bobbins all her little store, Content though mean, and cheerful if not gay, Shuffling her threads about the livelong day, Just earns a scanty pittance, and at night Lies down secure, ber heart and pocket light, She, for her humble sphere by nature fit, Has little understanding, and no wit, Receives no praise, but though her lot be such Toilsome and indigent-she renders much, Just knows, and knows no more, her Bible tri A truth the brilliant Frenchman never knew, And in that charter reads, with sparkling eye Her title to a treasure in the skies. O happy peasant! O unhappy bard! His the mere tinsel, hers the rich reward, He praised, perhaps, for ages yet to come, She never heard of half a mile from home, He lost in errors his vain heart prefers, She safe in the simplicity of hers.

To Mary

lo 1

Addressed to Mrs Unwin in Autumn 1793
The twentieth year is well nigh past
Since first our sky was overcast, Ab, would that this might be the last '
My Mary '

Thy spirits have a fainter flow,
I see thee daily weaker grow,
Twas my distress that brought thee low,
My Mary!

Thy needles, once a shining store,
I or my sake restless heretofore,
Now rust disused, and shine no more,
My Mary *

I or though thou gladly wouldst fulfil
The same kind office for me still,
Thy sight now seconds not thy will,

My Mary!

But well thou play'dst the housewife's part, And all thy threads, with magic art, Have wound themselves about this heart, My Mary 1

Thy indistinct expressions seem Like language uttered in a dream,
Yet me they charm, whate'er the theme,
My Mary!

Thy silver locks, once auburn bright,
Are still more lovely in my sight
Than golden beams of orient light,
My Mary!

l or, could I view nor them nor thee, What sight worth seeing could I see? The sun would rise in vain for me, My Mary 1

Partakers of thy sad decline,
Thy hands their little force resign,
Yet gently pressed, press gently mine,
Ny Mary 1

Such feebleness of limbs thou prov'st,
That now at every step thou mov'st
Upheld by two, yet still thou lov'st,

My Mary 1

And still to love, though pressed with ill, In wintry age to feel no chill, With me is to be lovely still,

Mi Mary 1 But all I by constant heed I know How oft the sadness that I shew

Transforms the smiles to looks of woe,

Mr Mary f

And should my future lot be east With much resemblance of the past, Thy worn out heart will break at last My Mary I

England.

Fingland, with all the faults. I love thee still. We country thand, while yet a nook is left. Where English minds and manners may be found, shall be constrained to love thee. Though the clime Be fickle, and the year, most part, deformed. With drapping rains, or withered by a frost, I would not yet exchange the sullen skies. And fiel is without a flower for a armer France. With all her vines in nor for Ausonia's grows. Of golden fruiting, and her mixtle bovers. To shake the senate, and from heights sublime. Of patriot elequence to flash down for Upon the Lower was never meant in that.

But I can feel thy fortunes, and partake Thy jovs and sorrows vith as true a heart As any thunderer there. And I can feel Thy follies too, and with a just disclain Frown at effeminates, who e very looks Reflect dishonour on the land I love How, in the name of soldiership and sense, Should Lingland prosper, when such things, as smooth And tender as a girl, all essenced o er With odours, and as profligate as sweet, Who sell their laurel for a myrtle wreath, And love when they should fight, -when such as these Presume to lay their hand upon the ark Of her magnificent and awful cause? Time was when it was praise and boast enough In every clime, and travel where we might, That we were born her children, praise enough To fill the ambition of a private man, That Chatham's language was his mother tongue, And Wolfe's great name compatriot with his own. Farewell those honours and farewell with them The hope of such hereafter! They have fallen Each in his field of glory one in arms, And one in conneil-Wolfe upon the lap Of smiling Victory that moment won, And Chatham, heart sick of his country's shame! They made us many soldiers. Chatham still Consulting England's happiness at home, Secured it by an unforgiving frown If any wronged her Wolfe, where'er he fought, Put so much of his heart into his act, That his example had a magnet's force, Ind all were swift to follow whom all loved Those suns are set. Oh, ri e some other such ! Or all that we have left is empty talk Of old achievements, and despair of new

The Fireside in Winter

(Irm Tie Tist, Int 1)

Hark! the the thenging home or vonder broke. That with its wear some lin nee? fall length. Be trades the win in first, in which the measures her unit illow fare reflected bright.

He comes, the herald of a noisy world, With spattered boots, strapped waist, and frozen locks, News from all nations lumbering at his back. Truc to his charge, the close packed load behind, Yet careless what he brings, his one concern Is to conduct it to the destined inn, And, having dropped the expected bag, pass on He whistles as he goes, light hearted wretch! Cold and yet cheerful messenger of gricf Perhaps to thousands, and of joy to some, To him indifferent whether grief or joy Houses in ashes, and the fall of stocks, births, deaths, and marriages, epistles wet With tears, that trickled down the writer's cheeks Tast as the periods from his fluent quill, Or charged with amorous sighs of absent swiins, Or nymphs responsive, equally affect His horse and him, unconscious of them all But oh the important budget! ushered in With such heart shaking music, who can say What are its tidings? have our troops awaked? Or do they still, as if with opium drugged, Snore to the murmurs of the Atlantic wave? Is India free? and does she wear her plained And jewelled turban with a smile of peace, Or do we grind her still? The grand debate, The popular harangue, the tart reply, The logic, and the wisdom, and the wit, And the loud laugh-I long to know them all, I burn to set the imprisoned wranglers free, And give them voice and utterance once again.

Now stir the fire, and close the shutters fast, Let fall the eurtains, wheel the sofa round, And while the bubbling and loud hissing urn Throws up a steamy column, and the cups, That ehcer but not inebriate, wait on each, So let us welcome peaceful evening in Not such his evening who, with shining face, Sweats in the crowded theatre, and squeezed And bored with elbow points through both his sides, Out seolds the ranting actor on the stage Nor his who patient stands till his feet throb, And his head thumps, to feed upon the breath Of patriots bursting with heroic rage, Or placemen all tranquillity and smiles This folio of four pages, happy work! Which not even critics criticise, that holds luquisitive attention, while I read, Fast bound in chains of silence, which the fair, Though eloquent themselves, yet fear to break, What is it but a map of busy life, Its fluctuations, and its vast concerns? Here runs the mountainous and emggy ridge That tempts ambition On the summit see The seals of office glitter in his eyes, He climbs, he pants, he grasps them ' At his heels, Close at his lieels, a demagogue ascends, And with a dexterous jerk soon twists him down, And wins them but to lose them in his turn. Here rills of oily eloquence, in soft Meanders, lubricate the course they take, The modest speaker is ashamed and grieved To engross a moment's notice, and yet begs, Begs a propitious ear for his poor thoughts, However trivial all that he conceives Sweet bashfulness ' it claims at least this praise,

The dearth of information and good sense That it forctells us, always comes to pass. Cataracts of declamation thunder here, There forests of no meaning spread the page, In which all comprehension wanders lost, While fields of pleasantry amuse us there, With merry descants on a nation's woes. The rest appears a wilderness of strange But gay confusion, roses for the cheeks, And lilies for the brows of faded age, Teeth for the toothless, ringlets for the bald, Heaven, earth, and ocean plundered of their sweets, Nectarcous essences, Olympian dews, Scrmons, and city feasts, and favourite airs, Æthereal journeys, submarine exploits, A German char And Katterfelto, with his hair on end laian and conjurer At his own wonders, wondering for his bread

'Tis pleasant through the loopholes of retreat
To peep at such a world, to see the stir
Of the great Babel, and not feel the crowd,
To hear the roar she sends through all her gates
At a safe distance, where the dying sound
Falls a soft murmur on the uninjured car
Thus sitting, and surveying thus at ease
The globe and its concerns, I seem advanced
To some secure and more than mortal height,
That liberates and exempts me from them all.

Oh Winter 1 ruler of the inverted year, Thy scattered hair with sleet like ashes filled, Thy breath congealed upon thy lips, thy cheeks Fringed with a beard made white with other snows Than those of age, thy forehead wrapt in clouds, A leasless branch thy seeptre, and thy throne A sliding car indebted to no wheels, But urged by storms along its slippery way, I love thee, all nnlovely as thou seem'st, And dreaded as thou art 1 Thou hold'st the sun A prisoner in the yet undawning east, Shortening his journey between morn and noon, And hurrying him, impatient of his stay, Down to the rosy west, but kindly still Compensating his loss with added hours Of social converse and instructive ease, And gathering, at short notice, in one group The family dispersed, and fixing thought Not less dispersed by daylight and its cares. I crown thee king of intimate delights, Tireside enjoyments, home born happiness, And all the comforts that the lowly roof Of undisturbed retirement, and the hours Of long uninterrupted evening, know

Come, Evening, once again, season of peace, Return, sweet Evening, and continue long Methinks I see thee in the streaky west, With matron step slow moving, while the night Treads on thy sweeping train, one hand employed In letting fall the curtain of repose. On bird and beast, the other charged for man With sweet oblivion of the cares of day. Not sumptuously adorned, nor needing aid, Like homely featured Night, of clustering gems, A star or two just twinkling on thy brow. Suffices thee, save that the moon is thine. No less than here—not worm indeed on high With ostentatious pageantry, but set With modest grandeur in thy purple zone,

Resplendent less, but of an ampler round
Come then, and thou shalt find thy votary calm,
Or make me so Composure is thy gift,
And whether I devote thy gentle hours
To books, to music, or the poet's toil,
To weaving nets for bird alluring fruit,
Or twining silken threads round ivory reels,
When they command whom man was born to please,
I slight thee not, but make thee welcome still

On the Loss of the 'Royal George'

Toll for the brave!

The brave that are no more!

All snnk beneath the wave,

Fast hy their native shore!

Eight hundred of the brave,
Whose courage well was tried,
Had made the vessel heel,
And laid her on her side

A land breeze shook the shrouds, And she was overset, Down went the Royal George With all her crew complete.

Toll for the brave!

Brave Kempenfelt is gone,

His last sea fight is fought,

His work of glory done.

It was not in the battle,

No tempest gave the shock,
She sprang no fatal leak,
She ran upon no rock.

His sword was in the sheath,
His fingers held the pen,
When Kempenfelt went down
With twice four hundred men.

Weigh the vessel up,
Once dreaded by our foes!
And mingle with our cup
The tears that England owes.

Her timbers yet are sound, And she may float again Full charged with England's thunder, And plough the distant main

But Kempenselt is gone,
His victories are o'er,
And he and his eight hundred
Must plough the wave no more.

The Castaway

Obscurest night involved the sky,
The Atlantic billows roared,
When such a destined wretch as I,
Washed headlong from on hoard,
Of friends, of hope, of all bereft,
His floating home for ever left

No braver chief could Albion boast
Than he with whom he went,
Nor ever ship left Albion's coast
With warmer wishes sent
He loved them both, but both in vain,
Nor him beheld, nor her again.

Not long beneath the wholming brine,
Expert to swim, he lay,
Nor soon he felt his strength decline,
Or courage die away,
But waged with death a lasting strife,
Snpported by despair of life

He shouted nor his friends had failed
To check the vessel's course,
But so the furious hlast prevailed,
That, pitiless perforce,
They left their outcast mate behind,
And scudded still before the wind

Some succour yet they could afford,
And such as storms allow,
The cash, the coop, the floated cord,
Delayed not to bestow
But he (they knew) nor ship nor shore, Whate'er they gave, should visit more.

Nor, cruel as it seemed, could he Their haste himself condemn, Aware that flight, in such a sea, Alone could rescue them, Yet bitter felt it still to die Deserted, and his friends so nigh

He long survives who lives an hour
In ocean, self upheld,
And so long he, with unspent power,
His destiny repelled,
And ever, as the minntes flew,
Entreated help, or cried 'Adieu'

At length, his transient respite past,
His commides, who before
Had heard his voice in every hlast,
Could catch the sound no more
For then, hy toil subdued, he drank
The stifling wave, and then he sank

No poet wept him, hit the page
Of narrative sincere,
That tells his name, his worth, his age,
Is wet with Anson's tear
And tears by bards or heroes shed
Alike immortalize the dead

I therefore purpose not, or dream,
Descanting on his fate,
To give the melancholy theme
A more enduring date
But misery still delights to trace
Its semblance in another's case.

No voice divine the storm allayed,
No light propitious shone,
When, snatched from all effectual aid,
We perished, each alone
But I beneath a rougher sea,
And whelmed in deeper gulfs than he.

From the Translation of the 'Iliad.'

Think, oh Achilles, semblance of the Gods! On thy own father full of days like me, And trembling on the gloomy verge of life Some neighbour Chief, it may he, even now, Oppresses him, and there is none at hand,

No friend to succour him in his distress. Yet, doubtless, hearing that Achilles lives, He still rejoices, hoping day by day, That one day he shall see the face again Of his own son from distant Troy returned But me no comfort cheers, whose bravest sons, So late the flower of Ilium, all are slain When Greece came hither I had fifty sons, Nuncteen were children of one bed, the rest Born of my concubines. A numerous house I But fiery Mars hath thinn'd it One I had, One, more than all my sons the strength of Troy, Whom standing for his country thou hast slain-Hector—Ilis body to redeem I come Into Achaia's fleet, bringing, myself, Ransom mestimable to thy tent Reverence the Gods, Achilles ! recollect The father, for his sake compassion show To me more pitiable still, who draw Home to my lips (humiliation yet Unseen on earth) his hand who slew my son (From Book xxiv )

To Mrs Unwin

Mary! I want a lyre with other strings,
Such aid from Heaven as some have feigned they drew,
An eloquence scarce given to mortals, new And undebased by praise of meaner things,
That, ere through age or woe I shed my wings,
I may record thy worth with honour due,
In verse as musical as thou art true,
Verse that immortalizes whom it sings.
But thou hast little need—There is a book
By seraphs writ with beams of heavenly light,
On which the eyes of God not rarely look,
A chronicle of actions just and bright
There all thy deeds, my faithful Mary, shine,
And, since thou own'st that praise, I spare thee mine.

On Dr Johnson.

Oct 31, 1779.

My DEAR FRIEND,-I wrote my last Letter merely to inform you that I had nothing to say, in answer to which you have said nothing Indmire the propriety of your conduct, though I am a loser by it I will endeavour to say something now, and shall hope for something in return I have been well entertained with Johnson's biography, for which I thank you with one exception, and that a swinging one, I think he has acquitted himself with his usual good sense and sufficiency His treatment of Milton is unmerciful to the last degree. A pensioner is not likely to spare a republican, and the Doctor, in order, I suppose, to convince his royal patron of the sincerity of his monarchical principles, has belaboured that great poet's character with the most in As a man, he has hardly left him the dustrious cruelty shadow of one good quality Charlishness in his private life, and a rancorous liatred of everything royal in his public, are the two colours with which he has smeared all the canvas If he had any virtues, they are not to be found in the Doctor's picture of him, and it is well for Milton that some sourness in his temper is the only vice with which his memory has been charged, it is evident enough that if his biographer could have dis covered more, he would not have spared him. As a poet, he has treated him with severity enough, and has pluel ed one or two of the most beautiful feathers out of his Mure's wing, and trampled them under his great foot and has taken occasion from that charming poem expose to ridicule (what is indeed ridiculous enough the childish prattlement of pastoral compositions, as Lycidas was the prototype and pattern of them : The liveliness of the description, the sweetness of numbers, the classical spirit of antiquity that previous I am convinced by the w in it, go for nothing that he has no ear for poetical numbers, or that it v stopped by prejudice against the harmony of Milton Was there ever anything so delightful as the music the Paradise Lost? ## Economy of Life good while longer, but I have no room, our love atter you -Yours affectionately,

November 30, 1783
MY DEAR FRIEND,—I have neither long visits to p nor to receive, nor ladies to spend hours in telling i that which might be told in five minutes, yet often fi myself obliged to be an economist of time, and to ma Let our station be the most of a short opportunity retired as it may, there is no want of playthings a avocations, nor much need to seek them, in this wor Business, or what presents itself to us und of ours that imposing character, will find us out, even in t stillest retreat, and plead its importance, however triv in reality, as a just demand upon our attention. It wonderful how, by means of such real or seeming nec sities, my time is stolen away I have just time observe that time is short, and by the time I have ma the observation time is gone. I have wondered in form days at the patience of the antediluvian world, that the could endure a life almost millenary with so little varie as seems to have fallen to their share. It is probable that they had much fewer employments than we Th affairs lay in a narrower compass, their libraries we indifferently furnished, philosophical researches we carried on with much less industry and acuteness penetration, and fiddles, perhaps, were not even vented. How then could seven or eight hundred yes of life be supportable? I have asked this questi formerly, and been at a loss to resolve it, but I thin I will suppose myself born I can answer it now thousand years before Noah was born or thought of rise with the sun, I worship, I prepare my breakfas I swallow a bucket of goat's milk and a dozen goo sizeable cakes. I fasten a new string to my bow, as my youngest boy, a lad of about thirty years of ag having played with my arrows till he has stript off a the feathers, I find myself obliged to repair them T morning is thus spent in preparing for the chase, and is become necessary that I should dine. I dig up n roots, I wash them, I boil them, I find them not do enough, I boil them again, my wife is angry, w dispute, we settle the point, but in the meantime th fire goes out and must be kindled again. All this is ver amusing I hunt, I bring home the prey, with the skin of it I mend an old coat, or I make a new one this time the day is far spent, I feel myself fatigued, and retire to rest. Thus what with tilling the ground and eating the fruit of it, hunting, and walking, and running, and mending old elothes, and sleeping and rising again, I can suppose an inhabitant of the primæval world so much occupied as to sigh over the shortness of life, and to find at the end of many centuries that they had all slipped through his fingers, and were passed away like a What wonder then that I, who live in a day of so much greater refinement, when there is so much more to be wanted, and vashed, and to be enjoyed, should feel myself now and then pinelied in point of opportunity, and at some loss for leisure to fill four sides of a sheet like this. Thus, however, it is, and if the ancient gentlemen to whom I have referred, and their complaints of the disproportion of time to the occasions they had for it, will not serve me as an excuse, I must even plead guilty, and confess that I am often in haste when I have no good reason for being so

The Candidate's Visit.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—It being his Majesty's pleasure that I should yet have another opportunity to write before be dissolves the Parliament, I avail myself of it with all possible alacrity. I thank you for your last, 'which was not the less welcome for coming, like an extraordinary gazette, at a time when it was not expected.

As, when the sea is uncommonly agitated, the water finds its vay into creeks and holes of rocks, which in its calmer state it never reaches, in like manner the effect of these turbulent times is felt even at Orchardside, where in general we live as undisturbed by the political element as shrimps or eockles that have been accidentally deposited in some hollow beyond the water mark by the usual dashing of the waves. We were sitting yester day after dinner—the two ladies and myself—very composedly, and without the least apprehension of any such intrusion, in our snug parlonr, one lady kmitting, the other netting, and the gentleman winding worsted, when, to our unspeakable surprise, a mob appeared before the window, a smart rap was heard at the door, the boys hallooed, and the maid announced Mr Grenville. Puss was unfortunately let out of her box, so that the candi date, with all his good friends at his heels, was refused admittance at the grand entry, and referred to the back door, as the only possible way of approach

Candidates are creatures not very susceptible of affronts, and would rather, I suppose, climb in at a window than be absolutely excluded. In a minute the yard, the kitchen, and the parlour were filled Mr Grenville, advancing towards me, shook me by the hand with a degree of cordulity that was extremely seducing soon as he and as many more as could find chairs were seated, he began to open the intent of his visit. I told him I had no vote, for which he readily give me credit I as ured him I had no influence, which he was not equally inclined to believe, and the less, no doubt, because Mr Ashburner, the drapier, addressing himself to me at that moment, informed me that I had a great Supposing that I could not be possessed of such deal a treasure vithout knowing it, I ventured to confirm my first assertion by saving that if I had any I was ntterly at a loss to imagine where it could be, or wherein it consisted. Thus ended the conference. Mr Grenville squeezed me by the hand again, kissed the ladies, and with Irew He kissed likewise the nitid in the kitchen, and seemed upon the whole a most loving, I issing, kind hearted gentleman. He is very young, gentcel, and handsome He has a pair of very good eyes in his head, which not being sufficient, as it should seem, for the many nice and difficult purposes of a senator, lie has a third also, which he wore suspended by a riband from his buttonliole. The boys hallooed, the dogs barled, Puss scampered, the hero, with his long trun of obse quious followers, withdren We made ourselves very merry with the adventure, and in a short time settled into our former tranquillity, never probably to be thus interrupted more. I thought myself, however, happy in being able to affirm truly that I had not that influence for which he sued, and for which, had I been possessed of it, with my present views of the dispute between the Crown and the Commons, I must have refused him, for he is on the side of the former. It is comfortable to be of no consequence in a world where one cannot exercise any without disobliging somebody The town, however, seems to be much at his service, and, if he be equally successful throughout the county, he will undoubtedly Mr Ashburner, perhaps, was a little gain his election mortified, because it was evident that I owed the honour of this visit to his misrepresentation of my importance But had he thought proper to assure Mr Grenville that I had three heads, I should not, I suppose, have been bound to produce them

To Lady Hesketh.

OL E1 Feb 9 1786

My DIAPEST COUSIN, -I have been impatient to tell you that I am impatient to see you again Mrs Unum partakes with me in all my feelings upon this subject, and longs also to see you I should have told you so by the last post, but have been so completely occupied by this tormenting specimen that it was impossible to do it I sent the General a Letter on Monday that would distress and alarm him, I sent him another yesterday that will, I hope, quiet him again Johnson has apolo gized very civilly for the multitude of his friend's stric tures, and his friend has promised to confine himself in future to a comparison of me with the original [Homer], so that I doubt not we shall jog on merrily together. And now my dear, let me tell you once more that your kindness in promising us a visit has charmed us both-I shall see you again, I shall hear your voice, we shall tale walks together, I will show you my prospects, the hovel, the alcove, the Ouse, and its banks, everything that I have described. I anticipate the pleasure of those days not very far distant, and I feel a part of it at this moment Talk not of an inn, mention it not for your life. We have never had so many visitors but we could easily accommodate them all, though we have received Unwin, and his wife, and his sister, and his son all at once My dear, I will not let you come till the end of May or beginning of June, because before that time my greenhouse will not be ready to receive us, and it is the only pleasant room belonging to us. When the plants go out, we go in line it with mats, and spread the floor with mats, and there you shall sit with a bed of nugnonette at your side and a hedge of honeysuckles, roses, and jasmine, and I will male you a bouquet of myrtle every day Sooner than the time I mention the country will not be in cem plete beauty. And I will tell you what you shall find at your first entrance. Imprimis, as soon as you have entered the vestibule, if you cast a look on either side of you, you shall see on the right hand a box of my making It is the box in which have been lodged all my Hares, and in which lodges Puss at present But he, poor fellow, is worn out with age, and promises to die before you can see him On the right hand stands a cupboard, the work of the same Author It was once a dove cage, but I transformed it. Opposite to you stands a table which I also made, but a merciless servant having scrubbed it until it became paralytic, it serves no purpose now but of ornament, and all my clean shoes stand On the left hand, at the farther end of this superb vestibule you will find the door of the parlour into which I will conduct you, and where I will introduce you to Mrs Unwin (unless we should meet her before), and where we will be as happy as the day is long vourself, my Cousin, to the Swan at Newport, and there you shall find me ready to conduct you to Olney

My dear, I have told Homer what you say about Casks and Urns, and have asked him whether he is sure that it is a Cask in which Jupiter keeps his wine. He swears that it is a Cask, and that it will never be anything better than a Cask to Eternity. So if the God is content with it, we must even wonder at his taste, and be so too—Adieu my dearest, dearest Cousin, W. C.

The standard edition of Cowper's works is that by Southey, with a Memoir (15 vols 1834-37, reprinted in Bohn's Library, 1853-54). Another is that of Grimshawe (8 vols 1835). Besides the Aldine (1865) and Globe (1870) editions of the poems, there are texts by Mrs Meynell (1904) Bailey (1905) and Milford (1905). T Wright edited a Correspondence in 4 vols. in 1904. The Anti Theliphthora, Cowper's first publication (1781) was an anonymous and vehement attack in verse on his cousin the Rev Martin Maden's plea in defence of polygamy as the only expedient for abating the social evil. See Lives by Hayley (2 vols. 1803), 4th ed, much extended, 4 vols 1812) Goldwin Smith ('Men of Letters series, 1880) and Thomas Wright (1892). For the Olney period compare The Diary of Sanniel Teedon, schoolmaster at Olney (ed. Wright, 1902). And well worth reading are Sainte Beuves three delightful essays on Cowper in the eleventh volume of the Cauteries du Lindi, and Mrs Browning's 'Cowper's Grave.'

Robert Lloyd (1733-64), the friend of Cowper and Churchill, was the son of an under-master at Westminster School He distinguished himself at Trinity College, Cambridge, but was irregular in his habits, about 1756 he became an usher under The wearisome routine of this life soon disgusted him, and he attempted to earn a subsistence by his literary talents. His light and easy poem, The Actor (1760), attracted some notice, and was the precursor of Churchill's Rosciad contributing to periodicals as essayist, poet, and stage critic, Lloyd picked up a precarious subsistence, but his means were recklessly squandered in company with Churchill and other wits 'upon town' He brought out two indifferent theatrical pieces, published his poems by subscription, and edited the St James's Magazine (1762-63), to which Colman, Bonnell Thornton, and others contributed On Lloyd's being imprisoned for debt, Churchill generously allowed him a guinea a week, as well as a servant, and endeavoured to raise a subscrip tion to extricate him from his embarrassments Churchill died in November 1764, and 'Lloyd,' says Southey, 'had been apprised of his danger, but when the news of his death was somewhat abruptly announced to him as he was sitting at dinner, he was seized with a sudden sickness. and saying, "I shall follow poor Charles," took to his bed, from which he never rose again, dying, if ever man died, of a broken heart. The tragedy did not end here Churchill's favourite sister, who is said to have possessed much of her brother's sense and spirit and genius, and to have been betrothed to Lloyd, attended him during his illness, and, sinking under the double loss, soon followed her brother and her lover to the grave' Lloyd, in conjunction with Colman, parodied the odes of Gray and Mason, and the humour of their burlesques is not tinctured with The unlucky Lloyd, indeed, seems to have been one of the gentlest of witty observers and lively satirists, wrecked by the friendship of Churchill and the Nonsense Club Both Churchill and Cowper copied and imitated his vivacious style.

The two following extracts are from 'The Temple of Favour' and 'The Author's Apology' Lloyd's poems are included in the collections of Anderson and Chalmers

The Miseries of a Poet's Life

The harlot muse, so passing gay, Bewitches only to betray Though for a while with easy air She smooths the rugged brow of care, And laps the mind in flowery dreams, With Fancy's transitory gleams, Fond of the nothings she bestows, We wake at last to real woes. Through every age, in every place, Consider well the poet's case, By turns protected and caressed, Defamed, dependent, and distressed The joke of wits, the bane of slaves, The curse of fools, the butt of knaves, Too proud to stoop for servile ends, To lacquey rogues or flatter friends, With produgality to give, Too careless of the means to live, The bubble fame intent to gain, And yet too lazy to maintain, He quits the world he never prized, Pitied by few, by more despised, And, lost to friends, oppressed by foes, Sinks to the nothing whence he rose.

O glorious trade ' for wit's a trade,
Where men are ruined more than made
Let crazy Lee, neglected Gay,
The shabby Otway, Dryden gray,
Those tuneful servants of the Nine—
Not that I blend their names with mine—
Repeat their lives, their works, their fame,
And teach the world some nseful shame.

The Dismal Case of the Usher Were I at once empowered to shew My utmost vengeance on my foe, To punish with extremest rigour, I could inflict no penance bigger

Than, using him as learning's tool, To make him usher of a school For, not to dwell upon the toil Of working on a barren soil, And labouring with incessant pains, To cultivate a blockhead's hrains, The duties there but ill befit The love of letters, arts, or wit. For me, it hurts me to the soul To brook confinement or control. Still to be pinioned down to teach The syntax and the parts of speech, Or, what perhaps is drudgery worse, The links, and joints, and rules of verse, To deal out authors by retail, Like penny pots of Oxford ale, Oh, 'tis a service irksome more Than tugging at the slavish oar 1 Yet such his task, a dismal truth, Who watches o'er the bent of youth, And while a paltry stipend earning, He sows the richest seeds of learning, And tills their minds with proper care, And sees them their due produce bear, No joys, alas his toil beguile, His own hes fallow all the while 'Yet still he's on the road,' you say, 'Of learning Why, perhaps he may, But turns lile horses in a mill, Nor getting on, nor standing still, For little way his learning reaches, Who reads no more than what he teaches

Jolin Newton (1725-1807), the hymn writer and friend of Cowper, was born in London, the son of a shipmaster, and sailed with his father Impressed on board a man of-war, for six years he was made midshipman, but was degraded for attempted escape, and took service in a slavetrading ship. He was for some time servant to the negro mistress of a slave-trader in Sierra Leone, and his own condition was practically that He went to sea again, and, according to his own account, led a reckless, debauched, profane, and infidel life, but in March 1748 he was converted and became a new man Net, strange to say, it was after this that he became mate and then master of a slave ship, trading from Liverpool to West Africa and thence to America with slaves He spent much time in religious exercises, kept a strict record of all his actions, and was a severe judge of his own conduct. But, like the majority of sincere and earnest Christians, his eyes were not therefore opened either to the wickedness of slavery or to a sense of the horrors of the slave trade. It gives a curious interest to his diary to find that so good a man seems as yet to have had hardly any misgivings as to the lawfulness of the trade he was engaged in, though afterwards he became a zealous opponent of slavery and the slave trade. After his conversion he lapsed once, for a very short time, into religious indifference (August 1748), but in Africa was revisited with affliction, which was the means, he says, 'of bringing him back to God.' On the next page (p 30) of his abridged diary by Bull we find him writing

'If you can inform me of my [lottery] ticket having turned up a great prize, the news will not be disagree able, and in the same letter, referring to his sister, he says 'Thank her for the tolerably happy life I now lead, for to her only I owe it.' Again, in March 1749, addressing the same correspondent from Rio 'Though we have been here six Sesters, he says months, I have not been ten days in the ship, being con tinually cruising about in the boats to purchase souls, for which we are obliged to take as much pains as the Jesuits are said to do in making proselytes, sometimes venturing in a little canoe through seas like mountains, sometimes travelling through the woods, often in danger from the wild beasts, and much oftener from the more wild inhabitants, scorched by the sun in the day, and chilled by the dews in the night. Providence has preserved me safe through a variety of these scenes since I san you last, and I hope will continue so to do withstanding what I have said in relation to the difficulties I meet with here, I assure you I was never so happy in my life as I have been since I left Liverpool I can cheerfully submit to a great deal this vovage, because I hope it will be the last I shall make in an under station, and because I hope when it is finished a satisfactory meeting with my friends will make amends. I may be deceived, but, however, I find an advantage in persuading myself for the best '

On the coast of Sierra Leone in 1752 he holds himself bound to testify for Christ and admonish carcless Christians by earnest letters, yet records with thankfulness, and evidently without disgust or horror, the success he had in putting down a serious mutiny amongst the slaves on board his ship. And a month later he writes

'One circumstance I cannot but set down here, and which I hope I shall always take pleasure in ascribing to the blessing of the God of peace—I mean the remark able disposition of the men slaves I have on board, who seem for some time past to have entirely changed their tempers. I was at first continually alarmed by their almost desperate attempts to make insurrections One of these affairs has been mentioned but we had more afterwards, and when most quiet they were always watching for opportunity However from the end of February they have behaved more like children in one family than slaves in chains and irons, and are really upon all occasions more observing, obliging, and considerate than our white people. Let in this space they would often in all likelihood have been able to do much more mischief than in former parts of the voyage '

He sets Wednesday, November 21st, apart for the special purpose of seeking a blessing upon his voyage and for protection through its various difficulties and dangers. Wr Newton arrived at Liverpool, completing his second voyage in the African, on the 9th of August, 'having had,' he says, 'a favourable passage, and in general a comfortable sense of the presence of God through the whole, and towards the end some remarkable deliverances and answers to praver. I had the pleasure to return thanks in the churches (at Liverpool) for an African voyage performed without any accident, or the loss of a single man' Writing in 1763, he says 'The reader may perhaps wonder, as I now do myself, that, knowing the state of this vile traffic to be as I have described' (the reference is to a letter in which he has been speaking of the state and circum stances of the slaves), 'and abounding with enormities which I have not mentioned, I did not at the time start with horror at my own employment as an agent in promoting it Custom, example, and interest had blinded my eyes I did it ignorantly, for I am sure had I thought of the slave trade then as I have thought of it since, no considerations would have induced me to continue in it. Though my religious views were not very clear, my eonscience was very tender, and I durst not have dis pleased God by acting against the light of my mind. Indeed a slave ship, while on the coast, is exposed to such innumerable and continual dangers, that I was often then, and still am, astonished that any one, much more that so many, should leave the coast in safety then favoured with an uncommon degree of dependence upon the providence of God, which supported me, but this confidence must have failed in a moment, and I should have been overwhelmed with distress and terror if I had known, or even suspected, that I was acting I felt greatly the disagreeableness of the busi ness. The office of a gaoler, and the restraints under which I was obliged to keep my prisoners, were not suitable to my feelings, but I considered it as the line of life which God in His providence had allotted me, and as a cross which I ought to bear with patience and thankfulness till He should be pleased to deliver me from it. Till then I only thought myself bound to treat the slaves under my care with gentleness, and to consult their ease and convenience so far as was consistent with the safety of the whole family of whites and blacks on board my ship ' In his Varrative Mr Newton says 'I had often petitioned in my prayers that the Lord, in His own time, would be pleased to fix me in a more humane calling '

He continued the African slave business till a sudden illness in August 1754 made him resign the command of a ship just about to start on another African voyage. In 1755 he became tidesurvevor at Liverpool The 9th and 10th days of April 1756 he speaks of as days of much spiritual enjoyment, on May 4th

'Determined this day to have a ticket in the ensuing lottery, not, I hope, with a desire of amassing money merely, but, if it should be so, of increasing my capacity for usefulness'

His views on theatres are interesting as expressing the extreme form of hostility on the part of evangelicals of the old school

'If there is any practice in this land sinful, attendance on the play house is properly and eminently so. The theatres are fountains and means of vice, I had almost said in the same manner and degree as the ordinances of the gospel are the means of grace, and I can hardly think there is a Christian upon earth who would dare to be seen there, if the nature and effects of the theatre were properly set before him. Dr Witherspoon, of Scotland, has written an excellent piece upon the Stage, or, rather, again to it, which I wish every person who makes the least pretence to fear God had an opportunity of perusing I cannot judge much more favourably of Ranelagh,

Vauxhall, and all the innumerable train of dissipations by which the god of this world blinds the eyes of multi tudes, lest the light of the glorious gospel should shine in upon them'

In 1758 he applied for holy orders, and in 1764 he was offered the curacy of Olney and ordained Hither William Cowper came four years later, and a very close friendship sprang up A self devoting minister, who was to contribute largely to the evangelical revival, Newton proved a tender and sympathetic spiritual director to the morbidly sensitive poet, and strove, though with somewhat imperfect insight, to relieve his constitutional In 1779 he became rector of St Mary Woolnoth, London, and was till the end, even after he became blind, a laborious and faithful minister of the Word His prose works, especially the Cardiphonia (1781), a selection from his letters, simple in style, sincere, fervid, and soul-searching, were long popular, but are now little read, save the autobiographical Remarkable Particulars in his own Life But some of his Olney Hymns-280 of which were from his pen—have been taken to the heart by the English world, including, 'Approach, my soul, the mercy-seat, 'How sweet the name of Jesus sounds,' 'One there is, above all others,' 'Come, my soul, thy suit prepare,' 'Glorious things of thee are spoken,' and 'Quiet, Lord, my froward heart.' Edward Fitz-Gerald said 'His journal to his wife, written at sea, contains some of the most beautiful things I ever read-fine feeling in very fine English'

See Life by Cecil (1808), prefixed to a collected edition of Newton's works (1816), Thomas Wright, The Town of Comper (18 6), and other works cited at Cowper

William Hayley (1745-1820) it was, the biographer of Cowper, of whom Southey observed that 'everything about that man is good except his poetry? Yet his poems enjoyed great popularity in their day, and on Warton's death in 1790 he was offered but declined the laureateship his principal work, The Triumphs of Temper, a poem in six cantos (1781), he wrote an Essay on History, addressed to Gibbon (1780), an Essay on Epu Poctry (1782), a still entertaining Essay on Old Maids (1785), a Life of Millon (1796), Essays on Sculpture, addressed to Flaxman (1800), the Life of Cowper (1803), The Triumph of Music (1804), a Life of Romney (1809), and some halfdozen other works Blake illustrated his Ballads founded on Anecdotes of Animals Born at Chichester, and educated at Eton and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, he settled in 1774 on his estate of Eartham Hall in Sussex, where he was visited by many of the eminent men of his His overstrained sensibility and romantic tastes exposed him to ridicule, yet he was amiable and accomplished, and a capital talker through his personal application to Pitt that Cowper received his pension, and he wrote Cowper's epitaph, he seems, indeed, to have felt a sort of melancholy pride and satisfaction in writing epitaphs on his friends. Hayley prepared Memoirs of his own life (2 vols 4to, 1823), which he disposed of to a publisher on condition of his receiving an annuity for the rest of his life, this he enjoyed for eight years

Inscription on the Tomb of Cowper Ye who with warmth the public triumph feel Of talents dignified by sacred zeal, Here, to devotion's bard devoutly just, Pay your fond tribute due to Cowper's dust 'England, exulting in his spotless fame, Ranks with her dearest sous his favourite name. Sense, faucy, wit, suffice not all to raise So clear a title to affection's praise His highest honours to the heart belong, His virtues formed the magic of his song

Trusting in God with all her heart and mind, This woman proved magnanimously kind, Endured affliction's desolating hail, And watched a poet through misfortine's vale Her spotless dust angelie guards desend!

On the Tomb of Mrs Unwin.

It is the dust of Unwin, Cowper's friend. That single title in itself is fame, For all who read his verse revere her name

From 'To a Mother, on her Death' O thou fond spirit, who with pride hast smiled, And frowned with fear on thy poetie child, Pleased, yet alarmed, when in his boyish time He sighed in numbers or he laughed in rhyme, While thy kind cautious warned him to beware Of Penury, the bard's perpetual snare, Marking the early temper of his soul, Carcless of wealth, nor fit for base control! Thou tender saint, to whom he owes much more Than ever child to parent owed before, In life's first season, when the fever s flame Shrunk to deformity his shrivelled frame And turned eaen fairer image in his bruin To blank confusion and her crazy train, 'Twas thine, with constant love, through lingering years, To bathe thy idiot orphan in thy tears, Day ufter day, and night succeeding night, To turn incessant to the hideous sight, And frequent watch, if haply at thy view Departed reason might not dawn anew, Though medicinal art, with pitying care, Could lend no aid to save thee from despur, Thy fond maternal heart adhered to hope and prayer Nor prayed in vain, thy child from powers above Received the sense to feel and bless thy love. O might he thence receive the happy skill, And force proportioned to his ardent will, With truili's unfading radiance to emblaze Thy virtues, worthy of immortal praise!

Nature who decked thy form with beauty's flowers, Exhausted on thy soul her finer powers, Tanght it with all her energy to feel Love's melting softness, friendship's fervid zeal, The generous purpose and the active thought, With charity's diffusive spirit fraught. There all the best of mental gifts she placed,

Vigorr of judgment, purity of taste, Superior parts without their spleenful leaven, Kindness to earth, and confidence in heaven While my fond thoughts o'er all thy merits roll, Thy praise thus gushes from my filial soul

Sir William Jones (1746-94) carned his laurels rather as an Oriental scholar and judge, an enlightened lawyer and patriot, than as a poet But by his mastery of an extraordinary wealth of Oriental lore he greatly widened the literary lionzon of England and all European nations, he had himself exceptional skill and ease in expounding his favourite subjects, and his verse translations from Eastern tongues were in many ways memorable. Born in London, the son of an eminent mathematician, in 1753 he was sent to Harrow, where to Latin and Greek he added some knowledge of Arabic and Hebrew Entered of University College, Oxford, in 1764, lie assiduously read the Greek poets and historians, and pursued Oriental studies under the tuition of a native of Aleppo In his nineteenth year he was made private tutor to Lord Althorp, afterwards Earl Spencer, and a fellowship at Oxford relieved the young scholar from pecuniary straits In 1768 the king of Denmark visited England, and brought with him a Persian manuscript of the life of Nadir Shah, which Jones translated into French In 1769 he accompanied his noble pupil to the Continent Next year, entered a student of the Temple, he applied himself with his characteristic ardour to his new profession. He also wrote a Persian grammar, a French Traité (1770), a French Dissertation (1771), and Latin Commentaria (1774), all on Oriental poetry, and some translations, and was made FRS, but finding that jurisprudence was a jealous mistress, he devoted himself for some years exclusively to his legal studies, practised at the Bar, and was appointed one of the Commissioners of Bankrupts In 1778 he published a translation of the speeches of Isæus, and several treatises on law He strongly opposed the Anieri can war and the slave-trade, and in 1781 he pub lished his famous Alcaic ode Appointed one of the judges of the supreme court at Fort William in Bengal and knighted in his thirty-seventh year, he embarked for India (1783), never to return the intervals of leisure from his judicial labours he worked at all manner of scientific and literary subjects, and established the Bengal Asiatic Society His contributions to the transactions of this society on Asiatic philology, ethnology, and chronology are epoch making. Ultimately he was able to read in twenty eight languages He was the first English scholar to master Sanskrit, and it was he who first emphasised its close resemblance to Greek and Latin, becoming thus one of the founders of comparative philology He translated from the Hitopadesa and from the Sakuntala, and made versions of Hindu livmns and of parts of the Vedas He engaged to compile a digest of Hindu and Mohammedan laws, and in 1794, to secure for the natives of India the administration of justice by their own laws, he translated the Ordinances of Menu, the Hindu Justinian

An Ode in Imitation of Alcaus

What constitutes a state? Not high raised buttlement or laboured mound, Thick wall or morted gate, Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned, Not bays and broad armed ports, Where laughing at the storm, rich navies ride, Not starred and spangled courts, Where low browed baseness wafts perfume to pride No, men, high minded men, With powers as far above dull brutes endued In forest, brake, or den, As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude, Men who their duties know, But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain, Prevent the long aimed blow, And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain The e constitute a state, And sovereign Law, that state s collected will, O'er thrones and globes elate Sits empress, crowning good, repressing ill,

Such was this here en loved isle,
Than Lesbos fairer, and the Cretan shore!
No more shall Freedom smile?
Shall Britons languish, and be men no more?
Since all must life resign,
Those sweet rewards which decorate the brave
'Tis folly to decline,
And steal inglorious to the silent grave.

Hides her faint rays, and at her bidding shrinks.

Smit by her sacred frown, The fiend Discretion like a vapour sinks,

And c'en the all-dazzling Crown

A Persian Song of Hafiz

Sweet maid, if thou wouldst charm my sight,
And hid these arms thy neck infold,
That rosy cheek, that hily hand,
Would give thy poet more delight
Than all Bocara's haunted gold, Bok
Than all the gems of Samarcand

Bokhara s

Boy, let you liquid ruby flow,
And hid thy pensive heart be glad,
Whate'er the frowning zealots say
Tell them their Eden cannot shew
A stream so clear as Roembad,
A bower so sweet as Mosellay

Oh when these fair perfidious maids, Whose eyes our secret haunts infest, Their dear destructive charms display, Each glance my tender breast invades, And robs my wounded soul of rest, As Tartars seize their destined prey

In vain with love our bosoms glow Can all our tears, can all our sighs, New lustre to those charms impart? Can cheeks, where high roses blow, Where nature spreads her richest dyes, Require the borrowed gloss of art? Speak not of fate—ah, change the theme, And talk of odours, tall of wine, Talk of the flowers that round us bloom 'Its all a cloud, 'to all a dream, To love and joy thy thoughts confine, Nor hope to pierce the sacred gloom

Beauty has such resistless power, That even the claste I gyptian dame Sighed for the blooming Hebrew boy I or her how fital was the hour, When to the banks of Nilus came A youth so lovely and so coy!

But all I sweet maid, my counsel hear (Youth should attend when those advise Whom long experience renders sage). While music charms the ravished ear, While sparkling cups delight our eyes, Be gay, and scorn the frowns of age.

What cruel answer have I heard? And yet, by Heaven, I love thee still Can hight be cruel from the hip? Yet say, how fell that latter word I rom hips which streams of sweetness fill, Which nought but drops of honey sip?

Go boldly forth, my simple lay, Whose necents flow with artless case, Lille orient pearls at random string. Thy notes are sweet, the dains lessy. But oh far sweeter of they please. The nymph for whom these notes are sung!

Quatrain from the Persian.

On parent knees a naked new born child Weeping thou sat'st while all around thee smiled, So live that, sinking in the last long sleep, Calm thou may st smile while all around thee weep

His works with a I ife by I and Teignmouth were published in nine volumes (1797-1804).

William ('rowe (1745-1820) was born at Midgham, Berks the son of a carpenter, and brought up at Winchester, where in 1758 he was admitted upon the foundation as a poor scholar. He passed in 1765 to New College, Oxford, and was elected Fellow in 1767. A sturdy, eccentric Whig, he rose to be Public Orator, holding at the same time the valuable rectory of Alton Barnes in Wiltshire. Crowe was author of Levisdon Hill (1788), a descriptive poem in blank verse, and of various other pieces, collected in 1827. There is true poetry in his works, though they have never been popular.

Wreck of the 'Halsewell,' East Indiaman

See how the sun, here clouded, afar off
Pours down the golden radiance of his light
Upon the chridged sea, where the black ship
Sails on the phosphor seeming waves—So fair,
But falsely flattering, was you surface calm,
When forth for India sailed, in evil time,
That vessel, whose disastrous fate, when told,
Filled every breast with horror, and each eye
With piteous tears, so cruel was the loss

Methinks I see her, as, by the wintry storm Shattered and driven along past yonder isle, She strone, her latest hope, by strength or art, To gain the port within it, or nt worst, To shnn that harbourless and hollow coast From Portland eastward to the promontory Where still St Alban's high built chapel stands. But art nor strength avail her-on she drives In storm and darkness to the fatal coast, And there 'mong rocks and high o'erhanging cliffs Dashed piteously, with all her precious freight, Was lost, by Neptune's wild and foamy jaws Swallowed up quick! The richest laden ship Of spicy Ternate, or that annual sent To the Philippines o'er the southern main From Acapulco, carrying massy gold, Were poor to this, freighted with hopeful youth, And beauty and high courage undismayed By mortal terrors, and paternal love, Strong and unconquerable even in death-Alas, they perished nll, all in one hour !

The Halsewell (Captain Pierce) was wrecked in January 1786 having struck on the rocks near Seacombe, on the island of Purbeck. All the passengers perished, but out of two hundred and forty souls on board seventy four were saved.

The Miseries of War

If the stroke of war Fell certain on the guilty head, none else, If they that make the cause might taste th' effect, And drink themselves the bitter cup they mix, Then might the bard, though child of peace, delight To twine fresh wreaths around the conqueror's brow, Or haply stake his high toned harp, to swell The trumpet's martial sound, and bid them on Whom justice arms for vengeance. But alas! That undistinguishing and deathful storm Beats heavier on th' exposed innocent, And they that stir its fury, while it raves Stand at safe distance, send their mandate forth Unto the mortal ministers that wait To do their bidding -Oh, who then regards The widow's tears, the friendless orphan's cry, And fimine, and the ghastly train of woes That follow at the dogged heels of war? They, in the pomp and pride of victory Rejoicing o'er the desolated earth, As at an altar wet with human blood, And flaming with the fire of cities burnt, Sing their mad hymns of triumph-hymns to God, O er the destruction of his gracious works ! Hymns to the Father o er his slanghtered sons.

Thomas Woss, perpetual curate of Brierly Hill in Staffordshire, who died in 1808, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and besides some sermons and a blank-verse poem On the Imperfection of Human Enjoyments (1783), published a small collection of Poems on Several Occasions (1769), one of which—'The Beggar Man'—was long a popular favourite

Pity the sorrows of a poor old man!

Whose trembling limbs have borne him to your door,
Whose days are dwindled to the shortest span,

Oh! give relief, and Heaven will bless your store.

These tattered clothes my poverty bespeak,
These hoary locks proclaim my lengthened years,
And many a furrow in my grief worn cheek
Has been the channel to a stream of tears

Yon house, erected on the rising ground,
With tempting aspect drew me from my road,
For plenty there a residence has found,
And grandeur n magnificent abode.

(Hard is the fate of the infirm and poor!)
Here craving for a morsel of their bread,
A pampered menial forced me from the door,
To seek a shelter in a humbler shed

Oh I take me to your hospitable dome,

Keen blows the wind, and piercing is the cold!

Short is my passage to the friendly tomb,

For I am poor, and miserably old

Should I reveal the source of every grief,
If soft humanity e'er touched your breast,
Your hands would not withhold the kind relief,
And tears of pity could not be repressed

Heaven sends misfortunes—why should we repine?
'Tis Heaven has brought me to the state you see
And your condition may be soon like mine,
The child of sorrow, and of misery

A little farm was my paternal lot,

Then, like the lark, I sprightly hailed the morn,
But nh' oppression forced me from my cot

My cattle died, and blighted was my corn

My daughter—once the comfort of my age '
Lured by a villain from her native home,
Is cast, abandoned, on the world's wide stage,
And doomed in scanty poverty to roam.

My tender wife—sweet soother of my care '
Struck with sad anguish at the stern decree,
Fell—lingering fell, a victim to despair,
And left the world to wretchedness and me

Pity the sorrows of a poor old man!

Whose trembling limbs have borne him to your door,
Whose days are dwindled to the shortest span,

Oh! give relief, and Heaven will hless your store

Song from 'The Shamrock' (Dublin, 1772)

Belinda's sparkling eyes and wit Do various passions raise And, like the lightning, yield a bright But momentary blaze

Eliza's milder, gentler sway,
Her conquests fairly won,
Shall last till life and time decay,
Eternal as the sun

Thus the wild flood, with deafening roar, Birsts dreadful from on high, But soon its empty rage is o'er, And leaves the channel dry,

While the pure stream, which still and slow Its gentler current brings, Through every change of time shall flow, With unexhausted springs.

Dr John Moore (1729-1802), author of Zeluco, was born at Stirling, son of a minister of the town, who died in 1737, leaving seven children to the care of his widow, and she thereupon removed to Glasgow, where her relations had property. After the usual education at the grummar school and university, John began the study of medicine and surgery under Mr Gordon, the same surgeon to whom Smollett had been ap-In his nineteenth year he accompanied the Duke of Argyll's regiment abroad, and served in the military hospitals at Maestricht. Thence he went to Flushing and Breda, and at the close of hostilities he accompanied General Braddock to England Soon afterwards he became household surgeon to the Earl of Albemarle, British ambassador at the court of Versailles In 1751 his old master invited him to become a partner in his business in Glasgow, and Moore, who had been two years in Paris, accepted the invitation practised in Glasgow with great success, married in 1757, and became the father of a daughter and five sons, the eldest the hero of Corunna. In 1772 he travelled with the young Duke of Hamilton on the Continent, spending five years in France, Switzerland, Germany and Italy, on his return in 1778 he removed his family to London, and commenced physician there.

In 1779 he published A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany, which was well received. In 1781 appeared his View of Society and Manners in Italy, in 1786, Medical Sketches, and, in the same year, Zeluco Various I news of Human Nature, taken from Life and Manners, Foreign and Domestic, selected to prove that, in spite of the gayest and most prosperous appearances, inward misery always accompanies vice. The hero (possibly suggested by Smollett's Count Fathom) is the only son of a noble family in Sicily, spoiled by maternal indulgence, and at length rioting in every prodigality and vice The scene of the novel is laid chiefly in Italy, and Moore's familiarity with foreign manners enabled him to give his narrative many novel and vivid side-lights Zeluco serves in the Spanish army, and becomes a slave-owner in the West Indies, so that Moore has an opportunity of condemning slavery, he gives touching pictures of the sufferings of the negroes and of their attachment to their masters, and the death of Hanno, the generous slave, is one of Moore's most masterly delineations

Moore visited Scotland in the summer of 1786, and next year took a warm interest in the genius and fortunes of Burns. It is to him that we owe the precious Autobiography of the poet, and in their correspondence the extraordinary gifts of the peasant bard show to advantage. In 1792 Moore accompanied the Earl of Lauderdale to Paris, and witnessed some of the excesses of the French Revolution, of this tour the record was published as A Journal during a Residence in France (2 vols 1793-94), and was followed in 1795 by A View of the Causes and Progress of the French Revolution. a valuable work which was utilised both by Scott and Carlyle. In 1796 Moore produced a second novel, Edward Various Views of Human Nature, taken from Life and Manners, chiefly in England As Zeluco was a model of villainy, Edward is a model of virtue, but is unhappily less interesting than his antitype In 1797 Moore furnished a life of his friend Smollett for a collective edition of his works In 1800 appeared Mordaunt Sketches of Life, Character, and Manners in Various Countries, including the Memoirs of a French Lady of Quality, an insipid novel without much plot or incident, told in letters partly dated from the Continent and partly from England

In the following extract from Zeluco, two Scotch servants in Italy, dining (and drinking) in the absence of their masters, have a dispute, followed by a duel and a reconciliation Duncan Targe was a hot Highlander, who had been out in the Forty-five, George Buchanan had been born and educated among the Whigs of the west of Scotland.

Scots Abroad.

Buchanan filled a bumper, and gave for the toast, 'The Land of Cakes!'

This immediately dispersed the cloud which began to gather on the other's brow

Targe drank the toast with enthusiasm, saying 'May the Almighty pour his blessings on every hill and valley in it! That is the worst wish, Mr Buchanan, that I shall ever wish to that land.'

'It would delight your heart to behold the flourishing condition it is now in,' replied Buchman, 'it was fast improving when I left it, and I have been credibly informed since that it is now a perfect garden'

'I am very happy to hear it,' said Targe.

'Indeed,' added Buchanan, 'it has been in a state of rapid improvement ever since the Union'

'Confound the Union!' cried Targe, 'it would have improved much faster without it'

'I am not quite clear on that point, Mr Targe,' said Buchinaa

'Depend upon it,' replied Targe, 'the Union was the worst treaty that Scotland ever made'

'I shall admit,' said Buchanan, 'that she might have made a better, but, bad as it is, our country resps some advantage from it.'

'All the advantages are on the side of England'

'What do you think, Mr Targe,' said Buchman, 'of the increase of tride since the Union, and the riches which have flowed into the Lowlands of Scotland from that quarter?'

'Think' cried Targe, 'why, I think they have done a great deal of mischief to the Lowlands of Scotland'

'How so, my good friend?' said Buchanaa

'By spreading luxury among the inhabitants, the never failing forerunner of effemmacy of manners. Why, I was assured,' continued Targe, 'by Sergeant Lewis Macneil, a Highland gentleman in the Prussian service, that the Lowlanders, in some parts of Scotland, are now very little better than so many Linglish'

'O fic!' cried Buchman, 'things are not come to that pass as yet, Mr Targe your friend the sergeant assuredly exaggerates."

'I hope he does,' replied Targe. 'But you must acknowledge,' continued he, 'that, by the Union, Scot land has lost her existence as an independent state, her name is swallowed up in that of England. Only read the English newspapers, they mention England, as if it were the name of the whole island. They talk of the English army, the English fleet, the English everything They never mention Scotland, except when one of our country men happens to get an office under government, we are then told, with some stale gibe, that the person is a Scotchman, cr, which happens still more rarely, when any of them are condemned to die at Tyburn, particular care is taken to inform the public that the criminal is originally from Scotland! But if fifty Englishmen get places, or are hanged, in one year, no remarks are made.'

'No,' said Buchanan, 'in that case it is passed over as a thing of course.'

The conversation then taking another turn, Targe, who was a great genealogist, descanted on the antiquity of certain gentlemen's families in the Highlands, which, he asserted, were far more honourable than most of the noble families either in Scotland or England 'Is it not shameful,' added he, 'that a parcel of mushroom lords, mere sprouts from the dunghills of law or commerce, the grandsons of grocers and attorneys should take the pass of gentlemen of the oldest families in Europe?'

Why, as for that matter, replied Buchanan, 'provided the grandsons of grocers or attorneys are deserving cati zens, I do not perceive why they should be excluded from the kings favour more than other men.'

'But some of them never drew a sword in defence of either their king or country,' rejoined Targe

'Assuredly,' said Buchanan, 'men may deserve honour and pre eminence by other means than by drawing their swords.' [He then instances his celehrated namesake, George Buchanan, whom he praises warmly as having been the best Latin scholar in Europe, while Targe nphraids him for want of honesty ]

'In what did he ever shew any want of honesty?' said Buchanan

'In calumnating and endeavouring to blacken the reputation of his rightful sovereign, Mary, Queen of Scots,' replied Targe, 'the most beautiful and accomplished princess that ever sat on a throne'

'I have nothing to say either against her beauty or her accomplishments,' resumed Buchanan, but surely, Mr Targe, you must acknowledge that she v as a ——?'

'Have a care what you say, sir' interrupted Targe, 'I'll permit no man that ever wore breeches to speak disrespectfully of that unfortunate queen'

'No man that ever wore either hreeches or a philabeg,' replied Buchanan, 'shall prevent me from speaking the truth when I see occasion'

'Speak as much truth as you please, sir,' rejoined Targe, 'but I declare that no man shall calumniate the memory of that beautiful and unfortunate princess in my presence while I can wield a claymore'

'If you should wield fifty claymores, you cannot denv that she was a Papist' said Buchanan

'Well, sir,' cried Targe, 'what then? She was, like other people, of the religion in which she was bred'

'I do not know where you may have been bred, Wr Targe,' said Buchanan, 'for aught I know, you may be an adherent to the worship of the Scarlet Lady yourself Unless that is the case, you ought not to interest yourself in the reputation of Mary, Queen of Scots'

'I fear you are too nearly related to the false slanderer whose name you bear 1' said Targe.

'I glory in the name, and should think myself greatly obliged to any man who could prove my relation to the great George Buchanan!' cried the other

'He was nothing but a disloyal calumniator,' cried Targe, 'who attempted to support falsehoods by forgeries, which, I thank Heaven, are now fully detected 1'

'Yon are thankful for a very small mercy,' resumed Buchanan, 'but since you provoke me to it, I vill tell you, in plain English, that your bonny Queen Mary was the strumpet of Bothwell, and the murderer of her husband!'

No sooner had he uttered the last sentence than Targe flew at him like a tiger, and they were separated with difficulty by Mr N——'s groom, who was in the adjoining chamber, and had heard the altercation

'I insist on your giving me satisfaction, or retracting what you have said against the beautiful Queen of Scot land' cried Targe

'As for retracting what I have said,' replied Buchanan, 'that is no habit of mine, but with regard to giving you satisfaction, I am ready for that to the best of my ability, for let me tell you, sir, though I am not a Highlandman, I am a Scotchman as well as yourself, and not entirely ignorant of the use of the claymore, so name your hour, and I will meet you to morrow morning'

'Why not directly?' cried Targe, 'there is nobody in the garden to interrupt us.'

'I should have chosen to have settled some things first, but since you are in such a hurry, I will not balk you I will step home for my sword and be with you directly,' said Buchanan

The groom interposed, and endeavoured to reconcile the two enraged Scots, but without success. Buchanan soon arrived with his sword, and they retired to a private spot in the garden. The groom next tried to persuade them to decide their difference by fair boxing. This was rejected by both the champions as a mode of fighting unbecoming gentlemen. The groom asserted that the best gentlemen in England sometimes fought in that manner, and gave as an instance a boxing match, of which he himself had been a witness, between Lord G 's gentleman and a gentleman farmer at York races about the price of a mare

'Bnt our quarrel,' said Targe, 'is about the reputation of a queen'

'That, for certain,' replied the groom, 'makes a difference'

Buchanan unsheathed his sword

'Are you ready, sir?' cried Targe.

'Amen!' cried Targe, and the conflict began

Both the combatants understood the weapon they fought with, and each parried his adversary's blows with such dexterity that no blood was shed for some time. At length Targe, making a feint at Buchanan's head, gave him suddenly a severe wound in the thigh

'I liope you are now sensible of your error?' said

Targe, dropping his point

'I am of the same opinion I was' cried Buchanan 'so keep your guard' So saying, he advanced more briskly than ever upon Targe, who, after warding off several strokes, wounded his antagonist a second time Buchanan, however, shewed no disposition to relinquish the combat But this second wound being in the fore head, and the blood flowing with profusion into his eyes, he could no longer see distinctly, but was obliged to flourish his sword at random, without being able to per ceive the movements of his adversary, who, closing with him, became master of his sword, and with the same effort threw him to the ground, and, standing over him, he said 'This may convince you, Mr Buchanan, that yours is not the righteous cause. I on are in my power, but I will act as the queen whose character I defend would order were she alive. I hope you will live to repent of the injustice you have done to that amiable and unfortunate princess' He then assisted Buchanan to rise. Buchanan made no immediate answer when he saw Targe assisting the groom to stop the blood which flowed from his wounds, he said 'I must acknowledge, Mr Large, that you behave lile a gentle man '

After the bleeding was in some degree diminished by the dry lint which the groom, who was an excellent farrier, applied to the wounds, they assisted him to his chamber, and then the groom rode away to inform Mr N---- of what had happened But the wound becoming more painful, Targe proposed sending for a surgeon Buchanan then said that the surgeon's mate belonging to one of the ships of the British squadron then in the bay was, he believed, on shore, and as he was a Scotchman he would like to employ him rather than a foreigner Having mentioned where he lodged, one of Mr N----'s footmen went immediately for him. He returned soon after, saying that the surgeon's mate was not at his lodg ing, nor expected for some hours. 'But I will go and bring the French surgeon,' continued the footman

'I thank you, Mr Thomas,' said Buchanan, 'but I will have patience till my own countryman returns.'

'He may not return for a long time,' said Thomas.
'You had best let me run for the French surgeon, who, they say, has a great deal of skill.'

'I am obliged to you, Mr Thomas,' added Buchanan, 'but neither I renehman nor Spanishman shall dress my wounds when a Scottishman is to be found for love or money'

'They are to be found, for the one or the other, as I am credibly informed, in most parts of the world,' said Thomas.

'As my countrymen,' replied Buchanan, 'are distinguished for letting slip no means of improvement, it would be very strange if many of them did not use that of travelling, Mr Thomas.'

'It would be very strange indeed, I own it,' said the footman

'But are you certain of this young man's skill in his business when he does come at said Targe

'I confess I have had no opportunity to know any thing of his skill,' answered Buchanan, 'but I know for certain that he is sprung from very respectable people. It father is a minister of the gospel, and it is not likely that his father's son will be deficient in the profession to which he was bred'

'It would be still less likely had the son been bred to preaching '' said Targe.

'That is true,' replied Buchanan, 'but I have no doubt of the voung man's skill; he seems to be a very douct [discreet] lad. It will be an encouragement to him to see that I prefer him to another, and also a comfort to me to be attended by my countryman'

'Countryman or not countryman,' said Thomas, 'he will expect to be paid for his trouble as well as another'

'Assuredly,' said Buehanan, 'but it was always a maxim with me, and shall be to my dying day, that we should give our own fish guts to our own sea mews'

'Since you are so fond of your own sea mens,' said Thomas, 'I am surprised you were so eager to destroy Mr Targe there.'

'That proceeded from a difference in politics, Mr Thomas,' replied Buchanan, 'in which the best of friends are apt to have a misunderstanding, but though I am a Whig, and he is a Tory, I hope we are both honest men, and as he behaved generously when my life was in his power, I have no scruple in saying that I am sorry for having spoken disrespectfully of any person, dead or alive, for whom he has an esteem.'

'Mary, Queen of Scots, acquired the esteem of her very enemies,' resumed Targe 'The elegance and engaging sweetness of her manners were irresistible to every heart that was not steeled by prejudice or jealousy'

'She is now in the hands of a Judge,' said Buelianan, 'who can neither be seduced by fair appearances, nor imposed on by forgenes and fraud'

'She is so, Mr Buchanan,' replied Targe, 'and her rival and accusers are in the hands of the same Judge'

'We had best leave them all to His justice and mercy, then, and say no more on the subject,' added Buchanan, 'for if Queen Mary's conduct on earth was what vou believe it was, she will receive her reward in heaven, where her actions and sufferings are recorded'

'One thing more I will say,' rejoined Targe, 'and that is only to ask of you whether it is probable that a woman whose conscience was loaded with crimes imputed to her could have closed the varied scene of her life, and have met death with such serene and dignified courage, as Mary did?'

'I always admired that last awful seene,' replied Buchman, who was melted by the recollection of Mary's behaviour on the scaffold, 'and I will freely acknow ledge that the most innocent person that ever lived, or the greatest hero recorded in history, could not face death with greater composure than the queen of Scot land she supported the dignity of a queen while she displayed the meckness of a Christian'

"I am exceedingly sorry, my dear friend, for the mis understanding that happened between us' said Targe affectionately, and holding forth his hand in token of reconciliation 'and I am now willing to believe that your friend, Mr George Buchanan, was a very great poet, and understood Latin as well as any man alive!' Here the two friends shook hands with the utmost cordiality

The edition of Moore's works (7 vols. 1820) contains a Memoir by Dr Robert Anderson Zeluco is included in Mrs Barbauld's British Novelists

William Beckford (1760-1844), the author of Vallek, was born at Fonthill in the south-west of Wiltshire. He had as great a passion for building towers as the caliph himself, and both his fortune and his genius have something of Oriental splendour about them. His father, Alderman Beckford (1709-70), MP from 1753 for the City of London, and twice Lord Mayor, was a doughty

Whig, a rival almost of Wilkes, a man who, according to a somewhat doubtful story, dared to speak face to face with a king His only son, on coming of age, succeeded to a million of money and over £100,000 a year His education had been desultory and irregular, but under tutors at Geneva a literary taste already manifested itself. In his seven teenth year he wrote Memoirs of Extraordinary Painters (published in 1780), a burlesque guidebook to the pictures at Fonthill, which by means of wholly fictitious biographies deftly satirised both Dutch and English artists under feigned names His letters on his travels, 1780-82, in the Netherlands and Italy were printed in 1783, then suppressed, and reprinted in 1835, with omissions and additions, as Italy, with Sketches of Spain and Portugal, the restored text becoming available only in 1891 In 1782 he wrote Vathek 'I wrote it,' he told Cyrus Redding, 'at one sitting, and in It cost me three days and two nights of hard labour I never took my clothes off the whole time' As a matter of fact, he was working at it for most of a twelvemonth In 1783 he married a daughter of the Earl of Aboyne, and they lived in Switzerland until her death at Vevay in 1786, after bearing a second daughter, who married the Duke of Hamilton. Late in that same year appeared in London an English version of The History of the Caliph Vathek, an Arabian tale from an unpub lished manuscript, with notes critical and explana-Both translation and notes were made, with Beckford's co operation, by the Rev Samuel Henley, D D, rector of Rendlesham in Suffolk, and first Principal of Haileybury, but the publication was quite unauthorised, anticipating as it did two editions of the French original (Paris and Lausanne, Yet Henley's version it is that still holds the field, if altered somewhat in the third edition Beckford's travel pictures, though unequal and often disappointing, can yet be read with keen interest and pleasure. The point of view is some times startling, thus a modern art-lover is surprised to find that one of the things that chiefly attracted this great cognoscente to Holland was the prospect of revelling in Polemburgs! And Beckford does in so many words rank Cornelis van Poelenburgh (1586-1667) among the greatest painters of the Low Countries, and far above Rubens On the other hand, his raptures amid the sublime scenery of Alpine mountains and forests were compared with the finest things in Gray's letters Beckford was returned to Parliament for Wells

Beckford was returned to Parliament for Wells and Hindon, but his love of magnificence and his voluptuary tastes were ill suited to English society In 1794 he set off for Portugal with a retinue of thirty servants, and was absent about two years He was said to have built a palace at Cintra—that 'glorious Eden of the south,' and Byron referred to it in the first canto of Civilde Harold

There thou, too, Vathek! England's wealthiest son, Once formed thy paradise.

Byron had been misinformed Beckford built no 'paradise' at Cintra. But he left a literary memorial of his residence in Portugal in his Recollections of an Excursion to the Monasteries of Alcobaça and Batalha (1835) In 1796 he returned to England, and took up his residence permanently on his Wiltshire estate Two burlesque novels by him belong to this period-Modern Novel-writing, or the Elegant Enthustast (1796), and Azemia (1797), but they are tedious extravaganzas At Fonthill Beckford lived in a style of Oriental luxury and seclu-He built a wall of nine miles round his property to shut out visitors, but in 1800 his gates were thrown open to receive Lord Nelson and Sir William and Lady Hamilton, in lionour of whom he gave a series of splendid fetes

WILLIAM BECKFORD From an Engraving after Reynolds

Next year he sold the furniture and pictures of Fonthill, pulled down the old house with its great hall, and for years employed himself in rearing the magnificent but unsubstantial Gothic structure known as Fonthill Abbey, with a tower 278 feet high, which fell in ruins in 1825. In 1822 he sold the place for £330,000, retaining only family pictures and books, and went to live at Bath There he erected another costly building, Lansdowne House, which had a tower a hundred feet high, crowned with a model of the temple of Lysicrates at Athens, made of cast-iron 1 and there he died Beckford was one of the most magnificent of bibliophiles, some of his purchases being perfectly imperial. He bought Gibbon's library at Lausanne and handed it over to his physician His own splendid collection, which passed to his descendants the Dukes of Hamilton, was sold in 1882 for £43,000

Vathek was Byron's delight 'For correctness of costume, beauty of description, and power of imagination, this most Eastern and sublime tale surpasses all impations,' said the author of Childe Harold, 'as an Eastern tale even Rasselas must bow before it.' Voluptuousness and cynicism are strangely combined in the work. The hero is the grandson of Haroun al Raschid, whose dominions stretched from Africa to India, he is fearless, proud, inquisitive, gourmand, fond of theological controversy, cruel, and magnificent There cer tainly is much both of weirdness and of grandeur in some of the inventions, the catastrophe has real epic sublimity, and the conception of the vast multitude incessantly pacing the halls from which all hope has fled is Dantesque. Numberless graces of description, piquant allusions, humour and satire, and a wild yet witty spirit of mockery and derision diversify and distinguish a romance which gives Beckford a place of his own among our imaginative writers, even apart from the surprise excited by the work of a youth of twenty-two, who had never been in the countries described so vividly. But the work is conspicuously unequal. Only sometimes is the romancer convincing, often he fails of his intended effect, there are many passages of mere incredible phantasmagoria, and some of sheer duliness

The Caliph Vathek and his Palaces

Vathek, minth caliph of the race of the Abbusides, was the son of Motassem, and the grindson of Haroun al Raschid. From an early accession to the throne, and the talents he possessed to ndorn it, his subjects were induced to expect that his reign would be long and happy. His figure was pleasing and majestic, but when he was angry, one of his eyes became so terrible that no person could bear to behold it, and the wretch upon whom it was fixed instantly fell backward, and sometimes expired. For fear, however, of depopulating his dominions and making his palace desolate, he but rarcly gave way to his anger.

Being much addicted to women and the pleasures of the table, he sought by his affability to procure agree able companions, and he succeeded the better as his generosity was unbounded and his indulgences unre strained, nor did he think, with the caliph Omar Ben Abdalaziz, that it was necessary to make a hell of this world to enjoy paradise in the next.

He surpassed in magnificence nll lis predecessors. The palace of Alkoremini, which his father, Motassem, had erected on the hill of Pied Horses, and which commanded the whole city of Samurah, was in his idea far too scanty, he added, therefore, five wings, or rather other palaces, which he destined for the particular gratification of each of his senses. In the first of these were tables continually covered with the most exquisite dainties, which were supplied both by night and by day, according to their constant consumption, whilst the most dehcious wines and the choicest cordials flowed forth from a hundred fountains that were never exhausted. This palace was called the Eternal, or Unsatiating Banquet. The second was styled the Temple of Melody, or the Nectar of the Soul. It was inhibited by the most shiffil musicians and admired poets of the time, who not only displayed their talents within, but dispersing in bands without, caused every surrounding scene to reverberate their songs, which were continually varied in the most delightful succession

The palace named the Delight of the Lyes, or the Support of Memory, was one entire enchantment. Rarities collected from every corner of the curth were there found in such profusion as to duzzle and confound, but for the order in which they were arranged. One gallery exhibited the pictures of the celebrated Mani [the founder of the Manichreans, who was famed as a ningician and painter), and statues that seemed to be alise. Here a well managed perspective attracted the sight, there the magic of optics agreeably deceived it, whilst the naturalist, on his part, exhibited in their several classes the various gifts that Heaven had bestowed on our globe. In a word, Vithel omitted nothing in this palace that might gratify the curiosity of those who resorted to it, although he was not able to satisfy his own, for he was of all men the most curious

The Palace of Perfumes, which was termed blewise the Incentive to Pleasure, consisted of various halls, where the different perfumes which the earth produces were kept perpetually burning in censers of gold. Flumbeaux and aromatic lamps were here lighted in open day. But the too powerful effects of this agree able dehrium might be alleviated by descending into an immense garden, where an assemblage of every fragrant flower diffused through the air the purest odours.

The fifth palace, denominated the Retreat of Mirth, or the Dangerous, was frequented by troops of young females, beautiful as the Houris and not less seducing, who never failed to receive with careses all whom the caliph allowed to approach them and enjoy a few hours of their company. For he was by no means jealous, as his own women were seeluded within the palace he inhabited himself.

Notwithstanding the sensuality in which I athek in dulged, he experienced no abatement in the love of his people, who thought that a sovereign immersed in pleasure was not less tolerable to his subjects than one that employed limiself in creating them foes. But the unquiet and impetuous disposition of the caliph would not allow him to rest there. He had studied so much for his amusement in the lifetime of his father as to acquire a great deal of knowledge, though not a sufficiency to satisfy limiself, for he wished to know everything, even sciences that did not exist. He was fond of engaging in disputes with the learned, but did not allow them to push their opposition with warmth. He stopped with presents the mouths of those whose mouths could be stopped, whilst others, whom his liberality was unable to subdue, he sent to prison to cool their blood, a remedy that often succeeded Vathel discovered also a predilection for theological controversy, but it was not with the orthodox that he usually held. By this means he induced the zealots to oppose him, and then persecuted them in return, for he resolved nt anymate to have reason on his side.

The great prophet Mahomet, whose vicars the caliplis are, beheld with indignation from his abode in the seventh lieuven the irreligious conduct of such a vicegerent 'Let us leave him to himself,' said he to the genn, who are always ready to receive his com mands, 'let us see to what lengths his folly and implets will carry him, if he run into excess, we shall know how to chastise him. Assist him, therefore, to complete the tower, which, in imitation of Nimrod, he hath begun, not, like that great warrior, to escape being drowned, but from the insolent curiosity of pene trating the secrets of Heaven he will not divine the fate that awaits him.'

The genii obeyed, and, when the workmen had raised their structure a cubit in the daytime, two cubits more were added in the night. The expedition with which the fabric arose was not a little flattering to the vanity of Vathek he fancied that even insensible matter shewed a forwardness to subserve his designs, not considering that the successes of the foolish and wicked form the first rod of their chastisement

His pride arrived at its height when, having ascended for the first time the fifteen hundred stairs of his tower, he east his eyes below, and beheld men not larger than pismires, mountains than shells, and cities than bee hives. The idea which such an elevation inspired of his own grandeur completely bewildered him, he was almost ready to adore himself, till, lifting his eyes upward, he saw the stars as high above him as they appeared when he stood on the surface of the earth. He concoled himself, however, for this intruding and unwelcome perception of his littleness, with the thought of being great in the eyes of others, and flattered him self that the light of his mind would extend beyond the reach of his sight, and extort from the stars the decrees of his destiny

The Hall of Eblis.

In this manner they advanced by moonlight till they came within view of the two towering rocks that form a kind of portal to the valley, at the extremity of which rose the vast ruins of Istakar Aloft, on the mountain. glimmered the fronts of various royal mausoleums, the horror of which was deepened by the shadows of night. They passed through two villages, almost deserted, the only inhabitants remaining being a few feeble old men, who, at the sight of horses and litters, fell upon their knees and cried out 'O heaven' is it then by these phantoms that we have been for six months formented? Alas it was from the terror of these spectres, and the noise beneath the monntains, that our people have fled, and left us at the mercy of the maleficent spirits!' The caliph, to whom these complaints were but unpromising augures, drove over the bodies of these wretched old men, and at length arrived at the foot of the terrace of black marhle. There he descended from his litter, handing down Nouromhar, both, with beating hearts, stared wildly around them, and expected. with an apprehensive shudder, the approach of the Giaonr But nothing as yet announced his appearance.

A deathlike stillness reigned over the mountain and through the air. The moon dilated on a vast platform the shades of the lofty columns which reached from the terrace almost to the clonds. The gloomy watch towers, whose number could not be counted, were covered by no roof, and their capitals, of an architecture nnknown in the records of the earth, served as an asylum for the birds of night, which, alarmed at the approach of such visitants, fled away croaking

The chief of the cunnels, trembling with fear, besought Vathek that a fire might be kindled 'No,' replied he,

'there is no time left to think of such trifles, abide where thou art, and expect my commands' Having thus spoken, he presented his hand to Nonronihar, and, ascending the steps of a vast staircase, reached the terrace, which was flagged with squares of marble, and resembled a smooth expanse of water, npon whose surface not a blade of grass ever dared to vegetate. On the right ro e the watch towers, ranged before the ruins of an immense palace, whose walls were embossed with various figures
In front stood forth the colossal forms of four creatures, composed of the leopard and the griffin, and though hut of stone, inspired emotions of terror Near these were distinguished, by the splen dour of the moon, which streamed full on the place, characters like those on the sabres of the Giaour, and which possessed the same virtue of changing every These, after vacillating for some time, fixed at last in Arabie letters, and prescribed to the caliph the following words 'Vathek! thou hast violated the con ditions of my parchment, and deservest to be sent back, hut in favour to thy companion, and, as the meed for what thou hast done to obtain it, Eblis permitteth that the portal of his palace shall be opened, and the sub terranean fire will receive thee into the number of its

He scarcely had read these words before the moun tain against which the terrace was reared trembled, and the watch towers were ready to topple headlong upon them. The rock jawned, and disclosed within it a staircase of polished marble that seemed to approach the abyss. Upon each stair were planted two large torches, like those Nouronihar had seen in her vision, the camphorated vapour of which ascended and gathered itself into a cloud under the hollow of the vault.

The caliph and Nouronihar beheld each other with amazement at finding themselves in a place which, though roofed with a vaulted ceiling, was so spacious and lofty that at first they took it for an immeasurable But their eyes at length growing familiar to the grandeur of the surrounding objects, they extended their view to those at n distance, and discovered rows of columns and arcades, which gradually diminished till they terminated in a point radiant as the sun when he darts his last beams athwart the ocean The pavement, strewed over with gold dust and saffron, exhaled so subtle an odour as almost overpowered them however, went on, and observed an infinity of censers, in which ambergris and the wood of aloes were con tinually burning

In the midst of this immense hall n vast multitude was incessantly passing, who severally kept their right hands on their hearts, without once regarding anything around them. They had all the livid paleness of death. Their eyes, deep sunk in their sockets, resembled those phosphoric meteors that glimmer by night in places of interment. Some stalked slowly on, absorbed in profound reverie, some, shrieking with agony, ran furiously about like tigers wounded with poisoned arrows, whilst others, grinding their teeth in rage, foamed along more frantic than the wildest maniac. They all avoided each other, and though surrounded by a multitude that no one could number, each wandered at random, unheedful of the rest, as if alone on a desert where no foot lind trodden.

After some time, Vathek and Nouronihar perceived a gleam brightening through the drapery, and entered n forms of the pre Adamite kings who had been monarchs of the whole earth. They still possessed enough of life to be conscious of their deplorable condition. Their eyes retained a melancholy motion, they regarded one and her with looks of the deepe t dejection, each holding his right hand motionless on his heart. At their feet were inscribed the events of their several reigns, their power, their pride, and their crimes, Soliman Raad, Soliman Daki, and Soliman Gian Ben Gian, who after having chained up the dives in the dark events of Kaf, became so presumptions as to doubt of the Supreme Power. All these maintained great state, though not to be compared with the eminence of Soliman Ben Daoud [Solomon, the son of David].

This king, so renowned for his wisdom, was on the loftiest elevation, and placed immediately under the dome. He appeared to possess more animation than the rest. Though, from time to time, he laboured with profound sighs, and, like his companions, kept his right of Life (1900).

Such was, and such should be, the punishment of urres rained prisons and atropous deeds. Such stall be the cliest sement of that blind curve is which would transfer those bounds the wisdom of the Creater has prescribed to Luman Frowledge, and such the dreadful disappointment of that restless ambition which aming at discoveries reserved for beings of a supernatural order, perceives not, through its infetuated pride that the condition of man upon earth is to be humble and ignorant.

Gilbert White.

Gilbert White (1720-93), the most charming of all English writers on the natural history of their country, was born at Selborne in Hampshire, and educated with the Wartons at their father's vicarage at Basingstoke whence he passed to Oriel After obtaining a fellowship College, Oxford. there, he took orders in 1747, and in 1751 became curate of his native parish. Next year he was back in Oxford, as senior proctor at the university, but in 1755 returned to Selborne, where he passed the rest of his uneventful life, enjoying, after the fashion of that comfortable age of pluralism, one or two college curacies as well as the equally sinecure It ing of Morton Pinkney in Northamptonshire. He was never married, but once fell deep in love with Miss Mulso (better known as the exceilent and edifying Mrs Chapone), who declined The two series of letters to Thomas his hand Pennant, the naturalist and traveller, and the Hon Daines Barrington, which form his delightful Natural History and Artiquities of Schorne, were beaun in 1767, and published in 1789. The minuteness and general accuracy of his observa t on and the simple skill and unaffected grace of his style, though not vithout a touch of eighteenthcentury formulity here and there, have given White the same classic rank as Isaac Walton, and it is probable that the Natural History of Selborne has sent as many boys to intelligent bird nesting as the Compleat Ingler has to the rod and hook. In one of the letters White tells that he used to carry a list in his pocket of the birds to be remarked on, and that, as he rode or walked about, he noted each day the continuance or omission of each birds song

Old Trees

In the court of Norton farmhouse, a manor farm to the north west of the village, on the white malms, stood within these twenty years a broad leaved clim, or vych hazel, Climia foito late imo scabro of Ray, which, though it liad los' a considerable leading bough in the great storm in the year 1703, equal to a moderate tree, yet, when felled, contained eight loads of timber, and, being too bull v for a carriage, vas say n off at seven feet above the butt, where it measured near eight feet in the diameter. This clim I mention to show to what a bulk planted elims may attain as this tree must certainly have been such from its situation.

In the centre of the village, and near the church, is a square piece of ground surrounded by houses, and vilgarly called 'The Plestor' [i e. Pleystowe, or playing place]. In the midst of this spot stood, in old times, a vast oak, with a short squat body, and huge horizontal arms extending almost to the extremity of the area. This venerable tree, surrounded with stone steps, and seats above them, was the delight of old and young, and a place of much resort in summer evenings, where the former sat in grave debate, while the latter frolicked and danced before them. Long might it have stood, had not the amazing tempest in 1703 overturned it at once, to the infinite regret of the inhabitants, and the vicar, who bestowed several pounds in setting it in its place aguin but all liss care could not avail, the true sprouted for a time, then withered and died. This oak I mention to show to what a bulk planted oaks also may arrive and planted this tree must certainly have been, as vill appear from what will be said farther concerning this area when we enter on the antiquities of Selborne.

On the Blackmoor estate there is a small wood called Losel's, of a few acres, that was lately furnished with a set of oaks of a peculiar growth and great value, they were tall and taper life firs, but standing near together liad very small heads, only a little brush without any large limbs. About twenty years ago the bridge at the Toy, near Hampton Court, being much decayed, some trees were wanted for the repairs that were fifty feet long, without bough, and vould measure twelve inches diameter at the little end. Twenty such trees did a purveyor find in this little wood with this advantage, that many of them answered the description at sixty feet. These trees were sold for twenty pounds apiece.

In the centre of this grove there stood an oak, which, though shapely and tall on the whole, bulged out into a large excrescence about the middle of the stem. On this a pair of ravens had fixed their residence for such a series of years that the oak was distinguished by the title of the Raven Tree Many were the attempts of the neigh bouring youths to get at this eye, the difficulty whetted their inclinations, and each was ambitious of surmounting the arduous task But when they arrived at the swell ing it jutted out so in their way, and was so far beyond their grasp, that the most daring lads were awed, and acknowledged the undertaking to be too liazardous so the ravens built on, nest upon nest, In perfect security, till the fital day arrived in which the wood was to be levelled. It was in the month of February, when these birds usually sit. The saw was applied to the butt,the wedges were inserted into the opening,-the woods echoed to the heavy blow of the beetle or mall or mallet,-the tree nodded to its fall, but still the dam sat on. At last, when it gave way, the bird was flung from her nest, and, though her parental affection de served a better fite, was whipped down by the twigs, which brought her dead to the ground

Vanished Game

This lonely domain is a very agreeable haunt for many sorts of wild fowls, which no only frequent it in the winter, but breed there in the summer, such as lap wings, snipes, wild ducks, and, as I have discovered within these few years, teals. Partridges in vast plenty are bred in good seasons on the verge of this forest, into which they love to make excursions, and in particular, in the dry summers of 1740 and 1741, and some years after, they swarmed to such a degree that parties of unreasonable sportsmen killed twenty and sometimes thirty brace in a day

But there was a nobler species of game in this forest, now extinct, which I have heard old people say abounded much before shooting flying became so common, and that was the heath cock, black game, or grouse. When I was a little boy I recollect one coming now and then to my father's table. The last pack remembered was I illed about thirty five years ago, and within these ten years one solitary grey hen was sprung by some beagles in beating for a hare. The sportsmen cried out, 'A hen pheasant' but a gentleman present, who had often seen

Migration of the Swallows If ever I saw anything like actual migration, it was last Michaelmas Day I was travelling and out early in the morning, at first there was a vist for but by the time that I was got seven or eight miles from home towards the coast, the sun broke out into a delicate warm day. We were then on a large heath or common, and I could discern, as the mist began to break away great numbers of swallows (Hirundines rustica) clustering on the stunted shrubs and bushes, as if they had roo ted there all night. As soon as the air became clear and pleasant they were all on the wing at once and, by a placed and easy flight, proceeded on continuard towards be found in most most postures, by the siles of streams and under hidges. These rishe are in hes condition in the height of sammer, but may be gathered, so as it serve the purpose well, quite on to an unin. It would be needless to add that the larges and longest are best. Decayed labourers, women, and children make it their histories to produce and prepare them. As soon of they are cut they must be fining into water and kept there, for otherwise they will dry and shrink and the peel will not run. At first a person would find it no easy matter to divest a rush of its peel or rind so as to leave one regular, narrow even rib from top to bottom that may support the pith but this his other feats soon becomes familiar even to children, and we have seen an old woman, stone blind, performing this business with great dispatch, and seldom failing to strip them with the nicest regularity. When these junci are thus far prepared, they must lie out on the grass to be bleached, and take the dew for some nights, and afterwards be dried in the

Some address is required in dipping these rushes in the scalding fat or grease, but this knack also is to be attained by practice. The careful wife of an industrious Hampshire labourer obtains all her fat for nothing, for she saves the scummings of her bacon pot for this use, and if the grease abounds with salt, she causes the salt to precipitate to the bottom, by setting the scummings in Where hogs are not much in use, and a warm oven especially by the sea side, the coarser animal oils will come very cheap A pound of common grease may be procured for fourpence, and about six pounds of grease will dip a pound of rushes, and one pound of rushes may be bought for one shilling, so that a pound of rushes, medicated and ready for use, will cost three If men that keep bees will mix a little wax with the grease, it will give it a consistency and render at more cleanly, and make the rushes burn longer, mutton suct would have the same effect.

A good rush, which measured in length two feet four inches and a half, being minnted, burnt only three minutes short of an hour, and a rush of still greater length has been known to burn one hour and a quarter

These rushes give a good clear light Watch lights (coated with tailow), it is true, shed a dismal one, 'dark ness visible,' but then the wick of those have two ribs of the rind, or peel, to support the pith, while the wick of the dipped rush has but one The two ribs are intended to impede the progress of the flame and make the candle last

In a pound of dry rushes, avoirdupois, which I caused to be weighed and numbered, we found upwards of one thousand six hundred individuals. Now suppose each of these burns, one with another, only half an liour, then a poor man will purchase eight hundred hours of light, a time exceeding thirty three entire days, for three shillings. According to this account each rush, before dipping, costs t'x of a farthing, and t'r afterwards. Thus a poor family will enjoy five and a half hours of comfortable light for a farthing. An experienced old housekeeper assures me that one pound and a half of rushes completely supplies his family the year round, since working people burn no candles in the long days, because they rise and go to bed by day light.

Little farmers use rushes much in the short days both morning and evening, in the dairy and kitchen, but the very poor, who are always the worst economists, and therefore must continue very poor, bny a halfpenny candle every evening, which in their blowing open rooms does not burn much more than two hours. Thus have they only two hours' light for their money instead of eleven

While on the subject of rural economy, it may not be improper to mention a pretty implement of housewifers that we have seen nowhere else, that is, little next besoms which our foresters make from the stalks of the Poly'richum commune, or great golden maiden hair, which they call silk wood, and find plenty in the bogs. When this moss is well combed and dressed, and divested of its onter slim, it becomes of a beautiful bright-chestnut colonr, and, being soft and plant, is very proper for the dusting of beds, curtains, carpets, hangings, &c. If these besoms were known to the brush makers in town, it is probable they might come much in use for the purpose above mentioned

The Rooks returning to their Nests

The evening proceedings and manœuvres of the rooks are curious and amusing in the autumn Just before dusk, they return in long strings from the foraging of the day, and rendezvous by thousands over Selborne Down, where they wheel round in the air, and sport and dive in a playful manner, all the while everting their voices, and making a loud cawing, which, being blended and softened by the distance that we at the village are below them, becomes a confused noise or chiding, or rather a pleasing mirmur, very engaging to the imagina tion, and not unlike the cry of a pack of hounds in hollow, cchoing woods, or the rushing of the wind in tall trees, or the tumbling of the tide upon a pebbly shore. When this ceremony is over, with the last gleam of day they retire for the night to the deep beechen woods of Tisted and Ropley We remember a little girl who, as she was going to bed, used to remark on such an occurrence, in the true spirit of physico-theology, that the rooks were saying their prayers, and yet this child was much too young to be aware that the Scriptures have said of the Dcity, that 'He feedeth the ravens who call npon Him'

In 1893 Whites centenary was cele brated at Selborne where his house. The Wakes still stands.

At thur Young (1741-1820), author of Travels in France, and famous for the work he did in promoting the interests of agriculture, was born in London, but was the son of the rector of Bradfield near Burv St Edmunds Bred for a countinghouse, he in 1763 rented a firm of his mother's, on which he made 3000 experiments and lost much A large farm in Essex (1766-77) nearly money ruined him, for two years he was in Ireland, and then resumed farming at Bradfield, but without any financial success. But he had learnt much, and was well inspired to turn his knowledge to good account. In 1767 he made the first of his famous tours, the record of which, A Six Wieks Tour, expounded to the public for the first time the facts and principles of Norfolk husbandry, tours in the south of England, the northern counties, &c., followed, in 1771 he issued The Farmer's Calendar (which reached a twenty first edition in 1862) After 1783 he edited a periodical, The Annals of Agriculture, to which King George III was an A list of his published occasional contributor Letters of a Farmer, essays, pamphlets, &c. on subjects of rural economy, the poor laws, taxation, &c., would fill a page, but the most important of Young's works are his Tour in Ireland (1780) and a great city The society for a man of letters, or who has any scientific pursuit, cannot be exceeded intercourse between such men and the great, which, if it is not upon an equal footing, ought never to exist at all, is respectable. Persons of the highest rank pay an attention to science and literature, and emulate the character they confer I should pity the man who expected, without other advantages of a very different nature, to be well received in a brilliant circle at London because he was a Fellow of the Royal Society But this would not be the case with a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, he is sure of a good reception everywhere. Perhaps this contrast depends in a great measure on the difference of the governments of the two countries Politics are too much attended to in England to allow a due respect to be paid to anything else, and should the French establish a freer government, academicians will not be held in such estimation, when rivalled in the public esteem by the orators who hold forth liberty and property in a free parliament.

A French Family Party

The 27th [Sept. 1788] Among my letters, one to Mons, de la Livoniere, perpetual secretary of the Society of Agriculture here I found he was at his country seat, two leagues off at Mignianne On my arrival at his seat, he was sitting down to dinner with his family, not being past twelve, I thought to have escaped this awkwardness, but both himself and madame prevented all embarrassment by very unaffectedly desiring me to partake with them, and making not the least derangement either in table or looks, placed me at once at my ease, to an indifferent dinner, garnished with so much ease and cheerfulness that I found it a repast more to my taste than the most splendid tables could afford. An English family in the country, similar in situation, taken unawares in the same way, would receive you with an unquiet hospitality and an anxious politeness, and after waiting for a hurry scurry derangement of cloth, table, plates, sideboard, pot and spit, would give you perhaps so good a dinner that none of the family, between anxiety and fatigue, could supply one word of conversation, and you would depart under cordial wishes that you might never return. This folly, so common in England, is never met with in France the French are quiet in their houses, and do things without effort.-Mons. Livoniere conversed with me much on the plan of my travels, which he commended greatly, but thought it very extraordinary that neither Government, nor the Academy of Sciences, nor the Academy of Agriculture, should at least be at the expense of my journey This idea is purely French, they have no notion of private people going ont of their way for the public good, without being paid by the public, nor could he well comprehend me when I told him that everything is well done in England, except what is done with public money I was greatly con cerned to find that he could give me no intelligence concerning the residence of the late Marquis de Tourbilly, as it would be a provoling circumstance to pass all through the province without finding his house, and afterward hear perhaps that I had been ignorantly within a few miles of it. In the evening returned to Angers .- 20 miles

Francis Grose (1731–91), antiquary, was born at Greenford in Middlesex, son of a rich Swiss jeweller settled at Richmond. In the Heralds' College from 1755 till 1763, he next became adjutant of the Hampshire and Surrey Militiaa historic service, for it was in the Hampshire Militia that Gibbon and Mitford served-and, when his easy habits had cost him his fortune, put to profit the favourite studies of his youth and his excellent draughtsmanship His Antiquities of England and Wales (1773-87) proved a success, and in 1789 he set out on an antiquarian tour through Scotland His splendid social qualities, his rich humour and good nature, made him friends everywhere-Burns one of them He went to Ireland on a like errand, but died suddenly in Grose's work on the antiquities of Scotland (to which Burns contributed 'Tam o' Shanter,' commended by the friendly editor as a 'pretty poem'l) appeared 1789-91, that on Ireland in Other works were A Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue (1785, new ed with Memoir by Pierce Egan, 1823), A Provincial Glossary (1787), Treatise on Ancient Armour and Weapons (1785-89), Military Antiquities (1786-88), The Grumbler (1791), and The Olio (1793)

Richard Gough (1735-1809), antiquary, born in London, published British Topography (1768), Sepulchral Monuments of Great Britain (1786-99), an English version of Camden's Britainia (1789), and more than a score of other works, historical, archæological, topographical, and numismatical

Dr Richard Farmer (1735-97), born at Leicester, and ultimately master of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, published an Essay on the Learning of Shakspeare (1767), which put an end to the dispute concerning the classical attainments of the great dramatist. Farmer certainly showed that Shakespeare had implicitly followed English translations of the ancient authors—as North's Plutarch—copying even their errors. He was indolent, but was a brilliant talker as well as an accomplished scholar

Edmund Malone (1741-1812), editor of Shakespeare, was born in Dublin, the son of an Irish judge, and graduated at Trinity College. Called to the Irish Bar in 1767, he fell into a fortune, and from 1777 devoted himself to literary work in London, his first publication being a 'supplement' to Steevens's version of Johnson's edition of Shakespeare (1778), see Vol. I of this work, p 376 Malone's own edition of the great dramatist (1790) was warmly received, and deservedly so, his learned dissertations on the history of the stage and on the genuineness of the three plays of Henry VI especially attracted notice. He had been one of the first to express his disbelief in Chatterton's Royley Poems, and in 1796 he denounced Ireland's forgeries He wrote a Life of his friend Sir Joshua Reynolds, he edited Dryden, with a memoir, and he left behind a large mass of materials for 'The Variorum Shakespeare,' edited in 1821 by James Boswell the younger See the Life by Sir James Prior (1860)

Samuel Parr (1747-1825), 'the Whig Johnson,' was better known as a classical scholar than as a theologian, but probably owed the extraordinary fame he enjoyed to his extraordinary and amazing powers as a talker, though even here he was very inferior to his prototype—he had Johnson's pomposity, love of antithesis, and roughness without his deeper gifts His collected worls (8 vols 8vo, 1828) deal with matters historical, critical, metaphysical, there are sermons and a mass of unarranged correspondence, but nothing here justifies or even explains his great reputation. His style is mannered and verbose to a degree, and nothing of his is now read His Characters of Fox (1809) is his best-known work, it discusses Charles James Fox in various aspects, argues for reform of the criminal law, and is as usual overlaid with notes His celebrated Spital sermon preached before the Lord Mayor at Easter 1800 displays in its printed form fifty one pages of text and two hundred and twelve of notes Sydney Smith humorously compared the sermon to Dr Parr's wig, which, 'while it tresposed a little on the orthodox magnitude of perukes in the anterior parts, scorned even episcopal limits behind, and swelled out into boundless convenity of frizz,' Godwin attacked some of the principles laid down in this discourse, as not sufficiently democratic for his taste, for, though a staunch Whig, Dr Parr was no revolutionist or leveller-his aim was to ameliorate the condition of the poor by education and other constitutional means Parr, born a surgeon's son at Harrow, was educated at Harrow and Cambridge, taught at Harrow, was headmaster of Norwich grammar-school (1778-86), held a series of livings, on one of which, at Hatton near Warwick, he spent the latter half of his life An uncompromising Whig, he hated Evangelicals, and was theologically of the anti-mysterious school of Palcy and Watson De Quincey's-somewhat unfair-essay on Whiggism and literature contains a brilliant criticism of Parr

William Coxe (1747-1828) was born in London, and from Eton passed to King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow in 1768 As tutor to the sons of four persons of quality, he spent most of twenty years on the Continent, and published accounts of his travels in Switzerland (1778-1801), and in Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark (1778-84) His History of the House of Austria (1807) became at once the standard English authority on that subject, and his Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole (1798) and of Marlborough (1816-19)-not to speak of other historical works -were important as containing letters private, official, and diplomatic, with other details drawn from manuscript collections, though he was rather a dull writer, a partisan Whig, and as a biographer apt to magnify the merits and sink the defects of his hero. He died, a prebendary of Salisbury and Archdeacon of Wilts, at Bemerton rectory

William Mitford (1744-1827), author of the famous History of Greece, was of Northumbnan stock but born in London, and educated at Cheam School, Surrey, and Queen's College, Oxford. He studied law, but on his father's death succeeded to the family estate at Exbury in Hampshire, where, devoting himself mainly to the study of Greek litera ture, he lived till his death. His first publication was an Essay on the Harmony of Language (1774, While in the militia he published a Treatise on the Military Force, and particularly of the Militia of the Kingdom-a subject which engrossed much of his attention, and when a member of the House of Commons lie advocated the cause of the militia with much fervour, recommending a salutary jealousy of a standing army. On the suggestion of Gibbon, a fellow officer in the South Hampshire Militia, he undertook his great work, The History of Greece (1784-1810, new editions repeatedly till 1835) Byron sketched his characteristics 'His great pleasure consists in praising tyrants, abusing Plutarch, spelling oddly, and writing quaintly, and what is strange, after all, its is the best modern History of Greece in any language, and he is perhaps the best of all modern historians Having named his sins,' adds the whatsoever courteous critic, 'it is but fur to state his virtueslearning, labour, research, wrath, and partiality call the latter virtues in a writer, because they make him write in earnest? The earnestness of Mitford is too often directed against 'the inherent weakness and the indelible burbarism of democratical government. He was a warm admirer of the English constitution and of the monarchical form of government, and a functical enemy of This bias led him to be French republicanism unjust to the Athenian people, 'the sovereign beggars of Athens' And while he unhesitatingly accepted all the good he found credited to monarchs and tyrants, he was apt to exaggerate or overstate defects charged against democracies and democrats Philip of Macedonia was a great statesman, Demosthenes a mere noisy demagogue. But, as Byron said, his pugnacious zeal to prove his case made him diligent in minute research, his book surpassed all earlier English works on the subject, and held the field till the appear ance of the fairer and more scholarly works of Thirlwall and Grote Freeman, an uncompromising critic, said of Mitford that he was 'a bad scholar, a bad historian, and a bad writer of English,' but yet 'the first writer of any note who found out that Greenan history was a living thing with a practical bearing' Mitford wrote also on the Corn Laws and on design in architecture.

Condemnation and Death of Socrates

We are not informed when Socrates first became distinguished as a Sophist, for in that description of men he was in his own day reckoned. When the wit of Aristophanes was directed against him in the theatre, he was already among the most emineut, but his eminence seems to have been then recent. It was about the tenth or eleventh year of the Peloponnesian war, when he was six or seven and forty years of age, that, after the manner of the old comedy, he was offered to public derision upon the stage by his own name, as one of the persons of the drama, in the comedy of Aristophanes called The Clouds, which is yet extant

Two or three and twenty years had elapsed since the first representation of The Clouds, the storms of conquest suffered from a foreign enemy, and of four revolutious in the civil government of the country, had passed, nearly three years had followed of that quiet which the revolution under Thrasyhulus produced, and the act of amnesty should have confirmed, when a young man named Melitus went to the king archon, and in the usual form delivered an information against Socrates, and bound himself to prosecute The information ran thus 'Melitus, son of Melitus, of the borough of Pitthos, declares these upon oath against Socrates, son of Sophroniscus, of the borough of Alopece Socrates is guilty of reviling the gods whom the city acknowledges, and of preaching other new gods moreover, he is guilty of corrupting the youth Penalty, death.

Xenophon begins his Memorials of his revered master with declaring his wonder how the Athenians could have been persuaded to coudemn to death a man of such uncommonly clear innocence and evalted worth. Ælian, though for authority he can bear no comparison with Xenophon, has nevertheless, I think, given the 'Socrates,' he says, 'disliked the Athenian constitution, for he saw that democracy is tyrannical, and abounds with all the evils of absolute monarchy? But though the political circumstances of the times made it necessary for contemporary writers to speak with caution, yet both \enophou and Plato liave declared enough to shew that the assertion of Ælian was well founded, and further proof, were it wanted, may be derived from another early writer, nearly contemporary, and deeply versed in the politics of his age, the orttor Aschines Indeed, though not stated in the indictment, yet it was urged against Socrates by his prosecutors before the court, that he was disaffected to the democracy, and in proof, they affirmed it to be notorious that he had ridiculed what the Athenian constitution prescribed, the appointment to magistracy 'Thus,' they said, 'he taught his numerous followers, youths of the principal families of the city, to despise the established government, and to be tur bulent and seditious, and his success had been seen in the conduct of two of the most eminent, Alcihiades Even the best things he converted to and Critias from the most esteemed poets, these ill purposes and particularly from Homer, he selected passages to enforce his anti-democratical principles '

Socrates, it appears, indeed, was not inclined to deny list disapprobation of the Athenian constitution. His defence itself, as it is reported by Plato, contains matter on which to found an accusation against him of dis affection to the sovereignty of the people, such as, under the jealous tyranny of the Athenian democracy, would sometimes subject a man to the penalties of high treason. 'You well I now,' he says, 'Athenians, that had I engaged in public business, I should long ago have perished without procuring any advantage either to you or to myself. Let not the truth offend you it is no peculiarity of your democracy, or of your national character, but wherever the people is sovereign, no man who shall dare honestly to oppose injustice—frequent and extravagant injustice—can avoid destruction.

Without this proof, judeed, we might reasonably believe that though Socrates was a good and faithful subject of the Athenian government, and vould promote no sedition, no political violence, yet he could not like the Athenian constitution. He wished for whole some changes by gentle means, and it seems even to have been a principal object of the labours to which he dedicated himself, to infuse principles into the rising generation that might bring about, the desirable change insensibly

Melitus, who stood forward as his principal accuser. was, as Plato informs us, noway a man of any great consideration. His legal description gives some probability to the conjecture that his father was one of the commissioners sent to Lacedæmon from the moderate party, who opposed the ten successors of the thirty tyrants, while Thrasybulus held Pireus, and Pausanias was encamped before Athens. He was a poet, and stood forward as in a common cause of the poets, who esteemed the doctrine of Socrates injurious to their interest. Unsupported, his accusation would have been little formidable, but he seems to have been a mere instrument in the business. He was soon joined by Lycon, one of the most powerful speakers of his time Lycon was the avowed patron of the rhetoricians, who, as well as the poets, thought their interest injured by the moral philosopher's doctrine. I know not that on any other occasion in Grecian history we have any account of this kind of party interest operating, but from circumstances nearly analogous in our own country -if we substitute for poets the clergy, and for rheto ricians the lawvers-we may gather what might be the party spirit, and what the weight of influence of the rhetoricians and poets in Athens. With Lycon, Anytus, a man scarcely second to any 111 the commonwealth in rank and general estimation, who had held high command with reputation in the Peloponnesian war, and had been the principal associate of Thrasybulus in the war against the thirty, and the restoration of the democracy, declared himself a supporter of the prosecution. Nothing in the accusation could, by any known law of Atheus, affect the life of the accused England no man would be put upon trial on so vague a charge-no grand jury would listen to it. But In Athens, if the party was strong enough, it signified little what was the law When Lycon and Anytus came forward, Socrates saw that his condemnation was already decided

By the course of his life, however, and by the turn of his thoughts for many years, he had so prepared himself for all events, that, far from alarmed at the probability of his condemnation, he rather rejoiced at it, as at his age a fortunate occurrence. He was persuaded of the soul's immortality, and of the superintending providence of an all good Deity, whose favour lie had always been assiduously endeavouring to deserve. Men fear death, he said, as if unquestionably the greatest evil, and vet no man knows that it may not be the greatest good. If, indeed, great joys were in prospect, he might, and his friends for him, with somewhat more reason, regret the event, but at his years, and with his scanty fortune—though he was happy enough at seventy still to preserve both body and mind in vigour—yet even his present gratifications must necessarily soon decay. To avoid, therefore, the evils of age, pain, sickness, decay of sight, decay of hearing, perhaps decay of understanding, by the easiest of deaths (for such the Athenian mode of execution—by a draught of hemlock—was reputed), cheered with the company of surrounding friends, could not be otherwise than a blessing

Xenophon says that, by condescending to a little supplication, Socrates might easily have obtained his acquittal. No admonition or entreaty of his friends, however, could persuade him to such an unworthiness. On the contrary, when put upon his defence, he told the people that he did not plead for his own sake, but for theirs, wishing them to avoid the guilt of an unjust condemnation. It was usual for accused persons to beward their apprehended lot, with tears to supplicate favour, and, by exhibiting their children upon the bema, to endeavour to exerte pity. He thought it, he said, more respectful to the court, as well as more becoming himself, to omit all this, however aware that their sentiments were likely so far to differ from his that judgment would be given in anger for it.

Condemnation pronounced wrought no change upon him. He again addressed the court, declared his inno cence of the matters laid against him, and observed that, even if every charge had been completely proved, still, all together did not, according to any known law, amount to a capital crime. 'But,' in conclusion he said, 'it is time to depart—I to die, you to live, but which for the greater good, God only knows'

It was usual at Athens for execution very soon to follow condemnation-commonly on the morrow, but it happened that the condemnation of Socrates took place on the eve of the day appointed for the sacred ceremony of crowning the galley which carried the annual offerings to the gods worshipped at Delos, and immemorial tradition forbade all executions till the sacred vessel's return Thus the death of Socrates was respited thirty days, while his friends had free access to him in the prison During all that time he admirably supported his con-Means were concerted for his escape, the juiler was bribed, a vessel prepared, and a secure retreat in Thessaly provided No arguments, no prayers, could persuade him to use the opportunity. He had always taught the duty of obedience to the laws, and he would not furnish an example of the breach of it purpose it was urged that he had been unjustly con demned—he had always held that wrong did not justify wrong He waited with perfect composure the return of the sacred vessel, reasoned on the immortality of the soul, the advantage of virtue, the happiness derived from having made it through life his pursuit, and with his friends about him, took the fatal cup and died

Writers who after Xenophon and Plato have related the death of Socrates, seem to have held themselves bound to vie with those who preceded them in giving pathos to the story. The purpose here has been rather to render it intelligible—to shew its connection with the political history of Athens—to derive from it illustration of the political history. The magnanimity of Socrates, the principal efficient of the pathos, surely deserves admiration, yet it is not that in which he has most out

The circumstances of Lord Russell's shone other men fate were far more trying Socrates, we may reasonably suppose, would have borne Lord Russell's trial, but with Bishop Burnet for his eulogist, instead of Plato and Xenophon, he would not have had his present splendid The singular merit of Socrates lay in the purity and the usefulness of his manners and conversation, the clearness with which he saw and the steadiness with which he practised, in a blind and corrupt age, all moral duties, the disinterestedness and the zeal with which he devoted himself to the benefit of others, and the enlarged and warm benevolence, whence his supreme and almost only pleasure seems to have consisted in The purity of Christian morality, little doing good enough, indeed, seen in practice, nevertheless is become so familiar in theory that it passes almost for obvious, and even congenial to the liuman mind will justly estimate the ment of that near approach to it which Socrates made who will take the pains to gather -as they may from the writings of his contemporanes and predecessors-how little conception was entertained of it before his time, how dull to a just moral sense the human mind has really been how slow the progress in the investigation of moral duties, even where not only great pains have been taken, but the greatest abilities zealously employed, and when discovered, how difficult it has been to establish them in proofs beyond controversy, or proofs even that should be generally admitted by the reason of men. It is through the light which Socrates diffused by his doctrine, enforced by his prac tice, with the advantage of having both the doctrine and the practice exhibited to highest advantage in the incomparable writings of disciples such as lenophon and Plato, that his life forms an era in the history of Athens and of man

See the Life of Mitford, prefixed to the seventh edition of his History (1838) by his brother Lord Redesdale, Lord Chancellor of Ireland —The Rev John Mitford (1781-1859), who wrote poems and criticism and edited a dozen of the Aldine poets was a kins man, he was an Oriel man, and held Benham and two other Suffolk livings. Miss Mitford was of another stock.

John Horne Tooke (1736-1812), known m literature as philologist, but notable rather for his political and social character, was the son of Mr Horne, a wealthy London poulterer, so that when asked by schoolfellows what his father was, he could answer, 'A Turkey merchant.' Well educated -first at Westminster, then at Eton, and after wards at St John's College, Cambridge-he took orders, but disliking the clerical profession, he studied law at the Middle Temple, took a living for a short time to please his father, and travelled in France and Italy as tutor to a son of Elwes the miser, but having cast off the clerical character in these Continental tours, he never resumed it. He became an active politician and supporter of John Wilkes, in praise of whom he wrote an anonymous pamphlet in 1765 When in 1768 Wilkes stood for Middlesex, 'Parson Horne' pledged his credit for the expenses, and said that in a cause so just and holy he would dye his black coat red' George III having from the throne in 1770 censured an address presented by the London city authorities, the latter waited upon the sovereign with another 'humble address,' remonstrance, and petition, reiterating their request for the dissolution of Parliament and the dismissal of Ministers They were again repulsed, the king saying that he would consider such a use of his prerogative as dangerous to the interests and constitution of the country Horne Tooke, anticipating such a reception, suggested to his friend Beckford, the Lord Mayor, the idea of a reply to the sovereign-a measure unexampled in our history When the Lord Mayor had retired from the royal presence, 'I saw Beckford,' said Tooke, 'just after he came from St James's I asked him what he had said to the king, and he replied that he had been so confused, he scarcely knew what he had said. "But," cried I, "your speech must be sent to the papers, I'll write it for you" He did so, it was printed and circulated over the kingdom, and was ultimately engraved on the pedestal of Beckford's statue in Guildhall This unspoken speech, famous as that of a parson who had bearded a king on his throne, is as follows

Most Gracious Sovereign-Will your majesty be pleased so far to condescend as to permit the mayor of your loyal city of London to declare in your royal presence, on behalf of his fellow citizens, how much the bare apprehension of your majesty's displeasure would, at all times, affect their minds? The declaration of that displeasure has already filled them with mex pressible anxiety, and with the deepest affliction Permit me, sire, to assure your majesty, that your majesty has not in all your dominions any subjects more faithful, more dutiful, or more affectionate to your majesty's person or family, or more ready to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in the maintenance of the true honour and dignity of your crown. We do, therefore, with the greatest humility and submission, most earnestly sup plicate your majesty that you will not dismiss us from your presence without expressing a more favourable opinion of your faithful citizens, and without some comfort, without some prospect at least, of redress Permit me, sire, further to observe that whoever has already dared, or shall hereafter endeavour, to alienate your majesty's affections from your loyal subjects in general, and from the city of London in particular, and to with draw your confidence in and regard for your people, is an enemy to your majesty's person and family, a violator of the public peace, and a betrayer of our happy consti tution as it was established at the glorious and neces sary revolution

Horne's subsequent quarrel with Wilkes and controvers, with Junius are well known. He had ere this formally severed himself from the Church (1773), and again taken to the study of the law His spirited opposition to an enclosure bill procured him favour and the prospect of a fortune (never fully realised) from a wealthy client, Mr Tooke of Purley (near Reading), whose surname he in 1782 assumed. Hence also the sub-title of his greatest work, Epea Pteroenta, or the Diversions of Purley So early as 1778 Horne Tooke had addressed a Letter to Mr Dunning on the rudiments of grammar, and the principles there laid down were followed up and treated at length in the Diversions, of which the first part appeared in 1786, and a second part in 1805. Wit, politics, metaphysics, etymology, and grammar are curiously mingled in this work. The aim (wholly fallacious) was to prove that all the parts of speech, including those which grammarians considered as expletives and unmeaning particles, may be resolved into nouns and verbs, and the author's knowledge of the Northern languages was no less highly commended than his liveliness and acute Horne Tooke commenced the Diversions during an imprisonment in the King's Bench for promoting a subscription 'for the Americans barbarously murdered at Lexington by the king's soldiers in 1775,' and he was afterwards debarred from the Bar by the king's orders In 1794 he was tried for high treason, being accused with Hardy, Thelwall, and others of conspiring and corresponding with the French Convention to overthrow the English constitution. to which the eloquence of Erskine, his counsel, gave something more than temporary importance, excited intense interest, lasted several days, and ended in acquittal. He twice stood unsuccessfully for Westminster, for a short time sat in Parliament as member for Old Sarum, but did not distinguish himself either as legislator or debater, and next year was excluded by a special Act preventing clerks in holy orders from sitting in Parliament. He spent his latter years in lettered retirement at Wimbledon, entertaining his friends to Sunday dinners and quiet parties, and delighting them with his lively and all too varied conversa-His fortune he left to his natural children

Words as Signs or Abbreviations

H—I imagine that it is, in some measure, with the vehicle of our thoughts as with the vehicles for our bodies. Necessity produced both. The first carriage for men was no doubt invented to transport the bodies of those who from infirmity, or otherwise, could not move themselves. But should any one, desirous of understanding the purpose and meaning of all the parts of our modern elegant carriages, attempt to explain them upon this one principle alone, viz.—that they were neces sary for conveyance—he would find himself wofully puzzled to account for the wheels, the seats, the springs, the blinds, the glasses, the lining, &c., not to mention the mere ornamental parts of gilding, varnish, &c.

Abbreviations are the wheels of language, the roungs of Mercury And though we might be dragged along without them, it would be with much difficulty, very heavily and tediously

There is nothing more admirable nor more useful than the invention of signs—at the same time there is nothing more productive of error when we neglect to observe their complication. Into what blunders, and consequently into what disputes and difficulties, might not the excellent art of Short hand writing (practised almost exclusively by the English) lead foreign philosophers, who, not knowing that we had any other alphabet, should suppose each mark to be the sign of a single sound! If they were very laborious and very learned indeed, it is likely they would write as many volumes on the subject, and with as much bitterness against each other, as Grammarians have done from the same sort of mistake concerning Language until perhaps it should be suggested to them that there may be not only signs of sounds, but again, for the sake of abbreviation, signs of those signs, one under another in a continued progression.

B—I think I begin to comprehend you. You mean to say that the errors of Grammarians have arisen from supposing all words to be immediately either the signs of thing, or the signs of ideas—whereas in fact many words are merely abbreviations employed for despatch, and are the signs of other words—And that these are the artificial wings of Mercury, by means of which the Argus eyes of philosophy have been cheated

II -It is my meaning

B—Well, we can only judge of your opinion after we have heard how you maintain it. Proceed, and strip him of his wings. They seem easy enough to be taken off for it strikes me now, after what you have said, that they are indeed put on in a peculiar manner, and do not, like those of other winged deities, make a part of his body. You have only to loose the strings from his feet, and take off his cap. Come—Let us see what sort of figure he will make without them.

II - The first aim of Language was to communicate our thoughts, the second, to do it with despatch mean intirely to disregard whatever additions or altera tions live been made for the sake of beauty, or ornament. ease, gracefulness, or pleasure) The difficulties and dis putes concerning Language have arisen almost intirely from neglecting the consideration of the latter purpose of speech which, though subordinate to the former, is almost as necessary in the commerce of mankind, and has a much greater share in accounting for the different sorts of words Words have been called aunged, and they well deserve that name, when their abbreviations are compared with the progress which speech could inake without these inventions, but compared with the rapidity of thought, they have not the smallest claim to Philosophers have calculated the difference of velocity between sound and light but who will attempt to calculate the difference between speech and thought? What wonder then that the invention of all ages should have been upon the stretch to add such wings to their conversation as might enable it, if possible, to keep pace in some measure with their minds?-Hence chiefly the variety of words (From the Div rsions, Chap L)

The interlocutors are H the author, and B his friend Dr Beadon, afterwards Pishop of Gloucester. See the Life by A. Stephens (1813) and Thorold Rogers s Historical Gleanings (2nd 2-ries, 1870).

Lord Thurlow (1732-1806), Lord Chancellor, was coarse in speech and manners, profane, and immoral yet of him it was that Fox made the famous bon mot. 'No man was so wise as Thurlow looled. Idle and insubordinate at school and college, he was sent down from Cambridge without a degree, but called to the Bar in 1754, he secured his greatest triumpli by his speech in the Douglas Petrage Case (1769). A zealous supporter of Lord North, he won George III's good-will by upholding strongly his American policy, and be came Lord Chancellor in 1778. He was at the same time the secret and confidential adviser of the king, and the dictator of the House of Lords Under Rockingham he undermined his colleagues, Fox and North compelled him to retire, and Pitt But when he again worked against restored him his colleagues, Pitt told the king either he or Thurlow must retire, and the king at last assented to his dismissal (1792) He made one short speech that was 'superlatively great.' Its effect, both within the walls of Parliament and out of them, was prodigious It gave Lord Thurlow an ascendency in the House which no Chancellor had ever possessed, it invested him in public opinion with a character of independence and honour, and this, though he was ever on the un popular side in politics, made him always popular with the people The Duke of Grifton, during a debate in the House of Lords, took occasion to reproach Thurlow with his plebeian extraction and his recent admission to the peerage. rose from the woolsack, advanced slowly to the place from which the Chancellor generally addresses the House, then fixing on the Duke the look of Jove when he grasped the thunder, began in a loud voice

'I am amazed at the attack the noble dake has made on me Yes, my Lords,' considerably raising his voice, 'I am amazed at his Grace's speech The noble duke cannot look before him, behind him, or on either side of him without seeing some noble peer who owes his seat in this House to successful exertions in the profession to which I belong Does he not feel that it is as honour able to owe it to these as to being the accident of an accident? To all these noble Lords the language of the noble duke is as applicable and as insulting as it is to myself But I don't fear to meet it single and alone. No one venerates the peerage more than I do, but, my Lords, I must say that the peerage solicited mc, not I the peerage Nay, more, I can say, and will say, that as a peer of parliament, as Speaker of this right honour able House, as Keeper of the Great Seal, as Guardian of his Majesty's Conscience, as Lord High Chancellor of England, nay, even in that character alone in which the noble duke would think it an affront to be con sidered—as a man—I am at this moment as respectable -I beg leave to add, I am at this moment as much respected-as the proudest peer I now look down upon'

Lord Erskine (1750-1823) left a series of printed speeches which rank amongst the finest specimens we have of English forensic oratory. Thomas Erskine was the youngest son of the Earl of Buchan, and brother of Harry Erskine, the eloquent and witty Lord Advocate of Scotland. He served both in the navy and army, but threw up his commission in order to study law at Lin coln's Inn, took also a degree at Cambridge, and was called to the Bar in his twenty-eighth year. His first speech (1778), in defence of Captain Baillie, heutenant-governor of Greenwich Hospital (charged with libel), at once put him above all his brethien of the Bar. Next year saw an equally successful defence of Admiral Lord Keppel, and in 1781 he secured the acquittal of Lord George In 1783 he entered Parliament as The floor of the House member for Portsmouth of Commons, it has been said, is strewn with the wrecks of lawyers' reputations, and Erskine's appearances there were, comparatively, failures, he never became a great parliamentary orator sympathy with the French Revolution led him to join the 'Friends of the People,' and to undertale the defence in many political prosecutions of 1793-94. His acceptance of a retainer from Tom Paine cost him his appointment as attorney to the Prince of Wales, his speeches for him and Frost, Hardy, and Horne Tooke were specially famous, that for Hadfield (1800), indicted for shooting at George III, was a destructive analysis of the current theory of criminal responsibility in mental disease. In 1806 Erskine was raised to the peerage and the woolsack, but resigned next year, and gradually retired into private life, though he continued to mix in society, where his liveliness and wit, his vanity and eccentricities, rendered him a favourite. He died at Almondell in Linlithgowshire. In 1821 he had made a second marriage, this time at Gretna Green He published a pamphlet on army abuses in 1772, a discussion of the war with France in 1797, a utopian political romance, Armata, a pamphlet in favour of the Greeks, and some poems His decisions as Lord Chancellor were satincally styled the 'Apocrypha,' and added nothing to his fame. His reputation was solely forensic, and in this respect is unrivalled in the history of the English Bar He was a zealous student of the best English literature, and knew most of Milton by heart The following paragraphs are from Erskine's speech in defence of a publisher, Stockdale (9th December 1789), who had published a defence of Warren Hastings written by the Rev John Logan (see page 529), and affirmed to constitute a libel on the House of Commons

On the Law of Libel.

Gentlemen, the question you have therefore to try upon all this matter is extremely simple. It is neither more nor less than this. At a time when the charges against Mr Hastings were, by the implied consent of the Commons, in every hand and on every table-when, by their managers, the lightning of eloquence was inces santly consuming him, and flashing in the eyes of the public-when every man was with perfect impunity saying, and virting, and publishing just what he pleased of the supposed plunderer and devastator of nationswould it have been criminal in Mr Hastings himself to remind the public that he was a native of this free land, entitled to the common protection of her justice, and that he had a defence in his turn to offer to them, the outlines of which he implored them in the meantime to receive, as an antidote to the inlimited and unpunished poison in circulation against him? This is, without colour or exaggeration, the true question you are to decide. Because I assert, without the hazard of contra diction, that if Mr Hastings himself could have stood justified or excused in your eyes for publishing this volume in his own defence, the author, if he wrote it bond fide to defend him, must stand equally excused and justified, and if the author be justified, the publisher cannot be criminal, unless yon have evidence that it was published by him with a different spirit and intention from those in which it was written. The question, there fore, is correctly what I just now stated it to be—Could Mr Hastings have been condemned to infamy for writing this book?

Gentlemen, I tremble with indignation to be driven to put such a question in England Shall it be endured that a subject of this country may be impeached by the Commons for the transactions of twenty years—that the accusation shall spread as wide as the region of lettersthat the accused shall stand, day after day and year after year, as a spectacle before the public, which shall be kept in a perpetual state of inflammation against him, yet that he shall not, without the severest penalties, be permitted to submit anything to the judgment of man kind in his defence? If this be law (which it is for you to-day to decide), such a man has no trial great hall, built by our fathers for English justice, is no longer a court, but an altar, and an Englishman, instead of being judged in it by God and his country, is a victim and a sacrifice

On the Government of India

The unhappy people of India, feeble and effeminate as they are from the softness of their climate, and sub dued and broken as they have been by the knavery and strength of civilisation, still occasionally start up in all the vigour and intelligence of insulted nature. To be governed at all, they must be governed by a rod of iron, and onr empire in the East would long since have been lost to Great Britain if skill and military prowess had not united their efforts to support an anthority which Heaven never gave, by means which it never can sanction.

Gentlemen, I think I can observe that you are touched with this way of considering the subject, and I can account for it. I have not been considering it through the cold medium of books, but have been speaking of man and his nature, and of human dominion, from what I have seen of them myself amongst reluctant nations I know what they feel, submitting to our authority and how such feelings can alone be suppressed heard them in my yonth, from a naked savage in the indignant character of a prince surrounded by his subjects, addressing the governor of a British colony, holding a bundle of sticks in his hand, as the notes of his un lettered eloquence. 'Who is it?' said the jealous ruler over the desert, encroached upon by the restless foot of English adventure-'who is it that causes this river to rise in the high mountains and empty itself into the ocean? Who is it that causes to blow the loud winds of winter, and that calms them agun in the summer? Who is it that rears up the shade of those lofty forests, and blasts them with the quick lightning at his pleasure? The same Being who gave to you a country on the other side of the waters, and gave ours to us, and by this title we will defend it,' said the warrior, throwing down his tomahawl upon the ground, and raising the war sound of his nation These are the feelings of subjugated man all round the globe, and, depend upon it, nothing but fear will control where it is vain to look for affection.

It is the nature of everything that is great and useful, both in the animate and inanimate world, to be wild and irregular, and ve must be contented to take them with the alloys which belong to them, or live without them Genius breaks from the fetters of criticism, but its wanderings are sanctioned by its majesty and wisdom when it advances in its path subject it to the critic, and you tame it into dullness. Mighty rivers break down their banks in the winter, sweeping away to death the flocks which are fattened on the soil that they fertilise in the summer the few may be saved by embankments from drowning, but the flock must perish from lunger Tempests occasionally shake our dwellings and dissipate our commerce, but they scourge before them the lazy elements, which without them would stagnate into pesti-In like manner, Liberty herself, the last and best gift of God to his creatures, must be taken just as she is you might pare her down into bashful regularity, and shape her into a perfect model of severe scrupulous law, but she would then be Liberty no longer, and you must be content to die under the lash of this inexorable justice which you had exchanged for the banners of Freedom.

Justice and Mercy

Every human tribunal ought to take care to administer justice, as we look, hereafter, to have justice administered Upon the principle on which the Attor ney general prays sentence upon my client-God have mercy upon us! Instead of standing before him in judg ment with the hopes and consolations of Christians, we must call upon the mountains to cover us, for which of us can present, for omniscient examination, a pure, un spotted, and faultless course? But I humbly expect that the benevolent Author of our being will judge us as I have been pointing out for your example. Holding up the great volume of our lives in his hands, and regarding the general scope of them, if he discovers benevolence, charity, and good will to man beating in the heart, where he alone can look—if he finds that our conduct, though often forced out of the path by our infirmities, has been in general well directed—his all searching eye will assuredly never pursue us into those little corners of our lives, much less will his justice select them for punish ment, without the general context of our existence, by v hich faults may be sometimes found to have grown out of virtues, and very many of our lieaviest offences to have been grafted by human imperfection upon the best and lindest of our affections No, gentlemen, believe me, this is not the course of divine justice, or there is no truth in the Gospels of Heaven - If the general tenor of a man's conduct be such as I have represented it, he may wall through the shadow of death, with all his faults about him, with as much cheerfulness as in the common paths of life, because he knows that, instead of a stern accuser to expose before the Author of his nature those fiul passages which, like the secred matter in the book before you, chequers the volume of the brightest and best spent life, his mercy will obscure them from the eye of his purity, and our repentance blot them out for ever

Charles James Fox (1749-1806), the great Whig statesman and orator, during his intervals of relaxation from public life, among other literary studies and occupations commenced a History of the Reign of James II, intending to continue it to the settlement at the Revolution of 1688. An Introductory Chapter, giving a rapid view of our constitutional history from the time of Henry VII, he completed He wrote also some chapters of his History, but at the time of his death he had brought it down only to Monmouth's execution. Public affairs, private pleasures, and a devotion, eclectic and profound, to the classics, and to works of imagination and poetry, were constantly draw ing him off from historical research, furthermore, he was fastidiously scrupulous as to the niceties of language, and wished to form his plan exclusively on the model of the ancient writers, without note, digression, or dissertation 'He once assured me,' reported his nephew, Lord Holland, 'that he would admit no word into his book for which he had not the authority of Dryden' We need not, there fore, wonder that Fox died before completing his History In 1808 the fragment was given to the world by Lord Holland, a History of the Early Part of the Reign of James II, with an Intro ductory Chapter An Appendix of original papers was also added The History is plainly written, without pedantry or pretence, but the style of the great statesman, spite of the care bestowed upon it, is far from perfect. It wants force and vivacity, as if graphic clearness of narrative and distinct perception of events and characters had evaporated in the process of elaboration, and there is little trace of the power of the brilliant parliamentary debater

George Chalmers (1742-1825), born at Fochabers in Moray, practised as a lawyer at Baltimore from 1763 until the breaking out of He then the American War of Independence settled in London (1775), and in 1786 became His History of Clerk to the Board of Trade. the United Colomes, from their Settlement till the Peace of 1763, appeared in 1780 his numerous works were a Life of Sir David Lyudsay, with an edition of his works, and a Life of Mary, Queen of Scots, from the State In 1807 he commenced the publica tion of his Caledonia, of which three large volumes had appeared before his death tains a laborious antiquarian detail of the earlier periods of Scottish history, with minute topo graphical and historical accounts of the various A reprint (Paisley, provinces of the country 1888-95) comprised the matter prepared for the unpublished fourth volume, and a copious and much needed index.

John Gillies (1747-1836), born at Brechin, studied at Glasgow, and was travelling tutor to three sons of the Earl of Hopetoun. In 1793 he succeeded Robertson as Historiographer for Scot land. The monarchical spirit of his History of Aucient Greece, its Colonies and Conquests (2 vols 1786), was scarcely less decided than that of Mitford's 'The history of Greece,' he says, 'exposes the dangerous turbulence of democracy, and arraigns the despotism of tyrants By describing the incurable evils inherent in every republican policy, it evinces the inestimable benefits resulting to liberty itself from the lawful dominion of hereditary kings and the steady operation of well-regulated monarchy. Dr Gillies also translated from Aristotle, and wrote a View of the Reign of Frederick II of Prissia (1789), a History of the World from the Reign of Alexander to Angustus (1807–10), and other works

Halcolm Laing (1762-1818), Scottish histo rian, was born at his paternal estate on the Mainland of Orkney, educated at Kirkwall and Edinburgh University, and called to the Scottish Bar in 1785 He appeared as an author in 1793, liaving completed Dr Henry's History of Great Britain sturdy Whig opinions of Laing formed a contrast to the tame moderatism of Henry, and his attain ments and research were far superior to those of his predecessor In 1800 he published The History of Scotland from the Union of the Crowns to the Union of the Kingdoms, with Dissertations on the Gowrie Conspiracy and on Ossian's Poems Laing attacked the translator of Ossian with unmerciful and almost ludicrous severity, in revenge, the Highland admirers of the Celtic Muse attributed his sentiments to the prejudice natural to an Orkney Laing replied in The Poems of Ossian, &c., containing the Poetical Works of James Macpherson, Esq (1805) In 1804 he published a second edition of his History of Scotland, to which he prefixed a Preliminary Dissertation on the Participation of Mary Queen of Scots in the Murder of Darnley, on the whole his acutest and ablest work. Member for Orkney and Shetland 1807-12, Laing spent the last ten years of his life on his paternal estate in Orkney, where he promoted with ardour local and agricultural improvement.

John Pinkerton (1758–1826), born in Edinburgh, and bred for the law, in 1780 settled in London as a man of letters, in 1802 in Paris His twenty-four works include Essay on Medals (1787), Origin of the Scythians or Goths (1787), in which he fell foul of the Celts, Enquiry into the History of Scotland preceding the Reign of Malcolni III (1790), History of Scotland, 1871–1542 (1797), Walpoliana (1799), and Modern Geography (1802–7) A vehement partisan and controversialist, he was an industrious collector of forgotten fragments of history, of Scotlish Ballads (1783) and Ancient Scotlish Poems (1786), but was neither a discriminating nor conscientious editor

Joseph Ritson (1752-1803), a London converancer, born at Stockton on-Tees, of Westmorland family, was indefatigable in his labours to illustrate English literature, particularly the neglected ballad strains of the nation. He published in 1783 a valuable Collection of English Songs, in 1790, Ancient Songs, from the time of Henry III to the Revolution, in 1792, Pieces of Ancient Popular Poetry, in 1794, A Collection of Scottish Songs, in 1795, A Collection of all the Ancient Poems, Songs, and Ballads relating to Robin Hood And he edited Minot and Ancient Metrical Romances, and produced sundry antholo Ritson was a faithful and acute editor, profoundly versed in literary antiquities, but of a jealous, irritable temper, and prone to an acerbity in criticism and comment which kept him in a state of constant warfare with almost all his brother-collectors, except Sir Walter Scott. He attacked Joseph Warton and Bishop Percy with ferocity, though often his objections were not without just ground, he scolded Johnson and Steevens for their text of Shakespeare, nor did Malone's escape He was in diet a strict Pythagorean, and wrote a treatise against the use of animal food Sir Walter Scott, who bore ample testimony to the merits of this unhappy gleaner in the by-paths of literature, wrote to his friend Ellis in 1803 'Poor Ritson is no more. All his vegetable soups and puddings have not been able to avert the evil day, which, I understand, was preceded by madness?

Richard Porson was born on Christmas Day 1759 at East Ruston in Norfolk, son of the parish clerk. He was sent to a village school, and was afterwards taken in hand by the curate, and a neighbouring squire sent the precocious boy to In 1778 he entered Trinity College, Cam bridge, was elected a scholar, won the Craven Scholarship and the first chancellor's medal, and in 1782 was elected a Fellow He now began to contribute to reviews, his Aola breves ad Toupii Emendationes in Sindam (1790) carried his name. beyond England In 1787 appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine his three sarcastic letters on Hawkins's Life of Johnson, and during 1788-89 his far more famous letters to Archideacon Travis on the spurious verse I John v 7, which brought him no little odium, and were reprinted as a volume in 1790 In 1792 he was appointed regius professor of Greek at Cambridge, in 1795 he edited Æschylus, and in 1797-1801 four plays of Euripides, and in 1806 he was appointed librarian of the London Institution, but sadly neglected his Struck down with apoplexy on the 19th of September 1808, he died six days later Porson possessed a stupendous memory, unwearied industry, great acuteness, fearless honesty, and masculine sense, but was hampered and hindered all his life by poverty, ill health, dilatoriness, and fits of intemperance. He achieved little, besides the works already named, but a few bon mots, some brilliant emendations, and the posthumous Adversaria (1812), notes on Aristophanes (1820), Pausanias (1820) and Suidas (1834), and the lexicon of Photius (1822) His love of drink amounted to a passion, or rather disease, Byron describes him as hiccup ing Greek like a helot at the evening parties at Trinity College But his company was irresistibly charming to his intimates, when at night he was in his glory, 'he poured out torrents of various literature, the best sentences of the best writers, and sometimes the ludicrous beyond the gay, pages of Barrow, whole letters of Richardson, whole scenes of Toote, favourite pieces from the periodical press' And this marvellous miscellany of remembered literature was set in a framework of his own admirable sense (sometimes, however, highly paradoxical) and trenchant wit and humour Many of his pointed sayings were remembered Being on one occasion informed that Southey considered his poem Madoc as likely to be a valuable possession to his family, Porson answered, 'Madoc will be read-when Homer and Virgil are forgotten' The ornate style of Gibbon was his aversion 'There could not,' he said, 'be a better exercise for a schoolboy than to turn a page of The Decline and Fall into English' Unhappily he is even better remembered for such Facetiæ Cantabrigienses as

I went to Frankfort and got drunk With that most learn'd professor, Brunck, I went to Worms and got more drunken With that more learn'd professor, Ruhnken When Dido found Æneas would not come, She mourned in silence and was di do dum

From the Letters on Hawkins's 'Johnson'

Mr URBAN, -Two canons of criticism are undisputed that an author cannot fail to use the best possible word on every occasion, and that a critic cannot chuse but know what that word is And if these rules hold good in words, why not in sentences? These points being granted, it follows that whenever Sir John Hawkins, in quoting any part of Jolinson's works, adopts a reading different from the editions, it is to be replaced in the text, and the other discarded Now to apply We read in the vulgar editions of London, vol xi p 319, 'And fix'd on Cambria's solitary shore ' But how much better is Sir John's reading (56) 1 'And fix'd in Cambria's soli tary shore' I would not believe that Johnson wrote otherwise, though Johnson himself should affirm it Again, in the last number of The Rambler, vol vii p 395, Johnson says, or is made to say, 'I have endea voured to refine our language to grammatical purity? How tame, dull, flat, lifeless, insipid, prosaie, &c is this, compared to what the Knight has substituted (291) -grammar and purity! A fine instance of the figure Hen dia duoin / like Virgil's pateris et auro, or likehut I will not overpower you with my learning, or, more properly speaking, with my lettered ignorance, for that is the stntutable phrase, and so it ought to have been printed in the verses on Levett, vol xi p 366, upon the authority of the Knight (555), instead of lettered arro gance Lettered ignorance is a beautiful oxymoron, and hints that people who affect to be men of learning mny be very ignorant notwithstanding Examples, I suppose, will occur to every reader Here I cannot help hazard ing, though somewhat out of its place, a conjecture of my own upon a passage in Sir John's work (311), 'Among men of real learning there is but one opinion-' Ought it not to be, 'Among us men of real learning-'? Critics in a dead language, when they dislike the common text, quarrel with the careless or faithless tran scribers My spleen is not less moved by those negligent, or worse than negligent, rogues, the printers, who have given us, in the preface to Jolinson's Dictionary, vol ix. p 221, the following paragraph 'In gathering the authorities, I forbore to copy those which I thought hkely to occur whenever they were wanted markable that in reviewing my collection, I found the word sea unexemplified. Now would you believe, Mr Urban, that not a word of this is genuine? No The true reading, or nearly the true reading (for the Knight (344) has not favoured us with the exact words) runs thus 'So near perfection have I brought this Dictionary, that, upon a review of it, previous to my drawing up the prefree, I am unable to detect the casual omission of more than one article, the appellative ocean' You, I dare say, Mr Urban, and many others, had no more wit than to imagine that Johnson was rather confessing his weakness than exulting in his strength, that he meant to show how the most common things may escape our notice, and therefore says, 'In reviewing my collection, I found the word sea unexemplified ' See, Sir, how griev ously you were inistaken. Johnson, in the sentence we have retrieved, boasts of the perfection to which he has brought his work, in the modest style of Exegi monn mentum- and it was not the word sea unexemplified that made the single fault, but the appellative occan omitted

The next part of my task I would gladly decline, of proposing some corrections in Sir John's work. I shudder at my own rashness, but, since I have begun, it is too late to retreat I' 384, 'I once travelled with Richardson in the I ulham stage coach' Iell me the truth, Mr Urban, is there not something in this sentence that grates upon your round and religious ears? If the date of the fact were settled, I should pronounce at once that Sir John wrote, 'Ny own coach being out of order, I once travelled '- 1 like omission has happened (419), 'I retired and stud in the outer room to take him home.' Read boldly, 'To take him home in my own corch' Who ever is well acquainted with the Knight's writings knows that he never misses an opportunity of using the pronoun of the first person It was on this ground I offered my first conjecture. Thus we find, from the beginning of the volume to the end, not only my own coreli, but also my servants My servant. My lands. My country house My gate in the country My gardener I was chairman Intelligence in my judicial capacity Kelly practised under me A bill found before me I have discharged debtors [i e as judge, not as creditor]. My discourse with Lord Rochford My conversation with a nobleman Bishop Hoadley himself told me [what he land told all the world before]. Sir John (386) has given a list of the books in ana, but has forgotten one of the most famous, called Jonuller iana the more extraordinary, because he is indebted to it for two of his best stories in pages 192 and 348, and the Knight is a man of such mee honour that he never borrows from an author without neknowledging the obli gation Witness Mr Boswell, Mrs Piozzi, the Gentle man's and European Magazines, &c.

Did I tell you, Mr Urban, that Sir John has a deheate hand at a compliment? If I told you so, I told you nothing but the truth. Out of fifty proofs I shall produce two. P 211, Dr Hill obtained from one of those universities (St Andrews), which would scarce refuse a degree to an apothecary's horse, a diploma. The civil things that Johnson said of Scotland were highly grateful and honourable to the natives, or Wr Boswell would not have recorded them. But, in my mind, the Knight is far superior to his model both in sentiment and language.

Porson's Tracts and Criticisms were collected by Kidd (1815). See Selby Watson's Life of him (1861) and his Correspondence edited by Luard (1867).

Sharon Turner (1768-1847), a London solicitor, London-born but of Yorkshire extraction, commenced in 1799 the publication of a series of works on English history The first was a History of the Anglo-Saxons (1799-1805), the second, a History of England (1814-29), ultimately brought down to the end of the reign of Elizabeth, the whole series being comprised in twelve volumes, and containing much new and interesting information on the government, laws, literature, and manners, as well as on the civil and ecclesiastical history, of the country From an ambitious attempt to rival Gibbon in loftiness of diction, Sharon Turner disfigured his History, especially in the later volumes, by pomp of expression and involved intricacy of style. The early part of his History, the labour of sixteen years, may be said to have revealed their ancestors to modern Englishmen, and gave a vast impulse to historical study and research, and though his work is now somewhat antiquated, it may safely be said that he made a much greater advance on his predecessors than his more fully equipped successors have done on him He also wrote a very orthodox Sacred History of the World, in two volumes, and so late as 1845 published an historical poem, Richard III

William Roscoe (1753-1831) was the only -son of a Liverpool innkeeper and market-gardener He was articled to an attorney in 1769, and began to practise in 1774. In 1777 he published a poem, Mount Pleasant, and another in 1787, The Wrongs .of Africa, a protest against the slave-trade. Having m youth acquired a competent knowledge of Latin, French, and Italian, he applied himself about 1789 to the great task he had long meditated, a Life of Lorenzo de Medici, called the Magnificent (2 vols The work ranked its author among the most popular of the day, a second edition was soon called for, and Cadell & Davies purchased the copyright for £1200 About the same time Roscoe relinquished practice as an attorney, and studied for the Bar, but in 1799 became partner and manager in a Liverpool bank. His next Interary appearance was as the translator of The Nurse (1798), a poem from the Italian of Luigi Tansillo His second great work, The Life and Pontificate of Leo X (4 vols 1805), though carefully prepared, and also enriched with new information, had not the success of his Life of Lorenzo 'The history of the reformation of religion,' it was truly said, 'involved many questions of subtle disputation, as well as many topics of character and conduct, and, for a writer of great candour and discernment, it was scarcely possible to satisfy either the Papists or the Protestants' Roscoe's liberal views and his accomplishments recom mended him to his townsmen as a fit person to represent them in Parliament, and he was accordingly elected in 1806. He spoke in favour of the abolition of the slave trade, and of the civil disabilities of the Catholics, thereby exciting against him a powerful and violent opposition, and on the dissolution in the following spring he was not But he still took a warm interest again returned in passing events, and published several pamphlets on the topics of the day A projected History of Art and Literature was not carried out. Pecuniary embarrassments came to cloud his latter days banking establishment of which he was a partner was forced in 1816 to suspend payment, and Roscoe had to sell his library, pictures, and other works of art, but his love of literature continued undiminished The Butterfly's Ball (1807), the bestknown of his poems, was written for the entertainment of his youngest child, the earliest (1777) was a descriptive poem, Mount Pleasant He gave valuable assistance in the establishment of the Royal Institution of Liverpool He edited an edition of Pope, which showed but little research or discrimination, and in his best work De Quincey detected 'the feebleness of the mere belles lettrist.' See the Life by his son Henry (1833), the Memoir by J S Traill (1853), and Espinasse's Laucashire Worthies (2nd series, 1877)

Archibald Alison (1757-1839), the son of a Provost of Edinburgh, studied at Glasgon University and Balliol College, Oxford, received Anglican orders in 1784, and had held several preferments, including a prebend of Salisbury and the perpetual curacy of Kenley, Shropshire, when in 1800 he returned to his native city, and till 1831 served there as an Episcopal minister. In 1790 he published his Essays on the Nature and Principles of Taste, designed to prove that material objects appear beautiful or sublime in consequence of their association with our moral feelings and affections, the objects presented to the eye generate trains of thought and pleasing emotion, and these constitute our sense of beauty This theory, referring all our ideas of beauty to the law of association, was long maintained and disputed too simple resthetic theory was subsequently maintained by Jeffret, but has been superseded by the modified associationist doctrines of Bain and Herbert Spencer, and is now mainly of liistoric interest. His two volumes of sermons (1814-15) were, like Blair's, 'elegant' in language, non doctrinal and non-controversial The following extracts are from his Essays

Historic Association.

Even the peasant, whose knowledge of former times extends but to a few generations, has yet in his village some monuments of the deeds or virtues of his fore fithers, and cherishes with a fond veneration the memorial of those good old times to which his imagination returns with delight, and of which he loves to reconnt the simple tales that tradition has brought him. And what is it that constitutes the emotion of sublime delight which every man of common sensibility feels upon his first prospect of Rome? It is not the seene of destruction which is before him It is not the Tiber, diminished in his imagination to a paltry stream, flowing amidst the ruins of that magnificence which it once adorned. It is not the triumph of superstition over the wreek of human greatness, and its monuments erected upon the very spot where the first honours of humanity have been gained It is ancient Rome which fills his imagination. It is the country of Cæsar, of Cieero, and Virgil which is before It is the mistress of the world which he sees, and who seems to him to rise again from her tomb to give laws to the nniverse. All that the labours of his youth, or the studies of his maturer age, have acquired with regard to the history of this great people, open at once on his imagination, and present him with a field of high and solemn imagery which can never be ex-Take from him these associations-conceal from him that it is Rome that he sees, and how different would be his emotion!

Sound coloured by Association

The howl of the wolf is little distinguished from the howl of the dog, either in its tone or in its strength, but there is no comparison between their sublimity There are few, if any, of these sounds so loud as the most common of all sounds, the lowing of a cow this is the very reverse of sublimity Imagine this sound, on the contrary, expressive of fierceness or strength, and there can be no doubt that it would become sublime. The hooting of the owl at midnight, or amid ruins, is strikingly sublime, the same sound at noon, or during the day, is very far from being so The scream of the eagle is simply disagreeable when the bird is either tame or confined, it is sublime only when it is heard amid rocks and deserts, and when it is expressive to us of liberty and independence, and savage majesty. The neighing of a war horse in the field of battle, or of a young un trained horse when at large among mountains, is power fully sublime. The same sound in a cart horse or a horse in the stable is simply indifferent, if not dis agreeable. No sound is more absolutely mean than the grunting of swine The same sound in the wild boaran animal remarkable both for fiereeness and strength -is sublime The low and feeble sounds of animals which are generally considered the reverse of sublime are rendered so by association The hissing of a goose and the rattle of a child's plaything are both con temptible sounds, but when the hissing comes from the mouth of a dangerous serpent, and the noise of the rattle is that of the rattlesnake, although they do not differ from the others in intensity, they are both of them highly sublime There is certainly no resemblance, as sounds, between the noise of thunder and the hissing of a serpeat-between the growling of a tiger and the explosion of gunpowder-between the scream of the engle and the shouting of a multitude yet all of these arc sublime. In the same manner, there is as little resemblance between the tinkling of the sheep fold bell and the murmuring of the breeze-between the hum of the beetle and the song of the lark-between the twitter of the swallow and the sound of the curfew, yet all these are beautiful

John Howie (1735-93), a farmer at Lochgoin near Eaglesham in Renfrewshire, was sprung of a family which claimed descent from an Albigensian refugee of the name of Huet in the thirteenth century, and which had certainly suffered persecu tion and forfeiture for its adherence to the Covenant in the reign of Charles II He was as keen and devout a Presbyterian as his ancestors, and his leisure was employed in the collection of a number of Covenanting relics still shown in the house at Lochgoin, and also in the editing of Presbyteman tracts and sermons, and the composition of the Scots Worthies (1774), a series of biographies of Presbyterian saints and martyrs from Patrick Hamilton down to James Renwick. The information which these biographies contain is taken chiefly from Knox, Calderwood, Wodrow, Patrick Walker, and other similar sources, but their pages are sometimes enriched (notably in the interesting life of Captain Paton) from the stories of local and family tradition Howie was a workmanlike com piler, and wrote a simple and not ineffective style, and his book well deserved the national popularity it long enjoyed as a Presbyterian hagiography Of the recent reprints, the great majority, like that by Rev W H Carslaw (1870), omit the curious and characteristic 'Appendix containing a short Historical Hint of the Wicked Lives and Miserable Deaths of some of the most Remarkable Apostates and Bloody Persecutors in Scotland, from the The extract. Reformation to the Revolution' which follows is from the life of Captain Paton

The Captain, with a few more, being one night quartered in the fore mentioned house of Lochgoin, with James Howie, who was one of his fellow sufferers, at which time one Captain Ingles, with a party, lay at the Dean of Kilmarnock's, who sent out parties on all hands to see what they could apprehend and that night a party, being out in quest of some of the sufferers, came to Meudowhend, and from thence went to another remote place in the muirs of Fenwick, called Croil born, but finding nothing there, they went next to Lochgoin, as appreliending they would not miss their design there, and that they might come upon this place more securely, they sent about five men with one Serjeant Rae by another way, whereby the main body could not come so well up undiscovered

The sufferers had watched all night, which was very stormy, by turns, and about day break the Captain, oa account of his asthmatical disorder, went to the far end of the house for some rest In the meanwhile, one George Woodburn went out to see if he could observe any (but it seems he looked not very surely), and going to secret duty instead of this, from which he was but a little time returned, until, on a sudden, ere they were aware, Serjeant Rae came to the inner door of the house, and cried ont, Dogs! I have found you now men took to the spence-James and John Howie hap pened to be then in the byre, among the cattle. The wife of the house, one Isabel Howie, seeing none but the serjeant, cried to them to take the hills, and not be killed in the house. She took hold of Rae as he was coming boldly forward to the door of the place in which they were, and ran him backward ont of the outer door of the house, giving him such a hasty turn as mide him lie on the ground In the meanwhile the Captain, being alarmed, got np, put on his shoes, though not very hastily, and they got all ont, by which time the rest of the party was up. The serjeant fired his gun at them, which one John Kirkland answered by the like with his. The bullet passed so near the serjeant that it took off the knot of hair on the side of his The whole crew being alarmed, the Captain and the rest took the way for Eaglesham murs, and they followed Two of the men ran with the Captain, and other two stayed by turns, and fired back on the enemy, the enemy firing on them likewise, but by reason of some wetness their guns had got in coming through the water they were not so ready to fire, which helped the others to escape.

After they had pursued them some time, John Kirkland turned about, and stooped down on his knee, and aimed so well that he shot a highland serjeant through the thigh, which made the front still stoop as they came forward, till they were again commanded to run this time the sufferers had gained some ground, and being come to the muirs of Eaglesham, the four men went to the heights, in view of the enemy, and caused the Captain, who was old and not able to run, take another way by himself. At last he gotta mare upon the field, and took the liberty to mount her a little, that he might be more suddenly ont of their reach. But ere he was aware, a party of dragoons going for Newmills was at hand, and what was more observable, he wanted his shoes, having cast them off hefore, and was riding on the beast's bare back, but he passed by them very slowly, and got off undiscovered, and at length gave the mare her liberty, which returned home, and went nnto another of his lirking places. All this happened on a Monday morning, and on the morrow these persecutors returned, and plundered the house, drove off their cattle, and left almost nothing remaining

Sir James Mackintosh (1765–1832) was born at Aldourse, on the banks of Loch Ness, October 24, 1765 His father was a brave Highland officer, possessed of a small estate, Kyllachy, in his native county From his earliest days James Mackintosh had a passion for books, and though all his relatives were Jacobites, he was a staunch Whig After studying at Aberdeen—where he had as a college companion and friend the pious and eloquent Robert Hall-Mackintosh went to Edinburgh and studied medicine. In 1788 he repaired to London, wrote for the press, and afterwards applied himself to the study of law In 1791 he published his Vindicia Gallica, a defence of the French Revolution, in reply to Burke, which, for cogency of argument, historical knowledge, and logical precision, is a remarkable effort for a young man of twenty-six. Four years afterwards he acknowledged to Burke that he had been the dupe of his own enthusiasm, and that a 'melancholy experience, had undeceived him-a change of opinion bitterly resented by many of those who had most warmly welcomed the Vindicia A series of lectures on the Law of Nature and Nations greatly extended his reputation. In 1795 he was I called to the Bar, and as barrister in 1803 made a brilliant defence of M Peltier, an emigrant royalist indicted for a libel on Napoleon, then First Consul. The forensic display of Mackintosh was too much like an elaborate essay or dissertation, but it marked him out for legal promotion, and he received the appointment—to which his poverty, not his will, consented—of Recorder of Bombay He was knighted, sailed from England in the beginning of 1804, and after discharging faithfully his high official duties, returned at the end of seven years, the earliest period that entitled him to his returning pension of £1200 per annum Mackintosh in 1813 obtained a seat in Parliament for Nairn, and stuck faithfully by his old friends the Whigs, till, in 1827, his friend Canning, on the formation of his administration, made him a Privy-Councillor On the accession of the Whig Ministry in 1830, he was appointed a commissioner for the affairs of India. On questions of criminal law and national policy Mackintosh spoke forcibly, but he was not accounted a successful parliamentary orator Amid the bustle of public business he did not neglect literature, though he lacked resolution for continuous and severe study. The charms of society, the interruptions of public business, and the debilitating effects of his Indian sojourn co operated with his constitutional indolence to prevent the realisation of the ambitious dreams of his Nevertheless he wrote various articles for the Edinburgh Review, a long famous Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy for the Encyclopadia Britannica, and three volumes of a History of England for Lardner's Cabinet

Cyclopædia, which, though without grace or charm of style, contains admirable statements of constitutional history He also furnished for the same comprehensive series a short but valuable Life of Sir Thomas More, and at his death he was engaged on a History of the Revolution of 1688, which was continued by another hand in a rather different spirit (1834) Mackintosh's Dissertation was long used as a text book of the history of ethics, and as such was probably more widely known than anything else by him. It is even accounted his most important work, though James Mill was largely justified in criticising (as he did, however, with needless asperity) its lack of precision in thought and expression. It is curiously eclectic in standpoint accepting Butler's supremacy of the conscience, it yet takes utility as the ethical criterion, and contrives to adopt. Hartley's association theory as a help to explain the development of conscience. On the whole it represents a modified utilitarianism, as a treatise it is incomplete and inadequate, and has long since been superseded by more systematic and more profound But in its own time it filled a gap, and promoted ethical studies Mackintosh's works were all little more than fragments of what he might have done, and there was no Boswell to record his brilliant conversation

From the 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ.'

The collision of armed multitudes [in Paris] terminated in unforeseen excesses and execrable crimes of Mr Burke, however, these erimes and excesses assume an aspect far more important than can be communicated to them by their own insulated gudt. They form, in his opinion, the crisis of a revolution far more important than any change of government-a revolution in which the sentiments and opinions that have formed the mantiers of the European nations are to perish age of chivalry is gone, and the glory of Europe extinguished for ever!' He follows this exclamation by an eloquent culogium on chivalry, and by gloomy predictions of the future state of Europe, when the nation that has been so long accustomed to give her the tone in arts and manners is thus debased and A caviller might remark that ages much more near the meridian fervour of chivalry than ours have witnessed a treatment of queens as little gallant and generous as that of the Parisian mob He might remind Mr Bruke that, in the age and country of Sir Philip Sidney, a queen of France, whom no blindness to accomplishment, no malignity of detraction, could reduce to the level of Marie Antoinette, was, by 'a nation of men of lionour and cavaliers,' permitted to languish in captivity and expire on a scaffold, and he might add that the manners of a country are more surely indicated by the systematic cruelty of a sovereign than by the licentious frenzy of a mob He might remark that the mild system of modern manners which survived the massacres with which fanaticism had for a century desolated and almost barbarised Europe, might perhaps resist the shock of one day's excesses committed ly a delirious populace.

But the subject itself is, to an enlarged thinker, fertile in reflections of a different nature of manners which arose among the Gothic nations of Enrope, of which chivalry was more properly the effusion than the source, is, without doubt, one of the most peculiar and interesting appearances in human The moral causes which formed its character have not perhaps been hitherto investigated with the happiest success But to confine ourselves to the subject before us, chivalry was certainly one of the most prominent features and remarl able effects of this system of manners. Candonr must confess that this singular institution is not alone admirable as a corrector of the ferocious ages in which it flourished. It contributed to polish and soften Europe. It paved the vay for that diffusion of knowledge and extension of commerce which afterwards in some measure supplanted it, and gave a new character to manners. Society is inevitably progressive. In government, commerce has overthrown that 'feudal and chivalrous' system under whose shade it first grew. In religion, learning has subverted that superstition whose opulent endowments had first fostered it. Peculiar eircumstances softened the barbarism of the middle ages to a degree which favoured the ad mission of commerce and the growth of knowledge. These circumstances were connected with the manners of chivalry, but the sentiments peculiar to that institu tion could only be preserved by the situation which gave them birth. They were themselves enfeebled in the progress from ferocity and turbulence, and almost obliterated by tranquillity and refinement. But the auxiliaries which the manners of chivalry had in rude ages reared, gathered strength from its weakness and flourished in its decay Commerce and diffused I now ledge have, in fact, so completely assumed the ascendant in polished nations that it will be difficult to discover any relies of Gothic manners but in a fantastic exterior, which has survived the generous illusions that made these manners splendid and seductive. Their direct influence has long ceased in Europe, but their indirect influence, through the medium of those causes which would not perhaps have existed but for the mildness which chivalry created in the midst of a barbarous age, still operates with increasing vigour. The manners of the middle age were, in the most singular sense, com pulsory Enterprising benevolence was produced by general fierceness, gallant courtesy by ferocious rudeness, and artificial gentleness resisted the torrent of natural barbarism But a less incongruous system has succeeded, in which commerce, which unites men's interests, and knowledge, which excludes those prejudices that tend to embroil them, present a broader basis for the stability of civilised and beneficent manners.

Mr Burke, indeed, forebodes the most fatal consequences to literature, from events which he supposes to have given a mortal blow to the spirit of chivalry. I have ever been protected from such apprehensions by my belief in a very simple truth—that diffused knowledge immortalises itself. A literature which is confined to a few may be destroyed by the massacre of scholars and the conflagration of libraries, but the diffused knowledge of the present day could only be annihilated by the extirpation of the civilised part of manl ind

There is a Life of Mackintosh by his son, Robert James Mackintosh (2 vols. 1855), and see the essays on him by Macaula, and De Quincey. His miscellaneous works were collected in three volumes in 1846.

William Paley (1743-1805) was a thinker of remarkable vigour and clearness rather than originality, his acquirements as a scholar and Churchman were grafted on a homely, shrewd, and kindly nature. He was born at Peterborough in 1743, the son of a minor canon, afterwards teacher of the grammar-school at Giggleswick, Yorksbire At the age of fifteen he was entered as sızar at Christ's College, Cambridge, and after two years of idleness worked hard and came out senior wrangler For a time a teacher and then curate at Greenwich, be was in 1768 elected a Fellow of his college, and lectured in the university on Moral Philosophy and the Greek Testament till he was presented with the rectory of Musgrave in Westmorland in He beld contemporaneously the livings of Dalston, Great Salkeld, Appleby, and Stanwix, and was made prebendary (1780), archdeacon (1782), and chancellor (1785) of Carlisle In 1785 appeared his long-meditated Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, in 1790 his Horæ Pauline, and in 1794 his famous View of the Evideuces of Christianity Friends and preferment now crowded in on him. The Bishop of London (Porteus) made Paley a prebendary of St Paul's, the Bishop of Lincoln presented him with the subdeanery of Lincoln, and the Bishop of Durham gave him the rectory of Bisbop-Wearmouth, worth £1200 a year—and all these within six months, the luckiest half-year of his life boldness and freedom of some of Paley's disquisitions on government, a certain north country roughness of speech and manner, his unspiritualness and 'common sense' views of religion, and a suspected tendency to Unitarianism prevented his rising to the bench of bishops. In 1802 Paley published his Natural Theology, his last work, which reached a twentieth edition in 1820, and was translated into Spanish and Italian even. He enjoyed himself in the country with his duties and recreations he was fond of angling, and he mixed familiarly with his neighbours in sociality and even conviviality He disposed of his time with great regularity in his garden he limited himself to one hour at a time, twice a day, in reading books of amusement, one hour at breakfast and another in the evening, and one for dinner and his newspaper

Few theological or philosophical works were so extensively popular or held their place so long as those of Paley. His perspicacity of intellect was as remarkable as the vigour and simplicity of a style that in the eyes of his contemporaries was occasionally undignified. He had the rare art of popularising recondite knowledge and blending the business of life with philosophy. His doctrine of expediency as a rule of morals was even in his own time thought to trench on the authority of revealed religion, and to lower the standard of public duty, in the shape he put it, it could not be expected to foster the great and heroic virtues

In his early life he is reported to have said, on the subject of his having subscribed the Thirty nine Articles, that be was 'too poor to keep a conscience,' and certainly there was little in him of Like Dr Johnson, he was poetry or enthusiasm a practical moralist, abhorred pretence, cant, and hypocrisy, and was suspicious of ideal virtue and high-strung devotion Paley did not write for philosophers or metaphysicians, but for the great body of the people anxious to acquire knowledge, and to be able to give 'a reason for the hope that is in them.' His common sense philosophy and his teleological method are now antiquated considered the art of life to consist in properly 'setting our habits,' and for this no subtle dis tinctions or profound theories were necessary His Moral and Political Philosophy is a utilitarian system with a religious sanction, virtue is 'doing good to mankind, in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of future happiness' It is not a new system, but rather an admirable compendium of the views of such earlier moralists as suited him, lucidly and vigorously stated in his other works, he made skilful use of any other writers whose arguments served his purpose-not, however, without many shrewd additions of his own The famous argument from a watch was a commonplace, but was made classi cal in the pithy statement he gave it. Sir James Mackintosh summed up thus 'The most original and ingenious of his writings is the Hora The Evidences of Christianity are formed out of an admirable translation of Butler's Analogy, and a most skilful abridgment of Lardner's Credibility of the Gospil History He may be said to have thus given value to two works, of which the first was scarcely intelligible to most of those who were most desirous of profiting by it, and the second soon wearies out the greater part of readers, though the few who are more patient have almost always been gradually won over to feel pleasure in a display of knowledge, probity, charity, and meekness unmatched by an avowed advocate in a cause deeply interesting his warmest feelings His Natural Theology is the wonderful work of a man who, after sixty, had studied anatomy in order to write it' When Paley's name was mentioned to George III, the monarch said, 'Paley' what, Pigeon Paley?'—a nicl name given to the arcbdeacon from a famous illustration in the Moral and Political Philosophy in a passage on property, which is a fair specimen of his style of reasoning

Of Property

If you should see a flock of pigeons in a field of corn, and if—instead of each picking where and what it liked, taking just as much as it wanted, and no more—you should see ninety nine of them gathering all they got into a heap, reserving nothing for themselves but the chaff and the refuse, keeping this heap for one, and that the weakest, perhaps worst pigeon of the flock, sitting round and looking on all the winter, whilst this one was devouring, throwing about and wasting it, and if a pigeon more hardy and hungry than the rest touched a grain of the hoard, all the others instantly flying upon it and tearing it to pieces if you should see this, you would see nothing more than what is every day practised and established among men Among men, you see the ninety and nine toiling and scraping together a heap of superfluities for one, and this one, too, oftentimes the feeblest and worst of the whole set-a child, a woman, a madman, or a fool, getting nothing for themselves all the while but a little of the coarsest of the provision which their own industry produces, looking quietly on while they see the fruits of all their labour spent or spoiled, and if one of the number take or touch a particle of the hoard, the others joining against him, and hanging him for the theft. There must be some very important advantages to account for an institution which, in the view of it above given, is so paradoxical and unnatural The principal of these advantages are the following

I It increases the produce of the earth

The earth, in climates like ours, produces little with out cultivation, and none would be found willing to cultivate the ground if others were to be admitted to an equal share of the produce The same is true of the care of flocks and herds of tame animals Crabs and acorns, red deer, rabbits, game, and fish, are all which we should have to subsist upon in this country if we trusted to the spontaneous productions of the soil, and it fares not much better with other countries. A nation of North American savages, consisting of two or three hun dred, will take up and be half storved upon a tract of land which in Europe, and with Enropean management, would be sufficient for the maintenance of as many In some fertile soils, together with great abundance of fish upon their coasts, and in regions where clothes are unaecessary, a considerable degree of population may subsist without property in land, which is the case in the islands of Otaheite but in less favoured situations, as in the country of New Zealand, though this sort of property obtain in a small degree, the inhabitants, for want of a more secure and regular establishment of it are driven oftentimes by the scarcity of provision to devour one nnother

II It preserves the produce of the earth to maturity We may judge what would be the effects of a community of right to the productions of the earth from the trifling specimens which we see of it at present. A cherry tree in a hedgerow, nuts in a wood, the grass of an instinted pasture, are seldom of much advantage to anybody, because people do not wait for the proper season of reaping them. Corn, if any were sown, would never ripen, lambs and calves would never grow up to sheep and cows, because the first person that met them would reflect that he had better take them as they are than leave them for another

III It prevents contests.

War and waste, tumilt and confusion, must be un avoidable and eternal where there is not enough for all, and where there are no rules to adjust the division.

IV It improves the conveniency of living

This it does two ways. It enables mankind to divide themselves into distinct professions, which is impossible unless a man can exchange the productions of his own art for what he wants from others, and exchange implies

Much of the advantage of civilised over savage When a man is, from necessity, life depends upon this his own tailor, tent maker, carpenter, cook, huntsman, and fisherman, it is not probable that he will be expert at any of his callings Hence the rude habitations. furniture, clothing, and implements of savages, and the tedious length of time which all their operations require It likewise encourages those arts by which the accommodations of human life are supplied, by appropriating to the artist the benefit of his discoveries and improve ments, without which appropriation ingennity will never be exerted with effect. Upon these several accounts we may venture, with a few exceptions, to pronounce that even the poorest and the worst provided, in countries where property and the consequences of property pre vail, are in a better situation with respect to food, raiment, houses, and what are called the necessaries of life, than any are in places where most things remain The balance, therefore, upon the whole, in common must preponderate in favour of property with a manifest and great excess. Inequality of property, in the degree in which it exists in most countries of Europe, ab stractedly considered, is an evil, but it is an evil which flows from those rules concerning the acquisition and disposal of property, by which men are incited to industry, and by which the object of their industry is readered secure and valuable. If there be any great inequality unconnected with this origin, it ought to be corrected

Distinctions of Civil Life lost in Church

The distinctions of civil life are almost always insisted upon too much and urged too far Whatever, therefore, conduces to restore the level, by qualifying the disposi tions which grow out of great elevation or depression of rank, improves the character on both sides. Now things are made to appear little by being placed beside what is great In which manner, superiorities, that occupy the whole field of the imagination, will vanish or slimk to their proper diminutiveness, when compared with the distance by which even the highest of men are removed from the Supreme Being, and this comparison is naturally introduced by all acts of joint worship If ever the poor man holds up his head, it is at church if ever the rich man views him with respect, it is there and both will be the better, and the public profited, the oftener they meet in a situation in which the consciousness of dignity in the one is tempered and mitigated, and the spirit of the other erected and confirmed (From the same work)

The World made with a Benevolent Design.

The air, the earth, the It is a happy world after all water, teem with delighted existence. In a spring noon or a summer evening, on whichever side I turn my eyes, myriads of happy beings crowd upon my view insect youth are on the wing' Swarms of new born flies are trying their pinions in the air. Their sportive motions, their wanton mazes, their gratuitous activity, their continual change of place without use or purposc, testify their joy and the exultation which they feel in their lately discovered finculties. A bee amongst the flowers in spring is one of the most cheerful objects that can be looked upon Its life appears to be all enjoy ment, so busy and so pleased yet it is only a specimen of insect life, with which, by reason of the animal being half domesticated, we happen to be better acquainted than we are with that of others The whole winged insect tribe, it is probable, are equally intent upon their proper employments, and, under every variety of consti tution, gratified, and perhaps equally gratified, by the offices which the Author of their nature has assigned But the atmosphere is not the only scene of enjoyment for the insect race. Plants are covered with aphides, greedily sucking their juices, and constantly, as it should seem, in the act of sucking. It cannot be doubted but that this is a state of gratification what else should fix them so close to the operation and so long? Other species are running about with an alacrity in their motions which carries with it every mark of pleasure. Large patches of ground are sometimes half covered with these brisk and sprightly natures. If we look to what the waters produce, shoals of the fry of fish frequent the margins of rivers, of lakes, and of the sea itself. These are so happy that they know not what to do with themselves Their nttitudes, their vivacity, their leaps out of the water, their frolics in it-which I have noticed a thousand times with equal attention and amusement-all conduce to show their excess of spirits, and are simply the effects of that excess. Walking by the sea side in a calm evening, upon a sandy shore and with an abbing tide, I have frequently remarked the appearance of a dark cloud, or rather very thick mist, hanging over the edge of the water, to the height, perhaps, of half a yard, and of the breadth of two or three yards, stretching along the coast as far as the eye could reach, and always returng with the water this cloud came to be examined, it proved to be nothing else than so much space filled with young shrimps in the act of bounding into the air from the shallow margin of the water, or from the wet sand If nny motion of a mute animal could express delight, it was this, if they had meant to make signs of their happiness, they could not have done it more intelligibly. Suppose, then, what I have no doubt of, each individual of this number to - be in a state of positive enjoyment, what a sum, collectively, of gratification and pleasure have we here before our vien '

The young of all animals appear to me to receive pleasure simply from the exercise of their limbs and bodily faculties, without reference to any end to be attained, or any use to be answered by the exertion A child, without knowing anything of the use of lan guage, is in a high degree delighted with being able to Its incessant repetition of a few articulate sounds, or perhaps of a single word which it has learned to pronounce, proves this point clearly Nor is it less pleased with its first successful endeavours to walk, or rather to run-which precedes walking-although entirely ignorant of the importance of the attunment to its future life, and even without applying it to now present purpose. A child is delighted with speaking, without having anything to say, and with walking, without knowing where to go And, prior to both these, I am disposed to believe that the waking hours of infancy are agreeably taken up with the exercise of vision, or perliaps, more properly speaking, with learning to see.

But it is not for youth inlone that the great Parent of creation hath provided. Happiness is found with the purring cat no less than with the playful kitten in the arm chur of dowing age, as well as in either the spright liness of the dance or the animation of the chase. To novelty, to acuteness of sensation, to hope, to ardour of pursuit, succeeds what is, in no inconsiderable degree. an equivalent for them all, 'perception of case' Herein is the exact difference between the young and the old The young are not happy but when enjoying pleasure, the old are happy when free from pain. And this constitution suits with the degrees of animal power which they respectively possess. The vigour of youth was to be stimulated to action by impatience of rest, whilst to the imbecility of age, quietness and repose become positive gratifications. In one important step the advantage is with the old. A state of ease is, generally speaking, more attainable than a state of A constitution, therefore, which can enjoy pleasure ease is preferable to that which can taste only pleasure This same perception of ease oftentimes renders old nge a condition of great comfort, especially when riding nt its anchor after n busy or tempestnous life. It is well described by Rousseau to be the interval of repose and enjoyment between the hurry and the end of life. How far the same cause extends to other animal natures cannot be judged of with certainty The appearance of satisfaction with which most animals, as their activity subsides, seek and enjoy rest affords reason to believe that this source of gratification is appointed to advanced life under all or most of its various forms In the species with which we are best acquinted, namely, our own, I am far, even as an observer of human life, from thinking that youth is its happiest season, much less the only happy one (From Natural Theology)

Character of St Paul

Here, then, we have a man of liberal attrinments, and, in other points, of sound judgment, who had addicted his life to the service of the gospel. We see him, in the prosecution of his purpose, travelling from country to country, enduring every species of hardship, en eountering every extremity of danger, assaulted by the populace, punished by the magistrates, scourged, beat, stoned, left for dead, expecting, wherever he came, a renewal of the same treatment, and the same dangers, yet, when driven from one city, preaching in the next, spending his whole time in the employment, sacrificing to it his pleasures, his ease, his safety, persisting in this course to old age, unaltered by the experience of per verseness, ingratitude, prejudice, desertion, unsubdued by anxiety, want, labour, persecutions, unwearied by long confinement, undismayed by the prospect of death Such was Paul. We have his letters in our hands, we have also a history purporting to be written by one of his fellow travellers, and appearing, by a comparison with these letters, certainly to have been written by some person well acquainted with the transactions of his life From the letters, is well as from the history, we gather not only the account which we have stated of him, but that he was one out of many who neted and suffered in the same manner, and that of those who did so, several had been the companions of Christ's ministry, the ocular witnesses, or pretending to be such, of his miracles and of his resurrection. We moreover find this same person referring in his letters to his supernatural conversion, the particulars and accompany ing circumstances of which are related in the history and which accompanying circumstances, if all or any of them be true, render it impossible to have been a delusion We also find him positively, and in appro priate terms, asserting that he himself worked miracles, strictly and properly so called, in support of the mission which he executed, the history, meanwhile, recording various passages of his ministry which come up to the extent of this assertion The question is, whether false hood was ever attested by evidence like this. Falsehoods, we know, have found their way into reports, into tradi tion, into books, but is an example to be met with of a man voluntarily undertaking a life of want and pain, of incessant fatigue, of continual peril, submitting to the loss of his home and country, to stripes and stoning, to tedious imprisonment, and the constant expectation of a violent death, for the sake of carrying about a story of what was false, and what, if false, he must have known to be so? (From the Horæ Paulinæ)

Paley published in all a score of works, including various collections of sermons. Collective editions appeared in 1805-8, 1819, 1825, 1837 1838, and 1851 There are Lives by Meadley (1809), his son (1825), and the other editors of the works.

John Brown of Haddington (1722-87), the founder of a house famous in Scottish theology, science, and literature for four generations, did himself by his theological works give an impress to the Scottish mind and evoke intellectual through religious interests Born at Carpow near Aber nethy in Perthshire, a poor weaver's child, he lost father and mother in boyhood and lind but scanty schooling Nevertheless, as a Tayside herd-boy he contrived to study not merely Latin to some purpose, but even Greek and a little Hebrew a time he was a pedlar, during the '45 served in the Fife Militia, taught in several schools, and having studied theology in connection with the Associate Burgher Synod, was in 1751 called to the congregation of Haddington He was a man of much learning, open-handed on a stipend of £50 a year, a kindly humourist, though harrowing self doubts tormented him all his life through, and a powerful preacher. In 1768 he accepted the unsalaried Burgher chair of Divinity twenty-seven works, the most widely known are the Dictionary of the Bible (1768) and the Self-interpreting Bible (2 vols 1778), both of which took rank with the Pilgrini's Progress and Boston's Fourfold State amongst the most treasured books of the Scottish people. Dr Brown's sons and grandsons were respected, learned, and eloquent divines, one grandson was a poet, chemist, and original thinker of exceptional accomplishments, a great grandson was Professor of Chemistry in Edinburgh, and another great-grandson was the beloved Dr John Brown of Edinburgh, author of Rab and his The Memoirs and Select Remains of Dr Brown of Haddington were edited in 1856

Beilby Porteus (1731–1808), Bishop first of Chester (1776) and then of London (1787), was another apologist whose Summary of Christian Evidences was long an educational force in England Born at York of Virginian parentage, he studied at Christ's College, Cambridge. He took an active part in philanthropic and missionary enterprises, and published, besides charges and sermons, a Life of Secker, and other works sufficient to fill six volumes

Samuel Hotsley (1733–1806), born in London and educated at Westminster and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, succeeded his father as rector of Newington in Surrey. A young FRS, he published comments on recent Arctic observations, helped to issue Newton's complete works, and conducted a grand controversy with Priestley, who had reckoned the divinity of Christ amongst his Corruptions of Christianity. Through this he attained successively to the sees of St Davids, Rochester, and St Asaph

Richard Watson (1737–1816), a Westmor land man who studied at Trinity and became professor at Cambridge successively of Chemistry and Divinity, took more interest in farming and planting on his estate at Windermere than in his spiritual cures in Norfolk and Leicester. He was notoriously unspiritual in temper and a Liberal in politics and theology, but made himself famous by his Apologies in reply to Gibbon (1776) and Tom Paine (1796), and became Bishop of Llandaff in 1782

William Wilberforce (1759-1833) was born at Hull, the son of a wealthy merchant, and edu cated at St John's College, Cambridge. Returned to Parliament for Hull and then for Yorkshire, he was a close friend of Pitt, though he remained independent of party During a tour on the Con tinent with Dean Milner, he became seriously impressed about religious truth and duty, and in 1787 he founded an association for the reformation of manners In 1788, supported by Clarkson and the Quakers, he entered on his nineteen vears' struggle for the abolition of the slave trade, crowned with victory in 1807. He next sought to secure the abolition of the slave-trade abroad and the total abolition of slavery itself, and was long a central figure in the 'Clapham sect' of Evangelicals wrote a Practical View of Christianity (1797), which was regarded as an epoch-making book. His Life was written by his sons (one of them the famous Bishop of Winchester, 1838), and his Private Papers were edited by Mrs A M Wilberforce (1898)

Heibeit Marsh (1757–1839), son of the vicar of Faversham in Kent, after a course at St John's, Cambridge, was second wrangler and second Smith's prizeman. He continued his studies at Leipzig, and as translator of his master Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament ranks as the introducer to England of modern German Biblical criticism. He served England well by writing and publishing in German (1799) a defence of English policy in the French war which so conciliated German and Continental good-will that Napoleon proscribed the author, then in Germany, so that he had to lie concealed in Leipzig for months Appointed professor at Cambridge, he increased the excitement already caused by the dissertation appended to his translation of Michaelis, by lectures on the history of sacred criticism, and by a series of critical works which included books on the authenticity and credibility of the New Testament and on the authority of the Old Testament, all regarded as of dangerous and unsettling ten-He involved himself still deeper in controversy by denouncing as immoral the Calvinistic doctrines of the Evangelical school. vehement in polemics, and, appointed Bishop of Llandaff (1816) and of Peterborough (1819), proved an energetic administrator He wrote innumerable charges, pamphlets, and books on such various subjects as the Pelasgi, the Roman Catholic controversy, Dr Bell's system of tuition, toleration, and the Government policy at various dates

Gilbert Wakefield (1756-1801), born at Nottingham, became Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, but renouncing his Anglican orders as a convinced Unitarian, became classical tutor in Dissenting academies at Warrington and Hack-He lay two years in Dorchester jail for a 'seditious' answer to Bishop Watson, earnestly defending the French Revolution, not without severe strictures on the Government of the day and on pluralist bishops. He published editions of Bion and Moschus, Virgil, Horace, and Lucretius, Early Christian Writers on the Person of Christ (1784); Inquiry into the Expediency of Social Worship (1791, disapproving all public worship as such), Examination of Paine's Age of Reason (1794), and Silva Critica, illustrating the Scriptures from profane learning (1789-95) was a keen controversialist, an enthusiast and political fanatic, a Pythagorean in his diet, and an eccentric in many of his ways Porson said of him that he was as fierce against the Greek accents as he was against the Trinity, he felt keenly, acted on the first impulse, and wrote swiftly, often with force and eloquence. His Memoirs (1792) are uninteresting, not so his Correspondence with Fox (1813)

Dr John Lingard (1771-1851), born at Winchester, 5th February 1771, of humble Catholic parentage, was sent in 1782 to the English College at Douay, whence he escaped from the revo lutionists in 1793 to England He went with his fellow-refugees to the college established at Crockhall near Durham, and in 1808 at Ushaw, receiving priest's orders in 1795, and becoming vicepresident and Professor of Philosophy In 1811 he accepted the mission of Hornby near Lancaster, at the same time declining a chair at Maynooth, in 1821 he obtained his D D from the Pope, and in 1839 a Crown pension of £300 His Antiquity of the Anglo-Saron Church (1806) was the precursor of what became the labour of his life-the History of England to the Accession of William and Mary (8 vols 1819-30, 6th ed 1854-55) had access to many unpublished documents in the Vatican archives and other Catholic sources, and was able to correct quietly many errors not merely of ultra Protestant authors, but of such writers as Hume. Inevitably, of course, most Protestants assumed that he had allowed his Catholic prepossessions to pervert the fidelity of his History, to palliate the atrocities of the Bartholomew Massacre, and especially to darken the shades in the characters of Anne Boleyn, Queen Elizabeth, Cranmer, and others connected with the Reformation. His work was subjected to a severe scruting by Dr John Allen in two elaborate articles in the Edinburgh Review, by Archdeacon Todd, a zealous defender of Cranmer, and by other Protestant controversialists in the Quarterly and elsewhere. To these antagonists Dr Lingard replied in 1826 by a vindication of his fidelity as an historian, written in admirable tone and temper. His fairness had already been proved by the fact that Ultramontanes regarded him as Gallican and dangerous to his own Church polity Moderate Protestants were surprised to find how candidly he had dealt with debatable matters, he had obviously so written as to encourage Protestants to study his version of controverted questions. No doubt on the whole he was on many such points nearer the truth than the ultra-Protestants, and his work cleared away many prepossessions and softened the asperity that had heretofore prevailed almost universally between Catholic and Protestant historians For the earlier periods, especially for Anglo Saxon and Norman history, Lingard's work has been completely superseded, it still retains high value for English readers as representing the view of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, and of the Reformation, taken by a candid and conciliatory Roman Catholic. Content with plain speech, Dr Lingard did little to commend his sound and conscientious work by any special graces of style.

One single phrase in Lingard's History attained to special celebrity, the words 'what he deemed to be his duty' in the conclusion of his story of Thomas Becket's assassination, highly disapproved at headquarters, were held to have cost the too judicious historian a cardinal's hat The sentences in which the fateful phrase occurs are these

Thus at the age of fifty three perished this extraordinary man, a martyr to what he deemed to be his duty, the preservation of the immunities of the church. The moment of his death was the triumph of his cause. His personal virtues and exalted station, the dignity and composure with which he met his fate, the sacredness of the place where the murder was perpetrated, all contributed to inspire men with horror for his enemies and veneration for his character

Cranmer and Pole

From the window of his cell the archbishop had seen his two friends led to execution. At the sight his resolution began to waver and he let fall some hints of a willingness to relent, and of a desire to confer with the legate. But in a short time he recovered the tranquillity of his mind, and addressed, in defence of his doctrine, a long letter to the queen, which at her request was answered by Cardinal Pole. At Rome, on the expiration of the eighty days, the royal proctors demanded judg and Paul, in a private consistory, pronounced the usual sentence. The intelligence of this proceeding awakened the terrors of the archbishop. He had not the fortitude to look death in the face To save his life he feigned himself a convert to the established creed, openly condemned his past delinquency, and stifling the remorse of his conscience, in seven successive instru ments abjured the faith which he had trught, and approved of that which he had opposed He first pre sented his submission to the council, and as that sub mission was expressed in ambiguous language, replaced it by another in more ample form. When the bishops of London and Ely arrived to perform the ceremony of his degradation, he appealed from the judgment of the pope to a general council but before the prelates left Oxford, he sent them two other papers, by the first of which he submitted to all the statutes of the realm, respecting the supremacy and other subjects, promised to live in quietness and obedience to the royal authority, and submitted his book on the sacrament to the judg ment of the church and the next general council in the second he professed to believe on all points, and particu larly respecting the sacrament, as the catholic church then did believe, and always had believed from the beginning To Ridley and Latimer life had been offered on condition that they should recant, but when the question was put whether the same favour might be granted to Cranmer, it was decided by the council in the negative. His political offences, it was said, might be overlooked, but he had been the cause of the schism in the reign of Henry, and the author of the change of religion in the reign of Edward, and such offences required that he should suffer 'for ensample's sake' The writ was directed to the mayor or bailiffs of the day of his execution was fixed yet he cherished a hope of pardon, and in a fifth recantation. as full and explicit as the most zealous of his adversaries could wish, declared that he was not actuated by fear or favour, but that he abjured the erroneous doctrines which he had formerly maintained, for the discharge of his own conscience and the instruction of others paper was accompanied with a letter to Cardinal Pole, in which he begged a respite during a few days, that he might have leisure to give to the world a more con vincing proof of his repentance, and might do away, before his death, the scandal given by his past conduct His prayer was cheerfully granted by the queen, and Crunmer in a sixth confession acknowledged that he had been a greater persecutor of the charch than Paul, and wished that like Paul he might be able to make He could not rebuild what he had destroyed, but as the penitent thief on the cross, by the testimony of his lips, obtained mercy, so he (Cranmer) trusted that by this offering of his lips, he should move the clemency of the Almighty He was unworthy of favour, and worthy not only of temporal, but of eternal punishment He had offended against King Henry and Queen Catharine he was the cause and author of the divorce, and, in consequence, also of the evils which resulted from it. He had blasphemed against the sacriment, had sinned against heaven, and had deprived men of the benefits to be derived from the eucharist.

conclusion he conjured the pope to forgive his offences against the apostolic sec, the king and queen to pardon his transgressions against them, the whole realm, the universal church, to take pity of his wretched soul, and God to look on him with mercy at the hour of his death. He had undoubtedly flattered himself that this humble tone, these expressions of remorse, these cries for mercy, would move the heart of the queen. She, indeed, little suspecting the dissimulation which had dictated them, rejoiced at the conversion of the sinner, but she had also persuaded herself, or been persuaded by others, that public justice would not allow her to save him from the punishment to which he had been condemned

At length the fatal morning arrived at an early hour, Garcina, a Spanish friar, who had frequently visited the prisoner since his condemnation, came, not to announce a pardon, but to comfort and prepare him for the last Entertaining no suspicion of his sincerity, Garcina submitted to his consideration a paper, which he advised him to read at the stake, as a public testimony of his repentance It consisted of five parts a request that the spectators would pray with him, a form of praver for himself, an exhortation to others to lead a virtuous life, a declaration of the queen's right to the crown, and a confession of faith, with a retractation of the doctrine in his book on the eucharist Cranmer, having dissembled so long, resolved to carry on the deception. He transcribed and signed the paper, and giving one copy to the Spaniard, retained the other for his own use. But when the friar was gone, he appears to have made a second copy, in which, entirely omitting the fourth article, the assertion of the queen's right, he substituted in lieu of the confession contained in the fifth a disavowal of the six retractations which he had already Of his motives we can judge only from his Probably he now considered lumself doubly If a pardon were announced, he might take the benefit of it, and read the original paper, if not, by reading the copy, he would disappoint the expectations of his adversaries, and repair the scandal which he had given to his brethren. At the appointed hour the procession set forward, and, on account of the run, halted at the church of St Mary, where the sermon was Cranmer stood on a platform preached by Dr Cole opposite the pulpit, appearing, as a spectator writes, 'the very image of sorrow' His face was bathed in tears, his eyes were sometimes raised to heaven, some At the con times fixed through shame on the earth clusion of the sermon he began to read his paper, and was heard with profound silence, till he came to the fifth article. But when he recalled all his former recanta tions, rejected the papal authority, and confirmed the doctrine contained in his book, he was interrupted by the murmurs and agitation of the audience. The lord Williams called to him to 'remember himself, and play the Christian' 'I do,' replied Cranmer, 'it is now too I must now speak the truth' As late to dissemble soon as order could be restored, he was conducted to the stake, declaring that he had never changed his belief, that his recantations had been wrung from him by the hope of life, and that, 'as his hand had offended by writing contrary to his heart, it should be the first to receive its punishment' When the fire was kindled, to the surprise of the spectators he thrust his hand into the flame, exclaiming, 'This hath offended' His suffer ings were short the flames rapidly ascended above his head, and he expired in a few moments. The catholics consoled their disappointment by invectives against his insincerity and falsehood, the protestants defended his memory by maintaining that his constancy at the stale had atoned for his apostacy in the prison.

Historians are divided with respect to the part which Pole acted during these horrors Most are willing to acquit him entirely, a few, judging from the influence which he was supposed to possess, have allotted to him a considerable share of the blame In a confidential letter to the cardinal of Augsburgh he has unfolded to us his own sentiment without reserve. He will not, he says, deny that there may be men so addicted to the most pernicious errors themselves, and so apt to seduce others, that they may justly be put to death for the same purpose as we amputate a limb to preserve the whole body But this is an extreme case, and, even when it happens, every gentler remedy should be applied before such punishment is inflicted. In general lenity is to be preferred to severity, and the bisliops should remember that they are fathers as well as judges, and ought to shes the tenderness of parents, even when they are compelled to punish. This lias always been his opinion, it was that of the colleagues who presided with him at the Council of Trent, and also of the prelates v ho composed that assembly His conduct in England was conformable to these professions. On the deprivation of Cranmer he was appointed archbishop, and his consecration took place on the day after the death of his predecessor From that moment the persecution ceased Pole found sufficient in the diocese of Canterbury exercise for his zeal in reforming the clergy, repairing the churches, and re establishing the ancient discipline His severity was exercised against the dead rather than the living, and his delegates, when they visited the universities in his name, ordered the bones of Bucer and Fagius, two foreign divines, who had taught the nen doctrines at Cambridge, to be taken up and burnt But his moderation displeased the more zealous they called in question his orthodoxy, and in the last year of his life (perhaps to refute the calumny) he issued a commission for the prosecution of heretics within his diocese Five persons were condemned four months afterwards they suffered, but at a time when the cardinal lay on his death bed, and was probably ignorant of their

It had at first been hoped that a few of these bar barous exhibitions would silence the voices of the preachers and check the diffusion of their doctrines. In general they produced conformity to the established wor ship but they also encouraged hypocriss and perjury

James Bruce (1730-94), 'the Abyssiman,' was born at Kinnard House in Stirlingshire, and from Harrow passed in the winter of 1747 to Edinburgh University, with the intention of studying law Instead, coming to London, he married in 1754 the orphan daughter of a wine merchant, and became a partner in the business. His wife died within the year, and after travelling in Spain Portugal, and Italy, in 1763 he became British consul at Algiers, and in 1768 he set out from Cairo on his famous journey to Abvssinia by the Nile, Assouan, the Red Sea, and Massowah In 1770 he was at Gondar, had many stirring adventures, and held for a time a Government appointment On 14th November he reached the source of the Abai, or head stream of the Blue Nile, which he considered the main stream of the Nile, in the December of the following year he quitted Gondar, and returned, through great hardships, by way of Sennaar, Assourn, Alexandria, and Marseilles France he visited Buffon, in 1774 he was back in England It was not until sixteen years after his return that Bruce published his Travels Parts had been made public, and were much ridiculed, Johnson even doubted whether Bruce had ever been in Abissinia. The work appeared in 1790, in five large quarto volumes, with another volume The strangeness of the authors advenof plates tures at the court of Gondar, the somewhat inflated style of his narrative, and his undisguised vanity led to a disbelief of his statements, and numerous lampoons and satires, both in prose and verse, were directed against him 'Peter Pindar' made the most of the live-cow beafsteaks and other improbabilities, and some of the chapters of Baron Munchauser's Travels were levelled as much at Bruce as at the old Hanoverian Freiherr von Münchhausen The really honourable and admirable points of Bruce's character-his energy and daring, his various knowledge and acquirements, and his disinterested zeal in undertaking such a journey at his own expense-vere overlooked in this petty war of the wits Bruce, the was a huge, self assertive, dictatorial man, six feet four inches high, felt their attacks keenly, but he was a proud spirited man, and did not deign to reply to pasquinides imperching his veracity. He sur yised to endure these annoy inces only four years The foot which had trod vithout scrious misidventure the deserts of Nubra tripped on his own staircise at Kinnurd, and, filling heisil, he died of the injuries sustained. Bruce's style is usually plain suling, sometimes vigorous, vivid, and humorous, but occasionally prolic, lie wis apt to select the most prominent features and colour them highly No doubt vanity ind the desire to be always presenting a distinguished figure inade him at times adorn the reality, and his somewhat carcless method of composition twelve years after the events led lum frequently into confusion with his facts and dates. His reports of long conversations vere mentably to some extent literary invention, and he overetated the claims of the Blue Nile to be the lie id-stream, a ignist the red or White Nile. But the trivels of late trivellers in Abassina, Henry Salt (1780-1820) Nithinicl Petrce (1780-1620), and others completely substruttited the most incredible parts of the older traveller's tales, including the story about the Abyssim insteading ray ment cut out of a living cow, which is most persistently denied and flouted by easy climic critics

His First View of the Supposed Source of the Nile

Half undressed as I vas, by the loof my saih, and thros ing off my shoes, I ran down the hill tox ar is the hillock of green so I, which was about to o hundred yards distant, the vhole ade of the hill vas thick grown with flowers, the large bulbous root of which appearing also c the surface of the ground, and their of ins coming off on ing treading upon them, ocea ioned me to very severe falls before I reached the brink of the marsh. I after this came to the altar of green turf, Inch was apparently the work of art, and I stood in rapture above the princi pal fountum, which rises in the middle of it. It is easier to guers than to describe the situation of my inited at that moment-standing in that spot which had bafiled the genus, industry, and inquiry of both ancients and moderns for the course of near three thousand years Kings had attempted this discovery at the head of armics, and each expedition vas distinguished from the lat only by the difference of numbers which had perished, and agreed alone in the disappointment vhich had uniformly, and vithout exception, followed them I ame, riches, and honour had been held out for a series of ages to every individual of those myrinds these princes commanded, vithout having produced one man capable of gratifying the curiosity of his covereign, or wiping off this stain upon the enterprise and abilities of manl ind, or adding this de ideratum for the encourage ment of geography Though a merc private Briton, I triumphed here, in my own mind, over lings and their armies! and every comparison was leading nearer and nearer to presumption, when the place itself where I stood, the object of my vamplory, suggested what depressed my short lived triumph. I was but a few minutes arrived at the sources of the Nile, through num berless dangers and sufferings, the least of which would first eolony, in computing their time, have continued the use of the solar year. Diodorus Siculus says, 'They do not reckon their time by the moon, but according to the sun. Thirty days constitute their month, to which they add five days and the fourth part of a day, and this completes their year.' They have another way of describing time, peculiar to themselves. They read the whole of the four evangelists every year in their churches, beginning with Matthey, and proceeding to Mark, Luke, and John in order, and, in speaking of an event, they write or say that it happened in the days of Matthew, if it was in the first quarter of the year, while the Gospel of 5t Matthew was being read in the churches. And so of Mark, Lule, and John

Nothing can be more inaccurate than all Abyssinian calculations Besides their ignorance of arithmetic, their excessive idleness and aversion to study, and a number of fanciful, whimsical combinations, by which every par ticular scribe or monly distinguishes himself, there are obvious reasons why there should be a variation between their chronology and ours. The beginnings of our years are different-theirs begin on the first of September The last day of August may be the year 1780 with us, and only 1779 vith the Abyssinians. In the annals of their kings they seldom give the lengths of the reigns with precision, and this produces more or less of confusion in the history of the country A difference of two or three years, however, is a matter of little conse quence in the history of barbarous nations. From the record of certain eclipses in the annals of Abyssinia, the dates of which correspond with European observations, I am satisfied that the chronology of my sketch of the history of this country is sufficiently correct for all practical purposes

Steaks from a Living Cow

Not long after losing sight of the ruins of this ancient capital of Abyssinia, we overtook three trivellers driving n cow before them. They had black goat-skins upon their shoulders, and lances and shields in their hands, and appeared to be soldiers. The cow did not seem to be fatted for killing, and it occurred to us all that it had This, however, was not our business. Our been stolen attendants attached themselves, in a particular manner, to the three soldiers, and held a short conversation with The drivers suddenly tripped up the cow, and gave the poor animal a very rude fall. One of them sat across her neck, holding down her head by the horns, the other twisted the halter about her forefeet, while the third, who had a knife in his liand, instead of taking her by the throat, got astride upon her belly, and, to my very great surprise, gave her a deep wound in the upper part of her buttock.

From the time I had seen them throw the beast upon the groun I, I had rejoieed, thinking that when three people were killing a cow, they must have agreed to sell part of her to us, and I was much disappoin ed on hearing the Abyssinians say that we were not to encamp here. Upon my proposing that they should bargain for part of the cow, my men answered, what they had hereal interest learned in conversation, that they were not then going to bill her, that she was not wholly their, and they could not sell her. This awakened my curiosity. I let my people go forward, and staved till I saw, via h the utmost assonichment two pieces, thicker and longer than our ordinary beef steaks, cut out of the higher part of the buttoel of the beast. How it was done I cannot post tively say, but it was accomplished very adroi ly, and the two pieces vere spread on the outside of one of their shields One of them continued holding the head, v hile the other two were busied in curing the wound too, was done not in an ordinary manner The skin which had covered the flesh that was taken away, and had been flapped back during the operation, was now brought over the wound, and fastened to the correspond ing part with small skewers or pins. Whether they had put anything under the skin, I know not, but at the river side, a here they were, they had prepared a cata plasm of clay, with which they covered the wound They then forced the animal to rise, and drove it forward, to furnish them with a fuller meal, when they should meet their companions in the evening

British Incredultty

When first I mentioned this in I ugland as one of the singularities which prevailed in this barbarous country, I was told by my friends it was not believed. I asl ed the reason of this disbelief, and was answered that people who had never been out of their own country, and others well acquainted with the manners of the world (for they had trivelled as far as I rince), had agreed the thing was impossible, and therefore it was so. My friends coun selled me farilier, that as these men were infallible, and had each the leading of a circle, I should by all means obliterate this from my journal, and not attempt to in culcate in the minds of my renders the belief of a thing that men who had travelled pronounced to be impossible. Far from being a convert to such prudential reasons, I must for ever profess openly that I think them un worthy of me. To represent as truth a thing I know to be a falschood, not to arow a truth which I know I ought to declare—the one is friud, the other cowardice I hope I am equally distant from both, and I pledge myself never to retract the fact here advanced, that the Abyssimans do feed in common upon live fligh, and that I myself have, for several years, been partaker of that disagreeable and beastly diet. I have no doubt that, when time shall be given to read this history to an end, there will be very few, if they have candour enough to own it, that will not be ashauted of having ever

A second edition of the Travels edited by Dr Alexander Murray, an excellent Oriental scholar was published with a Life, in 1033 and a third in 1813. See also a Life by Sir Francis Head (1844), and Fanny Burney's Early Diary.

Hungo Park (1771-1805) was born, the son of a farmer, at Foulshiels on the Yarrov, and studied medicine at Edinburgh Universit Through Sir Joseph Banks, he was named assistant-surgeon in the Boraster, bound for Sumatra (1792), and in 1795 his services were accepted by the African Association. He learnt Mandingo at an English factory on the Gambia, started inland in December vas imprisoned by a chief but escaping, reached the Niger at Sego in July 1796. He pursued his was westward along its banks to Banimaku, and then crossing a mountainous country, fell ill but was ultimately brought by a slave trader back to the fie org again after an absence of nineteen months adventures he recorded in Trivels in the letter r of Africa (1799) Having married (1799), he settled as a surgeon at Peebles, but the life was repugnant to him, and in 1805 he undertook another journey to Africa at Government expense Again he started from Pisania on the Gambia, with a company of forty five, when he reached the Niger he had but seven followers. From San sanding he sent back his journals and letters in November 1805, and embarked in a canoe with four European companions. Through many perils and difficulties they reached Boussa, where the canoe was caught on a rock, they were attacked by the natives, and drowned in the double effort to defend themselves and escape from their perilous plight. Joseph Thomson declared that 'for actual hardships undergone, for dangers faced and difficulties overcome, together with an exhibition of the virtues which make a man great in the battle of life, Mungo Park stands without a rival' He was unhappily cut off ere he achieved his great aim, the discovery of the course of the Niger, but the record of his wanderings throws much light on the botany and meteorology of the countries he passed through, and on the social and domestic life of the various tribes he made friends with His narratives are written in a simple and straightforward way, and at once took their place amongst the classics of travel The same can hardly be said for the records of the travels of Denham, Clapperton, or Lander, who a little later fell successively victims to their zeal in exploring this part of Africa.

African Hospitality

Next morning (July 20) I endeavoured, both by en treaties and threats, to procure some victuals from the Dooty, but in vain I even begged some corn from one of his female slaves as she was washing it at the well, and had the mortification to be refused. However, when the Dooty was gone to the fields, his wife sent me a hand ful of meal, which I mixed with water and drant for About eight o'clock I departed from Doslinkerboo, and at noon stopped a few minutes at a large korree, where I had some milk given me by the Foulahs, and hearing that two Negroes were going from thence to Sego, I was happy to have their company, and we set out immediately Mont four o clock we stopped at a small village, where one of the Negroes met with an acquaintance who invited us to a sort of public enter tainment, which was conducted with more than common propricty A dish, made of sour milk and meal, called sinkatee, and beer made from their corn, was distributed with great liberality, and the women were admitted mo the society—a circumstance I had never before observed There was no compulsion, every one was at liberty to drink as he pleased, they no lded to each other when about to drink, and on setting down the calabash commonly and Berka ('Thank you') Both men and women appeared to be somewhat intoricated, but they were far from being quarrelsome

Departing from thence, we passed several large vil lages, where I was constantly taken for a Moor, and became the subject of much merriment to the Bam barrans, who, seeing me drive my horse before me, laughed licartily at my appearance 'He has been at Meeca,' says one, 'you may see that by his clothes ' another asked if my horse was sick, a third vashed to purchase it, so that I believe the very slaves were ashuned to be seen in my company. Just before it was dark we took up our lodging for the night at a small village, where I procured some victuals for myself and some corn for my horne, at the moderate price of a button, and was told that I should see the Niger (which the Negroes called Jollaha, or the great mater) early the The hons are here very numerous, the gates next day are shut a little after sunset, and nobody allowed to go The thoughts of seeing the Niger in the morning, and the troublesome buzzing of mosquitoes, prevented me from shutting my eyes during the night, and I had saddled my horse and was in readiness before daylight, but on account of the wild beasts, we were obliged to wait until the people were stirring and the gates opened. This happened to be a market-day at Sego, and the roads were everywhere filled with people carrying dif We passed four large villages, ferent articles to sell and at eight o'clock saw the smoke over Sego

Is we approached the town, I was fortunate enough to overtake the fugitive Kaartans to whose kindness I had been so much indubted in my journey through Bambarra. They readily agreed to introduce me to the king, and we rode together through some marshy ground where, as I was anxiously looking around for the river, one of them called out, Geo affili ('See the water'), and looking forwards, I saw with infinite pleasure the great object of my mission—the long sought for majestic Niger, glittering to the morning sun, as broad as the Thames at Westminster, and flowing slowly to the cast roard. I hastened to the brink, and having drunk of the water, lifted up my fervent thanks in prayer to the Great Ruler of all things for having thus far erowned my endeavours with success.

The errcumstance of the Niger's flowing towards the east, and its colliteral points, did not, however, excite my surprise, for although I had left Europe in great hesitation on this subject, and rather believed that it ran in the contrary direction, I had made such frequent in quines during my progress concerning this river, and received from Negroes of different nations such clear and decisive assurances that its general course was towards the rising sum, as scarcely left any doubt on my mind, and more especially as I knew that Major Houghton had collected similar information in the same manner

A Kind-hearted African Housewife

I raited more than two hours without having an opportunity of crossing the river, during which time the people who had cro sed carried information to Mansong the king, that a white man was waiting for a passage, and was coming to see him. He immediately sent over one of his chief men, who informed me that the ling could not possibly see me until he knew what had brought me into his country, and that I must not pre sume to cross the river without the king's permission He therefore advised me to lodge at a distant village, to which he pointed for the night, and said that in the morning he would give me further instructions how to conduct myself. This was very discouraging. However, as there I as no remedy, I set off for the village, where I found, to my great mortification, that no person would admit me into his house. I was regarded-with astonish ment and fear, and was obliged to sit all day without victuals in the shade of a tree, and the night threatened to be very uncomfortable-for the wind rose, and there was great appearance of a heavy rain-and the wild bea to are so very numerous in the neighbourhood that I should have been under the necessity of climbing up the tree and resting among t the branches. About sun set, however as I was preparing to pass the night in this manner, and had turned my horse loose that he might graze at liberty, a voman, returning from the labours of the field, stopped to observe me, and percening that I was wears and dejected, inquired into my situation, which I briefly explained to her, whereupon, with looks of great compassion, she took up my saidle and bridle, and told me to follow her Having con ducted me into her hut, she lighted up a lamp, spread a mat on the floor, and told me I might remain there for the night. Finding that I was very hungry, she said she would procure me something to eat. She accord ingly went out, and returned in a short time with a very fine fish, which, having caused to be half broiled upon some embers, she gave me for supper. The rites of hospitality being thus performed towards a stranger in distress, my worthy benefactress-pointing to the mat, and telling me I might sleep there without apprehension -called to the female part of her family, who had stood gazing on me all the while in fixed astonishment, to resume their task of spinning cotton, in which they continued to employ themselves great part of the night They lightened their labour by songs, one of which was composed extempore, for I was myself the subject of it It was sung by one of the young women, the rest joining in a sort of chorus. The air was sweet and plaintive, and the words, literally translated, were these 'The winds roared, and the rains fell. The poor white man, faint and weary, came and sat under our tree. He has no mother to bring him milk-no wife to grind his corn Chorus-Let us pity the white man-no mother has he,' &c. Trifling as this recital may appear to the reader, to a person in my situation the circumstance was affecting in the highest degree. I was oppressed by such unexpected kindness, and sleep fled from my eyes. In the morning I presented my compassionate landlady with two of the four brass buttons which remained on my waistcoat—the only recompense I could make her

An account of Park's second journey was published in 1815. A Life by Wishaw was prefixed to the Journal of 1815, and Joseph Thomson himself a well known African traveller, wrote a little monograph on Mung. Parl (1890).

Sophia and Harriet Lee were the daughters of John Lee, who had been articled to a solicitor, but adopted the stage as a profession Sopliia was born in London in 1750, Harriet not till 1757, and the early death of their mother devolved the cares of the household upon the elder sister, who nevertheless secretly cherished a strong attachment to literature Sophin's first appearance as author was not made till 1780, when her comedy, The Chapter of Accidents, based on Didcrot and brought out at the Haymarket by the elder Colman, was received with applause. The profits served to establish a Seminary for Young Ladies at Bath, a family enterprise rendered the more necessary by the death of the father in 1781, and to Bath accordingly the sisters repaired. Happily their accomplishments and prudence secured rapid and permanent success In 1784-85 Sophia published The Recess, or a Tale of Other Times (the times, namely, of Queen Elizabeth), which instantly became popular The melancholy and contemplative tone of the Recess appears also in the blank verse tragedy, Almyda, Queen of Granada (1796) Harriet Lee, who had meanwhile produced two rather tedious novels and a dull comedy, nov published The Canterbury Tales (5 vols 1797-1805), in which the introduction and two of the tales, tender and sympathetic both, are from the pen of Sophia - The Young Lady's Tale, or the Two Emilys, and The Clergyman's Tale But the best things in the Canterbury Tales are all Harriet's Kruitzner, or the German's Tale, fell into Byron's hands when he was about fourteen 'It made a deep impression upon me,' he recorded, 'and may indeed be said to contain the germ of much that I have since written! While at Pisa in 1821 Byron dramatised Miss Lee's romantic story, and published his version of it under the title of Werner, or the Inheritance The incidents and much of the language of the play are taken straight from the novel, and the public were unanimous in con sidering Harriet Lee as more interesting, passionate, and poetical than her illustrious dramatiser herself adapted it for the stage as The Three Strangers, but it was only played four times The compactness of these tales and the liveliness of the frequent dialogues made them a pleasing contrast to the average three volume novel 1803 Sophia Lee gave up the school having earned a provision for the rest of her life. In 1804 she published The Life of a Lover, a tale written early, and showing juvenility both of thought and expression. In 1807 a comedy from her pen, called The Assignation, was performed at Drury Lane, but played only once, the audience conceiving that some of the satisfical portraits were aimed at popular personages. Sophia died in 1824, Harriet lived on till 1851, remarkable to the last for her vigorous intellect and lively conversation. William Godwin was a devoted admirer of Harriet's, and, in 1798, a formal suitor for her hand, but his religious views were an insuperable barrier to a union. Both sisters were buried in Clifton Church.

From the Introduction to 'The Canterbury Tales'

There are people in the world who think their lives well employed in collecting shells, there are others not less satisfied to spend theirs in classing butterflies. For my own part, I always preferred animate to main mate nature, and would rather post to the antipodes to mark a new character or develop a singular incident than become a Lellow of the Royal Society by enriching museums with nondescripts From this account you, my gentle reader, may, without any extraordinary penetra tion, have discovered that I am among the eccentric part of mankind, by the courtesy of each other, and them selves, yeleped poets-1 title which, however mean or con temptible it may sound to those not honoured with it, never yet was rejected by a single mortal on whom the suffrage of mankind conferred it, no, though the laurel leaf of Apollo, barren in its nature, was twined by the frozen fingers of Poverty, and shed upon the brow it crowned her chilling influence. But when did it so? Too often destined to deprive its griced owner of every real good by an enchantment which we know not how to define, it comprehends in itself such a variety of pleasures and possessions that well may one of us ery-

'Thy lavish charter, Taste, appropriates all we see I' Happily, too, we are not like "artuest in general, encum bered with the treasures gathered in our peregrinations. Compact in their nature, they lie fill in the small cavities of our brain, which are, indeed, often so small as to render it doubtful whether we have any at all. The few discoveries I have made in that richest of mines, the human soul, I have not been cliurl enough to keep to myself, nor, to say truth, unless I can find out some other means of supporting my corporeal existence than animal food, do I think I shall ever be able to afford that sullen affectation of superiority

Travelling, I have already said, is my taste, and, to make my journeys pay for themselves, my object against my good liking, some troublesome fellows, a few months ago, took the liberty of making a little home of nune their own, nor, till I had coined a small portion of my brun in the mint of my worthy friend George Robin son, could I induce them to depart I give a proof of my politeness, however, in leaving my house to them, and retired to the coast of Kent, where I fell to work very busily Gay with the hope of shutting my door on these unwelcome visitants, I walked in a severe frost from Deal to Dover, to secure a seat in the stage coach to London One only was vacant, and having engaged it, 'maugre the freezing of the bitter sky,' I wandered forth to note the memorabilia of Dover, and was soon lost in one of my fits of exquisite abstraction

With reverence I looked up to the cliff which our immortal bard has with more faincy than truth described; with toil mounted, by an almost endless staircase, to the top of a castle, which added nothing to my poor stock of ideas but the length of our Virgin Queen's pool et pistal—that truly Dutch present—cold and weary, I was pacing towards the inn, when a sharp visaged barber popped his head over his shop door to reconnecte the inquisities stranger. A brist fire, which I suddenly east my eye on, invited my frozen hands and feet to its precincts. A civil question to the honest man produced on his part a civil invitation, and having placed me in a snip seat, he readily gave me the benefit of all his oral tradition.

'Sir,' he said, 'it is implify lucky you came across me. The vulgar people of this town have no genus, sir—no taste, they never show the greatest curiosity in the place.

Sir, we have here the tomb of a poet "

'The tomb of a poet!' eried I, with a spring that electrified my informant no less than myself. 'What poet hes here?' and where is he buried?'

'Ay, that is the curiosity,' returned he exultingly I smiled, his distinction was so like a barber. While hall been spealing, I recollected he must allude to the grave of Churchill—that vigorous genus who, well calculated to stand forth the champion of freedom, has recorded himself the slave of party and the victim of splean' So, however, thought not the barber, who considered him as the first of human beings.

'This great man, sir,' continued he, 'who hved and died in the cause of liberty, is interred in a very remarkable spot, sir, if you were not so cold and so tired, sir, I could show it you in a moment.' Curiosity is an excellent greateout. I forgot I had no other, and strode after the barber to a spot surrounded by ruined walls, in the midst of a linch stood the white marble tablet marked with Churchill's name—to appearance its only distinction.

'Cast your eyes on the walls' said the important burber, 'they once enclosed a church, as you may see?'

On inspecting the crumbling ruins more narrowly, I did indeed discern the traces of Gothic arclinecture.

'Yes, sir,' eried my friend the barber, with the conscious pride of an Englishman, throwing out a grunt legand arm, 'Churchill, the champion of liberty, is interred here! Here, sir, in the very ground where King John did honinge for the crown he disgraced'

The idea was grand. In the eye of fance, the slender pillars ngun lifted high the vaulted roof that rang with solemn chanings. I saw the insolent legate seated in scarlet pride, I saw the sneers of many a mitted abbot, I saw, bareheaded, the mean, the prostrate ling, I saw, in short, everything but the barber, whom in my flight and swell of soul I had outwalked and lost. Some more curious traveller may again pick him up, perhaps, and learn more minutely the fact.

Waking from my reverie, I found myself on the pier. The pile beams of n powerless sun gilt the fluctuating waves and the distinct spires of Calais, which I now clearly surveyed. What in new train of images here sprang up in my mind, borne nway by succeeding impressions with no less rapidity! From the monk of Sterne I travelled up in five minutes to the inflexible Edward III senteneng the noble burghers, and living seen them saved by the cloquence of Philippa, I wanted no better seasoning for my mutton chop, and pitted the empty licated peer who was stamping over my little parlour in fury in the cook for having over roasted his pheasant.

William Gilpin (1724-1804), author of v orks on the picturesque aspects of the scenery of Britain, illustrated by his own aquatint engravings, was in his own way an apostle of romanticism Born at Scaleby, Carlisle, he studied at Queen's College, Oxford, kept a school at Cheam, and in 1777 became vicar of Boldre in Hampshire. He published, besides some theological works, a series of books on the scenery of the Wye, of the Lake District, of the Scottish Highlands, and of the Isle of Wight, which drew on him the ridicule of the author of Dr Syntax His best-known book was his too poetic Remarks on Forest Scenery, in which he says 'It is no exaggerated praise to call a tree the grandest and most beautiful of all the productions of the earth,' and he describes trees, singly and in masses, under all conditions of light and weather In not a few points he may rank as an early forerunner of Ruskin

Sunrise in the Woods

The first dawn of day exhibits a beautiful obscurity When the east begins just to brighten with the reflections only of effulgence, a pleasing progressive light, dubious and amusing is thrown over the face of things. A single ray is able to assist the picturesque eye, which by such slender aid creates a thousand imaginary forms, if the scene be unknown, and as the light steals gradually on, is imused by correcting its vague ideas by the real objects. What in the confusion of twilight perhaps seemed a stretch of rising ground, broken into various parts, becomes now vast masses of vood and an extent of forest.

As the sun begins to appear above the horizon, another change takes place. What was before only form, being now enlightened, begins to receive effect. This effect depends on two circumstances—the catching hights which touch the summits of every object, and the mistiness in which the rising orb is commonly enveloped.

The effect is often pleasing when the sun rises in unsullied brightness, diffusing its ruddy light over the supper parts of objects, which is contrasted by the deeper shadows below, yet the effect is then only transcendent when he rises accompanied by a trun of vapours in a misty atmosphere. Among lakes and mointains, this happy accompaniment often forms the most astonishing visions, and yet in the forest it is nearly as great. With what delightful effect do we sometimes see the sun's disk just appear above a woody hill, or, in Shakspeare's language, and dart his diverging rays through the rising vapour. The radiance, catching the tops of the trees as they hang miditary upon the shaggy steep, and tonching here and there a few other prominent objects, imper ceptibly mixes its ruddy tint with the surrounding miss, setting on fire, as it were, their upper parts, while their lower shirts are lost in a dark mass of aried confusion, in which trees and ground, and radiance and obscurity, are all blended together. When the eye is fortunate enough to catch the glowing instant—for it is always a vanishing scene—it furnishes an ridea worth treasuring among the choicest appearances.

'Stand tiptoe on the misty mountain's top'

of nature. Mistiness alone, we have observed, occasions a confusion in objects which is often picturesque, but the glory of the vision depends on the glowing lights which are mingled with it

Landscape painters, in general, piv too little atten tion to the discriminations of morning and evening We are often at a loss to distinguish in pictures the rising from the setting sun, though their characters are very different both in the lights and shadows ruddy lights, indeed, of the evening are more easily distinguished, but it is not perhaps always sufficiently observed that the shadows of the evening are much less opaque than those of the morning They may be brightened perhaps by the numberless rays floating in the atmosphere, which are incessantly reverberated in every direction, and may continue in action after the sun is set, whereas in the morning the rays of the preceding day having subsided, no object receives any light but from the immediate histre of the sun Whatever becomes of the theory, the fact, I believe, is well ascertained

Sir Evedale Price (1747-1829), another notable apostle of the picturesque, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, where he became the friend of Fox, inherited a fortune on the death of his father and the estate of Foxley in Herefordshire, and was made a baronet in 1828 In his Essay on the Picturesque he earnestly recommended the study of the great landscape painters, their works and art, in order to improve real scenery, as well as to promote landscape gardening on true principles He wrote also 'with', elegance' on artificial water, on house decorations, architecture, and buildings He insisted that the picturesque in nature is distinct from the sublime and the beautiful, and in enforcing and maintaining this, he attacked the style of ornamental gardening which Mason the poet lind recommended, and Kent and Brown, the great landscape improvers, had reduced to practice. Some of Price's positions had the honour to be debated and confuted by Dugald Stewart. Price was credited with having greatly stimulated public interest in questions of art and taste, in provoking the desire to observe and enjoy and conscientiously reproduce natural beauty

Atmospherio Effects.

It is not only the change of vegetation which gives to autumn its golden hue, but also the atmosphere itself. and the lights and shadows which then prevail has its light and flitting clouds, with shidows equally flitting and uncertain, refreshing showers, with gry and genial bursts of sunshine, that seem suddenly to call forth and to nourish the young buds and flowers. In autumn all is matured, and the rich hues of the ripened fruits and of the changing foliage are rendered still richer by the warm haze, which, on a fine day in that season spreads the last varmish over every part of the picture. In vinter, the trees and woods, from their total loss of foliage, have so lifeless and meagre an appearance, so different from the freshness of spring, the fullness of summer, and the richness of autumn that many, not insensible to the beauties of scenery at other times, scarcely look at it during that season. But the contracted circle which the sun then describes, however unwished for on every other consideration, is of great advantage with respect to breadth, for then even the midday lights and shadows, from their horizontal direction, are so striking, and the parts so finely illuminated, and yet so connected and filled up by them, that I have many times forgotten the nakedness of the trees, from admiration of the general masses. In summer the exact reverse is the case, the rich clothing of the parts makes a faint impression, from the vague and general glare of light without shadow.

John O'Keefe (1747-1833), a prolific farcewriter, was born in Dublin, and for a year or two was an art student, but, smitten with a passion for the stage, he came out as an actor in his native He generally produced some dramatic piece every year for his benefit, and one of these, Tony Lumpkin in Town, was played with success in 1778 at the Haymarket Theatre in London Failing eyesight disqualified him for acting, but, settling in London about 1780, he continued to supply the theatres with new pieces, and up to the year 1809 had written about fifty plays and farces Most of these were called comic operas or musical farces, and some of them enjoyed great success, such as The Agrecable Surprise, Wild Oals, Modern Antiques, Fontainebleau, The Highland Reel, Love in a Camp, The Poor Soldier, and Sprigs of Laurel, in the first of which the character of Lingo the schoolmaster is a laughable piece of broad humour Wild Oats is still sometimes plaved O'Keefe's things were merely intended to make people laugh, and they fully answered that object. The lively dramatist, who was one of the victims of Gifford's savage criticism in the Baviad and Maviad, went quite blind by 1797, and in 1800 he had a benefit at Covent Garden Theatre, and delivered a poetical address. He died at the age of cighty-five. His songs, brightly conceived and cleverly written, had many of them the good luck to become popular, and wedded to the music of such composers as Shield and Arnold, have kept their place in popular song-books 'I am a friar of orders grey, is a standard song, 'Amo, amas, I loved a lass,' is still occasionally sung, and so are 'The Thorn' and 'Flow, thou regal, purple stream'

George Colman 'the Younger' (1762-1836) vas the most able and successful comic dramatist of his day The son of the author of The Jealous Wife and Claudestine Marriage (see page 561), Colman had an hereditary attachment to the He was educated at Westminster School, drama and was afterwards entered at Christ Church College, Oxford, but his idleness and dissipation led his father to withdraw him hence and banish him to Aberdeen, where, though still distinguished for his eccentric dress and folly, he applied himself to classical and other studies At Aberdeen he published a poem on Charles James Fox, entitled The Man of the People, and wrote a musical farce, The Temale Dramatist, which was brought out by his father at the Haymarket Theatre, but condemned dramatic attempt, Two to One (1784), had some success and fixed his inclinations, for though his father intended him for the Bar and entered him of Lincoln's Inn, the drama engrossed his attention In 1784 he contracted a thoughtless Gretna Green marriage, and next year brought out a second musical comedy, Turk and no Turk, and when his father became incapacitated by attacks of paralysis, undertook the management of the Haymarket. Numerous pieces proceeded from his pen Inkle and Yarico, a musical opera based on a story from the Spectator, brought out with success in 1787, Ways and Means, a comedy (1788), The Battle of Hexham (1789), The Surrender of Calais (1791), The Mountaineers (1793), The Iron Chest (1796), founded on Godwin's novel of Caleb Williams, and at first a failure, The Heir at Law (1797), Blue Beard (1798), a mere piece of scenic display and music, The Review, or the Wags of Windsor (1798), an excellent farce, The Poor Gentleman (1802), Love Laughs at Locksmiths (1803), Gay Deceivers (1804), John Bull (1805), Who Wants a Guinea? (1805), We Ily by Night (1806), The Africans (1808), X Y Z (1810), The Law of Java (1822), a musical drama, &c. It was after the condemnation of the Iron Chist, which afterwards became a standard acting play, that Colman added 'the younger' to his name. 'Lest my father's memory,' he says, 'may be injured by mistakes, and in the confusion of aftertime the translator of Terence, and the author of The Jeal ous Wife, should be supposed guilty of The Iron Chest, I shall, were I to reach the patriarchal longevity of Methuselah, continue (in all my dramatic publications) to subscribe myself George Colman, the younger' No modern dramatist has added so many stock pieces to the theatre as Colman, or given so much genuine mirth and His society was much humour to playgoers courted, he was a favourite with George IV, and, in conjunction with Sheridan, was wont to set the His griety, however, was royal table in a roar not allied to prudence, and theatrical property As manager, is a very precarious possession Colman got entangled in lawsuits, and was forced to reside in the King's Bench The king relieved him by appointing him to the post of licenser and examiner of plays, worth from £300 to £400 a year In this office Colman incurred the enmity of several dramatic authors by the rigour with which he scrutinised their productions. His own plays are far from being strictly correct or highly moral, but not an oath or double-entendre, not even a mild 'O Lord,' was suffered to escape his expurgatorial pen, and he was peculiarly keen scented in detecting all political allusions Besides his numerous plays, Colman wrote some poetical travesties and levities, published as My Nightgown and Slippers (1797), and republished (1802), with additions, as Broad Grins, also Poetical

Vagarus, Lagaries Vindicated, and Eccentricities for Edinburgh In these delicacy and decorum are often sacrificed to broad mirth and humour The last work of the lively author was memoirs of his o in early life and times, entitled Random Colman's comedies abound in Records (1830) witty and ludicrous delineations of character interspersed with bursts of tenderness and feeling, somewhat in the style of Sterne, whom indeed he closely copied in his Poor Gentleman Sir Walter Scott praised John Bull as by far the best effort of recent comic drama 'The scenes of broad humour are executed in the best possible taste, and the whimsical vet native characters reflect the manners of real life The sentimental parts, although one of them includes a finely wrought up scene of paternal distress, partake of the falsetto of German But the piece is both humorous and affecting, and we readily excuse its obvious imperfections in consideration of its exciting our laughter and our tears' Ollapod in the Poor Gentleman is one of Colman's most original conceptions, Pangloss in the Har at Law is a satirical portrait of a pedant, proud of being both LLD and A. double S, and his Irishmen, Yorkshiremen, and country rustics are entertaining though overcharged portraits A tendency to farce is the besetting sin of Colman's comedies, and in his more serious plays there is a curious mirture of prose and verse, high-toned sentiment and low Their effect on the stage is, however, humour irresistible. Octavian in the Mountaineers was a complimentars sketch of John Kemble

Lovely as day he was—but envious clouds
Have dimmed his lustre. He is as a rock Opposed to the rude sea that beats against it,
Worn by the waves, yet still o ertopping them
In sallen majesty Rugged now his look—
For out, alas ' calamity has blurred
The fairest pile of manly comehness
That ever reared its lofty head to heaven '
'Tis not of late that I have heard his voice,
But if it be not changed—I think it cannot—
There is a melody in every tone
Would charm the towering eagle in her flight,
And tame a hungry lion

The following extracts are both from the Poor Gentleman

Sir Charles at Breakfast

Sir Charles Cropland Has old Warner, the steward, been told that I arrived last night?

Valet [adjusting Sir Charles s lair] Yes, Sir Charles, with orders to attend you this morning

Sir Cha [jaroning and stretching] What can a man of fashion do with himself in the country at this vretchedly dull time of the year?

Valet It is very pleasant to day out in the park, Sir Charles

Sir Cha Pleasant, you book ' How can the country be pleasant in the middle of spring? All the v orld's in London

Valet I thmk, somehow, it looks so lively, Sir Charles, when the corn is coming up

Sir Cha Blockhead! Vegetation makes the face of a country lool frightful. It spoils hunting Vet, as my business on my estate here is to raise supplies for my pleasures elsewhere, my journey is a wise one. What day of the month was it yesterday when I left town on this wise expedition?

Valet The first of April, Sir Charles.

Sir Cha Umph! When Mr Warner comes, shew him in.

Valet I shall, Sir Charles [Lxit Sir Cha This same lumbering timber upon my ground has its ments. Trees are notes, issued from the bank of nature, and as current as those payable to Abraham Newland I must get change for a few oaks, for I want cash consumedly—So, Mr Warner

Warner [ertering] Your honour is right welcome into Kent I am prond to see Sir Charles Cropland on his estate again I hope you mean to stay on the spot for some time, Sir Charles?

Sir Cha A very tedious time Three days, Mr Warner

Warner Ah, good sir, things would prosper better if you honoured us with your presence a little more. I wish you lived entirely upon the estate, Sir Charles

Sir Cha Thank you, Warner, but modern men of fashion find it difficult to live upon their estates

Harner The country about you so charming!

Sir Cha Look ye, Warner—I must hunt in Leicester-shire—for that's the thing. In the frosts and the spring months, I must be in town at the clubs—for that's the thing. In summer I must be at the watering places—for that's the thing. Now, Warner, under these circum stances, how is it possible for me to reside upon my estate? For my estate being in Kent——

Harner The most beautiful part of the country

Sir Cha Pshaw, beauty we don't mind that in Leicestershire. My estate, I say, being in Kent—

Warner A land of milk and honey!

Sir Cha I hate milk and honey

Harner A land of fat !

Sir Cha Hang your fat ' Listen to me Wy estate being in Kent-

Harner So woody !

Sir Cla Curse the wood! No-that's wrong, for it's convenient. I am come on purpose to cut it.

Warner Ah! I was afraid so! Diee on the table, and then the axe to the root! Money lost at play, and then, good lack! the forest groans for it.

Sir Cha But you are not the forest, and why do you groan for it?

Warner I heartily wish, Sir Charles, you may not encumber the goodly estate. Your worthy ancestors had views for their posterity

Sir Cha And I shall have views for my posterity—I shall take special care the trees shan't intercept their prospect.

Servant [entering] Mr Ollapod, the apothecary, is in the hall, Sir Charles, to inquire after your health.

Sir Cha Shew him in. [Exit servant] The fellow's a character, and treats time as he does his patients. He shall kill a quarter of an hour for me this morning—In short, Mr Warner, I must have three thousand pounds in three days—Fell timber to that amount immediately 'Tis my peremptory order, sir

Harner I shall obey you, Sir Charles, but 'tis with a heavy heart! Forgive an old servant of the family if he grieves to see you forget some of the duties for which society has a claim upon you

Sir Cha What do you mean by duties?

Warner Duties, Sir Charles, which the extravagant man of property can never fulfil-such as to support the dignity of an English landholder for the honour of old England, to promote the welfare of his honest tenants, and to succour the industrious poor, who naturally look But I shall obey you, Sir np to him for assistance. [Exit

Sir Cha 4 tiresome old blockhead! But where is this Ollapod? His jumble of physic and shooting may enliven me, and, to a man of gallantry in the country, his intelligence is by no means uninteresting, nor his services inconvenient.—H1, Ollapod 1

Ollaped [entering]. Sir Charles, I have the honour to Hope your health is good Been a hard be your slave winter here Sore throats were plenty, so were wood Flushed four couple one morning in a half mile walk from our town to cure Mrs Quarles of a quinsy May coming on soon, Sir Charles-season of delight, love and campaigning! Hope you come to sojourn, Sir Shouldn't be always on the wing-that's Charles He, he, he! Do you take, good being too flighty sir—do you take?

Sir Cha O yes, I take But by the cockade in your hat, Ollapod, you have added lately, it seems, to your avocations.

Olla He, he' yes, Sir Charles I have now the honour to be cornet in the Volunteer Association Corps of our town. It fell out unexpected-pop, on a sudden, like the going off of a field piece, or an alderman in an apoplexy

Sir Cha Explain.

O la Happening to be at home-rainy day-no going out to sport, blister, shoot, nor bleed-was busy behind the counter I ou know my shop, Sir Charles-Galen's head over the door-new gilt him last week, by the-bye —looks as fresh as a pill.

Sir Cha. Well, no more on that head now Proceed O'la On that head! he, he, he' That's very well -very well indeed! Thank you, good sir, I owe you Churchwarden Posh, of our town, being ill of an indigestion from eating three pounds of measly pork at a vestry dinner, I was making up a cathartic for the patient, when who should strut into the shop but Lieutenant Grams, the brewer-sleek as a dray horsein a smart scarlet jacket, tastily turned up with a rhubarb coloured lapel I confess his figure struck me. I looked at him as I was thimping the mortar, and felt instantly inoculated with a military ardour

Sir Cha Inoculated 1 I hope your ardour was of a favonrable sort?

Olla Ha, ha! That's very well-very well, indeed! Thank you, good sir, I owe you one We first talked of shooting He knew my celebrity that way, Sir I told him the dry before I had killed six brace of birds I thumpt on at the mortar We then talked of physic. I told him the day before I had killed-lost, I mean-six brace of patients. I thumpt on at the mortar, eyeing him all the while, for he looked very firshy, to be sure, and I felt an itching to belong to the corps The medical and military both deal in death, you know, so 'twas natural He, he! Do you take, good sir-do you take?

Sir Cha Take? Oh, nobody can miss

Olla He then talked of the corps itself, said it was sickly, and if a professional person would administer to the health of the Association-dose the men and drench the horse-he could perhaps procure him a cornetcy

Sir Cha Well, you jumped at the offer

Olla Jumped! I jumped over the counter, kicked down Churchwarden Posh's cathartic into the pocket of Lieutenant Grains' small scarlet jacket, tastily turned up with a rhubarb coloured lapel, embraced him and his offer, and I am now Cornet Ollapod, apothecary at the Galen's Head, of the Association Corps of Cavalry, at your service.

Sir Cha I wish you joy of your appointment. You may now distil water for the shop from the laurels you gather in the field

Olla Water for-oh! laurel water-he, he! Come, that's very well-very well indeed! Thank you, good sir, I owe you one Why, I fancy fame will follow, when the poison of a small mistake I made has ceased to operate

Sir Cha A mistake?

Olla Having to attend Lady Kitty Carbuncle on a grand field-day, I clapt a pint bottle of her ladyship's diet drink into one of my holsters, intending to proceed to the patient after the exercise was over I reached the martial ground, and jalloped-galloped, I meanwheeled, and flourished with great &lat, but when the word 'Fire' was given, meaning to pull out my pistol in a terrible hurry, I presented, neck foremost, the hanged diet-drink of Lady Kitty Carbuncle, and the medicine being unfortunately fermented by the jolting of my horse, it forced out the cork with a prodigious pop full in the face of my gallant commander

Ollapod visits Miss Lucretia Mactab (a 'stiff maiden nunt, sister of one of the oldest barons in Scotland).

Foss [entering]. There is one Mr Ollapod at the gate, an' please your ladyship's honour, come to pay a visit to the family

Lucretia Ollapod? What is the gentleman?

Foss He says lie's a cornet in the Galen's Head 'Tis the first time I ever heard of the corps.

Luc Ha! some new-raised regiment gentleman in [Exit Foss] The country, then, has heard of my arrival at last A woman of condition, in a family, can never long conceal her retreat that sounds like an ancient name If I am not mistaken, he is nobly descended Ollapod [entering] Madam, I have the honour of Sweet spot, here, among the paying my respects cows, good for consumptions-charming woods here abonts-pheasants flourish-so do agues-sorry not to see the good lieutenant-admire his room-hope soon to Do you take, good madam-do you have his company take?

Luc I beg, sir, you will be seated

Olla O dear madam! [Sitting down] A charming chair to bleed in!

Luc I am sorry Mr Worthington is not at home to receive you, sir

Olla You are a relation of the lientenant, midam?

Luc I1 only by his marriage, I assure you, sir But I am not surprised at your to his deceased wife question My friends in town would wonder to see the Honourable Miss Lucretia Mactab, sister to the late Lord Lofty, cooped up in a farmhouse

Olla [aside]. The honourable I humph! a bit of quality tumbled into decay. The sister of a dead peer in a pigety I

Inc You are of the military, I am informed, sir?

Olla He, he! Yes, madim Cornet Ollippod, of our volunteers—i fine healthy troop—ready to give the enemy a dose whenever they dare to attack us

Inc I was always prodigiously partial to the military My great grandfather, Marmaduke, Baron Lofty, commanded a troop of horse under the Duke of Marlborough, that famous general of his age.

Olla Marlborough was a hero of a man, madam, and lived at Woodstock—a sweet sporting country, where Rosamond perished by poison—araenic as likely as anything

Inc. And have you served much, Mr Ollapod?

Olla He, he! Yes, madam, served all the nobility and gentry for five miles round

Luc Sir 1

Olla And shall be happy to serve the good heutenant and his family [Bowing

Luc We shall be proud of your acquaintance, sir A gentleman of the army is always an acquisition among the Goths and Vandals of the country, where every sheepish squire has the air of an apothecary

Ola Madam! An apothe—— Zounds!—hum!— He, he! I—You must know, I—I deal a little in galenicals myself [shafishly].

Inc Galemeals' Oh, they are for operations, I suppose, among the military

Olla Operations he, he! Come, that s very well—very well indeed I Thank you, good madam, I owe you one Galenicals, madam, are medicines

Luc Medicines!

O'la Yes, physic buckthorn, senna, and so forth

Luc [rising]. Why, then, you are an apothecary?

O'la [rising too, and browing]. And man inidwife at your service, madam

Inc At my service, indeed !

Olla Yes, madam! Cornet Ollapool at the gilt Galen. Head, of the Volunteer Association Corps of Cavalry—as ready for the fee as a customer, always willing to charge them both. Do you take, good madam—do you take?

Inc. And has the Honourable Miss Lucretia Maetabbeen talking all this while to a petry dealer in drugs?

Olla Drugs I Why, she turns up her honourable nose as if she was going to swallow them [aside]. No man more respected than myself, madam. Courted by the eorps, idolised by invalids and for a shot—ask my friend, Sir Charles Crepland

Lue Is Sir Charles Cropland a friend of yours sir?

Olla Intimate He doesn't make was faces at physic, whatever others may do, mad m. This village flanks the intrenchments of his park—full of fine fat venison,

In But he is never on his estate here, I am told 071 He quarters there at this moment.

which is as light a food for digestion as-

Luc Bless me ! has Sir Charles then-

(the Told me all--your accidental meeting in the metropolis, and his visits when the heutenant was out

Itte. Oh, shoering I declare I shall frint

071 I aint t pever mind that, with a ciclical man in the room. I can bring you about in a twinkling.

In And what has Sir Clorles Croplan I presumed to advance also me?

Olla Oh, nothing derogatory. Respectful as a duck legged drummer to a commander in clief

Luc I have only proceeded in this affair from the purest motives, and in a mode becoming a Macrab

Olla None dare to doubt it

Luc And if Sir Charles has dropt in to a dish of tea with myself and Emily in London, when the heutenant was out, I see no harm in it

Olla Nor I either except that ten shakes the nervous system to shatters. But to the point. The beronet's my bosom friend. Having heard you were here—'Ollapod,' says he, squeezing my hand in his own, which had strong symptoms of fever—'Ollapod,' says he, 'you are a military man, and may be trusted.' 'I m a cornet,' says I, 'and close as a pill box.' 'I ly, then, to Miss Lucretia Mactab, that honourable picture of prudence'—

Luc He, lie! Did Sir Charles my that?

Olla [aside]. How these tabbies love to be tordied!

Luc In short, Sir Charles, I perceive, has appointed you his emissary, to consult with me when he may have an interview

Olla Madam, you are the sharpest shot in the truth I ever met in my life. And now ve are in consultation, what think you of a walk vith. Miss I mily by the old elms at the back of the village this evening?

Luc Why I am willing to take any steps which may promote Emily's future welfare.

Other Take steps! what, in a valk? He, he! Come, that s very well—very well indeed! Thank you, good madam, I owe you one. I shall communicate to my friend with due despatch. Command Cornet Ollaporl on all occasions, and whatever the gilt Galen's Head can produce——

Luc [curtsying] O sir !

Olla By the bye, I have some double-distilled laven der water, much admired in our corps. Permit me to send a pint bottle, by way of present

Inc Dear sir, I shall role you

Olla Quite the contrary, for I'll set it doen to Sir Charles as a quart [ande]. Madam, your slave. You have prescribed for our patient like an able physician Not a step.

Inc Nav, I must-

Olla. Then I must follow in the rear—the physician always before the apothecary

The Apothecary! Sir, in this by mess I look upon you as a general officer

Olla Do you? Thank you good maam, I owe you one. [Frank Column wrote many epilogues and prologues to other people's plays and not a few songs, mostly come. Mynheer Van Darch is still familiar in its setting as a glee by Bishop. Unfort trate Miss Bailey is another. His humorous poetre was as popular as his plays often spirkling with wit, and only occasionally spiced with impropriety. The care two trilles from Bishal Grins.

'Who wouldn't be crusty with half a year's biking?'

Will paid for his rooms, cried the host, with a sneer, 'Well, I see you've been going away half a year' 'Friend, we can't well agree, vet no quarrel,' Will said, 'But I'd rather not perish while you make your bread

William Combe (1741-1823), author of Dr Syntax, was born at Bristol, and from Eton pro ceeded to Oxford, but left without a degree 'Godson' (or natural son) of a rich London alderman, who died in 1762, leaving him £2150, he led for some years the life of an adventurer, now keeping a princely style at the fashionable watering-places, anon serving as cook at Douai College and as a common soldier His last forty-three years were passed mostly within the 'rules' of the King's Bench debtors' prison Of the eighty six works by him published in 1774-1824, the Three Tours of Dr Syntax (1812-21) alone are remembered, and even they owe much to Rowlandson's illustrations the first and best of the Tours, the publisher got plates from Rowlandson to begin with, and applied to Combe for letterpress Combe accordingly 'wrote up' to the pictures month by month, and the joint work appeared in successive numbers of Ackermann's Poetical Magazine (1809-11) none of his works did Combe affix his name, but he had no reluctance in assuming the names of Among his literary frauds was a collection of Letters of the late Lord Lyttelton (1780-82) The second or 'wicked Lord Lyttelton' (son of the first, see page 348) was remarkable for his talents and profligacy, and for the mystery about his sudden death, foretold, as Dr Johnson was 'willing to believe,' by an apparition personated the character of this dissolute noble man-with whom he had been at school at Eton -and the spurious Letters are marked by ease, elegance, and occasional force of style attempt was made in the Quarterly Review for December 1851 to prove that these Letters were genuine, and that Lyttelton was the author of Junius's Letters The proof was woolly inconclusive, and there seems no doubt that Combe wrote the pseudo Lyttelton epistles In the same vein he manufactured a series of Letters supposed to have passed between Sterne and Eliza He wrote a satirical work, The Diaboliad, and a continuation of Le Sage, entitled The Devil upon Two Sticks in England (1790) Combe wrote other poems in the style of Syntax—as Johnny Quæ Genus, The English Dance of Death, The Dance of Life, &c.—besides a History of Westminster Abbey (2 vols 1812) and other serious books Gilpin's Forest Scenery, his many tours, and his Picturesque Remarks, and Price's Essay on the Picturesque indicate only two of several persons and fashions he was hitting at in his Dr Sintax In the first tour, described as 'in search of the picturesque' (the others being in search of consolation after his first wife's death, and in search of a new wife), the doctor, an ungainly figure with a long nose, projecting chin, and ill fitting bunchy wig, is represented as setting out, losing his way, stopped by highwaymen and bound to a tree, disputing with a landlady, pursued by a bull, mistaking a gentleman's house for an inn, losing his money on a race course, sketching after nature, and so on The humour is at best very thin, and turns much on eating and drinking (occasionally to excess) and taking one's case in an inn, the whole is drearily Philistine in conception, and frequently spiritless and pointless in execution, and the Hudibrastic verse, though not without point, is wholly without charm. Yet the thing was immensely popular, and an 1838 edition was elaborately illustrated anew by 'Alfred Crowquill' The first canto runs thus (Forrester)

> The school was done, the business o'er, When, tired of Greek and Latin lore, Good Singax sought his easy chair, And sat in calm composure there His wife was to a neighbour gone, To hear the chit chat of the town, And left him the unfrequent power Of brooding through a quiet hour Thus, while he sat, a busy train Of images besieged his brain. Of church preferment he had none, Nay, all his hope of that was gone He felt that he content must be With drudging in a curacy Indeed, on every Sabbath-day, Through eight long miles he took his way, To preach, to grumble, and to pray, To cheer the good, to warn the sinner, And, if he got it,-eat a dinner To burn these, to christen those, And marry such fond folks as chose To change the tenor of their life, And risk the matrimonial strife. Thus were his weekly journies made, 'Neath summer suns and wintry shade, And all his gains, it did appear. Were only thirty pounds a year Besides, th' augmenting taxes press. To aid expense and add distress

Mutton and beef, and bread and beer, And every tlung was grown so dear, The boys, too, always prone to eat, Delighted less in books than meat, So that, when holy Christinas came, His earnings ceased to be the same, And now, alas! could do no more, Than keep the wolf without the door E en birch, the pedant master's boast, Was so increased in worth and cost, That oft, prudentially beguil'd, To save the rod, he spared the child Thus, if the times refused to mend, He to his school must put an end How hard his lot! how blind his fite! What shall he do to mend his state? Thus did poor Syntax runningte, When, as the vivid meteors fly, And illstant light the gloomy sky, A sudden thought neross him came. And told the way to wealth and fame, And, as th' expanding vision grew Wider and wider to his view, The painted fancy did beguile His wee worn pluz into a smile But, while he paced the room around, Or stood immersed in thought profound, The Doctor, midst his rumination, Was wakened by a visitation Which troubles ninny n poor nian's life-The visitation of his wife Good Mrs Syntax was a lady, Ten years, perliaps, beyond her hey day, But though the blooming charms had flown, That graced her youth, it still was known The love of power she never lost, As Syntax found it to his cost, For as her words were used to flow, He but replied or LES or No Whene'er enraged by some disaster, She'd shake the boys and cuff the master, Nay, to menge the slightest wrong, She could employ both arms and tongue, And, if we list to country tales, She sometimes would enforce her nails Her face was red, her form was fat, A round about, and rather squat, And when in angry humour stalking, Was like a dumpling set a walking 'Twas not the custom of this spouse To suffer long a quiet house She was among those busy wives, Who hurry scurry through their lives, And make amends for fiding beauty By telling husbands of their duty

John Wolcot (1738-1819) was a lively, coarse, and copious satirist, who, under the name of 'Peter Pindar,' published a multitude of rhymes on public men and events—many of them on George III, an admirable subject for his jest. Born at Dodbrooke near Kingsbridge in Devonshire, Wolcot was educated at Kingsbridge, at Bodmin, and in Normandy, at the cost of an uncle, a respectable surgeon and apothecary of the little Cornish sea port of Fowey, and then, having studied medicine for seven years under him, walled the London hospitals, and got an MD at Aberdeen (1767) With Sir William Trelawney he went as medical attendant to Jamaica, where his social vays made him a fivourite, but his time being only partly employed by his professional duties, he solicited and obtained from his patron the gift of a church living then vacant, and the Bishop of London ordained the graceless neophyte (1769). His congregation consisted mostly of negroes, and Sunday being their principal holiday and market, the attendance at the church was at best meagre Sometimes not a soul appeared, when Wolcot and his clerk would, after waiting ten numbes, proceed to the seashore and shoot ring taled The death in 1772 of Sir William pigeons Trelaunes cut off further hopes of preferment so bidding idien to Jamaica and the Church, Wolcot accompanied Lady Trelawney to England, and established lumself as a physician at Truro While in Cornwall Wolcot discovered the artistic talents of One-

The Cornish low in tin names bred. and materially assisted to form his taste and procure him patronage, and in 1780 when Opies fame was well established, the doctor and his protegé repaired to I ondon Wolcot had already acquired distinction by his satirical efforts, he now poured forth a long series of caustic odes and epistles, commencing with truculent criticisms of the Royal Academicians, and in 1785 lie produced no less than twenty-three 'ones' In 1786 he published The Liusial, a Heroi-comic Poem, in five cantos, founded on the legend that an obnovious insect had been discovered on the kings plate among some green peas, which produced a solemn decree that all the servants in the royal kitchen were to have their heads shaved. The publication of Bosnell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides afforded another tempting opportunity. and he indited an epistle commencing

O Boswell, Boxy, Bruce, whate'er thy name, Thou mighty shark for nnecdote and fime, Thou jackal, leading lion Johnson forth To eat Macpherson inidst his native north, To frighten grave professors with his roar, And shake the Hebrides from shore to shore, All hail! Triumphant thou through Time's vast gulf shall sail, The pilot of our literary whale, Close to the classic Rambler shalt thou cling, Close as a supple courtier to a king Fate shall not shake thee off with all its power, Stuck like a bat to some old ivied tower Nay, though the Johnson ne'er had blessed thine eyes, Paoh's deeds had rused thee to the skies Yes, his broad wing had mised thee—no bad hack— A tomtit twittering on an eagle's back.

Bozzy and Piozzi, or the British Biographers, was another attack. The personal habits of the king—'the Best of Kings' or 'the King of glory'—were ridiculed in Peeps at St James's, Royal Visits,

Lyric Odes, and the lile. Sir Joseph Banks was not beyond the reach of his satire

A president, in butterflies profound,
Of whom all insect mongers sing the praises,
Went on a day to hunt this game renowned,
On violets, dunghills, nettle tops, and daisies

Bruce the Abyssinian gave him an exceptionally favourable chance the importance of the marvellous is set out by allusions to Scriptural miracles on one hand, and to Psalmanazar, Mandeville, Pontoppidan, and Katerfelto on the other Tom Paine and Mr Pitt, Pve the laureate, Count Rumford, Lord Macartney, and Kien Long, Emperor of China-all furnish subjects for clever but unmannerly comment. From 1778 to 1808 above sixty of these verse pamphlets were issued by Wolcot. So formidable was he, he alleged, that the Ministry endeavoured to bribe him to silence, and he boasted that his writings had been translated into six different languages 1795 he obtained from his booksellers an annuity of £250, payable half-yearly, for the copyright This handsome alloyance he of his works enjoyed, to the heavy loss of his booksellers, for twenty years. Neither old age nor blindness could repress his witty vituperative attacks He had the regular help of an amanuensis, but in his absence continued to write himself 'His method was to tear a sheet of paper into quarters, on each of which he wrote a stanza of four or six lines, according to the nature of the poem the paper he placed on a book held in the left hand, and in this manner not only wrote legibly, but with great ease and celerity' In 1796 his productions were collected and published in four volumes, and several editions were issued, but most of the 'poems' are forgotten satirists can reckon on permanent popularity, and Wolcot's things were inevitably ephemeral, while the recklessness of his censure and ridicule, and the obvious lack of decency, principle, or good moral feeling, hastened oblivion. And in vituperative brutality he met more than his match in Gifford, whose Epistle to Peter Pindar (1800) provoked the hero of so many words wars to a personal assault on Gifford in a bookseller's shop An unsuccessful action of crim con was brought against him in 1807, he died at his house in Somers' Town (January 1819), and was buried in a vault in the churchyard of St Paul's, Covent Garden, close to the grave of Butler

Wolcot was as ready and versatile as Churchill, though usually ruder and more rugged in style, with a quick sense of the ludicrous, not a little real wit and humour, real critical acumen, and a command of stinging and epigrammatic phrases. He had great facility in a vast variety of styles, satirical, merely comic, and quite serious. He wrote 'new old' ballads in pseudo antique spelling, and verse tales in the broadest. Devonshire dialect. Some of the songs are good. The Beggar Man and other serious pieces are actually tender Burns admired his Lord Gregory, and wrote another ballad on the same subject, the love or courtesy verses to Chloe and Julia and Celia and Phillida are wonderfully like anybody else's, but he could not write long without sliding into the ludicrous and burlesque. Much of his work is still amusing, many passages that are now dreary enough reading were doubtless once sufficiently pointed, the easy command of rhymes and loose rhythms reminds one sometimes of Don Juan, sometimes of the Ingoldsby Legends Extraordinary variety and felicity of expression and illustration are almost everywhere in evidence, as in Peter's lively critique of Dr Johnson's style

I own I like not Johnson's turgid style,
That gives an inch the importance of a mile,
Casts of manure a wagon load around,
To raise a simple daisy from the ground,
Uplifis the club of Hercules—for what?
To crush a butterfly or brain a gnat?
Creates a whirlwind from the earth, to draw
A goose's feather or exalt a straw,
Sets wheels on wheels in motion—such a clatter—
To force up one poor nipperkin of water,
Bids ocean labour with tremendous roar,
To heave a cockle shell upon the shore,
Alike in every theme his pompous art,
Heaven's awful thunder or a rumbling cart!

The Pilgrims and the Peas

A brace of sinners, for no good,
Were ordered to the Virgin Mary's shrine,
Who at Loretto dwelt in wax, stone, wood,
And in a curled white wig looked wondrous fine.

Fifty long miles had these sad rogues to travel, With something in their shoes much worse than gravel, In short, their toes so gentle to amuse, The priest had ordered peas into their shoes

A nostrum famous in old popish times
For purifying souls that stunk with crimes,
A sort of apostolic salt,
That popish parsons for its powers exalt,
For keeping souls of sinners sweet,
Just as our kitchen salt keeps meat.

The knaves set off on the same day,
Peas in their shoes, to go and pray,
But very different was their speed, I wot
One of the sinners galloped on,
Light as a bullet from a gun,
The other limped as if he had been shot.

One saw the Virgin, soon feccavi cned, IIad his soul whitewashed all so clever, When home again he nimbly hied, Made fit with saints above to live for ever

In coming back, however, let me say,
He met his brother rogue about half way,
Hobbling with outstretched burn and bending knees,
Cursing the souls and bodies of the peas,
His eyes in tears, his cheeks and brow in sweat,
Deep sympathising with his groaning feet.

'How now!' the light toed whitewashed pilgrim
'You lazy lubber!' [broke,
'Ods curse it!' cried t'other, ''tis no joke,
My feet, once hard as any rock,
Are now as soft as blubber

'Excuse me, Virgin Mary, that I swear As for Loretto, I shall not get there, No! to the Devil my sinful soul must go, For damme if I ha'n't lost every toe!

'But, brother sinner, do explain

How 'tis that you are not in pain—

What power hath worked a wonder for your toes—
Whilst I, just like a smal, am crawling,

Now swearing, now on saints devoutly bawling,

Whilst not a rascal comes to ease my woes?

'How is't that you can like a greyhound go,

Merry as if that nought had happened, burn ye?'
'Why,' cried the other, grinning, 'you must know
That just before I ventured on my journey,

To walk a little more at ease,
I took the liberty to boil mi peas.'

The Apple Dumplings and a King

Once on a time, a monarch, tired with hooping, Whipping and spurring,
Happy in worrying
A poor defenceless harmless buck,
(The horse and rider wet as muck,)
From his high consequence and wisdom stooping,
Entered through curiosity a cot,
Where sat a poor old woman and her pot

The wrinkled, blear eyed good old granny, In this same cot, illumined by many a cranny, Had finished apple dumplings for her pot In tempting row the naked dumplings lay,
When lo' the monarch, in his usual way,
Like lightning spoke 'What's this? what's this?
what, what?'

Then taking up a dumpling in his hand,
His eyes with indimiration did expand,
And oft did majesty the dumpling grapple
'Tis monstrous, monstrous hard, indeed,' he cried
'What makes it, pray, so hard?' The dame replied, Low curtsying 'Please your majesty, the apple.'

'Very astonishing indeed! strunge thing!'—
Turning the dumpling round—rejoined the king
''Tis most extraordinary, then, all this is—
It beats Pinetti's conjuring all to pieces
Strange I should never of a dumpling dream!
But, goody, tell me where, where, where's the seam?'
'Sir, there's no seam,' quoth she, 'I never knew That folks did apple dumplings seaw'
'No!' cried the staring monarch with a grin,
'How, how the devil got the apple in?'

On which the dame the curious scheme revealed By which the apple lay so sly concealed,

Which made the Solomon of Britain start, Who to the palace with full speed repaired, And queen and princesses so beauteous scared All with the wonders of the dumpling art There did he labour one whole week to shew The wisdom of an apple dumpling maker, And, lo' so deep was majesty in dough, The palace seemed the lodging of a baker!

Their Majesties at Whitbread's Brew-house Full of the art of brewing beer,

The monarch heard of Whitbread's fame, Quoth he unto the queen 'My dear, my dear, Whitbread hath got a maryellous great name.

Whitbread hath got a marvellous great name. Charly, we must, must, must see Whitbread brew—Rich as us, Charly, richer than a Jew, Shaine, shame we have not yet his brew house scen!' Thus sweetly said the king unto the queen

Muse, sing the stir that happy Whitbread made Poor gentleman! most terribly afraid

He should not charm enough his guests divinc, He gave his maids new aprons, gowns, and smocks, And lo ' two hundred pounds were spent in frocl s,

To make the apprentices and draymen fine Busy as horses in a field of clover, Dogs, carts, and chairs, and stools were tumbled over, Amidst the Whitbread rout of preparation, To treat the lofty ruler of the nation

Now moved king, queen, and princesses so grand, To visit the first brewer in the land, Who sometimes swills his beer and grands his meat In a snug corner, christened Chiswell Street, But oftener, charmed with fashionable air, Amidst the gandy great of Portman Square

Lord Aylesbury, and Denbigh's lord also,
His Graee the Duke of Montague likewise,
With Lady Harcourt, joined the rarce show
And fixed all Smithfield's marvelling eyes
For lo! a greater show ne'er graced those quarters, Since Mary roasted, just like crabs, the martyrs.

Arrived, the king broad grinned and gave a nod To smiling Whitbread, who, had God Come with his angels to behold his beer, With more respect he never could have met—Indeed the man was in a sweat,

So much the brewer did the king revere

Thus was the brew house filled with gabbling noise, Whilst draymen and the hrewer's boys

Devoured the questions that the king did ask,

In different parties were they staring seen,

Wond'ring to think they saw a king and queen!

Behind a tub were some, and some behind a cask

Some draymen forced themselves (a pretty luncheon) Into the mouth of many a gaping puncheon, And through the bung hole winked with curious eye,

To view and be assured what sort of things Were princesses, and queeus, and lings,

For whose most lofty stations thousands sigh!

And lo! of all the gaping puncheon clan,

Few were the mouths that had not got a man!

Now majesty into a pump so deep Did with an opera glass so curious peep Examining with care each wondrous matter That brought up water!

Thus have I seen a magpie in the street,
A chattering bird we often meet,
A bird for curiosity well known,
With head awry,
And cunning eye,
Peep knowingly into a marrow bone.

And now his curious M——y did stoop
To count the nails on every hoop,
And lo' no single thing came in his way,
That, full of deep research, he did not say,
'What's this? liae, hae? What's that? What's this?
What's that?

So quick the words too, when he deigned to speak, As if each syllable would break its neck

Thus, to the world of great whilst others crawl, Our sovereign peeps into the world of small Thus microscopic geniuses explore

Things that too oft provoke the public scorn, I et swell of useful knowledge is the store,
By finding systems in a peppercorn

Now boasting Whitbread seriously did declare,
To make the majesty of England stare,
That he had butts enough, he knew,
Placed side by side, to reach along to Kew,
On which the king with wonder swifily cried
'What, if they reach to Kew, then, side by side,
What would they do, what, what, placed end to end?'
To whom, with knitted, calculating brow,
The man of beer most solemnly did yow,

Almost to Windsor that they would extend On which the king, with wondering mien, Repeated it unto the wondering queen, On which, quick turning round his haltered head, The brewer's horse, with face astonished, neighed, The brewer's dog, too, poured a note of thunder, Rattled his chain, and wagged his tail for wonder

Now did the king for other beers inquire, For Calvert's, Jordan's, Thrale's entire, And after talking of these different beers, Asked Whitbread if his porter equalled theirs?

This was a puzzling disagreeing question, Gmting like arsenic on his host's digestion, A kind of question to the man of Cask That not even Solomon himself would ask

Now majesty, alive to knowledge, took A very pretty memorandum book, With gilded leaves of ass's skin so white, And in it legibly began to write—

Memorandum

A charming place beneath the grates For roasting chestnuts or potates.

Mem

'Tis hops that give a bitterness to beer, Hops grow in Kent, says Whitbread, and elsewhere.

Ouære

Is there no cheaper stuff? where doth it dwell? Would not horse aloes bitter it as well?

Mem

To try it soon on our small beer— 'Twill save us several pounds a year

Mem

To remember to forget to ask
Old Whitbread to my house one day

Vent

Not to forget to take of beer the cask, The brewer offered me, away

Now, having pencilled his remarks so shrewd, Sharp as the point, indeed, of a new pin, His majesty his watch most sagely viewed, And then put up his ass's skin

To Whitbread now deigned majesty to say 'Whitbread, are all your horser fond of hay?' 'Yes, please your majesty,' in humble notes The brewer answered—'Also, sire, of oats, Another thing my horses, too, maintains, And that, an't please your majesty, are grains.

'Grains, grains,' said mijesty, 'to fill their crops?
Grains, grains,—that comes from hops—yes, hops, hops, hops?'

Here was the king, like hounds sometimes, at fault—
'Sire,' said the humble brewer, 'give me leave Your sacred majesty to undeceive,
Grains, sire, are never made from hops, but malt.'

'True,' said the cautious monarch with a smile,
'From malt, malt, malt—I meant malt all the while.
'Yes,' with the sweetest bow, rejoined the brewer,
'An't please your majesty, you did, I'm sure'
'Yes,' answered majesty, with quick reply,
'I did, I did, I did, I, I, I, I'

Now did the king admire the bell so fine,
That daily asks the draymen all to dine,
On which the bell rung out (how very proper')
To shew it was a bell, and had a clapper

And now before their sovereign's curious eye,
Parents and children, fine fat hopeful sprigs,
All snuffling, squinting, grunting in their sty,
Appeared the brewer's tribe of handsome pigs,

On which the observant man who fills a throne,
Declared the pigs were vastly like his own,
On which the brewer, swallowed up in joys,
Tears and astonishment in both his eyes,
His soul brimful of sentiments so loyal,
Exclumed 'O heavens' and can my swine
Be deemed by majesty so fine?
Heavens! can my pigs compare, sire, with pigs royal?'
To which the king assented with a nod
On which the brewer bowed, and said 'Good God'
Then winked significant on Miss,
Significant of wonder and of bliss,
Who, bridling in her chin divine,

Who, bridling in her chin divine,
Crossed her fair hands, a dear old maid,
And then her lowest curtsy made
For such high honour done her father's swine.

Now did his majesty, so gracious, say_ To Mr Whitbread in his flying way

'Whitbread, d've nick the exciseman now and then? Hae, Whitbread, when d'ye think to leave off trade? Hae? what? Miss Whitbread's still a maid, a maid? What, what's the matter with the men?

'D'ye hunt?—hae hunt? No no, you are too old, You 'ill be lord mayor—lord mayor one day, Yes, yes, I've heard so, yes, yes, so I'm told, Don't, don't the fine for sheriff pay, I'll prick you every year, man, I deelare, Yes, Whitbread, yes, yes, you shall be lord mayor

'Whitbread, d'ye keep a coach, or job one, pray?
Job, job, that's cheapest, yes, that's best, that's best
You put your liveries on the draymen—hae?

Hae, Whitbread? You have feathered well your nest. What, what's the price now, hae, of all your stock? But, Whitbread, what's o'clock, pray, what's o'clock?'

Now Whitbread inward said 'May I be curst If I know what to answer first,'

Then searched his brains with ruminating eye, But ere the man of malt an answer found, Quick on his heel, lo, majesty turned round, Skipped off, and balked the honour of reply

Lord Gregory

'Ah ope, Lord Gregory, thy door,
A midnight wanderer sighs,
Hard rush the rains, the tempests roar,
And lightnings cleave the skies'

'Who comes with woe at this drear night, A pilgrim of the gloom? If she whose love did once delight, My cot shall yield her room'

'Alas' thou heardst a pilgrim mourn
That once was prized by thee
Think of the ring by yonder burn
Thou gav'st to love and me

'But shouldst thou not poor Marion know,
I'll turn my feet and part,
And think the storms that round me blow,
Far kinder than thy heart'

The editions of Wolcots works—1788, 1792, 1794-96 (4 vols.) and 1812 (5 vols.)—are none of them quite complete. Some of the last of his seventy separate publications only appeared in 1814-17 Selections were published in 1824 and 1834. Many verses published tinder the name of 'Peter Pindar, 'Peter Pindar, jun, &c. were not Wolcots, but by various initators.

William Gifford (1756-1826) was born at Ashburton in Devonshire His father, a ne'er-dowell glazier, died of drink in 1767, his mother died a year afterwards, and after some little educa tion, the boy was at thirteen placed on board a coasting-vessel by his godfather, a man supposed to have benefited himself at the expense of Gifford's parents 'It will be easily conceived,' he recorded, 'that my life was a life of hardship. I was not only "a ship-boy on the high and giddy mast," but also in the cabin, where every menial office fell to my lot, yet if I was restless and discon tented, I can safely say it was not so much on account of this, as of my being precluded from all possibility of reading as my master did not possess, nor do I recollect seeing, during the whole time of my abode with him, a single book of any description, except the Coasting Pilot' The cabin boy was often seen by the fishwives of his native town running about the beach in a ragged jicket and trousers, and thus their tale, often repeated, awakened Ashburton to pity for the orphan, as also to resentment against the man who had brought His godfather was concussed into him so low taking him from the sea, and again he was put to school, where he made rapid progress, and soon hoped to succeed his old and infirm schoolmister But in 1772 his godfather, sure he had got learning enough, put him apprentice to a shoemaker, and this new profession Gifford hated with a perfect He had but one book in the world, and that was a treatise on algebra, a subject of which he had no knowledge, but meeting with Fenning's Introduction, he mastered both works 'This was not done,' he remembered, 'without difficulty had not a farthing on earth, nor a friend to give me one pen, ink, and paper, therefore, were for the most part as completely out of my reach as a There was indeed a resource, crown and sceptre but the utmost caution and secrecy were necessary in applying it. I beat out pieces of leather as smooth as possible, and wrought my problems on them with a blunted awl for the rest, my memory was tenacious, and I could multiply and divide by it to a great extent?

He next tried poetry, and some of his 'lament able doggerel' fell into the hands of a surgeon of Ashburton, who raised money to buy him off from his apprenticeship, and in little more than two years Gifford had made such extraordinary progress in study that he was pronounced fit for Oxford 1779 a Bible clerkship was procured for him at Exeter College, and this, with occasional assist ance from the country, enabled him to live till, in 1782, he took his BA. He had been accustomed to correspond on literary subjects with a friend in London, his letters being enclosed in covers sent, The direc to save postage, to Lord Grosvenor tion having been once inadvertently omitted, the franker, supposing the letter to be meant for him self, opened and read it. He was struck with the contents, and after seeing the writer, and hearing his story, undertook his present support and future establishment, and meanwhile invited him to come and live with him 'These,' the grateful scholar testified, 'were not words of course they were more than fulfilled in every point. I did go and reside with him, and I experienced a warm and cordial reception, and a kind and affectionate esteem, that has known neither diminution nor interruption from that hour to this, a period of twenty years' Part of this time was spent in attending his patron's son, Lord Belgrave, on a tour of Europe, which greatly informed the mind of the tutor He appeared as author in 1794. His first production was a saturical poem, The Bavia I, directed against a group of sentimental poetasters of that day, known from their hobbies as the Della Cruscan School--Virs Piozzi, Mrs Robinson, Mr Greathead, Mr Merry, and some others (see page 473)—con spicuous for their affectation and bad taste, and their high-flown compliments to one another was a specious brilliancy in these exotics,' Gifford complained, 'which dazzled the native grubs, who had scarce ever ventured beyond a sheep, and a crook, and a rose tree grove, with an ostentatious display of "blue hills," and "crashing torrents," and "petrifying suns"; Gifford's vigorous exposure of the 'splay-foot madrigals' and 'nambypamby madrigals of love,' in Scott's phrase, 'squabashed the Della Cruscans at one blow' Anna Matilda, Laura Maria, Edwin, Orlando, and the other high flown heralds of log-rolling sank into instant and irretrievable contempt. satire, in the form of a conversation between the author, Persius, represented by P, and a friend, F, was universally read and admired, now it seems often unreasonably savage and But lines like these can hardly be described as wholly temporary or antiquated in application

Degeneracy of Modern Literature

Oh for the good old times ' when all was new, And every hour brought prodigies to view, Our sires in unaffected language told Of streams of amber and of rocks of gold Full of their theme, they spurned all idle art, And the plain tale was trusted to the heart. Now all is changed! We fume and fret, poor elves, Less to display our subject than ourselves Whate'er we paint—a grot, a flower, a bird, Heavens, how we sweat! laboriously absurd! Words of gigantic bulk and uncouth sound, In rattling triads the long sentence bound, While points with points, with periods periods jar, And the whole work seems one continued war! Is not this sad?

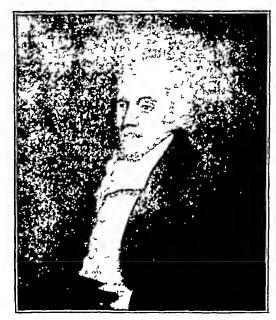

F—Tis pitiful, Heaven knows,
Tis wondrous pitiful. E'en take the prose
But for the poetry—oh, that, my friend,
I still aspire—nay, smile not—to defend
You praise our sires, but, though they wrote with force,
Their rhymes were vicious, and their diction coarse,
We want their strength—agreed, but we atone
For that and more by sweetness all our own.

For instance—'Hasten to the lawny vale, Where yellow morning breathes her saffron gale, And bathes the landscape'——

P—Pshaw, I have it here.
'A voice seraphic grasps my listening ear
Wondering I gaze, when lo' methought afar,
More bright than dauntless day's imperial star,
A godlike form advances'

F—You suppose
These lines perhaps too turgid, what of those?
'The mighty mother'——

P—Now, 'tis plain you sneer, For Weston's self could find no semblance here Weston' who slund from truth's imperious light, Swells like a filthy toad with secret spite,

And, envying the fame he cannot hope,
Spits his black venom at the dust of Pope.
Reptile accursed '—O 'memorable long,
If there be force in virtue or in song,'
O injured bard 'accept the grateful strain,
Which I, the humblest of the tuneful train,
With glowing heart, yet trembling hand, repay,
For many a pensive, many a sprightly lay '
So may thy varied verse, from age to age,
Inform the simple, and delight the sage,
While canker'd Weston and his loathsome rhymes
Stink in the nose of all succeeding times

Mrs Piozzi's share in this fantastic garland of exotic verse is hit off in one felicitous couplet

See Thrale's gay widow with a satchel roam, And bring in pomp her laboured nothings home! Tasteless bibliomanines are sketched—those who

On black letter pore, And what they do not understand, adore, Bny at vast sums the trash of ancient days, And draw on produgality for praise. These, when some lucky lut, or lucky price, Has blessed them with The Boke of Gode Advice, For ekes and algates only deign to seek, And live upon a whilome for a week.

The Baviad was a paraphrase of the first satire of Persius In the year following, encouraged by its success, Gifford produced The Maviad, an imitation of Horace, levelled largely at the corruptors of the drama, the little-known poetasters Bavius and Mevius being stigmatised together as poetasters by Virgil, while Mævius is contemp tuously treated by Horace In the Maviad also the Della Cruscan authors—who attempted dramas as well as odes and elegies—are gibbeted in satiric verse, but Gifford was sufficiently catholic in his dislikes to include O'Keefe, Holcroft, and Morton among the objects of his most vehement condemnation. The plays of Kotzebue and Schiller, then first translated and much in vogue, he also confounded in the same denunciation as 'heavy, lumbering, monotonous stupidity, worse even than the lively nonsense of O'Keefe and Co'

Both satires are strangely planless, rambling, miscellaneous, at times irrelevant, and not even always saturical or abusive. Gifford could praise with perspicacity, as when in the Baviad he laments that lords and dukes were victims of metromania, 'curs'd with a sickly taste, while Burns' pure nurture runs to waste' And a good bit of the Maviad is eulogy of the character and art of his friend Hoppiner the painter James Boswell comes in repeatedly for severe treatment, and some of the most vicious remarks are not in the text but in the footnotes, which often fill more than half the page Thus 'Wonderful is the profundity of Bathos! I thought that O'Keefe had reached the bottom of it, but, as uncle Bowling says, I thought a d-n'd lie Holcroft, Reynolds, and Morton have sunk beneath They have happily found "in the lowest deep a lower still," and persevere in exploring it with an emulation that does them honour' Holcroft 'is a poor stupid wretch, to whom infidelity and disloyalty have given a momentary notoriety, and opened the theatre to two or three of his grovelling and senseless productions? In 1797 a certain Williams, who assumed the name of Anthony Pasquin for his 'ribald strains' (a victim of a different type), aggrieved at his well-metited castigation in the Baviad, was nonsuited in an action against Gifford's publisher, though Gifford's statement was 'that he was so lost to every sense of decency and shame that his acquaintance was infamy and his touch poison'. The Tory bias is plain here and elsewhere. The following passage from the Mæviad explains the satirist's design

Sick of th' eternal croak, which, ever near, Beat like the death watch on my tortured ear, And sure, too sure, that many a genuine child Of truth and nature, check'd his wood notes wild, (Dear to the feeling heart,) in doubt to win The vacant wanderer, mid the unceasing din

Of this hoarse rout, I seized at length the wand, Resolv'd, tho' small my skill, tho' weak my hand, The mischief, in its progress, to arrest, And exoreise the soil of such a pest

Gifford in 1800 tried a third satire, an Episile to Peter Pindar (Dr Wolcot), which, being founded on personal animosity, is more remarkable for its passionate vehemence and abuse than for its point or justice, felicity or correctness. Wolcot replied with A Cut at a Cobbler, and, by-and by, with a personal assault (page 663) The notonety of Gifford's satires pointed him out as the man to edit the Anti-Jacobin, a weekly paper started by Canning and others to ridicule and expose the political agitators of the times Established in November 1797, it survived only till July 1798, but the connection thus formed with politicians and men of rank was afterwards serviceable to Gifford, he was made paymaster of the gentlemen-pensioners and commissioner of the lottery, with an income from the two offices of £900 In 1802 he published a translation of Juvenal, to which was pre fixed his sketch of his own life, a simple and unaffected autobiography When his Juvenal was attacked in the Critical Review, Gifford replied in An Examination, which pleasantly compared his reviewer to a tond

During my apprenticeship, I enjoyed perliaps as many places as Serub [in Farquhar's Beaux' Stratagen], though I suspect they were not altogether so dignified the chief of them was that of a planter of cabbages in a bit of ground which my master held near the town. It was the decided opinion of Panurge that the life of a cabbage planter was the safest and pleasantest in the world I found it safe enough, I confess, but not altogether pleasant, and therefore took every oppor tunity of attending to what I liked better, which happened to be, watching the actions of insects and reptiles, and, among the rest, of a huge toad I never loved tonds, but I never molested them, for my mother had early bid me remember that every living thing had the same Maker as myself, and the words always rang in my The toad, then, who had taken up his residence under a hollow stone in a hedge of blind nettles, I used to watch for hours together It was a lazy, lumpish animal, that squatted on its belly, and perked up its hideous head with two glazed eyes, precisely hile a In this posture, perfectly satisfied Critical Reviewer with itself, it would remain as if it were a part of the stone, till the cheerful buzzing of some winged insect provoked it to give signs of life. The dead glare of ifs eyes then brightened into a vivid lustre, and it awkwardly shuffled to the entrance of its cell, and opened its detestable mouth to snap the passing fly or Since I have marked the manners of the honey bee Critical Reviewers, these passages of my youth have often occurred to me

These are specimens of Gifford on Peter Pindar

But what is he, that with a Mohawk's air 'Cries havock, and lets slip the dogs of war?' A'bloated mass, a gross, blood bolter'd clod, A foe to man, a renegade from God, Cornwall remembers vet his first employ, And shuddering tells with what infernal jov His little tongue in blasphemies was loos'd, His little hands in deeds of horror us d, While mangled insects strew d his cradle o'er, And limbs of birds distain'd his bib with gore.

Lo here the repule' who from some dark cell, Where all his veins with native poison swell, Crav Is forth, a slimy toad, and spits, and spies. The crude abortions of his loathsome muse, On all that Genius, all that Worth holds dear, Unsulited rank, and piets sincere, While idiot mirth the base defilement lands, And malice, with averted free, applauds!

Lo here the brutal sot' who, drench'd with gin Squeals out (with oaths and blasphemies between) The impious song, the tale, the jest obscene, And careless views, amidst the barbarous roar, His few grey hairs strew, one by one, the floor!

Besides his version of Juvenal Gifford translated Persius, and edited the plays of Massinger, Ford, and Shirley, and the works of Ben Jonson In 1803 John Murray, with the co-operation of Walter Scott and Souther, resolved on starting a review, in opposition to the now famous Edinburgh, and Gifford was selected as editor. In his hinds the Quarterly Review became a powerful political and literary journal, to which leading statesmen and famous authors equally contributed. He continued to discharge his duties as editor until within two years of his death on 31st December 1826, and he was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Gifford was high spirited, courageous, and sin cerc, but in most of his writings there was a strong tinge of personal acerbity and even virulence. was a good hater, and as he was opposed to all political visionaries and reformers, his wrath had seldom time to cool Even where no such prejudices could interfere, his literary criticism was frequently disfigured by the same temper, whoever, dead or alive, had ventured to say aught against Ben Jonson, or write what he deemed unsatisfactory comments on his favourite dramatists, was assailed with a vehemence ludicrously disproportioned to the offence, too many of those whom he for one reason or another disapproved were described as toads and reptiles His attacks on Hazlitt, Lamb, and Leigh Hunt-av, and on Keats (for the Endymon article of 1818 was almost certainly his), in the Quarterly, have no pretensions to be fair or candid criticism object was to crush such authors as were opposed to the Government of the day, or who departed from his canons of literary propriety Even the best and most spirited of his criticisms lack width of view and candour, and accordingly fail to produce their effect. Hazlitt returned his compliments in an open letter, and by a bitter attack on him in the Spirit of the Age. Looking with distrust and suspicion on the growing importance of the United States, Gifford kept alive among the English aristocracy a feeling of dislike or hostility towards America as unwise as it was ungenerous best service to literature was his edition of Ben Jonson, in which he successfully vindicated the great classic from unjust aspersions. His small but sinewy intellect, as a critic put it, was well employed in bruising the butterflies of the Della. Some of his shorter poems-Cruscan Muse one in affectionate remembrance of a faithful mudservant, one on a trip to Greenwich Hill on the 1st of May, &c.—are kindly, even tender, but his fame must rest on his incisiveness as satirist and his influence as critic and annotator Possibly the story of his early struggles may be read when his other writings are forgotten

The Rolliad, a series of political satures. written by some Whigs of wit and fashion, attracted universal attention and was wonderfully popular The idea is original, though the authors had the Dunciad before their eyes, they cleverly burlesqued Homer and Virgil, Shakespeare and Milton, and imitated Dryden and Churchill, and the level of prose and verse is so high that it is strange both should have been so utterly forgotten The Anti Jacobin is, with a few brilliant exceptions, mainly a series of heavy political pamphlets. the Rolliad and its companion pieces are, on the whole, more varied and sprightly But the innumerable topical allusions in the Rolliad, the large number of pieces that depend for their point on forgotten incidents and unimportant persons, have in this case hastened the oblivion that is the usual fate of political satire unless it dips deep into the elemental humour of human nature, and is the work, not of brilliant wits, but of a true genius The greater ferocity of the Anti-Jacobiu, its savage earnestness, is largely explained by the fact that the Rolliad appeared before the French Revolution had raised greater issues and stirred men's souls to their uttermost The so called Criticisms on the Rolliad appeared first in the Morning Herald, a London newspaper, in 1784-85, and were a succession of satires on Colonel John Rolle, afterwards Lord Rolle (1750-1842), a staunch adherent of Pitt, the blundering and passionate MP for Devon, who made himself obnoxious to the Opposition by his hostility to For. He lived to do homage to Queen Victoria at her coronation, but, eightsseven years old, he stumbled and fell on the steps of the throne, whereupon, as is well remembered, the young queen graciously and gracefully rose and came forward to meet him

In 1784 Pitt had been returned with an overwhelming majority. The Whigs, smarting under defeat, were naturally eager to show in ever way their superiority in wit and eloquence over sheer weight of numbers—brought to bear in the House of Commons, as they maintained, mainly by the loud and prolonged cheering and hissing of the 'stupid party,' comprising the home plutocrats and the Indian nabobs The 'Westminster Scrutiny' in 1784-85, when the Government party tried-but failed-to oust Fox from his seat at Westminster in favour of Sir Cecil Wray, gave the Whigs something to rejoice over, few political events ever called forth such a wealth of squibs, lampoons, and caricatures The Rolliad consists of pretended criticism on a supposititious epic poem, from which quotations were now and again made, enough only being given at a time to serve as text for the comment. The plot was suggested by a boast of Rolle that he was descended from the Norman Duke Rollo, who (disguised as a smuggler) is made to sail to England, and, by help of Merlin, has visions of the glories of his descendants in England, down to the most distinguished scion of the stock, the strong lunged Tory member who coughed down The vision of his descendants' career is, as might be expected, not wholly pleasing-thus several of the principal representatives of the family are seen to come to an untimely and In the 'Dedication' it is indishanneful end. cated that the Rolliad 'owed its existence to the memorable speech of the member for Devonshire on the first discussion of the Westminster Scrutiny, when he so emphatically proved himself the genuine descendant of Duke Rollo, and in the noble contempt which he showed for the rights of electors seemed to breathe the very soul of his great progenitor, who came to extirpate the liberties of Englishmen with the sword' And the last of Rollo's stock had at various times in his career (so the vision showed) had humiliating experiences -as at Westminster School, for example

> In vain ten thousand Busbys should employ Their pedant arts thy genius to destroy, In vain at either end thy Kolle assail, To learning proof alike at head or tail

The planless plan allows the free handling of all the supporters of the Government most open to criticism, burlesque, or innuendo as bores, fools, or venal persons, the bishops are not spared—

Who still, submissive to their Maker's nod, Adore their Sovereign, and respect their God,

Cumberland the dramatist and Rowland Hill the popular preacher are sharply dealt with, the hygienic ments of the Highland kilt and of southong (as compared with stingo and October) are lauded in mock heroics, and for the comfort of the luxurious Indian contingent, it is proposed to introduce a few velvet cushioned couches of ivory in place of the hard benches of the House of Commons

The Criticisms on the Rolliad appeared in a 'First Part' and a 'Second Part,' and this series of clever jeux desprit was followed by Probationary Odes for the Laureateship, Political Ecloques, and Political Miscellanies The design of the Probationary Odes was probably suggested by Pope's ridicule of Cibber, and the death of Whitehead, the poet-laureate, in 1785, was seized upon by the Whig wits as affording an opportunity for satirising some of the political and literary characters of the day, conspicuous as members or supporters of the Government. Pitt, Dundas, Jenkinson (Lord Liverpool), Lord Thurlow, Major John Scott (agent for Warren Hastings), Harry Dundas (Viscount Melville), and others were the objects of these humorous sallies and personal invectives, while among literary men, Joseph and Thomas Warton, Sir John Hawkins, Macpherson (the translator of Ossian), and Sir N W Wraxall, MP, traveller, and author of many books of travels, were selected for attack. The idea (some what analogous to that of the Rejected Addresses) was to make the personages write, in competition for the laureateship, poems as specimens of their powers, thus giving the parodists scope for satins ing their characters, caricaturing their peculiarities, and burlesquing their style

Though there is a great variety of rhymes and of subjects, there is a wonderful unanimity of feeling throughout, and it has always been difficult to say who was the author of the several pieces, doubtless many were the joint work of several pens The chief contributors to this gailery of burlesque portraits and clever caricatures were Dr French Laurence (1757-1809), the friend of Burke, who was the chief editor or director of the satires, he was ultimately chancellor of the diocese of Oxford and judge of admiralty for the Cinque Ports He wrote also odes and sonnets, and translations from the Italian —General Richard Fitzpatrick (1747-1813), a brother of the last Earl of Upper Ossory, who served in the army in America, was long in Parliament, and held the offices of Secretary-at-War Fitzpatrick was the most and Irish Secretary intimate friend of Charles James Fox, he was famous as a wit, and published several poems, saturical and other - richard Tickell (1715-93), the grandson of Addison's friend and the brotherin law of Sheridan, besides his contributions to the Rolliad, was author of The Wreath of Tashion and other poetical pieces, and of a lively political pamphlet entitled Anticipation, 1778 was a commissioner of stamps, he was a great favourite in society, yet in a moment of de spondency he threw himself from a window in Hampton Court Palace, and was killed on the spot -Joseph Richardson (1755-1803), a journalist and ultimately proprietor of the Morning Post, was author of a comedy called The Fugitive, and was partner with Sheridan in Drury Lane Theatre. From 1776 till his death he sat in Parliament.

Among the other contributors to the Rolliad were Lord John Townsend (1757–1833), Wr George Fills (1753–1815), editor of Early English poetry, friend of Scott, and afterwards one of the founders of the Tory Anti-Jacobin (see pages 673, 678), Sir Robert Adair, Fox's intimate, a capable diplomatist, and General Burgoyne (1723–92), who surrendered to

Gates at Saratoga, latterly known as author of painphlets, miscellanea, and at least one successful comedy, The Heiress These were for the most part gay, witty, fashionable, and somewhat fist-living men, whose political satire and malice, as Moore has remarked, 'from the fancy with which it is mixed up, like certain kinds of fireworks, explodes in sparkles'-though, it must be added, some of their sallies are coarsely personal The topics of their saure are now in a great measure forgotten-superseded by other party-men and party measures, and the very qualities which gave it immediate and splendid success, and carried the series through more than a score of editions, have sunk it the sooner no oblivion

Merlin in the House

It is possible Merlin might even have gone on much longer, but he is interrupted by one of those disturbances which frequently prevail in the House of Commons. The confusion is finely described in the following broken couplet.

'Spole' Spole '—Sir'—Mr Speaker—Order there'
I rise —Spole'—Question' Question'—Chair' Chair'

This incident is highly natural, and introduced with the greatest judgment, as it gives another opportunity of exhibiting Mr Rolle, and in a situation where he always appears with conspicuous pre-eminence.

Great Rollo lool'd amazed, nor without fears His hands applied by instinct to his ears. He lool'd, and lo' amid the wild acclaim Discerned the future glory of his name, O er this new Babel of the noisy crowd, More fierce than all, more turbulent, more foud, Him vet he heard with thund'ring voice contend, 'Him first, him last, him midst, him without end'

Collected editions of The Rolliad, Probationary Odes and Political Eclogues and Miscellanies appeared in 1795 and subsequently, the twenty-second edition was dated 1812. The author ship of the various pieces in the Rolliad was discussed at length in vols. ii and iii. of the First Series of Notes and Queries, and see an article in St Paul's, vol. v. (1870).

George Canning (1770-1827), the scion of an old Anglo Irish family long settled at Garvagh in County Derry, was born in London, his father, having quarrelled with his family over his marriage, tried poetry, pamphleteering, and law without success, and died leaving his wife, with a one yearold baby, to make a struggle to live as an actress. The boy, however, was sent by a banker uncle to Eton and Christ Church, and after a time at Lincoln's Inn, when according to Scott's story he was startled out of revolutionary sympathics by a visit from Godwin (see page 702), entered Parlia ment as a supporter of Pitt in 1796 In two years he had made himself famous as a parliamentary orator, and formidable as the ruling spirit of the In 1804 he became Pitt's Secretary Anti-Jacobin of the Navy In or out of office he was a most conspicuous figure till, in 1822 on the death of Castlereagh, with whom he had fought a duel in 1809, he became Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and helped to make history. At home he was disliked by reformers as a supporter of oppressive measures, his foreign policy was branded as revolutionary Tories suspected him of leanings to Liberthism, to Liberals he was always a Tory Eldon and Wellington in his own camp disliked him, and his contemptuous criticisms of all who differed from him made him many enemies. He supported Catholic emancipation, asserted British inde pendence against the Holy Alliance, promoted commerce by mitigating the protective prohibitive system, prepared the way for the repeal of the Corn Laws, worked with France and Russia for Greek independence, supported Portugal against Spain, and (though both Castlereagh and Welling ton admitted the de facto independence) was the first to recognise the free states of South America. In 1827 he became Prime Minister with the aid of the Whigs, but his health give way under the cares of office, and he died within six months, in the same room where Fox had breathed his last. He was a master of polished eloquence, of incisive logic, of trenchant wit, of brilliant rhetoric, but had not the power of convincing and persuading that his great predecessors Pitt and Burke and Fox exercised, though Cornewall Lewis thought that Canning as an orator had never been surpassed, perhaps never equalled, and Mackintosh ranked him above Pitt a strenuously saturical and powerful organ of Conservative opinion in prose and verse, begun in November 1797, and carried on—in dead earnest even when at its wittiest-till the July of next year Canning was the master-spirit, but he had Gifford for editor, and amongst his principal collaborators George Ellis and Hookham Frere, Pitt, too, may have lent a hand The Whig Rolliad had been rollicking, broadly humorous, at times coarse and offensively personal, but it aimed more at fun than at the destruction of error and the dissemination of truth These were distinctly amongst the aims of the Anti-Jacobin, and there is therefore some excuse for a measure of bitterness and even ferocity both in defence and assault, which cannot be attributed solely to Gifford. The Anti-Jacobin stood up for the English constitution against all foes, domestic and foreign, especially against French republicans and their friends, for Christianity and the Church of England against innovators, freethinkers, Dissenters, and atheists, for common sense against the poetry and philosophy of Erasmus Darwin, for English humour and taste against the false and feeble sentiment, silly rodomontade, lay morality, pointless dramatic construction, and general imbecility the Tory wits (from imperfect knowledge) conceived to be charac-The management was someteristically German times, as might be expected, undiscriminating and unfair in the selection of persons to be attacked Thus 'Coleridge and Southcy, Lloyd and Lamb and Co,' are invoked, along with 'Paine, Williams, Godwin, Holcroft,' and 'all creeping creatures venomous and low,' to worship the revolutionary Lepaux. It is not singular that Southey should at this time bave been denounced as an incendiary, or that Helen Maria Williams should have been very disrespectfully alluded to Coleridge never admitted that he was fairly treated in these references, and even when a high Tory, continued to resent the inclusion in this connection of poor Charles Lamb's name

More famous than his speeches are his contributions to The Anti-Jacobin or Weekly Examiner,

In the Anti Jacobin for 1802 there is a commendatory notice of the poem called The Infidel and Christian Philosopher, contrasting the deathbeds of Voltaire and Addison, the long extract on Voltaire's end begins thus—

View yon pale wretch who late with haughty pride Like you his Saviour and his God deny'd. Mark how his fiery eyeballs, glaring roll, And shew the anguish of his tortur'd soul, and Voltaire is made to bewail his blasphemies and in abject terror implore the sovereign mercy which he scorned before

The same number, reviewing a volume of poetry 'by the author of Gebir,' repudiates 'all knowledge of the former productions of this notable bard' named on the title (including The Phoceans and Chrysaor), but pronounces this 'the most arrant doggrell as ever poor critic was compelled to regard. In short, worse lines and worse principles were seldom if ever united in one poor volume This fustion probably comes from one of the dissenting manufactories at Warwick.'

A good deal of difficulty has been found in fixing the authorship of the various contributions to the Anti-Jacobin, which were of course anonymously published, many of the best were the joint work of two or more of the band. Some of the very best were undoubtedly wholly or almost wholly Canning's work. Amongst these are generally reckoned the prospectus, the inscription for the cell of Mrs Brownrigg, the murderer, the second and third parts of The Lovis of the Triangles, The Needy Knife-Grinder, the second and third parts of The Progress of Man, and The New Morality Canning shared with Ellis and Frere in the play of The Rovers (with its English heroes Puddingfield and Beefington), meant to ridicule German plays generally, though in truth it has little relevance to any actual German work, and the 'Song of Rogero' is apparently his, though it is said Pitt added the last verse.

The Browning poem caricatured Southey's inscription for the cell of Henry Marten, the parliamentarian regicide, at Chepstow, the 'Friend of Humanity' was the Irish Whig MP, Tierney, the Progress of Man satirised Payne Knight's Progress of Civil Society, and the Loves of the Triangles was the too amazingly effective caricature of Erasmus Darwin's Loves of the Plants—it killed Darwin's poem and blasted his laurels. Indeed, it might be argued that the Anti-Jacobin helped greatly to put all didactic poetry out of fashion, and so, in spite of its politics and literary principles, to promote a new era in literature and a taste diametrically opposed to that of the eighteenth century

Γrom the New Morality come the oftenquoted lines—

Give me the avowed, the erect, the manly foe, Bold I can meet, perhaps may turn his blow, But of all plagues, good Heaven, thy wrath can send, Save, save, oh' save me from the candid friend'

as also the couplet-

For one long term, or ere her trial came, Here Brownrigg linger'd Often have these cells Lehoed her blasphemies, as with shrill voice She screamed for fresh Geneva. Not to her Did the blitlie fields of Tothill, or thy street, St Giles, its fair varieties expand, Till at the last, in slow drawn carr, she went To execution Dost thou ask her crime? She whipp'd two female prentices to death, And hid them in the coal hole For her mind Shaped strictest plans of discipline Sage schemes! Such as Lycurgus taught, when at the shrine Of the Orthyan goddess he bade flog The little Spartans, such as erst chastised Our Milton when at college For this act Did Brownings swing 1 larsh laws! But time shall come When France shall reign, and laws be all repeal'd '

From 'The Progress of Man.'

Lo! the rude savage, free from civil strife, Keeps the smooth tenour of his guiltless life, Restrain'd by none save Nature's lement laws, Quaffs the clear stream, and feeds on hips and haws. I ight to his daily sports behold him rise! The bloodless banquet health and strength supplies Bloodless not long—one morn he haps to stray Through the lone wood—and close beside the way Sees the gaunt tiger tear his trembling prey, Beneath whose gory fangs a leveret bleeds, Or pig—such pig as fertile China breeds

Struck with the sight, the wondering Savage stands, Rolls his broad eyes, and clasps his lifted hands! Then restless roams—and loaths his wonted food, Shuns the salubrious stream, and thirsts for blood

By thought mutur'd, and quicken'd by desire,
New arts, new arms, his wayward wants require.
From the tough yew a slender branch he tears,
With self taught skill the twisted grass prepares,
Th' unfashion'd bow with labouring efforts bends
In circling form, and joins th' unwilling ends
Next some tall reed he seeks—with sharp edg'd stone Shapes the fell dart, and points with whiten'd bone

Then forth he fares. Around in carcless play, Kids, pigs, and lambkins unsuspecting stray With grim delight he views the sportive band, Intent on blood, and lifts his murderous hand Iwangs the bent bow—resounds the fateful dart, Swift wing'd, and trembles in a porker's heart

Ah! hapless porker! what can now avail
Thy back's stiff bristles, or thy curly tail?
Ah! what avail those eyes so small and round,
Long pendent ears, and snout that loves the ground?

Not unreveng'd thou diest '—In after times From thy spilt blood shall spring unnumber'd crime. Soon shall the slaught'rous arms that wrought thy woe, Improv'd by malice, deal a deadlier blow, When social Man shall pant for nobler game, And 'gainst his fellow man the vengeful veapon aim.

As love, as gold, as jenlousy inspires, As wrathful hate or wild ambition fires, Urged by the statesman's crift, the tyrant's rage, Embattled nations endless wars shall wage, Vast seas of blood the ravaged fields shall stain, And millions perish—that a King may reign!

For blood once shed, new wants and wishes rise, Lach rising want invention quick supplies. To roast his victuals is Man's next desire, So two dry sticks he rubs, and lights a fire, Hail fire! &c. &c.

From 'The Loves of the Triangles'

And first, the fair Parabola behold,
Her timid arms with virgin blush unfold.
Though on one focus fix'd, her eyes betray
A heart that glows with love's resistless sway, Though, climbing oft, she strive with bolder grace
Round his tall neck to clasp her fond embrace, Still ere she reach it, from his polish'd side
Her trembling hands in devious Tangents glide

In The Friend of Humanity and the Knife grinder, generally called, from the first line, The Needy Knife-grinder, Canning ridicules the youth ful Jacobin effusions of Southey, in which, he says, it was sedulously inculcated that there was a natural and eternal warfare between the poor and the rich. The Sapphic rhymes of Southey afforded a tempting subject for ludicrous purody, and lest he should be suspected of painting from fancy, Canning quoted the following stanza.

Cold was the night wind drifting fast the snows fell, Wide were the downs, and shelterless and naked, When a poor wanderer struggled on her journey, Weary and way sore

The Friend of Humanity and the Knife-grinder

F of II Needy Knife grinder! whither are you going? Rough is your road, your wheel is out of order, Bleak blows the blast—your hat has got a hole in't, So have your breeches!

Weary Knife grinder! little think the proud ones, Who in their couches roll along the turnpike Road, what hard work 'tis crying nil day, 'Knives and Seissors to grind O''

Tell me, Knife grinder, how came you to grind knives? Did some rich man tyrannically use you? Was it the squire, or parson of the parish,

Or the attorney?

Was it the squire, for killing of his game? or Covetous parson, for his tithes distraining? Or roguish lawyer, made vou lose your little All in a lay suit?

Song of Rogero, in 'The Rovers'

Whene'er with haggard eyes I view
This dungeon that I'm rotting in,
I thinl of those companions true
Who studied with me at the U niversity of Gottingen,
niversity of Gottingen.

(Weeps and fulls out a blue kerchief, with which he cupes his eyes gazing tenaerly at it, he freeceds?)

Sv eet kerchief, checked with heavenly blue, Which once my love sat knotting in—Alas, Matilda then was true!

At least I thought so at the University of Gottingen, niversity of Gottingen

Lat the repetition of this line, Regero clanks his chains in cade ice a

Barbs' barbs' alas' how swift you flew Her neat post wagon trotting in'
Le bore Matilda from my view, Forlorn I languished at the University of Gottingen,
niversity of Gottingen

This faded form ' this pallid hue'
This blood my veins is clotting in,
My years are many—they were few When first I entered at the U niversity of Gottingen,
niversity of Gottingen.

There first for thee my passion grew,
Sweet, sweet Matilda Pottingen!
Thou wast the daughter of my Tu tor, law professor at the University of Gottingen,
niversity of Gottingen

Sun, moon, and thou vain world, adicu,
That kings and priests are plotting in Here doomed to starve on water gru

[During the last stanza, Rogero dashes his head refeatedly against the walls of his frison and finall, so hard as to produce a wistble contusion. He then through himself on the floor in an agony. The curtain drops, the rusic still continuing to play till it is wholly fallen?

There is a Memoir prefixed to Canning's Speeches edited by Therry (6 vols. 1833), A. Stapelton's Political Life of Canning (1831) and Canning and his Finnes (1859) are eulogistic more recent are the Lives by Hill (1887), Marriott (1903), and Temperles (1905). See also Lord Dalling's Historical Characters (1867) and Canning's Official Correspondence edited by E. J. Stapleton (2 vols. 1887). The Peetry of the Anti-Jacobin was separately published in 1801 and with explanatory notes, by Charles Edmonds in 1825 (3rd ed. 1890).

John Hookham Frere (1769–1846) was born in London of a good old East Anglian family, was the son of an accomplished anti quary, and was educated at Eton and Casus College, Cambridge. He next entered the Foreign Office, and from 1796 to 1802 was member for the Cornish pocket-borough of West Looe. Along with his old schoolfellow Canning, he gave steady support to Pitt's Government, and contributed to the Anti Jacobin (1797-98), whose editor was Gifford, and many of whose best pieces were the conjoint work of Canning and Frere, sometimes also of Ellis Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (1799), Frere was appointed envoy to Portugal (1800), and then twice Minister to Spain (1802-4, 1808-9), where he was much blamed for his conduct to Sir John Moore He was recalled after the retreat to Corunna, and renounced public life, twice refusing the offer of a peerage. By his father's death in 1807 he succeeded to the Roydon property near Diss, in 1816 he married the Dowager-Countess of Erroll, and in 1818, for her health's sale, they settled at Malta. She died there in 1831 (ten months before Scott's well-known meeting with Frere), and Frere himself fifteen years later In 1817 Mr Murray published a small poetical volume under the eccentric title of Prospectus and Specimen of an intended National Work, by William and Robert Whistlecraft, of Stowmarket in Suffolk, Harness and Collar Makers Intended to comprise the most Interesting Particulars relating to King Arthur and his Round Table The world was surprised to find, under this odd disguise, a happy effort further to naturalise in English the gay ottava rima of Berni, Casti, and their imitators in Italian brothers Whistlecraft formed, it was quickly seen, but the mask of some scholarly wit belonging to the higher circles of society. To two cantos published in 1817 a third and fourth were added the The description of Arthur and his following year knights at Carlisle shows the characteristic vein

They looked a mank generous generation, Beards, shoulders, evebrows, broad, and square, and thick, Their accents firm and loud in conversation, Their eyes and gestures eager, sharp, and quick,

Shewed them prepared, on proper provocation, Fo give the lie, pull noses, stab and kick, And for that very reason, it is said, They were so very courteous and well bred

In a wild valley near Carlisle, poetically described, lived a race of giants. The giants having attacked and carried off some ladies on their journey to court, the knights deem it their duty to set out in pursuit, and having overcome the oppressors, they relieve the captives from durance

The ladies?—They were tolerably well,
At least as well as could have been expected
Vany details I must forbear to tell,
Their toilet had been very much neglected,
But by supreme good luck it so befell,
That when the castle's capture was effected,
When those vile cannibals were overpowered,
Only two fat duennas were devoured

Near the valley of the giants was an abbey, containing fifty friars, 'fat and good,' long on good terms with their neighbours. The giants, naturally fond of music, would sometimes approach the sacred pile.

And oft that wild untutored race would draw, Led by the solemn sound and sacred light, Beyond the bank, beneath a lonely shaw, To listen all the livelong summer night, Till deep, screne, and reverential awe Environed them with silent calm delight, Contemplating the minster's midnight gleam, Reflected from the clear and glassy stream

But chiefly, when the shadowy moon had shed O'er woods and waters her mysterious hue, Their passive liearts and vacant fancies fed With thoughts and aspirations strange and new, Till their brute souls with inward working bred Dark hints that in the depths of instinct grew Subjective—not from Locke's associations, Nor David Hartley's doctrine of vibrations.

Unhappily this happy state of things is broken up by the introduction of a ring of bells into the abbey, a kind of music to which the giants had an insurmountable aversion

Meanwhile the solemn mountains that surrounded The silent valley where the convent lay, With tintinnabular uproar were astounded When the first peal burst forth at break of day Feeling their granite ears severely wounded, They scarce knew what to think or what to say, And—though large mountains commonly conceal Their sentiments, dissembling what they feel,

Yet—Cader Gibbrish from his cloudy throne To huge Loblommon gave an intimation Of this strange rumour, with an awful tone, Thundering his deep surprise and indignation, The lesser hills, in language of their own, Discussed the topic by reverberation, Discoursing with their echoes all day long, Their only conversation was, 'ding dong'

These grant mountains inwardly were moved, But never made an outward change of place,

Not so the mountain giants (as behoved A more alert and locomotive race), Hearing a clatter which they disapproved, They ran straight forward to besiege the place, With a discordant universal yell, Like house dogs howling at a dinner bell.

Meanwhile a monk, Brother John by name, who had opposed the introduction of the bells, has gone, in a fit of disgust with his brethren, to amuse himself with the rod at a neighbouring stream

A mighty current, unconfined and free,
Ran wheeling round beneath the mountain's shade,
Battering its wave worn base, but you might see
On the near margin many a watery glade,
Becalmed beneath some little island's lee,
All tranquil and transparent, close embayed, Reflecting in the deep serene and even
Each flower and herb, and every cloud of heaven,

The painted kingfisher, the branch above her, Stand in the steadfast mirror fixed and true, Anon the fitful breezes brood and liover, Freshening the surface with a rougher hue, Spreading, withdrawing, pausing, passing over, Again returning to retire anew So rest and motion in a narrow range, Feasted the sight with joy ous interchange.

Brother John becomes aware of the approach of the giants in time to run home and give the alarm, and after stout resistance by the monks, the giants at length withdraw from the scene of action. It finally appears that the pagans have retired in order to make the attack upon the ladies, which The ottava rima had formerly been described had already been used by the Scottish poet Tennant in his Anster Fair, but it was Whistle craft's clever combination of absurdity and sense, burlesque and real poetry in the measure, that showed Byron what an admirable instrument it He wrote Beppo in imitation of Frere's work, and imitated much more than the verse, and Don Juan was a still more masterly development of the same method and measure.

His friends credit him with writing the greater purt of The Loves of the Triangles in the Auli Jacobin (see page 673), and with a share in The Knife-grinder as well as in The Rovers translation of The Battle of Brunanburh (1801) for Ellis's Specimens was a foretaste of his won derful skill in this way But Frere's most serious and permanent contribution to English literature was made in his masterly translations of the 'Frogs,' 'Acharmans,' 'Knights,' and 'Birds' of Aristophanes, privately printed at Malta in 1839, but first made known through an article by Sir G Cornewall Lewis in the Classical Museum for It is universally admitted that these render ings-free versions rather than strict translations -are masterpieces of a difficult art, and in a specially difficult department—the transfusion into modern English verse, somewhat of the original type, of ancient Greek wit, humour, satire, racy phraseology, ringing rhythms, and verbal felicities innumerable.

Scene from the 'Acharnians.'

Enter a MECARIAN with his two little girls

Megarian Ah, there's the Athenian market! Heaven I say, the welcomest sight to a Megarian. [bless it, I've look'd for it, and long'd for it, like a child For its own mother You, my daughters dear, Disastrous offspring of a dismal sire, List to my words, and let them sink impress'd Upon your empty stomachs, now's the time That you must seek a livelihood for yourselves. Therefore resolve at once, and answer me, Will you be sold abroad, or starve at home? Both Let us be sold, papa !- Let us be sold Meg I say so too, but who do ye think will purchase Such useless mischievous commodities? However, I have a notion of my own, A true Megarian scheme, -I mean to sell ye Disguised as pigs, with artificial pettitoes Here, take them, and put them on. Remember now, Show yourselves off do credit to your breeding, Like decent pigs, or else, by Mercury, If I'm obliged to take you back to Megara, There you shall starve far worse than heretofore -This pair of masks too-fasten 'em on your faces, And crawl into the sack there on the ground Mind ye-Remember-you must squeak and whine, And racket about like little roasting pigs. -And I'll call out for Dicæopolis.

Hoh Diccopolis, Diccopolis! I sav, would you please to buy some pigs of mine? Dicaopolis What's there? a Megarian?

I es-we're come to market Meg [sneakingly] Die How goes it with you?

We're all like to starve Die Well, liking is everything. If you have your That's all in all the likeness is a good one,

A pretty likeness! like to starve, you say But s hat else are you doing?

What we're doing? I left our governing people all contriving To ruin us utterly without loss of time.

Dic It's the only way it will keep you ont of Meddling and getting into scrapes mischief, Ay, yes Dic Well, what's vonr other news? How's corn?

What price? Meg Corn? it's above all price, we worship it

Die But salt? You've salt, I reckon-

Salt? how should we?

Have you not seized the salt pans?

No ' nor garlie?

Have not ye garlic?

What do ye talk of garlie? Meg As if you had not wasted and destroyed it, And grubb'd the very roots out of the ground Dic Well, what have you got then? Tell us! Can't

Meg [in the tone of a sturdy resolute lie]. Pigs '-Pigs truly-pigs forsooth, for sacrifice

Dic That's well, let's look at 'em Ay, they're handsome ones, You may feel how heavy they are, if ye hold 'em np Die Hev day! What's this? What's here?

Meg A pig to be sure. Dic Do ye say so? Where does it come from? Come? from Megara. Meg

What, an't it a pig?

Dic No truly, it does not seem so Meg Did you ever hear the like? Such an unac-

Suspicious fellow! it is not a pig, he says! But I'll be judged, I'll bet ye a bushel of salt,

It's what we call a natural proper pig

Die Perhaps it may, but it's a human pig Meg Human ' I'm human, and they're mine, that's all Whose should they be, do ve think? so far they're human.

But come, will you hear 'em squeak?

Ay, yes, by Jove,

With all my heart.

Come now, pig 1 now 's the time Meg Remember what I told ye-squeak directly! Squeak, can't ve? Curse ye, what's the matter with ye? Squeak when I bid you, I say, by Mercury I'll carry you back to Megara if you don't Daughter Wee wee.

Do you hear the pig? Meg Dic

The pig, do ve call it?

It will be a different creature before long Meg It will take after the mother, like enough

Die Ay, but this pig won't do for sacrifice.

Meg Why not? why won't it do for sacrifice? Dic Imperfect ! here 's no tail !

Poh, never mind, Meg

It will have a tail in time, like all the rest. But feel this other, just the fellow to it, With a little further keeping, it would serve For a pretty dainty sacrifice to Venus Die Yon warrant 'em weand' they Il feed without the mother?

Meg Without the mother or the father either

Dic But what do they like to cat?

Meg Just what ye give 'em, You may ask 'em if you will.

DicPig, pig l 1 Daughter

Wee wee Dic Pig, are ye fond of peas?

1 Daughter Wee née wee nec.

Dic Are ye fond of figs? 1 Daughter

Wee wée nee nee nee née. Dic I ou little one, are you fond of figs?

2 Daughter

Dic What a squeak was there ' they're ravenous for Go somebody, fetch ont a parcel of figs For the little pigs ' Heh, what, they 'll cat, I warrant.

Lawk there, look at 'em racketing and bustling ! How they do munch and crunch ' in the name of heaven.

Why, sure they can't have eaten em already ! Meg [sneakingly]. Not all, there's this one here, I took myself Die Well, faith, they 're clever comical animals.

[Exil

What shall I give you for 'em? What do ye asl? Meg I must have a gross of onions for this here,

And the other you may take for a peck of salt Die I'll leep 'em, wait a moment

Heaven be praised! O blessed Mercury, if I could but manage To make such another bargain for my wife, I'd do it to morrow, or my mother either

The Borks of Frere in I erse on a Prose were published with a Memoir by his nephew, Sir Lartle Frere, in 1871

George Ellis (1753-1815), the son of a West Indian planter, was already writing mock heroics about Bath society in 1777, and next year pub lished Poetical Tales by Sir Gregory Gander, which delighted Scott and the world, and are referred to in the fifth canto of Marmion, dedicated to Ellis The young wit, having Whig connections, was one of the most effective members of the Rolliad group, and is believed to have written the attack on Pitt, quoted at page 671, but he afterwards changed sides and was a constant contributor to the Anti-Jacobin Attached to a diplomatic mission to the Netherlands, he wrote a history of the Dutch revolution in 1785-87, travelled in Germany in 1791, and after 1796 sat in Parliament for Seaford labours as the first scholarly editor of Specimens of the Early English Poets have been already commemorated in this work (Vol I p 30) first edition (1790) was greatly extended in 1801, and 1851 saw a fifth edition. His Specimens of Early English Romances (1805, 2nd ed 1811) con ferred a further favour on students of literature, and he edited Way's translations of select Fabliani of the twelfth and thirteenth centurics (1796, 3rd ed 1815) He was a cherished friend of Sir Walter Scott's and a futhful correspondent.

Richard Payne Knight (1750-1824), a wealthy Herefordshire squire, virtuoso, and collector of ancient coins, marbles, and bronzes, was recognised at home and abroad as a high authority on ancient art, and wrote on Greek epigraphy, the symbolism of art, and the like For a book on the worship of Prinpus he was severely liandled by Mathias in The Pursuets of Literature, his didnetic poem on The Progress of Civil Society give occasion to one of the cleverest burlesques in the Anti-Jacobin, and his other tedious pocin, The Landscape, came also in for much uncom plimentary criticism He made over his collections to the British Museum

Thomas James Mathias (1754?-1835), author of The Pursuits of Literature, was the son of a minor functionary in the queen's household. seems to have been at Eton, and was certainly educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was distinguished as Latinist and verse writer From the university he passed in 1782 into the queen's service, becoming her treasurer But in broken health he went to Italy in 1815, and there (mainly about Naples) remained till his death He was the best Italian scholar England had pro duced, edited Italian authors, published collections of Italian poems, translated English verse into Italian, and himself wrote Italian poems. He also wrote and published much Latin verse, and he ruined himself by a magnificent edition of Gray's works (1814) From 1780 he made himself known as a satirist in English prose and verse, mainly on the Fory side, and against Whigs in Church and State But it was by the Pursuits of Literature, in four verse dialogues, published anonymously between 1794 and 1797 (16th cd 1812), that he brought himisclf to be ir on his time by audicious saure of literary personages such as Joseph Warton, Pair, Godwin, Payne Knight, and Monk Jewis—several of them victimised also by the Anti-facolin. Like Gifford's Barnad and Marnad, the text was over laid vith elaborate notes, and the poem, in spite of occasional piquant and telling lines or short passages, was ere long voted unconscionable and indiscriminate in its censures and tedious on the whole, and is now little read

Henry Grattan (1746-1820), born in Dublin, at seventeen entered I rimity College, and embraced the reforming principles of Henry I lood with such ardour that his fither, the Recorder of Dublin, die inherited him. At the Middle Temple in London he neglected law for the debates in the House of In 1772 he was called to the lash Commons Bar, and in 1775 entered the Irish Parliament as nicinber for Charlemont. I lood had lost his popul larity by accepting office under Government, and Grattan leapt at a bound into his place, strove to secure the removal of the restrictions upon Irish tride, and not plunged into a struggle for legis lative independence When in 1782, after the great Convention at Dungannon, the Rocking ham Ministry surrendered, the Irish Parliament in grantude voted Grattan £50,000 But it proved impossible for 'Grittin's Parliament,' so little representative and so much subject to corruption, Grattan devoted to rise to real statesmanship himself mainly to advocating, in vain, the reform of special abuses. The corruption of the Castle government, the persistent repression of the agita tion for Catholic relief (which Grattan, himself a Protestant, warmly supported), and the spirit of discontent generated by the French Revolution fomented the movement of the United Irishmen Hopeless of his policy and broken by ill licalth, Grattan retired on the eve of the rebellion, but returned to take his seat for Wicklow, and bravely to combat the Bill for the Union Four years after the Union was carried out, he was elected to West minster as member for Malton in Yorkshire, and for Dublin in the following year. The remaining energies of his life were devoted to the cause of In December 1819 his Citholic emincipation health began to give way, in the following May he crossed from Dublin, a dyang man, to speak once more for the cause, and, dving five days after his arrival, was buried in Westminster Abbey In April 1782, a month before the English Parlia ment formally recognised the independence of the Irish Parliament, Grattan began thus one of his most famous speeches

Irish Parliamentary Independence

I am now to address a free people ages have passed away, and this is the first moment in which you could be distinguished by that appellation. I have spoken on the subject of your liberty so often that I have nothing to add, and have only to admire by what Heaven directed steps you have proceeded until the whole faculty of the nation is braced up to the act of her own deliver ance. I found Ireland on her knees, I watched over her with a paternal solicitude, I have traced her progress from injuries to arms, and from arms to liberty Spirit of Swift! spirit of Volyneux! your genius has prevailed! Ireland is now a nation in that new character I hail her' and bowing to her august presence, I say, Esto fer petua! She is no longer a wretched colony, returning thanks to her governor for his rapine, und to her king for his oppression, nor is she now a squabbling, fretful sectary, perplexing her little wits and firing ber furious statutes with bigotry, sophistry, disabilities, and death, to transmit to posterity insignificance and war Look to the rest of Enrope, and contemplate yourself, and be Holland lives on the memory of past achieve ments, Sweden has lost liberty, England has sullied her great name by un attempt to enslave her colonies are the only people-you, of the nations in Europe, are now the only people who excite admiration, and in your present conduct you not only exceed the present generation, but you equal the past I am not afraid to turn back and look antiquity in the face the revolution-that great event, whether you call it ancient or modern I know not, was tarnished with bigotry the great deliverer (for such I must ever call the Prince of Nassau) was blemished with oppression, he assented to, he was forced to assent to, acts which deprived the Catholics of reli gious, and all the Irish of eivil and commercial rights, though the Irish were the only subjects in these islands who had fought in his defence. But you have sought liberty on her own principle see the Presbyterians of Bangor petition for the freedom of the Catholics of You, with difficulties innumerable, with Munster dangers not a few, have done what your ancestors wished but could not accomplish, and what your pos tenty may preserve but will never equal, you have moulded the jarring elements of your country into a nation, and have rivalled those great and ancient com mony ealths whom you were taught to admire and among whom you are now to be recorded in this proceeding you had not the advantages which were common to other. great countries, no monuments, no trophies, none of those outward and visible signs of greatness such as inspire mankind and connect the ambition of the age which is coming on with the example of that going off, and form the de scent and concatenation of glory no, you have not had any great act recorded among all your misfortunes, nor have yon one public tomb to ussemble the crowd, and speak to the living the language of integrity and freedom.

From the Philippic against Flood (1783)

With regard to the liberties of America, which were inseparable from ours, I will suppose this gentleman to have been an enemy decided and unreserved, that he voted against her liberty, und voted, moreover, for an address to send 4000 Irish troops to cut the throats of the Americans, that he called these butchers 'armed negotiators,' and stood with a metuphor in his month and a bribe in his pocket, a champion against the rights of America, the only hope of Ireland, and the only refuge of the liberties of mankind

Thus defective in every relationship, whether to con stitution, commerce, toleration, I will suppose this man to have added much private improbits to public crimes, that his probity was like his patriotism, and his honour on a level with his oath He loves to deliver panegyries on himself I will interrupt him, and say Sir, you are much mistaken if you think that your talents have been as great as your life has been reprehensible, you began your parliamentary career with an acrimony and personality which could have been justified only by a supposition of virtue after a rank and clamorous opposition you became on a sudden sileit, you were silent for seven years you were silent on the greatest questions, and you were silent for money! In 1773, when a negotiation was pending to sell your talents and your turbulence, you absconded from your duty in parliament, von forsook your law of Poynings, you forsook the ques tions of economy, and abandoned all the old themes of your former declamation, you were not at that period to be found in the House, you were seen like a guilty spirit haunting the lobby of the House of Commons, watching the moment in which the question should be put, that you might vanish, you were descried with a emminul anxiety retiring from the scenes of your past glory, or you were perceived coasting the upper benches of this House like a bird of prey, with an evil aspect and a sepulchral note, meditating to pounce on its quarry These ways—they were not the ways of honour—you practised pending a negotiation which was to end either in your sale or your sedition the former taking place, you supported the rankest measures that ever came before Parliament, the embargo of 1776, for instance. 'O fatal embargo, that breach of law and ruin of commerce!' You supported the unparalleled profusion and jobbing of Lord Harcourt's scandalous ministry—the address to support the American war-the other address to send 4000 men, whom you had yourself declared to be neces sary for the defence of Ireland, to fight against the liberties of America, to which you had declared yourself a friend, -yon, Sir, who delight to utter execrations against the American commissioners of 1778, on account of their hostility to America, -you, Sir, who manufacture stage thunder against Mr Eden for his anti American principles, -you, Sir, whom it pleases to chant a hymn to the immortal Hampden, -you, Sir, upproved of the tyranny exercised against America, -and yon, Sir, voted 4000 Irish troops to cut the throats of the Americans fight ing for their freedom, fighting for your freedom, fighting for the great principle, liberty, but you found ut last (and this should be an eternal lesson to men of your craft und cunning) that the King had only dishonoured you, the Court had bought but would not trust you, and having voted for the worst measures, you remained for seven years the creature of salary, without the confidence of Government Mortified at the discovery, and stung by disappointment, you betake yourself to the sad expedients of duplicity, you try the sorry game of a trimmer in your progress to the acts of an incendiary, you give no honest support either to the Government or the people. you, at the most critical period of their existence, take no part, you sign no non consumption ugreement, you are no volunteer, you oppose no perpetual mutiny bill, no altered sugar bill, you declare that you lament that the declaration of right should have been brought forward, and observing with regard to prince and people the most impartial treachery and desertion, you justify the suspicion of your Sovereign by betraying the Govern ment, as you had sold the people until at last, by this hollow conduct and for some other steps, the result of mortified ambition, being dismissed, and another person put in your place, you fly to the ranks of the volunteers, and canvass for mutiny, you announce that the country was ruined by other men during that period in which she had been sold by you. Your logic is that the repeal of a declaratory law is not the repeal of a law in nll, and the effect of that logic is an English act affecting to emancipate Ireland by exercising over her the legislative authority of the British Parliament. Such has been your conduct, and at such conduct every order of your fellow subjects have a right to exclaim 1. The merchant may say to you—the American may say to you—and I, I now say, and say it to your beard. Sir, you are not an honest man.

The best collection of Grattan's Speeches is by his son, Henry Gratian, M.P. (1822) who also edited his Itiscellameous II orks (1822) and wrote the standard Life (1839-46). See too Leeky's Leaders of I ublic Opinion in Ireland (and ed. 1872) and an excellent study by Robert Dunlop (Statesmen series, 1889).

William Pitt (1759-1806), second son of the great Earl of Chatham, and himself one of the chief of English statesmen, occupies also a high place among English orators. His home education (he never was at a public school) gave him a thorough knowledge of the Greek and Latin classics, while the practice of extempore translation, in which he was exercised by his tutors, fostered greatly what was doubtless the native gift of eloquence. Consequently, when he entered the House of Commons at the age of twenty one, he was already a finished orator-not so much, according to Burke, 'a chip of the old block,' as 'the old block itself' Fox hailed him as 'one of the first men in the House,' and in less than three years he had justified the eulogy by becoming Prime Minister Thenceforward for more than twenty years he remained one of the great triumvirate of English parliamentary orators, along with Fox and Sheridan, for Burke had never been a really popular speaker The oratorical duels between him and Fox, recurring almost yearly between 1783 and 1801, are among the memorable things in the history of English eloquence. Macrula, who was certainly no Pittite, acknowledges that while he had 'less amplitude of mind and less ricliness of imagination than Burke, less ingenuity than Windham, less wit than Sheridan, less perfect mastery of dialectical fence and less of that highest sort of eloquence which consists of reason and passion fused together than Foy' he was yet, 'by the unanimous judgment of those who were in the habit of listening to that remarkable race of men. placed, as a speaker, above Burke, above Windham, above Sheridan, and not below Tox' English Prime Minister ever quoted Latin more copiously or more happily his thrilling citation of two beautiful Virgilian lines at the close of a great speech on the slave trade has obtained commemo ration in history The last of all his public utterances, made in the dark days after Austerlitz and Trafalgar, and only a few weeks before his own death, is a masterpiece of brevity 'England,' he said, 'has saved herself by her energy, and will save Europe by her example.' His parliamentary speeches, from one of which, delivered in 1785, the following extract is taken, were published in four volumes in 1806

The King's Prerogative

By what I nm now going to say, perhaps I may subject myself to the invidious imputation of being the ininister and friend of prerogntive, but, Sir, notwithstanding those terms of obloquy with which I am assailed, I will not shrink from avowing myself the friend of the king's just Prerogative, Sir, has been justly called a prerogative part of the rights of the people, and sure I am it is a part of their rights which the people were never more disposed to defend, of which they never were more jealous than at this hour. Grant only this, that this House has a negative in the appointment of immisters, and you trans plant the executive power into this House. Sir, I shall call upon gentlemen to speak out, let them not come to resolution after resolution without stating the grounds on which they act, for there is nothing more dangerous among mixed powers than that one branch of the legis lature should attack another by means of hints and auxiliary arguments, urged only in debate, without daring to arow the direct grounds on which they go, and with out stating in plain terms on the face of their resolutions, what are their motives, and what are their principles which lead them to come to such resolutions. Above all, Sir, let this House beware of suffering any individual to involve his own cause, and to intervence his own interests in the resolutions of the House of Commons. The dignity of the House is for ever appealed to let us beware that it is not the dignity of any set of men let us beware that personal prejudices have no share in deciding these great constitutional questions honourable gentleman is possessed of those enchanting arts whereby he can give grace to deformity, he holds before your eves a beautiful and delusive image, he pushes it forward to your observation, but as sure as you embrace it, the pleasing vision will vanish, and this fair plantom of liberty will be succeeded by anarchy, con fusion, and ruin to the constitution. For in truth, Sir, if the constitutional independence of the crown is thus reduced to the very verge of annihilation, where is the boasted equipoise of the constitution? Where is that balance among the three branches of the legislature which our ancestors have measured out to each with so much precision? Where is the independence-nay, where is even the safety of any one prerognitive of the crown, or even of the crown itself, if its prerogative of naming ministers is to be usurped by this House, or if (which is precisely the same thing) its nomination of them is to be negatived by us without stating any one ground of distrust in the men, and without suffering our selves to have any experience of their measures? Dreadful, therefore, as the conflict is, my conscience, my duty, my fixed regard for the constitution of our nucestors, mun tain me still in this arduous situation. It is not any proud contempt or defiance of the constitutional resolutions of this House, it is no personal point of honour, much less is it any lust of power that makes me still cling to office the situation of the times requires of nie, and I will add, the country calls nloud to me, that I should defend this castle, and I am determined, therefore, I will defend it.

Lord Stanhope's Life of Pitt (4th ed. 1879) is the best biography but Lord Macaulay's Encyclopedia Britannica article and Earl Rosebery's monograph in the series of Tweive English Statesmen are notable estimates.

John Philpot Curran (1750-1817), another great Irish orator, was born at Newmarket in County Cork, and was far from studious at Trinity College, Dublin From the Middle Temple in London he was called to the Irish Bar in 1775, and his wit and vehement eloquence soon brought him eminence and a large practice. K.C and a member of the Irish Parliament, he was a strong supporter of Grattan, but was less successful in the House than with the juries, and his sarcastic speeches brought on him no less than five duels A Protestant himself, he worked hard for the Catholic cause. Both before and after the Irish rebellion of 1798 he was powerful in his defence of those tried for sedition or treason, and his speeches were many of them masterly steadily opposed the Union. After Pitt's death and after the accession of the Whigs, Curran was Master of the Rolls in Ireland (1806-14) Thurlow's one famous speech was not more popular or effective than one sentence of Curran's in his speech in defence of Archibald Hamilton Rowan, prosecuted by the Government for a sedi-The libel contained this tious libel in 1792 declaration 'In four words lies all our poweruniversal emancipation and representative legis lature.' 'I speak,' said Curran, 'in the spirit of the British law, which makes liberty commensurate with and inseparable from British soil, which proclaims even to the stranger and sojourner, the moment he sets his foot upon British earth, that the ground on which he treads is holy, and consecrated by the genius of Universal Emancipation No matter in what language his doom may have been pronounced, no matter what complexion in compatible with freedom an Indian or an African sun may have burnt upon him, no matter in what disastrous battle his liberty may have been cloven down, no matter with what solemnities he may have been devoted upon the altar of slavery, the first moment he touches the sacred soil of Britain, the altar and the god sink together in the dust, his soul walks abroad in her own majesty, his body swells beyond the measure of his chains that burst from around him, and he stands redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of Universal Emancipation' This memorable utterance may have been suggested by the passage on slavery in Cowper's Task (quoted above at page 607), in which occur the lines

> Slaves cannot breathe in England, if their lungs Receive our air, that moment they are free, They touch our country, and their shael les fall.

But oddly enough British writers seem never to remember that this virtue is not peculiar to British soil. Thus the eminent Scottish jurist, Lord Fountainhall, who was in 1665-66 studying law in Paris, records in his Diary the impression made on him by the fact that this maxim as to a slave was true of France. Be the lawes of France, let him be a Turk, slave to a Venitien or Spaniard, no sooner sets he his foote on French ground but tpso facto he is frie?

William Cobbett (1763-1835), one of the most skilful and effective writers of strong, racy English, was born at Farnham in Surrey, and brought up as a ploughman. In 1783 he came to London and enlisted, for six years (1785-91) he served as sergeant-major in New Brunswick. He entered on his literary career in Philadelphia as a political pamphleteer under the name of Peter Porcupine, and returning to England in 1800, continued to write as a decided loyalist and High-Churchman. But having, as is supposed, received some slight from Pitt, he attacked the Ministry with extraordinary bitterness in his Weekly Political

WILLIAM COBBETT
From an Engraving by W Ward after J R. Smith

Register Tory first, it altered its politics in 1804, till at last it 'became the most fierce and de termined opponent of the Government, and the most uncompromising champion of Radicalism? A great lover of the country, Cobbett settled at Botley in Hampshire, where he planted, farmed, and went in for manly sports, a true soldiers' friend, he got two years in Newgrite (1810-12), with a fine of £1000, for his strictures on the flogging of militiamen by German mercenaries In 1817 money muddles and dread of a second imprisonment drove him once more across the Atlantic. He farmed in Long Island, writing all the while for the Register, till in 1819 he ventured back again, and came bringing Tom Paine's bones. Botley had to be sold, but he started a seed-farm at Kensington, and bent now on entering Parliament, stood for Coventry (1821) and Preston Both times he failed, but his ill advised trial for sedition (1831) was followed next year by his return for Oldham to the first Reformed Parliament. His career there was signalised clinchly by a crack-brained attack on Peel, the late hours were too much for him, and three years later he died at Normanby farm near Guildford, his last home.

Cobbett's inconsistency as a political writer was so broad and undisguised as to become proverbial He liad made the whole round of politics, from ultra Toryism to ultra Radicalism, and had praised and abused nearly every public man and measure He lorthed Whigs and 'mock for thirty years gentlefolks,' 'loan-jobbers, stock-jobbers, Jews, and taxeaters of all kinds,' nor did he speak gently of 'great captums,' admirals, or parsons—'deans, I believe, or prebends (sic), or something of that sort' He was always confident and boastful, often coarse and virulent, and one becomes tired of linving his pet prejudices cited as innvins of universal acceptance, of hearing London always referred to as 'the Wen,' and of seeing the poverty of the labourers attributed simply to the existence of paper money Colonies such as New Brunswick are a mere source of aimless expense, wildernesses useless save as places to which to send barrack masters, chaplains, and commissioners at the public expense. So fir from the population of England having increased during the last twenty years, as the census made out, it was evident, he said, to any rational mind, from descried villages and empty country churches, 'that in the time of the Plantagenets England was out of all comparison more populous than it is now? He truly sympathised with the poor, and denounced the Reformation for having made over the monastic provision for them to greedy nobles He had a keen eve, a powerful intellect, and a sharp and frank tongue. And he loved to write of the meadows and green lanes of England, rejoiced in noble trees (not 'nasty firs') and beautiful land scapes, pined in America for the English singing birds, and keenly felt the poetry of nature. The idiomatic strength, copiousness, and purity of his English style are patent, and he is often extraordinarily happy in his natural descriptions. But his perversity in literary matters proceeded at least as much from obtuseness as from love of paradox 'It has become of late years the fashion to extol the virtues of potatoes as it has been to admire the writings of Milton and Shakespeare? wonders how Paradise Lost could have been tolerated by a people conversant with astronomy, navigation, and chemistry And when in his old age he did set himself to try and read Shakespeare, he found some things to please him, but much more he did not like at all, and concludes, in short, I despised the book, and wondered how any one could like it.' Jeremy Bentham said of him 'He is a man filled with odium humani generis, his malevolence and lying are beyond anything' The philosopher (also a Radical) did not make sufficient allowance for Cobbett, who acted on I inomentary impulse, and never calculated consequences to himself or others. No man in England was better known than Cobbett, down to the minutest circuinstance in his character, habits, and opinions. He wrote freely of himself as he did of his fellows, and in all his writings there was overflowing natural freshiness, his cliness, and vigour. He had the truly great writer's power of making every one who read him feel and understand completely what he himself felt and described

Cobbett's unsurpassed Rural Rides (new edition, with notes by Pitt Cobbett, 1885) were a reprint (1830) from the Register, and followed or were followed by the excellent and entertaining English Grammar (1818), the savage History of the Refermation in England and Ireland (1824-27), the Woodlands (1825), the shrewd, homely Advice to Loung Men (1830), A Ligacy to Parsons, Colbett's Four in Scotland, A History of George IV, and some thirty other works, and he was the originator of the publications ultimately Lnown as Hansard's Debates (1803, passed to Hansard in 1812) and Howell's State Trials (1809)

The first extract is from the introduction to the Reformation, the following from the Rural Ruses and other reminiscences

A Tavern Dinner

Having laid my plan to sleep at Andover last night, I went with two I arnham friends, Messrs Knowles and West, to dine at the ordinary at the George Inn, which is kept by one Sutton, a rich old fellow, who wore a round skirted sleeved fustian waistcoat, with a dirty white apron tied round his middle, and with no coat on , having a look the eagerest and the sharpest that I ever saw in any set of features in my whole life time, having an air of authority and of mastership which, to a stranger, as I was, seemed quite incompatible with the meanness of his dress and the sulgarity of his manners and there being, visible to every beholder, constantly going on in him a pretty even contest between the servility of avarice and the insolence of wealth. A great part of the farmers and other fur people having gone off home, we found prepa rations made for dining only about ten people. But after we sat down, and it was seen that we designed to dine, guests came in apace, the preparations were augmented, and as many as could dine came and dined with us

After the dinner was over, the room became fuller and fuller, guests came in from the other inns, where they had been dining, till at last the room became as full as possible in every part, the door being opened, the door way blocked up, and the stairs leading to the room crammed from bottom to top. In this state of things, Mr Knowles, who was our chairman, gave my health, which, of course, was followed by a speech, and, as the reader will readily suppose, to have an opportunity of making a speech was the main motive for my going to dine at an sun, at any hour, and especially at seen o clock at night. In this speech I, after descanting on the present devastating ruin, and on those successive acts of the Ministers and the parliament by which such ruin had been produced, after remarking on the shuffling, the tricks, the contrivances from 1797 up to last March, I proceeded to offer to the company my reasons for believ ing that no attempt would be made to relieve the farmers and others, by putting out the paper money again, as in 1822, or by a bank restriction. Just as I was stating these my reasons, on a prospective matter of such deep interest to my hearers, amongst whom were land owners, land renters, cattle and sheep dealers, hop and cheese producers and merchants, and even one, two, or more country bankers, just as I was engaged in stating mi reasons for my opinion on a matter of such vital import ance to the parties present, who were all listening to me with the greatest attention, just at this time a noise was heard, and a sort of row was taking place in the passage, the cause of which was, upon inquiry, found to be no less a personage than our landlord, our host Sutton, who, it appeared, finding that my speech making had cut off, or at least suspended, all intercourse between the dining, now become a drinking, room and the bar, who, finding that I had been the cause of a great 'restriction in the exchange' of our money for his 'neat' 'genuine' com modities downstairs, and being, apparently, an ardent admirer of the 'liberal' system of 'free trade,' who, finding, in short, or rather supposing, that if my tongue were not stopped from running, his taps would be, had, though an old man, fought, or, at least, forced his way up the thronged stairs and through the passage and doorway, into the room, and was (with what breath the struggle had left him) beginning to bawl out to me, when some one called to him, and told him that he was causing an interruption, to which he answered, that that was what he had come to do! And then he went on to say, in so many words, that my speech injured his sale of liquor!

The disgust and abhorrence which such conduct could not ful to excite produced, at first, a desire to quit the room and the house, and even a proposition to that effect. But, after a minute or so to reflect, the company resolved not to quit the room, but to turn him out of it, who had caused the interruption, and the old fellow, finding him self tacl led, saved the labour of shoving or kicking, him out of the room, by retreating out of the doorway with all the activity of which he was master. After this I proceeded with my speech making, and, this being ended, the great business of the evening, namely, drinking, smoking, and singing, was about to be proeceded in, by a company who had just closed an nrduous and anxious week, who had before them a Sundry morning to sleep in, and who e wives were for the far greater part, at a convenient distance. An assemblage of circumstances more auspicious to 'fretrade'in the 'neat' and 'genuine' has seldom occurred But, now behold, the old fustian jacketed fellow, where head was, I think, foulered, took it into that head not only to lay 'restrictions' upon trade, but to impo-c an absolute embargo, cut off entirely all supplies whatever from his bur to the room, as long as I remained in that A message to this effect from the old fastian man having been, through the waiter, comminicated to Mr Knowles, and lie having communicated it to the company, I addressed the company in nearly these 'Gentlemen, born and bred, as you I now I was, on the borders of this county, and fond, as I am, of bacor, Hampshire hogs have, with me, always been objects of admiration rather than of contempt, but that which has just happened here induces me to observe that this feeling of mine has been confined to hogs of feur less For my part, I like your company too well to quit it I have paid this fellow six shillings for the uing of a fowl, a bit of bread, and a pint of small beer. I have a right to sit liere, I want no drink, and those who do, being refused it liere, have a right to send to other houses for it, and to drink it here.'

However, Mnmmon soon got the upper hand down stairs, all the fondness for 'free trade' returned, and up came the old fustian jacketed fellow, bringing pipes, tobacco, wine, grog, sling and sceming to be as pleased as if he had just sprung a mine of gold 1 Na), he soon after this came into the room with two gentlemen, who had come to him to ask where I was. He retually came up to me, making me a bow, and, telling me that those gentlemen wished to be introduced to me, lie, with a fawning look, Ind his hand upon my knee! 'Take away your paw,' said I, and, sliaking the gentlemen by the hand, I said, 'I am happy to see you, gentlemen, even though introduced by this fellow' Things now songs, torsts, and proceeded without interruption speeches filled up the time, until half past two o'clock this morning, though in the house of a landlord who receives the sacrament, but who, from his manifestly ardent attachment to the 'liberal principles' of 'free trade,' would, I have no doubt, have suffered us, if we could have found money and throats and stomachs, to at and sing and talk and drink until two o'clock of a Sundry afternoon instead of two o'clock of a Sunday It was not politics, it was not fersonal dislike morning to me, for the fellow knew nothing of me. It was, as I told the company, just this he looked upon their bodies as so many gutters to drain off the contents of his taps, and upon their purses as so many small heaps from which to take the means of augmenting his great one, and, finding that I had been, no matter how, the cause of suspending this work of 'reciprocity,' he wanted, and no matter how, to restore the reciprocal system to motion. All that I have to add is this that the next time this old sharp looking fellow gets six shillings from me for a dinner, he shall, if he choose, cook me, in any manner that he likes, and season me with hand so un sparing as to produce in the feeders thirst unquenchable.

Then and Now

After living within a few hundred yards of Westminster Hall, and the Abbey Church, and the Bridge, and look ing from my own windows into St James's Park, all other buildings and spots appear mean and insignificant I went to day to see the house I formerly occupied. How small! It is always thus the words large and small are carried about with us in our minds, and we forget real dimensions. The idea, such as it was received, remains during our absence from the object. When I returned to England in 1880, after an absence, from the country parts of it, of sixteen years, the trees, the hedges, even the parks and woods, seemed so small! It made me laugh to hear little gutters that I could jump over called rivers! The Thames was but a 'creek'! But when, in about a month after my arrival in London, I went to Farnham, the place of my birth, what was my surprise! Everything was become so pitifully small! I had to cross, in my post chaise, the long and dreary heath of Bagshot, then, at the end of it, to mount a hill called Hungry Hill, and from that hill I knew that I should look down into the beautiful and fertile vale of My heart fluttered with impatience, mixed with a sort of fear, to see all the scenes of my child hood, for I had learned before the death of my father There is a hill not far from the town, called Crooksbury Hill, which rises up ont of a flat in the form of a cone, and is planted with Scotch fir trees. I used to take the eggs and young ones of crows and magpies. This hill was a famous object in the neigh bourhood. It served as the superlative degree of height 'As high as Crooksbury Hill' meant, with us, the utmost degree of height. Therefore the first object that my eyes sought was this hill. I could not believe my eyes t Literally speaking, I for a moment thought the famous hill removed, and a little heap put in its stead, for I had seen in New Brunswick a single rock, or hill of solid rock, ten times as big, and four or five times as high ! The post boy going down hill, and not a bad road, whished me in a few minutes to the Bush Inn, from the garden of which I could see the prodigious sand hill where I had begun my gardening works What a nothing! But now came rushing into my mind all at once my pretty little garden, my little blue smock frock, my little nailed shoes, my pretty pigeons that I used to feed out of my hands, the last kind words and tears of my gentle and tender hearted and affectionate mother! I hastened back into the room If I had looked a moment longer I should bave dropped. When I came to reflect, what a change! I looked down at my dress What a change! What scenes I had gone through! How altered my state! I had dined the day before at a secretary of state's in company with Mr Pitt, and had been waited upon by men in gaudy liveries' I had had nobody to assist me in the world. No teachers of any sort. Nobody to shelter me from the consequence of bad, and no one to connsel me to good behaviour I felt prond. The distinctions of rank, hirth, and wealth all became nothing in my eyes, and from that moment—less than a month after my arrival in England—I resolved never to bend before them

On Field-sports

Taking it for granted, then, that sportsmen are as good as other folks on the score of humanity, the sports of the field, like everything else done in the fields, tend to produce or preserve health. I prefer them to all other pastime, because they produce early rising, because they have a tendency to lead young men into virtuous habits. It is where men congregate that the vices haunt. A hunter or a shooter may also be a gambler and a drinker, but he is less likely to he fond of the two latter if he be fond of the former. Boys will take to something in the way of pastime, and it is better that they take to that which is innocent, healthy, and manly, than that which is vicious, unhealthy, and effeminate.

A new edition of Selections from Cobbett's Political Works in 6 vols was usued by his son (2 vols 1848), and there are Lives of him by Edward Smith (2 vols 1878) and E. T. Carlyle (1904). See also Lord Dalling's Historical Characters (5th ed 1876).

Henry James Pve (1745-1813), poetaster and police magistrate, has for more than a hundred years been a standing joke-an unhappy fate he would doubtless have escaped had he not had the fortune to be made poet-hurcate, for the 'poetical Pye,' as Sir Walter called him, was, to quote an editorial note to the Vision of Judgment, 'eminently respectable in everything but his poetry' 'That bad eminence' was not, like Satan's, due to merit, nor was it so much owing to his unequalled eminence in badness as to his being raised to official literary eminence in spite of the admitted badness of his poetry Born in London, he studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and inherited from his father great estates in Berkshire, and even greater debts He sat in Parliament for the county from 1784 to 1790, had meanwhile to sell his property, and was glad in 1792 to obtain the post of police magistrate for Westminster, as forty-four years earlier Fielding had been. From his youth he had been ambitious to shine as a poet, and while at Oxford printed a birthday ode to the Prince of Wales When in 1790 Pitt appointed him laureate, he had published several 'poetical essays' (on Beauty, Amusement, &c ), and poems on Farringdon Hill, The Progress of Refinement, on shooting, and even on ballooning! (Aërophonion) -banal subjects mostly, and all in a hopelessly banal style, though his Six Odes from Pindar were respectable, like his translation of Aristotle's Hence the appointment to the laureate-Poetics ship was the signal for an outburst of mirth, scorn, and witticism at the laureate's expense, renewed from time to time on the regular appearance of royal birthday odes and laureate's verses to order Pye translated from Tyrtaus and the Homeric Hymns, wrote a Carmen Siculare for the year 1800, and in 1801 produced his cpic Alfred, deserving by its six books' length to rank as his magnum opus. It is hardly remembered that he was also a playwight, his tragedies of The Siege of Heave and Adelaide having been produced (with small success) in 1794 and 1800, in A Prior Claim, a comedy, he collaborated with his son in law. The Inquisitor, published in 1798, was an adaptation from the German, but was anticipated by Holcroft's rendering of the same original

His Comments on the Commentators of Shakespear commend not too enthusiastically Shakespeare's works, 'the perusal of which, through the course of my life, has been a favourite amusement in my hours of leisure' Shakespeare is notoriously very careless as to the unities and probabilities, is un equalled in the terrific and sublime, but 'does not possess the power of Otway and many inferior poets of exciting pity' 'He highly possesses all the sublimity, the variety, the accurate description, and the scenery independent of the representation, of the epopee, both serious and comic united' He excels in certain of the virtues of the 'ethic poet' and of the lyric poet, but 'sometimes swells his sublime to the bombist, and sometimes sinks his humour to buffoonery? The chief faults of his commentators 'arise from a desire to say everything they can say, not only on the passage commented on, but on everything that has been said in the comment,' and Pye thercupon proceeds in 350 pages to add his comments to those of Malone and Steerens, pointing out the obvious superfluity of so many Probably Pye's most popular work was his Summary of the Duties of a Justice of Peace out of Sessions, which, published in 1808, reached a fourth edition in 1827

As laureate, Pye succeeded Warton, held the office twenty-three years, and was himself succeeded by Southey It was his curious function by hardly interrupted versification to connect the beginning of George III's reign and the creative period of the nineteenth century. He represents nobody but himself, and happily he exerted no in fluence, but 'when the Pye was opened,' to quote one of the many Lad jokes made at his expense -when he began to publish poems, Boswell had not yet discovered Johnson, Goldsmith had not printed any of the books by which his name is known, and when Pye's mill ceased pro ducing, Coleridge and Wordsworth, Scott and Byron, had established their name and fame as representative poets

It was in the fateful year 1801 that Pye produced his magnum opus, a monumental epic on Alfred, his trials and triumplis, of more than four thousand decasyllabic rhyming lines, distributed into six books, and magnificently printed in a splendid quarto. Written in the last years of the eighteenth century for the in juguration of the nineteenth, and issued just when the union with Ireland had come into force, the poem naturally adopted a strongly unionist tone, and indulged in reseate hopes for the newly constituted United Kingdom and empire, which, if not justified by the event exactly as was forecast, have yet been in other respects more than Relying more on creative imagination than even on the most fabulous of the Scottish Instorious, Pyc males Alfred in his dark dark come, a suppliant for help, to Gregory of Scotland, and the assue of Alfred's crowning mercy, the defeat of the Danes at Ethandun, is largel due to the Scottish allies, with a hom the poet, still more un historically, neither and all elsh continuent co operate. The services in the field of the remain ing section of the Celtic fringe are not recognized, but, to atone for this Pyc gives 'a Cornubian bard' an important share in the proceedings of the day On the arrival, somewhat unexpected, of the Scot tish, Welsh, and Irish armies, the English are not a little gratified at these convenient additions to their fighting strength

Wondering, they see upon the aerial brow Cambria's and Caledonia's banners flow. Here crowned with recent conquest to the slies. The snow vilite steed in Saxon banners flies, There Cambria's griffin on the artire field. In snaky volumes writhes around the shield. And Scotia's hon, proud, erect, and bold, kears high his irritable crest in gold. Gold too her harp and strung with silver wire, I'm her arms displays vith landred fire, And Britain's sister isles in Alfred's cause conspire-

Alfred fully recognised the importance of having all the peoples of the British islands united against outlandish invaders and foes

My futhful subjects and my brave allies, All equal heirs of Albion's fostering skies, Nor peace nor liberty can Britain know But from the fall of you injurious foe And ye from Cambria's hills who join our band, From Caledonia's rocks and Frin's strand, Generous and brave compeers! And when the decisive battle of Ethandun—Pye rightly identifies it with Eddington—crushed the foe 'in the dire blazonry of Danish gore,' and Guthrum had made absolute surrender, then after all was over and much speech making satisfactorily accomplished, the 'Cornubian Bard'—so that

His father, a tailor, died vial the poet researchild, and at elever he was placed in der ha uncle a faimer He was too feetle and dummence for field labour, and four jear, later he joined an elder brother in London. to learn the trade of shoomaler, but his country service furnished materials for his Farner's Inj and price reality to his descriptions. But it was in the shoened ers garret that his poetry first came to the little, and it was Capell Loffe, the hierary Li ver and Suffoll squire, to whom the manuscript was slip in after rejection by several London. book ellers, who introduced it to the world and befriended the writer in many vilys. At this time Bloomfield was thirty two years of age, and having married in 1790, had three children. The Farners Les (1800) strughtway became popular, and was even translated into French and Italian (part of it into Latin also 26,000 copies went off in less than three lears, and the Dul c of Grafton sculed on its author a shilling a day, and got him a post (1802) in the Seal Office, which he soon resigned. In 1802 Bloomfield published Kural Tales to these succeeded Wild Horiers (1805), The Banks of the Wye (1811), May day with the Muses (1822), &c He made Alohan harps, he engaged in the bool selling business, but was notably unlucky, and latterly, half-blind and unitable almost to madness, he lived at Shefford in Bedfordshire Christopher North prused The Soldier's Home as no whit inferior to Burns's hand tried the Farrers Boy, but found it unappetising, and later generations have inclined rather to Lamb - than to Christopher's view. The smoothness and correctness, good feeling and good tiste, of the peasant-poets verses are remarkable, fire and fervour, passion and power are usually lacking, the descriptions, if true to nature, are often tame and tedious Act he sometimes has admirable passages and occasionally noteworths sentences and plirases, such as "If fields are prisons, where is Tiberty?" And strangers tell of three times skimmed sky blue, ' 'What trouble vaits upon a casual frown! Bloomfield's name will survive as a marvel of self-culture when his poetry i unical and forgotten. ## From 'Sabbath Walks,'

Delightful is this loneliness, it calms My heart pleasant the cool beneath these elms That throw across the stream a moveless slinde Here nature in her midnoon whisper speaks. How perceful every sound !- the ringdove's plaint, Monned from the forest's gloomiest retrent, While every other woodland lay is mute. Save when the wren flits from her down coved nest And from the root sprigs trills her ditty clear-The grasshopper's oft prusing chirp-the buzz, Angrily shrill, of moss entangled bee, That soon as loosed booms with full twang away -The sudden rushing of the minnow shoal Scared from the shallows by my passing tread Dimpling the water glides, with here and there A glossy fly, skimming in circlets gay The treacherous surface, while the quick eyed trout Watches his time to spring, or from above, Some feathered dam, purveying 'mong the boughs, Darts from her perch, and to her plumeless brood Bears off the prize Sad emblem of man's lot ! How dazzling white the snowy scene ' deep, deep The stillness of the winter Sabbuth day -Not even a footfall heard Smooth are the fields, Ereli hollow pathway level with the plain Hid are the bushes, save that here and there Are seen the topmost shoots of brier or broom High ridged the whirled drift has almost reached The powdered keystone of the churchyard porch. Mute hangs the hooded bell, the tombs he buried, No step approaches to the house of prayer The flickering fall is o'er the clouds disperse, And show the sun, hung o'er the welkin's verge, Shooting a bright but ineffectual beam On all the sparkling waste.

From the 'Georgics'

How pleasant came thy rushing, silver Tweed, Upon my car, when, after roaming long In southern plains, I've reached thy lovely bank! How bright, reuowned Sark, thy little stream,

I the ray of columned light chasing a shower, Would cross my homeward path, how sweet the sound, When I, to hear the Doric tongue's reply, Would ask thy well known name.

And must I leave,

Dear land, thy bonny bries, thy dales,
Each hunted by its wizard stream, o'erhung
With all the varied charms of bush and tree?
And must I leave the friends of youthful years,
And mould my heart anew, to take the stamp
Of foreign friendships in a foreign land,
And learn to love the music of strange tongues?
Yes, I may love the music of strange tongues,
And mould my heart anew to take the stamp
Of foreign friendships in a foreign land
But to my parched mouth's roof cleave this tongue,
My fancy fade into the yellow leaf,
And this oft pausing heart forget to throb,
If, Scotland, thee and thine I e'er forget

John Leyden (1775-1811), Orientalist and poet was born at Denholm in Royburghshire. His father a sliepherd, seeing his natural bent, determined to educate him for the Church, and from 1790 to 1797 he was a student of Edinburgh University made rapid progress, was an excellent Latin and Greek scholar, and acquired also brench, Spanish, Italian, and German, besides studying Hebrew, Arabic, and Persian. He became no mean proficient in mathematics and various branches of science, every difficulty seemed to vanish before his commanding talents, retentive memory, and robust application His college vacations were spent at home, and as his father's cottage afforded him little opportunity for quiet and seclusion, he looked out for accommodation abroad. In a wild recess,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'in the den or glen which gives name to the village of Denholm, he contrived a sort of furnace for the purpose of such chemical experiments as he was adequate to per-But his chief place of retirement was the small parish church, a gloomy and ancient build ing, generally believed in the neighbourhood to be To this chosen place of study, usually hrunted locked during week-days, Leyden made entrance by means of a window, read there for many hours in the day, and deposited his books and specimens It was a well-chosen spot of in a retired pew seclusion, for the kirk-excepting during divine service—is rather a place of terror to the Scottish rustic, and that of Cavers was rendered more so by many a tale of ghosts and witchcraft of which it was the supposed scene, and to which Leyden, partly to indulge his humour, and partly to secure his retirement, contrived to make some modern The nature of his abstruce studies, some specimens of natural history, as toads and adders, left exposed in their spirit-phials, and one or two practical jests played off upon the more curious of the persantry, rendered his gloomy linunt not only renerated by the wise, but feared by the simple of the parish! From this singular and romantic study, Leyden sallied forth, with his curious and various stores, to astonish his college associates, he already numbered among his friends the most distinguished literary and scientific men of Edinburgh In 1795-98 he was tutor to the sons of Mr Campbell of Fairfield, whom he accompanied to the University of St Andrews There he pursued his own researches in Oriental learning, and was licensed to preach, in 1799 he published Discoveries and Settlements of the Europeans in Northern and Western Africa He also contributed to the Edinburgh Magazine, to 'Monk' Lewis's Tales of Wonder, and to Scott's Minstrels; of the Scottish Border So ardent was he in assisting Sir Walter that once he walked between forty and fifty miles, and back again, for the sole purpose of visiting an old person who possessed an ancient historical ballad He cherished a strong desire to visit foreign countries, but when his friends sought from Government on his behalf some appointment for him connected with the learning and languages of the East, the only situation they could obtain for him was that of assistant-surgeon at Madras, and in fi c or six months Leyden qualified himself for , this new profession and obtained a diploma in medicine. In December 1802, summoned to join the Christmas fleet of Indiamen, Leyden finished his poem, the Scenes of Infancy, describing his native Teviotdale, and left Scotland for ever After his arrival at Madras his health gave way, and he was obliged to remove to Prince of Wales He remained there for some time, visiting Sumatra and the Malayan Peninsula, and amassing the curious information concerning the language, literature, and descent of the Indo Chinese tribes, which enabled him to lay a most valuable dissertation before the Asiatic Society at Calcutta. An appointment as professor in the Bengal College was soon exchanged for a more lucrative post, that of a judge in Calcutta, but his spare time was still devoted to Oriental manuscripts and antiquities 'I may die in the attempt,' he wrote to a friend, 'but if I die without surpassing Sir William Jones a hundredfold in Oriental learning, let never a tear for me profane the eye of a Bordcrer' The possibility of an early death in a distant land often crossed the mind of the ambitious student, in his Scenes of Infancy he expressly anticipates a fate he had then no reason to expect

The silver moon at midnight cold and still, Looks, sad and silent, o'er you western hill, While large and pale the ghostly structures grow, Reared on the confines of the world below Is that dull sound the hum of Teviot's stream? Is that blue light the moon's, or tomb-fire's gleam, By which a mouldering pile is faintly seen, The old deserted church of Hazeldean, Where slept my fathers in their natal clay, Till Teviot's waters rolled their bones away? Their feeble voices from the stream they raise—'Rash youth' nomindful of thy early days, Why didst thou quit the peasant's simple lot? Why didst thou leave the peasant's turf built cot,

The ancient graves where all thy fathers lie, And Teviot's stream that long has murmured by? And we—when death so long has closed our eyes, How wilt thou bid us from the dust arise, And bear our mouldering bones across the main, I rom vales that knew our lives devoid of stain? Rash youth, beware 'thy home bred virtues save, And sweetly sleep in thy paternal grave.'

In 1811 Leyden accompanied the Governor-General in the military expedition which conquered Java from the Dutch, and in Scott's words, 'his spirit of romantic adventure led him literally to rush upon his death, for, with another volunteer who attended the expedition, he threw himself into the surf, in order to be the first Briton of the expedi-

When the success of the well concerted movements of the invaders had given them possession of the town of Batavia, Leyden displayed the same ill-omened precipitation, in his haste to examine a library, or rather a warehouse of books The apartment had not been regularly ventilated, and either from this circumstance, or already affected by the fital sickness peculiar to Batavia, Levden, when he left the place, had a fit of shivering, and declared the atmosphere was enough to give any mortal a fever The presage was too just he took his bed, and died in three days (August 28, 1811), on the eve of the battle which gave Java for a while to the British Empire.' Scott alluded to his death in the Lord of the Isles referring here to Levden's balled The Mermand, the scene of which is laid it Corrieved in, it was published with his Coul of Keeldar in the Border Ministrelsy. Scott too generously said of the opening of the Mermand that for more melody of sound it had seldom been excelled in English poetry.

Herden's learning was portentous the dealt not a merely with Suislant and Prulant, Persian and Pushtu, Hindustam and Bengidi, but with the tongues of the Dekkan, of the Middices of Macassar and Bah, and with virious forms of Malay. He translated important vorks from and into several of these tongues. At home he had edited the Complaint of Scotlanae, Scotlan Descriptive Poems (including Alberta heretofore unpublished see page 440). But he was more powerful as a scholar than as a poet, though his ballads and shorter poems have more inspiration than his longest piece, the Scanes of Infant.

Ode to an Indian Gold Coin

Slave of the dark and dirty mine!

What vanity has brought thee here?

How can I live to see thee sline.

So bright, whom I have bon ht so dear?

The tent ropes flapping lone I hear

I or twilight converse, arm in arm

The jackal's shrick bursts on mine ear

When murth and music wont to cheer

By Cherical's dark wandering streams,
Where cane tufts shadow all the wild,
Sweet visions haunt my waking dreams
Of Teviot loved while still a child,
Of castled rocks stupendous piled
By I'sk or I den's classic wave,
Where loves of youth and friendships smiled,
Uncursed by thee, vile yellow slave!

Fade dry dreams sweet, from memory fade '
The perished bliss of youth's first prime,
That once so bright on fancy placed,
Levices no more in after time
Far from my sacred natal clime,
I haste to an untimely grave,
The daring thoughts that sourced sublime
Are sund in occan's southern wave

Slave of the nunc! the yellow light
Gleams baleful as the tomb fire drear
A gentle vision comes by night
My lonely widowed heart to cheer
Her eyes are dim with many a tear,
That once were guiding stars to mine,
If I cannot bear to see thee shine

Thus all to soothe the chieftain's woe,

Far from the maid he loved so dear,

The song arose, so soft and slow,

He seemed her parting sigh to hear

The lonely deck he paces o'er,
Impatient for the rising day,
And still from Crinan's moonlight shore,
He turns his eyes to Colonsay

The moonbeams crisp the curling surge, That streaks with form the ocean green, While forward still the rowers urge Their course, a female form was seen

That sea maid's form, of pearly light, Was whiter than the down; spray, And round her bosom, heaving bright, Her glossy yellow ringlets play

Borne on a foamy crested wave,

She reached amain the bounding prow,
Then clasping fast the chieftain brave,
She, plunging, sought the deep below

Ah ' long beside thy feigned bier,
The monks the prayer of death shall say,
And long for thee, the fruitless tear
Shall weep the maid of Colonsay'

But downward like a powerless corse,
The eddying waves the chieftain bear,
He only heard the moaning hourse
Of waters murmuring in his car

The murmurs sink by slow degrees,
No more the waters round him rive,
Lulled by the music of the seas,
He lies within a coral cave

No form he saw of mortal mould It shone like ocean's snowy foam, Her ringlets waved in living gold, Her mirror crystal, pearl the comb

Her pearly comb the siren tool,
And careless bound her tresses wild
Still o'er the mirror stole her look,
As on the wondering youth she similed

I the music from the greenwood tree, Again she ruled the melting hy 'I air warrior, wilt thou dwell with me, And leave the maid of Colonsay? 'Tair is the crystal hall for me With rubies and with emerilds set, And sweet the music of the sea Shall sing, when we for love are met

'How sweet to dance with gliding feet Along the level tide so green, Responsive to the cadence sweet That breathes along the moonlight scene!

'And soft the music of the main Rings from the motley tortoise shell, While moonbeams o'er the watery plain Seem trembling in its fitful swell'

Proud swells her heart! she deems at last fo lure him with her silver tongue, And, as the shelving rocks she passed, She raised her voice, and sweetly sung.

In softer, sweeter strains she sing, Slow gliding o'er the moonlight bay, When light to land the chieftain spring, To hail the maid of Colonsiv

O sad the Mermaid's gay notes fell, And sadly sink remote at sea! So sadly mourns the writhed shell Of Jura's shore, its parent sea.

And ever as the year returns,

The charm bound sailors know the day,
For sadly still the Mermaid mourns

George Clabbe,

in Byron's judgment 'Nature's sternest painter, yet the best,' was born at Aldeburgh in Suffolk, on the Christmas Eve of 1754 His father was collector of salt duties, a clever, strong, violent man, who though poor exerted himself to give his boy a good education, he lived to witness his son's growing fame, and, with parental fondness, to transcribe in his own liandwriting the poem of The Library The mother was a meek, religious woman, of three younger brothers, one penshed miserably with his whole crew, captain of a slaver whose cargo mutinied triumphantly, and another was lost sight of in Honduras George got some schooling at Bungay and Stowmarket, and from 1768 to 1774 was surgeon's apprentice at Wickham-Brock and at Woodbridge. In his first place he had to help the ploughboy, in his second he fell in love with Sarah Elmy ('Mira'), who lived with her uncle, a wealthy veonian, at Parliam. Then a spell of drudgers in his father's varchouse nine months in London, picking up surgery cheaply, some three vears' struggling practice at Aldeburgh, and at last in April 1780 with three pounds in his pocket, he sailed again for London, resolved to try his fortune in literature. Eight years before he had written verses for Wheble's Magazine, he had published Inebriety, a Poem (Ipswich, 1775), and now his Candidate soon found a publisher, unluckily a bankrupt one A season of penury dire as Chatterton's was borne by Crabbe with pious bravery, he had to pawn clothes and instruments, appeals to Lords Thurlow, North, Shelburne met no response, and early in 1781 he saw himself threatened with arrest for debt, when he made his case known to Burke Forty-one years later he told Lockhart at Edinburgh how, having delivered his letter at Burke's door, he paced Westminster Bridge all night long until daybreak. Burke proved a generous patron, from the hour of their meeting Crabbe was a made man, and as guest at Beaconsfield, he met Fox, Dr Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others of the statesman's great friends Lord Thurlow—who now, as in the case of Cowper, came with tardy notice and ungraceful generosity—invited him to breakfast, and at parting presented him with a bank-note for £100 Dodsley that same year brought out the Library, and the very next winter Crabbe took orders, and was licensed to the curacy of his native parish of Aldeburgh. In 1782 Burke procured for him the post of chaplain to the Duke of Rutland at Belvoir Castle, thenceforward he was never in fear of want, but he seems to have felt all the ills of dependence on the great, and in 'The Patron' and other poems has strongly depicted them

In 1783 appeared The Village, already read and corrected by Johnson and Burke Its success was instant and complete. Some of the descriptions in the poem—as that of the parish workhouse—were copied into all the periodicals, and at once took that place in our national literature they still retain. Thurlow presented him with two small Dorset livings in his gift, and congratulated him, with an oath, on his being as like Parson Adams as twelve to a dozen In 1783 Crabbe married Miss Elmy, and in 1785, taking the curacy of Stathern, near Belvoir Castle, he bade adieu to the ducal mansion and transferred himself to the village parsonage. In 1787 he exchanged his two small Dorset livings for two of greater value in the Vale of Belvoir, one of them the rectory of Muston, and there he lived for a time, but the poet in him remained silent for After thirteen happy years (1792many years 1805) in Suffolk, at Parham, Great Glenham, and Rendham, he returned to Muston, his Leicester shire rectory, and his wife having died there in 1813, exchanged it the next year for Trowbridge in Wiltshire In 1807 he published his Parish Register, which secured an unprecedented success The poem had been previously submitted to Fox, parts of it—especially the story of Phæbe Dawson -were among the last things that interested the The Borough (1810) great Whig on his deathbed is similar in substance but more connected, the Tales in Verse (1812) contain perhaps his finest illustrations of life and character Crabbe spent a great part of his income at Trowbridge (£800 a year) in charity. He was still eagerly active in literary work, and in 1817-18 was engaged on his last notable undertaking, The Tales of the Hall (1819), for which and the remaining copyright of all the earlier poems Mr Murray gave £3000 connection Tom Moore has given an amusing illus tration of his brother-poet's simplicity in money Thomas Campbell commented on his matters mildness in literary argument, strange in so stern a poet of nature, and on his 'vigilant shrewdness that almost eluded you by keeping its watch so quietly' The Tales of the Hall were received with the approval due to an old favourite, but without en In 1822 the now venerable poet paid a visit to Sir Walter Scott in Edinburgh. He arrived the day Scott at Leith welcomed George 1V to Scotland, and it was in Scott's joy at greeting Crabbe as guest that he sat down on and smashed the glass out of which the king had a little before drunk his health, and which Scott had carried off in the skirt of his coat. It was noted that Crabbe soon got wearied of the New Town, but could H15 latter amuse himself for ever in the Old years were spent in clerical duties, in social inter course, and in fossil-hunting, at threescore and ten he was still busy, cheerful, and affectionate. He died at Trowbridge on 3rd February 1832

The Village, the Parish Register, and the shorter tales of Crabbe were his most popular poems. The Tales of the Hall are less interesting, though Edward FitzGerald loved them, they deal with the higher ranks of life, and with them the poet of the poor was hardly at home Yet some of the episodes are in his best style Sir Owen Dale, Ruth, Ellen, and other stories are marked with Crabbe's sign-manual—a fidelity to nature which redeems verses otherwise dull enough. His field of observation was narrow, his gift of description somewhat limited, but his pictures have a strong dramatic effect—they are visibly drawn direct from the life. They are often too true, human nature exhibited in its naked reality and with all its defects shocks our vanity and mortifies our pride. The life experience of the poet gave the bent to his genius He well knew how untrue and absurd were the pictures of rural life which regularly figured in poetry. His own youth was painfulspent amidst want and misery, changing only from gloom to passion, though in later years he had more of the amenities of refined and intellectual society at his command than Cowper, yet he did not, like Cowper, attempt to paint their manifold When he took up his pen, his mind turned to Aldeburgh and its wild amphibious race-to the parish workhouse, where the wheel hummed doleful through the day—to erring damsels and luckless swains, the prey of overseers or justices-or to the haunts of desperate poachers and smugglers, Gipsies and gamblers, where vice and misery stalked undisguised in their darkest forms. He stirred up the dregs of human society, and while exhibiting to the life the hideous and hateful features, yet worked them into moving poetry Like his own Sir Richard Monday, he never forgot the parish village-life in England in its worst form, with the old poor-laws and game-laws, with a nonresident clergy, displayed a scale of marked contrasts, some bright, some gloomy, and Crabbe drew them all His Isaac Ashford is as honourable to the humbler English poor as Scott's Jeanie Deans or Dandie Dinmont are to Scottish char-The faithful maid who watched over her dying sailor is a noble tribute to the power of true love amongst the lowly, 'The Parting Hour' and 'The Patron' are equally honourable to the poor and to the middle classes But no doubt Crahbe was in general a gloomy painter of life, he was irrepressibly driven to depict the unlovely and unannable, whether for poetic effect or from painful experience, he makes the evil in life predominate over the good, by nature or by force of circumstances, he was a pessimist-a realist, in the sense we associate with the work, in prose and verse, of moderns like Thomas Hardy Even his pathos and tenderness are generally linked to something harsh, startling, or humiliating, to disappointed hopes or unavailing sorrow The minuteness with which he dwells on such aspects of life sometimes makes his descriptions tedious and apparently unfeeling, he drags forward every defect, every vice and failing, not for the purpose of educing something good out of the evil, but, as it would seem, merely for the sake of completing the picture. In his higher flights, where scenes of strong passion, vice, or remorse are depicted, Crabbe is a moralist poet, purifying the heart by terror and pity, and by appalling realisations of the misery and desolation that mark the track of unbridled passion. His story of Sir Eustace Grey in this kind is told with almost terrific power, and with a lyrical cry in its verse. His usual vehicle is the Popian couplet-Horace Smith dubbed him 'a Pope in worsted stockings'-much less flowing and melodious than its model, and often ending in points and quibbles Thus his thrifty housewife, Widow Goe, falls down in sickness, 'Heaven in her eye, and in her hand her keys,' the apothecary 'carries fate and playsic in his eye.' This kind of thing does really heighten the effect of his humorous and homely descriptions, but it is too much of a mannerism, and it mars the finer passages As a painter of English scenery Crabbe is as original and forcible as in character sketching His seascapes are peculiarly striking, and he invests even sterile marshes and barren sands with interest. His objects are seldom picturesque, but he noted every weed and plantthe purple bloom of the heath, the dwarfish flowers among the wild gorse, the slender grass of the sheep walk, and even the pebbles, seaweed, and shells amid 'the glittering waters on the shingles rolled,' and he passionately loved the sea, It will be remembered by all readers of Lockhart's Life of Scott how on his deathbed Scott insisted again and again on having something by Crabbe read to him, and how, though his memory had lost its grip, he listened always with pleasure to passages his son-in-law read to him from his old favourite. Cardinal Newman declared Tales of the Hall to be a poem, 'whether in conception or in execution, one of the most touching in our language,' proclaimed in The Idea of a University that he read it on its first publication with extreme delight, and had never lost his love of it,' and in successive editions still testified that on a re-reading he was 'even more touched by it than heretofore.'

Parish Workhouse and Apothecary

Theirs is yon house that holds the parish poor, Whose walls of mud scarce bear the broken door, There, where the putrid vapours, flagging, play, And the dull wheel hums doleful through the day, There children dwell who know no parents' care, Parents who know no children's love dwell there, Heart broken matrons on their joyless bed, Forsaken wives, and mothers never wed, Dejected widows with unheeded tears, And crippled age with more than childhood fears, The lame, the blind, and, far the happiest they! The moping idiot and the madman gay

Here too the sick their final doom receive,
Here brought amid the scenes of grief to grieve,
Where the loud groans from some sad chamber flow,
Mixed with the clamours of the crowd below,
Here sorrowing they each kindred sorrow scan,
And the cold charities of man to man

Whose laws indeed for ruined age provide, And strong compulsion pluds the scrap from pude, But still that sciap is bought with many a sigh, And pride embitters what it can't deny Say ic, oppressed by some fantastic woes, Some jarring nerve that baffles your repore; Who press the downy couch, while slaves advance With thild eye, to read the distant glance; Who with sad prayers the weary doctor tease, To name the nameless ever new disease, Who with mock patience alre complaints endure, Which real pain and that alone can care, How would be bear in real pain to lie, Despised, neglected, left alone to die? How would be bear to draw your latest breath Where all that's wretched paves the way for death?

Such is that room which one rude beam divides, And unked rafters form the sloping sides.

Where the vile bands that bind the thatch are seen, And lath and mind are all that he between, save one dull pane that, coarsely patched, gives way to the rude tempest, yet excludes the day Here on a matted flock, with dust o erspread, The drooping wretch reclines his languid head, tor him no hand the cordial cup applies, Or whees the tear that stagnates in his eyes, No friends with soft discourse his pain beginne, Or promise hope till slekuess wears a smile

But soon a loud and linsty summons calls, Shal es the thin roof, and celioes round the walls, Anon a figure enters, quantly neat,
All pride and business, bustle and concelt,
With looks unritered by these scenes of woe,
With speed that, entering, speaks his haste to go;
He bids the gazing throng around him fly,
And carries fate and physic in his eye,
A potent quack, long versed in human ills,
Who first limits the victim whom he kills,
Whose murderous hand a drowsy bench protect,
And whose most tender mercy is neplect

Paid by the parish for attendance here, He wears contempt upon his sapical sucer, In laste he seeks the bed where unsery hes, Impatience maried in his aveited eyes, And, some habitual queries harried o'er, Without reply, he rushes on the door, His drooping patient, long mured to pain, And long unheeded, knows remonstrance vain, The ceases now the feeble help to crave Of man, and silent shiks into the grave

Next to these ladles, but in nought ailled, A noble pensant, Isaac Ashford, died Noble he was, contemming all things mean, this truth imquestioned and his soul science Of no man's presence Isaac felt afraid, At no man's question Isaac fold disminyed Shame knew him not, he dreaded no disprace, Iruth, simple truth, was written in his face, Yet while the serious thought his soul approved, Cheerful he seemed, and gentleness he loved, I o bliss domestic he his heart resigned, And with the firmest, had the fondest mind Were others joyful, be looted smilling on, And gave allowance where he needed none,

Good he refused with future ill to bus, Not knew a joy that caused reflection's sigh, A friend to virtue, his unclouded breast No entry stung, no jealousy distressed-Bane of the poor! It wounds their weaker mind To miss one favour which their neighbours find-Yet far was he from store pride removed, He felt humanely, and he warmly loved I marked his action when his infant died, And his old neighbour for offence was tried, The still tears, stenling down that furrowed cheek, Spoke pity plainer than the tongue can speak If pride were his, 'twas not their vulgar pride, Who, in their base contempt, the great deride, Nor pilde in learning, though my clerk agreed, If fate should call him, Ashford might succeed; Nor pride in rustic skill, although we knew None his superior, and his equals few But if that spult in his soul had place, It was the jealous pride that shins disgrace, A pride in honest fame, by virtue galand, In study boys to virtuous labours trained, Pride in the power that guards his country's coast, And all that I nglishmen enjoy and boast, Pride in a life that slander's tongue defied, In fact a noble pression, misnamed pride

He had no party's rage, no sectory's whim, Christian and country man was all with him, I rue to his church he came, no Sunday shower Kept him at home in that important hour, Nor his firm feet could one persuading seet By the strong glare of their new light direct, 'On hope, in inline own sober light, I gaze, But should be blind and lose it in your blaze.'

In times severe, when many a sturdy swain I alt it his pride, his confort to complain, Isaac their wants would soothe, his own would hide, And feel in that his comfort and his pride

At length he found, when seventy years were run, His strength departed and his labour done, When, save his honest fame, he kept no more; But lost his wife and saw his children poor, 'I was then a spark of—say not discontent—Struck on his mind, and thus he pave it vent

'Kind are your laws -'tis not to be dealed-That in you house for rulned are provide, And they are just, when young, we pive you all, And then for comforts in our weakness call Why then this proud reluctance to be fed, To join your poor and cat the parish bread? But yet I linger, louth with blm to feed Who gains his plenty by the sons of need: He who by contract all your purpers took, And gauges stomachs with an auxious look t On some old master I could well depend, See him with joy, and thank him as a friend; But ill on him who doles the day's supply, And counts our chances who at night may die : Yet help me, Herven! and let me not complain Of what befalls me, but the fate sustain '

Such were his thoughts, and so resigned he grew? Daily he placed the workhouse in his view! But came not there, for sudden was his fate, He dropt expiring at his cottage gate.

I feel lils absence in the hours of prayer, And view his seat, and sigh for Isane there,

I see no more those white locks thinly spread Round the bald polish of that horomed head, No more that awful glance on playful wight Compelled to kneel and tremble at the sight, To fold his fingers all in dread the while, I ill Mister Ashford softened to a smile, No more that meek and suppliant look in prayer, Nor the pure faith—to give it force—are there But he is blest, and I lament no more, A wise good man contented to be poor (I rom The Parish Register)

Two summers since I saw at Lamnias fair The sweetest flower that ever blossomed there, When Phabe Dawson gally crossed the green, In laste to see, and happy to be seen, Her air, her manners all who saw admired, Courteous though cov, and gentle though retired. The joy of youth and health her eyes displayed, And ease of heart her every look conveyed, I native shill her simple robes expressed, As with untutored elegance she dressed, The lads around admired so fair a sight, And Phabe felt, and felt she gave, delight Admirers soon of every age she gained, Her beauty won them and her worth retained, Lnvy itself could no contempt display, They wished her well, whom yet they wished away Correct in thought she judged a surrant's place Preserved a rustic beauty from disgrace, But yet on Sunday eve, in freedom's hour, With secret joy she felt that beauty's power, When some proud bliss upon the heart would steal. That, poor or rich, a beauty still must feel

At length, the youth ordained to move her breast, Before the swains with bolder spirit pressed, With looks less timid made his passion known, And pleased by manners most unlike her own, Loud though in love, and confident though young, I terce in his air, and voluble of tongue. ## Approaching Age

Six years had passed, and forty ere the six, When Time began to play his usual tricks The locks once comely in a virgin's sight, Locks of pure brown, displayed th' encroaching white,

The blood once fervid now to cool began, And Time's strong pressure to subdue the man I rode or walked as I was wont before, But now the bounding spirit was no more, A moderate pace would now my body heat, A walk of moderate length distress my feet. I showed my stranger guest those hills sublime, But said, 'The view is poor, we need not climb' At a friend's mansion I began to dread The cold neat parlour, and the gay glazed bed, At home I felt a more decided taste, And must have all things in my order placed, I ceased to hunt, my horses pleased me less, My dinner more, I learned to play at chess, I took my dog and gun, but saw the brute Was disappointed that I did not shoot, My morning walks I now could bear to lose, And blessed the shower that gave me not to choose In fact, I felt a languor stealing on, The active arm, the agile hand were gone, Small daily actions into habits grew, And new dislike to forms and fashion new, I loved my trees in order to dispose, I numbered peaches, looked how stocks arose, Told the same story oft-in short, began to prose. #### The Crazed Maiden's Song

Let me not have this gloomy view
About my room, around my bed,
But morning roses, wet with dew,
To cool my burning brows instead.
As flow'rs that once in Eden grew,
Let them their fragrant spirits shed,
And every day the sweets renew,
Till I, a fading flower, am dead

Oh ' let the herbs I loved to rear
Give to my sense their perfinned breath,
Let them be placed about my bier,
And grace the gloomy house of death
I'll have my grave beneath a hill,
Where, only Lucy's self shall know,
Where runs the pure pellucid rill
Upon its gravelly bed below,
There violets on the borders blow,
And insects their soft light display,
Till, as the morning sunbeams glow,
The cold phosphorie fires decay

That is the grave to Lucy shown,
The soil a pure and silver sand,
The green cold moss above it grown,
Unplucked of all but maiden hand
In virgin earth, till then unturned,
There let my maiden form be laid,
Nor let my changed clay be spurned,
Nor for new guest that bed be made.

There will the lark—the lamb, in sport,
In air—on earth—securely play,
And Lucy to my grave resort,
As innocent, but not so gay
I will not have the churchyard ground
With bones all black and ngly grown,
To press my shivering body round,
Or on my wasted limbs be thrown

With ribs and skulls I will not sleep,
In clammy beds of cold blue clay,
Through which the ringed earth worms creep,
And on the shrouded bosom prey,
I will not have the bell proclaim
When those sad marriage rites begin,
And boys, without regard or shame,
Press the vile monldering masses in.

Say not, it is beneath my care,
I cannot these cold truths allow,
These thoughts may not afflict me there,
But, O' they vex and tease me now
Raise not a turf nor set a stone,
That man a maiden's grave may trace,
But thou, my Lucy, come alone,
And let affection find the place.

Oh! take me from a world I hate,
Men cruel, selfish, sensual, cold,
And, in some pure and blessed state,
Let me my sister minds behold
From gross and sordid views refined,
Our heaven of spotless love to share,
For only generous souls designed,
And not a man to meet us there.

Sketches of Autumn

It was a fair and mild autumnal sky, And earth's ripe treasures met th' admiring eye, As a rich beanty, when her bloom is lost, Appears with more magnificence and cost The wet and heavy grass, where feet had strayed, Not yet erect, the wanderer's way betrayed, Showers of the night had swelled the deepening rill, The morning breeze had urged the quickening mill, Assembled rooks had winged their seaward flight, By the same passage to return at night, While proudly o'er them hung the steady kite, Then turned him back, and left the noisy throng, Nor deigned to know them as he sailed along Long yellow leaves, from osters, strewed around, Choked the small stream, and hushed the feeble sound, While the dead foliage dropped from loftier trees, Our squire beheld not with his wonted ease, But to his own reflections made reply, And said aloud, 'Yes! doubtless we must die' 'We must,' said Richard, 'and we would not live To feel what dotage and decay will give,

'We must,' said Richard, 'and we would not live To feel what dotage and decay will give, But we yet taste whatever we behold, The morn is lovely, though the air is cold There is delicious quiet in this scene, At once so rich, so varied, so serene, Sonnds to delight us—each discordant tone Thus mingled please, that fail to please alone, This hollow wind, this rustling of the brook, The farm yard noise, the woodman at yon oal—See, the axe falls!—now listen to the stroke! That gun itself, that mirders all this peace, Adds to the charm, because it soon must cease.'

(From The Tales of the Hall)

Cold grew the foggy morn, the day was brief, Loose on the cherry hung the crimson leaf, The dew dwelt ever on the herb, the woods Roared with strong blasts, with mighty showers the floods All green was vanished, save of pine and yew,
That still displayed their melancholy hue,
Save the green holly with its berries red,
And the green moss that o'er the gravel spread

It is hardly unfair to compare Crabbe's

Better to love amiss than nothing to have loved, from The Struggles of Conscience, with Tennyson's

'Tis better to have loved and lost Than never to have loved at all

It was Crabbe who opined, not without reason, that he 'who often reads, will sometimes wish to write.' It is in The Widow's Tale that we read of

A tender, timid maid! who knew not how To pass a pig sty, or to face a cow, and who was aggreed

When the coarse cloth she saw, with many a stain Soiled by rade hinds who cut and come again

[An admirable Life of the poet by his son the Rev George Crabbe (1785-1857), for twenty three years vicar of Bredfield, Suffolk, was prefixed to the edition of the works published in eight volumes in 1834. There are studies by Kebbel (1898) and Canon Ainger (Men of Letters, 1903). The best edition of the works is that by A. W. Ward (3 vols. 1905-7).]

FRANCIS HINDES GROOME

Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832), for more than half a century conspicuous as an author on jurisprudence and ethics, lived in intimate correspondence with the leading men of several generations and of various countries, and was unceasingly active in the propagation of utilitarianism and in insisting on reform in law. The son of a pushing and prosperous London attorney, he was educated at Westminster School and Queen's College, Oxford He was little over twelve when he went to Oxford, but even then he was, from his precocity, not unjustly known by the name of 'the philosopher,' and though he never liked Oxford methods of study or of life, he took his degree of BA in 1763, and after studying law at Lincoln's lnn, was called to the Bar He had a strong dislike to the legal profession, and never but once pleaded in public. His first publication was an acute but hypercritical examination of a passage in Blackstone's Commentaries, and was called A Fragment on Government (1776) The critique was prompted, no doubt, by 'a passion for improvement in those shapes in which the lot of mankind is meliorated by it,' but also by a profound contempt for Black-He was stimulated by Priestley's writings 'In the phrase, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," I then saw delineated, says Bentham, 'for the first time, a plain as well as a true standard for whatever is right or wrong, useful, useless, or mischievous in human conduct, whether in the field of morals or of politics' The famous phrase was used first by Hutcheson (1726), then in Italian by Beccarra, and was found by Priestley in a translation of Beccarn's Crimes and Punishments

(1766), but unhappily Priestley, Bentham, and the rest have none of them given a final and uni versal definition of liuman liappiness To ensure it, Bentham considered it necessary to reconstruct the laws and government—to have annual parlia ments and universal suffrage, secret voting, and a return to the ancient practice of paying wages to parliamentary representatives. In all his political, sociological, and juridical writings this doctrine of utility, so understood, is the leading and penading principle. In 1778 he published a pumphlet on The Hard Labour Bill, recommending an improve ment in the mode of criminal punishment, amongst those that followed were Letters on Usury (1787), Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Politics (1789), Discourses on Civil and Penal Legislation (1802), Punishments and Re-vards (1811), A Treatise on Judicial Evidence (1813), Codification and Public Instruction (1817), and The Bool of Fallacies (1824) The article in the National Dictionary of Biography quotes a classified list of seventy-four publications By the death of his father in 1792, Bentham succeeded to property in London and to firms in Essex yielding from £5∞ to £600 a year. He lived frugally, but with elegance, in one of his London houses, kept young men as secretaries, corresponded and wrote daily, and by a life of temperance and industry, with great self-complacency and the society of a few devoted friends, the eccentric philosopher attained to the age of eighty-four. He left his body to be dissected, and his skeleton, clothed in his usual attire, is preserved in University College, London

His works were collected and edited by Bowning and Hill Burton, and published in eleven volumes But assome of the works were rearranged, abridged, and altered by Bowring and others, it is sometimes doubtful how far the statements perfectly repre sent Bentham's own words or ideas Bentham's style was natural, clear, and even In his later works he adopted a peculiar uncouth style and nomenclature, which deter ordi nary renders, and indeed have rendered many of The substance of his lus works a dead-letter published works and MSS was rearranged and translated into excellent French by M Dumont, a Genevese disciple, and there were Spanish and James Mill m ide known Portuguese translations his principles at home, Sir Samuel Romilly discussed and criticised them in the Edinburgh Review, and Sir James Mackintosh in his Ethical Dissertation Of his new coined words it should be noted that some-such as codify, minimise, inter national-have been found useful, and have become an essential and permanent part of the English In the science of legislation Bentham exhibited profound capacity and extensive know ledge, but he is chargeable with not sufficiently 'weighing the various circumstances which require his rules to be modified in different countries and times, in order to render them either more useful, more easily introduced, more generally respected, or more certainly executed' J S Mill declared 'There is hardly anything in Bentham's philosophy which is not true. The bad part of his writings is his resolute denial of all that he does not see, of all truths but those which he recognises' This does not fully indicate the fact that he was both dogmatic and intolerant, holding that those who deliberately differed from him were either fools He greatly furthered the improvement of the lamentable poor-laws, like so many of the older Radicals, he held that both for England and France, colonies are disadvantageous to the mother-country, and should be emancipated. Many of his schemes have been realised, many more are in course of realisation The end and object of them all was the general welfare, and his chief error lay in conceiving that organic changes are possible by manifesto and enactment, or otherwise than through the growth and modification of popular needs, ideas, and In Mill's words, 'he found the institutions philosophy of law a chaos, and left it a science,' and he was the philosophic pioneer of Liberalism and of Radicalism

From the 'Defence of Usury'

The business of a money lender, though only among Christians and in Christian times a proscribed profession, has nowhere, nor at any time, been a popular one Those who have the resolution to sacrifice the present to the future, are natural objects of envy to those who have sacrificed the future to the present. The children who have eaten their cake are the natural enemies of the children who have theirs While the money is hoped for, and for a short time after it has been received, he who lends it is a friend and benefactor. by the time the money is spent, and the evil hour of reckoning is come, the henefactor is found to have changed his nature, and to have put on the tyrant and the oppressor un oppression for a man to reclaim his own money, it is none to keep it from him. Among the inconsiderate -that is, among the great mass of mankind-selfish affections conspire with the social in treasuring up all favour for the man of dissipation, and in refusing justice to the man of thrift who has supplied him. In some shape or other, that favour attends the chosen object of it through every stage of his career. But in no stage of his eareer can the man of thrift come in for any share of it. It is the general interest of those with whom a man lives, that his expense should be at least as great as his circumstances will bear, because there are few expenses which a man can launch into but what the bencht of them is shared, in some proportion or other, by those with whom he lives. In that circle originates a standing law forbidding every man, on pain of infamy, to confine his expenses within what is adjudged to be the measure of his means, saving always the power of exceeding that limit as much as he thinks proper, and the means assigned him by that law may be ever so much beyond his real means, but are sure never to fall short of them So close is the combination thus formed between the idea of ment and the idea of expenditure, that a disposition to speud finds favour in the eyes even of those who know that a man's circumstances do not entitle him to the means and an upstart, whose chief recommendation is this disposition, shall find himself to have purchased a permanent fund of respect, to the prejudice of the very persons at v hose expense he has been gratifying his appetites and his pride. The lustre which the display of borrowed wealth has diffused over his character awes men during the season of his prosperity into a summission to his insolence, and when the hand of adversity has overtaken him at last, the recollection of the height from which he has fallen throws the veil of compassion over his injustice.

The condition of the man of thrift is the reverse. His lasting opulence procures bim a share, it least, of the same envy that attends the prodigal's transient display but the use he makes of it procures him no part of the favour which attends the prodigal. In the satisfactions he derives from that use—the pleasure of possession, and the idea of enjoying at some distant period, which may never arrive—nohody comes in for any share. In the midst of his opulence he is regarded as a kind of insolvent, who refuses to honour the bills which their rapacity would draw upon him, and who is by so much the more eriminal than other insolvents, as not having the plea of inibility for an excuse.

Could there he any doubt of the disfavour which attends the cause of the money lender in his competition with the borrower, and of the disposition of the public judgment to sacrifice the interest of the former to that of the latter, the stage would afford a compendious but a pretty conclusive proof of it. It is the business of the dramatist to study, and to conform to, the humours and passions of those on the pleasing of whom he depends for his success, it is the course which reflection must suggest to every man, and which a man would naturally fall into, though he were not to think about it. He may, and very frequently does, make magnificent pre tences of giving the law to them hut woe be to him that attempts to give to them any other law than what they are disposed already to receive! If he would attempt to lead them one inch, it must be with great caution, and not without suffering himself to be led hy them at least a dozen Now I question whether, among all the instances in which a horrower and a lender of money have been brought together upon the stage, from the days of Thespis to the present, there ever was one in which the former was not recommended to favour in some shape or other-either to admiration, or to love, or to pity, or to all three-and the other, the man of thrift, consigned to infamy

From Bentham's 'Commonplace Book.'

'O Locke ' first master of intellectual truth ' without whom those who have taught nie would have been as nothing! let thy blest spirit, if now it looketh down upon the affairs of men, acknowledge my obedience to the first great lesson of thy life, in the assertion of independence, und make its report in my favour to the Throne, the Judgment seat above. Priestley was the first (unless it was Beccaria) who taught my lips to pronounce this sacred truth -That the greatest happi ness of the greatest number is the foundation of morals and legislation Johnson is the pompous vamper of commonplace morality-of phrases often trite without When the truths in a man's book, though many and important, are fewer than the errors. when his ideas, though the means of producing clear ones in other men, are found to be themselves not clear, that book must die Montesquieu must therefore die he must die, as his great countryman, Descartes, had died before him he must wither as the blade withers when the corn is ripe he must die, but let tears of gratitude and admiration bedew his grave. O Montesquien i the British constitution, whose death thou prophesiedst, will live longer than thy work, yet not longer than thy fame Not even the incense of the illustrious Catharine can preserve thee. Locke-dry, cold, languid, wearisome, will live for ever Montesquieu-rapid, brilliant, glorious, enchanting-will not outlive his century I know-I feel -I pity-and blush at the enjoyment of a liberty which the birth place of that great writer (great with all his faults) forbade him to enjoy I could make an im mense book upon the defects of Montesquieu-I could make not a small one upon his excellencies. # William Godwin, author of Caleb Williams, was born at Wisbeach in Cambridgeshire, 3rd March 1756, the seventh of the thirteen children of John Godwin (1723-72), a Dissenting minister, who moved to Debenham in 1758, and in 1760 to Guestwick in Norfolk three years' schooling at Hindoly eston, three more with a tutor at Norwich, and one as usher in his former school, Godwin in 1773 entered Hoxton Presbyterian College, in 1778 quitted it as pure a Sandemanian and Tory as he had gone in during a five years' ministry at Ware, Stowmarket, and Beaconsfield, he turned Socinian and Republican, and by 1787 was a 'complete unbeliever' Meanwhile he had taken to literature, in 1783-84 writing three novels for £42, a Life of Chatham, and Sketches of History, in Sir Sermons In 1785 he became principal writer in the New Annual The French Revolution gave him an opening, and his Enquiry concerning Political Justice, and its Influences on General Virtue and Happiness (2 vols 4to, 1793), brought him fame, widespread influence, the leadership of a school of thought, and a thousand guineas - It was calmly subversive of everything (law and 'marriage, the worst of all laws'), but as it preached down violence, and was deemed caviare to the multitude, its author escaped prosecution In Things as they Are, or the Adventures of Caleb Williams (1794), Godwin's aim was to inculcate his characteristic doctrines, and to comprehend 'a general review of the modes of domestic and unrecorded despotism by which man becomes the destroyer of man' His hero tells his own tale of suffering and of wrong-of inno cence persecuted and reduced to the brink of death and infamy by aristocratic power, and by tyrannical or partially administered laws, but his story is so full of interest and vigour that the reader loses sight of the political object and the implied satire, and thinks only of the characters and incidents The imagination of the novelist overpowered his philosophy, he was a greater inventor than propagandist, and his character of Falkland is one of the most striking in the whole range of English fiction But the political views he shared were soon brought still more aggres-His friends, Holcroft, Thelwall, sively forward Horne Tooke, and others, were arrested and tried on a charge of high treason. Godwin had appa rently not been formally associated with their societies, and however obnoxious to those in power, had not rendered himself amenable to the laws of Yet if we may credit a curious entry his country in Sir Walter Scott's diary, he must have been early mixed up with the English Jacobins declared that Canning, while in the Temple, was startled out of somewhat revolutionary opinions by a visit from Godwin, who told him 'to his astonishment that, in expectation of a new order of things, the English Jacobins designed to place him, Canning, at the head of the revolution. He was much struck, and asked time to think what course he should take, and having thought the matter over, he went to Mr Pitt, and made the Anti Jacobin confession of faith? This must have been before 1793 In any case Godwin was readi with his pen in his friends' defence. Judge Eyre, in his charge to the grand jury, had laid down principles very different from his, and he instantly published Cursory Strictures on the judge's charge, so ably written that the pamphlet is said to have mainly led to the acquittal of the accused

In 1796 Godwin issued a series of essays on Education, Manners, and Literature, entitled The Inquirer, in August 1797 he married Mari Woll stonecraft, who died five months later after giving birth to a daughter (Mrs Shelley) Godwin's con tempt of the ordinary English modes of thinking and acting was displayed by this marriage wife brought with her a natural daughter by a former protector, and had lived with Godwin for some time before their marriage 'The principal motive,' he says, 'for complying with the ceremony was the circumstance of Mary's being in a state of pregnancy' In the Memoirs of Mary Wollstone craft Godwin, now written by him, all the details of her life and conduct are minutely related 1799 appeared his St Leon, a story of the 'miracu lous,' and designed to illustrate human feelings and passions in incredible situations. His hero attains the possession of the philosopher's stone, and secures exhaustless wealth by transmuting the baser metals into gold, at the same time he learns the secret of the eliair vitae, by which he has the The romance has power of renewing his youth many attractions—splendid description and true pathos, its chief defect is an excess of the terrible In 1800 Godwin produced his unlucky trigedy of Antomo, in 1801, Thoughts on Dr Parrs Spital Sermon, a reply to attacks made upon him, or on his code of morality, by Parr, Mackintosh, and others. In 1803 he brought out a Life of Chaucer, The Life of Chaucer was ridiculed in two quartos by Scott in the Edinburgh Review for its enormous bulk, minute details, and extraneous dissertations, but it is, for the time, a good and careful piece of work, exhibiting much sound criticism and a relish for true poetry In 1804 came Fleetwood, or the New Man of Feeling The title was unfortunate, as reminding the reader of the old Man of Feeling, this new one was self-willed and capricious, a morbid egotist, whose irritability, frantic outbursts of passion, and matrimonial troubles moved contempt rather than sympathy The better parts of the novel consist of the episode of the Macneills, a tale of family pathos, and some detached descriptions of Welsh scenery In 1801, after two unsuccessful courtships, Godwin had been married by the bustling widow, Mrs Clements or Clairmont, his next-door neighbour, who accosted him one day from her balcony 'Is it possible that I behold the immortal Godwin!' She had two children already, and a third was born of the marriage. So in the family group as now constituted there were poor Fanny Imlay (1794-1816), who died by her own hand, Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin (1797-1851), who in 1816 married Shelley, Charles Clairmont, 'Claire' Clairmont (1797-1879), the mother by Byron of Allegra, and William Godwin (1803-32), to whose posthumous novel, Transfusion, a memoir was prefixed by his father

In 1805 Godwin, having opened a bookseller's shop in London, under the assumed name of 'Edward Baldyin,' sent forth a number of children's books, small histories and other compilations, some of them by himself, Charles Lamb mentions an English Grammar, in which Hazlitt assisted, and Lamb himself wrote a children's book, The King and Queen of Hearts (reprinted He tried another tragedy, Faulkner, in 1807, also unsuccessful. Next year he published an Essay on Sepulchres, and in 1815, Lives of Edward and John Phillips, the Nephews of Milton He had paid a visit to Scotland, and engaged with Constable for another novel, Mandeville, a tale of the times of Cromwell (1817), measured and stately in style, and abounding in that moral anatomy which the author delighted in, but often carried beyond truth and nature. We next find Godwin combating the opinions of Malthus upon Population (1820), and then setting about an elaborate History of the Commonwealth The great men of that era (4 vols 1824-28) were exactly suited to his taste, with their resolute energy of character, their triumphant hostility to monarchy, their republican enthusiasm, and Godwin evidently tasked strange notions of faith himself to produce authorities for all he advanced. He took up, as might be expected, strong opinions, but in striving to be accurate and minute, he became too specific and chronological-it was truly said that the History 'creeps and hitches in dates and authorities' In Cloudesley (1830) he found his new hero, like Caleb Williams, in humble life, and he set him against his patron, but there the parallel ends The elastic vigour, the verisimilitude, the crowding incidents, the absorbing interest, and the overwhelming catastrophe of Caleb Williams are not to be found in Cloudesley; there is even little delineation of character Instead we have fine English, 'clouds of reflections without any new occasion to call them forth, an expanded flow of words without a single pointed remark.' The next thing was a metaphysical treatise, Thoughts on Mau, &c , and his last (1834) a compilation, Lives of the Neciomancers In 1833 the revolutionary author accepted the sinecure post of yeoman-usher of the Exchequer, conferred on him by Earl Grey's Ministry, and in the house attached to this appointment, in New Palace Yard, he ended his long and laborious life on 7th April 1836 From Old St Pancras churchyard his body and Mary Wollstonecraft's were removed in 1851 to Bournemouth, where also rests Mrs Shelley

The Life of Godwin (1876), by Mr Kegan Paul, is a valuable if over-eulogistic biography of one who in truth was largely a blend of Micawber and Yet he unquestionably was one of the Pecksniff most remarkable and influential men of his times The boldness of his speculations and opinions, his vehemence of feeling, and his irrepressible outspokenness were curiously contrasted with his plodding habits, his imperturbable temper, and the obscure humdrum of his daily life. startling and astounding theories were propounded by him with undoubting confidence, and sentiments that, if reduced to action, would have overturned the whole framework of society, were complacently dealt out by their author as if they had merely formed an ordinary portion of a busy literary life Godwin never willingly destroyed a written line, and his biographer found a vast quantity of letters and manuscripts, some never opened from the day they were laid aside by Godwin's own hand years before his death. The correspondence includes letters from Charles Lamb, Coleridge, Shelley, Wordsworth, Scott, Mackintosh, Lady Caroline Lamb, Mrs Inchbald, and others. The Life shows Godwin's powerful influence on Shelley and Bulwer Lytton, but it was reserved for a Frenchman, M. Émile Legouis, to show in La Jeunesse de Wordsworth (1896, Eng. trans. 1897) that 'The Prelude' and 'The Borderers' were as strongly Godwinian as the 'Lyrical Ballads' were anti-Godwinian.

Caleb Williams, the most interesting and original of Godwin's novels, is altogether a work of extraordinary art and power It has the planness of narrative and the apparent reality of the fictions of Defoc or Swift Calch Williams, an intelligent young peasant, is employed as secretary and kindly treated by a sombre and mysterious gentleman named Talkland Half by chance and half from curiosity he discovers that his master has been guilty of a murder, for which he has allowed two innocent men to be hanged. His knowledge of this secret costs him a long and crucl persecution from Falkland, who at last has him arrested for Driven to bay, Williams at his trial dis closes the crime of his master, who dies of shame and despair, while the other is acquitted only to suffer agonies of remorse for sacrificing one who had been his benefactor

Of the other novels of Godwin, St Leon alone will probably descend to posterity in company with Caleb Williams, though Godwin's romances have all a strong family likeness If the impossible hypothesis on which St Leon is founded be admitted, then the subordinate incidents are natural and justly proportioned The possessor of the philosopher's stone is an interesting visionary -a French Falkland of the sixteenth century, and as unfortunate, for his miraculous gifts entail but misery on himself and bring ruin to his family Even exhaustless wealth is in itself no blessing, and this is the moral of the story The character of the heroic Marguerite, wife of Leon, is one of the author's finest delineations Bethlem Gabor is also a vigorous and striking sketch, though introduced too late in the novel to relieve flagging interest

From 'Caleb Williams'

I can conceive of no shock greater than that I received from the sight of Mr Falkland. His appearance on the last occasion on which we met had been haggard, ghost like, and wild, energy in his gestures, and frenzi in his aspect. It was now the appearance of a corpse. He was brought in, in a chair, unable to stand, fatigued and almost destroyed by the journey he had just taken. His visage was colourless, his limbs destitute of motion, almost of life. His head reclined upon his bosom, except that now and then he lifted it up, and opened his eyes with a languid glance, immediately after which he sank back into his former apparent insensibility

He seemed not to have three hours to hive. He had kept his chamber for several weeks, but the summons of the magistrate had been delivered to him at his bedside, his orders respecting letters and written papers being so peremptory that no one dared to disobey them. Upon reading the paper, he was seized with a very dangerous fit, but as soon as he recovered, he masted upon being conveyed, with all practicable expedition, to the place of appointment. I alkland, in the most helpless state, was still Falkland, firm in command, and capable to extort obedience from every one that approached him.

What a sight was this to me! Here was Falkland, solemnly brought before a magistrate to answer to a charge of murder Here I stood, having already declared myself the author of the charge, gravely and sacredly pledged to support it This was my situation, and thus situated I was called upon immediately to act. My whole frame shook. I would eagerly have consented that that moment should have been the last of my I, however, believed that the conduct now most indispensably incumbent on me was to lay the emotions of my soul naked before my hearers. I looked first at Mr Falkland, and then at the magistrate and attendants and then at Mr Talkland again. My voice I began 'Would to Goa was suffocated with agony it were possible for me to retire from this scene without uttering another word 1 I would brave the consequences -I would submit to any imputation of cowardice, falsehood, and proflighey, rather than add to the weight of misfortune with which Mr Falkland is overwhelmed But the situation, and the demands of Mr Fall land him self, forbid me. He in compassion for whose fallen state I would willingly forget every interest of my own, would compel ine to necuse, that he might enter upon his justification. I will confess every sentiment of my Mr Fallland well I nows-I affirm it in his presence-how unwillingly I have proceeded to the extremity. I have reverenced him, he was northy of reverence. From the first moment I saw him, I con ecived the most ardent admiration. He condescended to encourage me, I attached myself to him with the fullness of affection. He was unhappy, I exerted my self with youthful curiosity to discover the secret of his This was the beginning of mitfortune. What shall I say? He was indeed the murderer of Tyrrel He suffered the Hawkinses to be executed, knowing that they were innocent, and that he alone was guilty ' After successive surmises, after various indiscretions on my part, and indications on his, he at length confided to me at full the fatal tale! Mr Falkland I I most solemnly conjure you to recollect yourself! Did I ever prove myself unworthy of your confidence? The secret was a most painful burden to me it was the extremest folly that Ied me unthinkingly to gain possession of it, but I would have died a thousand deaths ruther than betray it. It was the jealousy of your own thoughts, and the weight that hung upon your mind, that led you to watch my motions, and conceive alarm from every particle of You began in confidence—nhi did you my conduct I fell at last into the not continue in confidence? hands of the miscreants. In this terrible situation I, for the first time, attempted, by turning informer, to throw the weight from miself Happily for me, the London magistrate listened to my tale with insolent contempt. I soon, and long, repented of my rushness, and rejoiced

I acknowledge that in various ways in my miscarriage Mr Falkland showed humanity towards me during this period. He would have prevented my going to prison at first, he contributed to my subsistence during my detention, he had no, have in the pursuit that had been set on foot against me he at length procured my dis charge when brought forward for trial. But a great part of his forbearance vas unknown to me, I supposed him to be my unrelenting pursuer I could not forget that, whoever heaped calamities on me in the sequel, they all originated in his forged accusation. The prosecution against me for felony was now at an end Why were not my sufferings permitted to terminate then, and I allowed to hide my weary head in some obscure yet tranquil retreat? Had I not sufficiently proved my con stancy and fidelity? Would not a compromise in this situation have been most wise and most secure? But the restless and jealous anxiety of Mr Fall land would not permit him to repose the least atom of confidence The only compromise that he proposed was, that, with my own hand, I should sign myself a villain. I refused this proposal, and have ever since been driven from place to place, deprived of peace, of honest fame, even of bread For a long time I persisted in the resolution that no emergency should convert me into the assailant In an evil honr I at last listened to my resentment and impatience, and the hateful mistake into which I fell has produced the present scene. I now see that mistal e in all its enormity. I am sure that if I had opened my heart to Mr Fall land, if I had told to him privately the tale that I have now been telling he could not have resisted my rea onable demand. After all his pre cautions, he must ulumately have depended upon my forbearance. Could he be sure that if I were at last worked up to disclose everything I kucw, and to enforce it with all the energy I could exert, I should obtain no credit? If he must in every case be at my mercy, in which mode ought he to have sought his safety-in con ciliation, or in inevorable cruelty? Mr Falkland is of a noble nature. Yes! in spite of the catastrophe of Tyrrel, of the miserable end of the Hawkinses, and of all that I have myself suffered, I affirm that he has qualities of the most admirable kind. It is therefore impossible that he could have resisted a frank and fervent expostulation, the frankness and the fervour in which the whole soul was poured out. I despaired while it was yet time to have made the just experiment, but my despair was criminal, was treason aguist the sovereignty of truth. I have told a plain and unadul terated tale. I came hither to curse, but I remain to bless. I came to accuse, but am compelled to applaud. I proclaim to all the vorld that Mr Talkland is a man worthy of affection and lindness, and that I am myself the basest and most odious of mankind! Never will I forgive myself the iniquity of this day The memory will always haunt me, and imbitter every hour of my existence. In thus acting, I have been a murderer-a cool, deliberate, unfeeling murderer I have said what my accursed precipitation has obliged me to say Death would with me as you please. I ask no favour be a Findness compared to what I feel "?

Such were the accents dictated by my remorse I poured them out with uncontrollable impetuosity, for my heart was pierced, and I was compelled to give vent to its anguish. Every one that heard me was petrified with astonishment. Every one that heard me was melted into tears I lies could not resist the ardour with which I praised the great qualities of Falkland, they manifested their sympathy in the tokens of my penitence

How shall I describe the feelings of this unfortunate man! Before I began he seemed sunk and debilitated, incapable of any strenuous impression When I men tioned the murder, I could perceive in him an involuntary shuddering, though it was counteracted, partly by the feebleness of his frame, and partly by the energy of his mind This was an allegation he expected, and he had endeavoured to prepare himself for it But there was much of what I said of which he had had no previous When I expressed the anguish of my mind, he seemed at first startled and alarmed lest this should be a new expedient to gain credit to my tale indignation against me was great for having retained all my resentment towards him, thus, as it might be, in the last hour of his existence. It was increased when he discovered me, as he supposed, using a pretence of liberality and sentiment to give new edge to my hos But as I went on, he could no longer resist saw my sincerity, he was penetrated with my grief and compunction. He rose from his seat, supported by the attendants, and—to my infinite astonishment—threw himself into my arms!

'Williams,' said he, 'you have conquered ! I see too late the greatness and elevation of your mind fess that it is to my fault, and not yours, that it is to the excess of jealousy that was ever burning in my bosom that I owe my ruin. I could have resisted any plan of malicious accusation you might have brought against But I see that the artless and manly story you have told has carried conviction to every hearer my prospects are concluded All that I most ardently desired is for ever frustrated. I have spent a life of the basest eruelty to cover one act of momentary vice, and to protect myself against the prejudices of my species I stand now completely detected My name will be con secrated to infamy, while your heroism, your patience, and your virtues will be for ever admired inflicted on me the most fital of all mischiefs, but I bless the hand that wounds me. And now '-turning to the magistrate—'and now do with me as you please am prepared to suffer all the vengeance of the law?

See, besides the Life by Mr Kegan Paul above ciled (1876), Hazint's Spirit of the Age (1825) Mr Leslie Siephen's English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876) and the Shelley literature generally, as well as the works named in the article below on Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin

Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin (1759-97), the protomartyr of the Rights of Women, was born at Hoxton of Irish extraction, the second Her father was a drunken ne'er of six children do weel who squandered £10,000, and was always shifting about. At nineteen Mary went out to earn her own livelihood, and for ten years was a companion at Bath, a schoolmistress at Newing ton Green, and governess in Lord Kingsborough's family at Mitchelstown, Dubhn, and Bristol Of those ten years the chief events were her mother's death (1780), the flight of a sister, with Mary's help, from a brutal husband (1784), and a visit to Lisbon to nurse a dying friend (1785) in 1788, about which time she gave up church going, she turned translator and literary adviser to Johnson, the London publisher, who the year before had paid her ten guineas for her Thoughts on the Education of Daughters In this capacity she became acquainted, not only with the literati of the day, but with reformers-Paine, Priestley, and the painter Fuseli. That acquaintance bore twofold fruit. On the one hand, in 1791, she produced her Answer to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, and in 1792 her Vindication of the Rights of Woman, a book, dedicated to Talleyrand, which made her both famous and infamous On the other hand, her friendship for Fuseli ripened into love, and 'to snap the chain of this association' (for Fuseli was a married man) she started alone for Paris in the winter There, as a witness of the 'Terror,' of 1792 she collected materials for her valuable but never-finished Historical and Moral View of the French Revolution (vol 1 1794), and there, in April 1793, she met Captain Gilbert Imlay, an American timber-merchant and author of a book on the western territory of the American Union. In April 1794 at Havre she bore him a daughter, Fanny, in November 1795, after a four months' visit to Scandinavia as his 'wife' and accredited agent, she tried to drown herself from Putney Imlay, whom she adored, had cruelly Bridge But soon she resumed her old deserted her tasks, soon (in nine months' time) she was hving, or rather not living, with Godwin, for both kept their separate lodgings in Somers In August They had first met in 1791 1797, five months after their marriage, she gave birth to a daughter, Mary, who became Shelley's second wife, in September she died (see the articles on Godwin and on Shelley)

The Vindication, whose text is the equality of the seves, is a curious medley of genius and turgidity, religion and over-outspokenness, it was years in advance of its age, if only in its advocacy of government day-schools. Among her other writings were Original Stories for Children (1791, illustrated by Blake), Letters written during a Short Residence in Sweden, Norvay, and Denmark (1796), and Posthumous Works (4 vols 1798), these last comprising The Wrongs of Woman or Maria, a Fragment, and the passionate Letters to Inlay

Mr Kegan Paul's edition of these Letters (1879) has a Memoir of her see also the Memoirs by Godwin (1798) and by Mrs Pennell ('Eminent Women series, 1885) The Vindication was reprinted with an introduction by Mrs Pennell in the Scott Library (1892).

Thomas Robert Malthus (1766-1834), author of the Essay on the Principle of Population, was born of good family at his father's estate near Dorking, became a Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, and in 1797 curate at Albury in Surrey In 1798 he published anonymously his famous Essay, of which in 1803 he brought out a greatly enlarged and altered edition. In it he maintained that the optimistic hopes of Rousseau and Godwin are rendered baseless by the natural tendency of population to increase faster than the means of subsistence. The only limit to its increase is the want of room and food. With man, the instinct of propagation is controlled by reason, but even in his case the ultimate check to population is the want of food, though there are both preventive and positive checks-the preventive being moral restraint or prophylactic methods The positive checks include unwholesome occupations, severe labour, extreme poverty, bad nursing, large towns, excesses of till kinds, diseases and epidemics, wars, plague, and famine. Malthus gives no sanction to the theories and practices currently known as An amiable and benevolent man, Malthusianism he suffered much misrepresentation and abuse at the hands of both revolutionaries and conserva-The problem had been handled by Franklin, Hume, and many other writers, but Malthus crystallised the views of those writers, and presented them in systematic form with elaborate proofs derived from history Darwin saw, 'on reading Malthus On Population, that natural selection was the inevitable result of the rapid increase of all organic beings,' for such ripid increase necessarily leads to the struggle for existence, and Mr H G Wells, most audacious of those who have a prophetic glimpse of the future reconstruction of social conditions, describes the  $\mathcal{L}ssay$  as the most 'shattering' book that ever has been or will be written In 1804 Malthus married happily, and next year was appointed Professor of Political Economy and Modern History in the East India college at Haileybury, a post which he occupied He wrote other two important till his death works, An Inquiry into the Nature and Progress of Rent (1815), largely unticipating Ricardo, and Principles of Political Economy (1820) Malthus states part of his thesis in the first chapter of the Essay

It may safely be pronounced, therefore, that popula tion, when unchecked, goes on doubling itself every twenty five years, or increases in a geometrical ratio

The rate according to which the productions of the earth may be supposed to increase, it will not be so easy to determine. Of this, however, we may be perfectly certain, that the ratio of their increase must be totally of a different nature from the ratio of the increase of population

That we may be the better able to compare the increase of population and food, let us make a supposition which, without pretending to accuracy, is clearly more favourable to the power of production in the earth than any experience we have had of its qualities will warrant

Let us suppose that the yearly additions which might be made to the former average produce, instead of decreasing, which they certainly would do, were to remain the same, and that the produce of this island might be increased every twenty five years, by a quantity equal to what it at present produces. The most enthu siastic speculator cannot suppose a greater increase than this. In a few centuries it would make every acre of land in the island like a garden

If this supposition be applied to the whole earth, and if it be allowed that the subsistence for man which the earth affords might be increased every twenty five years by a quantity equal to what it at present produces, this will be supposing a rate of increase much greater than we can imagine that any possible exertions of mankind could male it

It may be fairly pronounced, therefore, that, considering the present average state of the earth, the means of subsistence, under circumstances the most favourable to human industry, could not possibly be made to increase faster than in an arithmetical ratio

The necessary effects of these two different rates of increase, when brought together, will be very striking Let us call the population of this island eleven millions, and suppose the present produce equal to the easy support of such a number. In the first twenty five years the population would be twenty two milhons, and the food being also doubled, the means of subsistence would be equal to this increase. In the next twenty five years the population would be forty four millious, and the means of subsistence only equal to the support of thirty three millions In the next period the population would be eighty eight millions, and the means of subsistence just equal to the support of half of that number the conclusion of the first century the population would be a hundred and seventy six millions, and the means of subsistence only equal to the support of fifty five millions, leaving a population of a hundred and twenty one millions totally unprovided for

Faking the whole earth, instead of this island, cmi gration would of course be excluded, and, supposing the present population equal to a thousand millions, the human species would increase as the numbers 1, 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, 64, 128, 256, and subsistence as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 In two centuries the population would be to the means of subsistence as 256 to 9, in three centuries as 4096 to 13, and in two thousand years the difference would be almost incalculable.

In this supposition no limits whatever are placed to the produce of the earth. It may increase for ever, and be greater than any assignable quantity, yet still the power of population being in every period so much superior, the increase of the human species can only be kept down to the level of the means of subsistence by the constant operation of the strong law of necessity, acting as a check upon the greater power.

George Alexander Stevens (1710-84), author of A Lecture upon Heads, dramatic sketches of contemporary follies, and of the fanious song, 'Cease, rude Boreas, blustering railer,' was bred a London tradesman, became an unsuccessful actor, and secured a precurious hyelihood by writing poems, poor dramas, burlesques, skits, and 'humorous miscellanies,' and by giving single-handed 'entertainments,' a department of song, speech, and extravaganza in which he was a pioneer. In a collection of songs by various hands published by him, 'Hearts of Oak' was first definitely ascribed to Garrick

Charles Dibdin (1745-1814), writer and com poser of many famous songs, was born at South ampton, early attracted notice by his singing, and, still a boy, composed an opercita, The Shepherd's Artifice, which was produced at Covent Garden in 1762 He subsequently lived an unsettled life as an actor and composer of stage music, and on occasion sang and accompanied himself on his own instrument. He quarrelled frequently and violently with patrons like Garrick, made himself impossible under Sheridan's management at Drury Lane, neglected his first wife, and cherished irregular relations with various other women In 1788 he commenced a series of musical entertainments (sometimes diversified with equestrian feats), which acquired great celebrity, the first was entitled The Whim of the Moment He retired in 1805 with a pension of £200 granted him two years before, it, was withdrawn in 1807, when he returned to public life with unfortunate financial results Dilxlin v rote nearly a hundred sea-songs, 'the solace of sailors in long voyages, in storms, and in battles'-among the best 'Poor Jack' and 'Tom Bowling,' one of the first, 'Blow high, blow low,' sung in Dibdin's piece called Scraglio in 1776, was brought to birth during a gale on the return voyage from Calais, whither he had fled to escape a debtor's prison Seamen are wont to say it is only too obvious that his sea songs are songs written about the sea and about seamen, not by one of themselves, but by a typical landsman Another famous song of the mexhaustible versewriter is 'The Anchorsmiths' He also wrote nearly seventy dramatic pieces

Tom Bowling

Here, a sheer hulk, hes poor Tom Bowling,
The darling of our crev,
No more he'll hear the tempest howling
For Death has broached him to His form was of the manhest beanty,
His heart was kind and soft
Faithful below he did his duty,
But now he's gone aloft

Tom never from his v ord departed,
His virtues were so rare,
His friends were many and true hearted
His Poll was kind and fair

And then he'd sing so blithe and jolly,
Ali, many's the time and oft'
But mirth is turned to melancholy,
I or I om is gone aloft.

Yet shall poor Tom find pleasant weather, When He, who all commands, Shall give, to call life's crew together,
The word to pipe all hands.
Thus Death, who kings and tars despatches,
In vain Tom's life has doffed
For though his body's under hatches,
His soul is gone aloft

Poor Jack.

Go, patter to lubbers and swabs, do you see,

I tight water boat and good sea room give me,

Bout danger, and fear, and the like,

And it a nt to a little I'll strile
Though the tempest top gallant mast smack smooth should smite,
And shiver each splinter of wood,
Clear the deek, stow the vards, and bouse everything tight,
And under reefed foresail we'll send Avast' nor don't think me a milksop so soft,
To be taken for trifles aback,
For they say there is a Providence sits up aloft,

I heard our good chaplain palaver one day
About souls, heaven, mercy, and such,
And, my timbers ' what hingo he'd coil and belay,
Why, 'twis just all as one as High Dutch,
For he said how a sparrow can't founder, dive see,
Without orders that come down below,
And a many fine things that proved clearly to me
That providence takes us in tow
For, says he, do you mind me, let storms e'er so oft Take the top sails of sailors aback
There's a sweet little cherub that sits up aloft, Fo keep watch for the life of poor Jack 1

John Collins, actor entertainer, and songwriter, was humbly born at Bath, was bred a staymaker but became a fairly successful actor; and from 1775 till the end of the century gave in London and elsewhere popular entertainments which were a medley of anecdotes, theatrical reminiscences, jokes, mock-heroic speeches, sentiments, and caricature of Scotsmen, Inshmen, and Welshmen He died in 1808, having for some years been part-proprietor of a Birmingham newspaper, in which his songs (some of them represented in anthologies like Palgrave's and Locker-Lampson's) were originally published. One 'truly noble poem,' To-morrow, was obviously suggested by Walter Pope's Old Marks Wish (see page 98)

To-morrow

In the downhill of life, when I find I'm declining, May my lot no less fortunate be Than a snug elbow-chair can afford for reclining
And a cot that o'erlooks the wide sea,

With an ambling pad point to pace over the last n, While I carol as ay idle sorrost, And blithe as the lark that each day hads the dawn, Look fore and with hope for to morro.

With a porch at my door, both for shelter and shade too, As the sunshine or rain may presnil,

And a small spot of ground for the use of the spale too, With a barn for the use of the flail

A cow for my dairy, a dog for my game
And a purse when a friend wants to borroy,
I ll en y no nabob his riches or fame,

Nor what honours await him to morro

From the block northern blast may my cot be completely Secure 1 by a neighbouring hill

And at might may repo e steal up in me more sweetly. By the sound of a murmuring rill. And a hile peace and plenty I find at my board, . With a heart free from siel ness and sorror, . With my friends may I share what to day may afford,

And when I at last must throw off this frail covering Which I've worn for three score years and ten,

On the brank of the grave I'll not seek to keep hovering,

Nor my thread wish to spin o'er agun

And let them spread the table to morrow

But my face in the glass I il serenely survey,
And with smiles count each wrinkle and furrow,
As this old worn out stuff which is threadbare to day,

May become everlasting to morrow

Thomas Worton (1764-1838), drimatist, wis born in Durham and quitted Lincoln's Inn for i play writing. For thirty five years he lived at Pangbourn near Reading, and finally settled in London, where he died Between his first drama, Columbus (1792), and his musical farce, The Internables (1828), he produced some five and twenty pieces, besides others written in collaboration with his son. Many of them were very successful, and had parts in them which became Speed the Plougn, acted it Covent Garden forty one times in 1798 and repeatedly revived, is a five act comedy with some of the s orst trults of transpontine melodrums, it is ill constructed, and the incidents are not led up to. the personages behave in an incredibly irrational manner, and often snivel drivel and talk fustion But it contains some happy strokes, and had the luck of introducing Mrs Grundy to the world the play she does not specifically appear in the character the world has insisted in associating with her name. She is by no means the meanna tion of suspicion and consoriousness of narrovmindedness and philistine prejudice contrary slic is simply the neighbour farmer's worths wife of whom Dame Ashfield is just a bttle jealous. Even at the next mention of her name, Mrs Grundy is simply a respected neighbour, not a prude or hypocrite

Ash I tell ye, I zee'd un gi' Susan a letter, an' I dan't

Dame Nor I,—If shame should come to the poor child —I say, Tummus, what would Mrs Grundy say then?

Ash Dom Mrs Grundy, what would my poor wold heart say? but I be bound it be all innocence.

When the brave farmer and his wife refuse to turn out of their house, at the wicked baronet's command, the (unrevealed) son of the baronet's brother and victim, the wicked baronet proceeds to sell up the farmer, who is in his debt. The farmer and his wife talk over the unpleasant prospect.

Ash Drabbit it! what can he do? he can't send us to gaol Why, I have corn will sell for half the money I do owe 'un—and han't I cattle and sheep?—deadly lean, to be sure—and han't I a thumping zilver watch, almost as big as thy head? and Dame here ha' got —How many silk gowns have thee got, Dame?

Dame Three, Tummis—and sell them all, and I'll go to church in a stuff one, and let Mrs Grundy turn up her nose as much as she pleases

By a well-nigh miraculous intervention the tide turns, and a wealthy suitor asks the farmer's daughter in marriage.

Ash Drabbit, I shall walk in the road all day to zee Sue ride by in her own coach

Susan You must ride with me, father

Dame I say, Tuinmus, what will Mrs Grundy say then?

And a little farther on

Ash Bless her, how nicely she do trip it away with the gentry '

Dame And then, Tummus, think of the wedding

Ash [Reflecting] I declare I shall be just the zame ever—maybe, I may but a smartish bridle, or a zilver backy stopper, or the like o' that

Dame [Afart] And then, when we come out of elurch, Mrs Grundy will be standing about there

Ash I shall shake hands agreeably wi' all my friends [Afart]

Dame [Apart]. Then I just look at her in this manner

Ash [Afarl, and bowing towards centre] How dost do, Peter? Ah, Dick' glad to zee thee, wi' all my zoul' Dame [Afarl] Then, with n kind of half curtsey, I shall— [They bump against each other

Ash What an wold fool thee beest, dame! Come along, and behave pratty, doe [Exeunt

Frederic Reynolds (1764-1841), produced about a hundred plays, tragic or comic, of which some twenty were popular for a time at least He was the son of a London merchant, and was educated at Westminster School, but he left law for dramatic work, IVerter (1785), based on Goethe, being his first piece. But the bulk of his work was in comedy, and his most successful play was The Dramatist (1789) In The Caravan, produced by Sheridan at Drury Lane, a live dog was made to save a child from drowning in real water, and, as Sheridan said, saved the theatre too, when at a crisis, by its success. Reynolds published an Autobiography in 1826

John Tobin (1770-1804) was an unlucky dramatist, who spent weary years in trying to get his plays accepted, and seeing them successwely rejected till the very year of his death, when his Honey Moon, his fourteenth piece, was not merely accepted at Drury Lane, but secured a success it maintained for twenty years Tobin, born in Salisbury, was articled to a solicitor in Lincoln's Inn, and practised law there while pro-The Honey Moon, a comedy ducing his plays mostly in verse, was translated into French by Charles Nodier, other comedies, in prose or verse, were The Curfew, The Connoisseur, and The Faro Table A volume of his plays was published in 1820, with a Life by Miss Benger

William Barnes Rhodes (1772-1826), born in Leeds, became a chief teller in the Bank of England, and is barely remembered in literature as the author of a once popular burlesque, Bombastes Furioso, for of the many who know the title of the piece and have some notion of the character of the mouthing braggart who is its hero, comparatively few know anything about the author. The title is obviously a play on Orlando Furioso, and the design is similar to that of Carey's Chronon-hotonthologos, though the plot is, if possible, sillier audience could believe it to have been Shake speare's. As the play proceeded, the torrent of ridiculous bombast overtaxed the endurance of the audience, and when Kemble gravely declaimed—

And when this solemn mockers is o'er, the pit rose and closed the scene with shrieks of So inipudent a fabrication—made the laughter subject of James Payn's The Talk of the Town in 1885-was perhaps never before thrust upon public notice The young adventurer, foiled in this effort, attempted to earn distinction as a novelist and dramatist, but utterly fuled. In 1796 he published a confession of the Shakespearean forgery, An Authentic Account of the Shaksperian MSS, expanded in 1805 into Confessions, in which he makes this declaration 'I solemnly declare, first, that my father was perfectly unrequrinted with the whole affair, believing the papers most firmly the productions of Shalespeare Secondly, that I am myself both the author and writer, and had no aid from any soul living, and that I should never have gone so far, but that the world praised the papers so much, and thereby flattered my vanity. Thirdly, that any publication which may appear tending to prove the manuscripts genuine, or to contradict what is here stated, is false, this being the true account' The old man, whose credit was seriously compromised by the impostures, plaintively professed till his death in 1800 to believe in the whole of the documents, and to deny that his son could have written the plays Of the half dozen novels (The Woman of Teeling, Gondes the Monk, Rissio, &c.), ballads and narratine poems, saures and political squibs, and dramas such as Mutius Scavola, it may at least be said that they showed sufficient facility and faculty to prove that he had all the mental equipment necessary to produce the forgeries He wrote a Life of Napoleon, translated Voltaire's Pucelle, and did a vast amount of precarious and miscellaneous hackwork, but his work brought him little credit and no success, and never attracted a tithe of the notice that attended his youthful exploits

Samuel Ireland, still believing in their authenticity, published Vortigern and Henry II, but not in the 'original' spelling, in 1799. The following speech by the hero was considered the 'most sublime passage' in Vortigern

Vortigern Time was, alas! I needed not this spur But here's a secret and a stinging thorn, [science! That wounds my troubl'd nerves O! conscience! con When thou didst cry, I strove to stop thy mouth, By boldly thrusting on thee dire ambition Then did I think myself, indeed, a god! But I was sore deceiv'd, for as I pass'd, And travers'd in proud triumph the Basse court, There I saw death, clad in most lindeous colours A sight it was, that did appal my soul, Yea, curdled thick this mass of blood within me Full fifty breathless bodies struck my sight, And some, with gaping mouths, did seem to mock me, While others, smiling in cold death itself,

Scoffingly bade me look on that, which soon Would wrench from off my brow this sacred crown, And make me, too, a subject like themselves. Subject I to whom? To thee, O' sovereign death! That hast for the domain this world immense, Churchyards and charnel houses are thy liaunts, And hospitals thy sumptuous palaces, and when thou wouldst be merry, thou dost choose the grandy chamber of a dying I ing. Oh, then thou dost wide ope thy bony jaws, And with rude laughter and fantasite triels, Thou clapp'st the rattling fingers to thy sides, With itsy hand thou tak'st him by the feet, And upward so till thou dost reach his heart, And wrap'st him in the cloal of lasting night

John Taylor (1750-1826), founder of the literary family of 'the Paylors of Norwich,' was in no wise connected with William Taylor, also 'of Norwich,' the promoter of German studies in England John Liylor was a yarn-factor in Norwich, a writer of many hymns used in the Unitarian churches, and an advanced Liberal, who wrote one famous song, 'The Trumpet of His wife, Susanna Cook, was also a woman of strong character and many accomplishments, the friend of many eminent men and women Among their seven children were several authors -one of them, Sarah, John Austin's wife. This John Taylor was descended from the famous John Taylor (1694-1761), a Dissenting clergyman who taught a modified form of Trinitarianism and as an opponent of Calvinism and the orthodox doctrine of the atonement, exercised a wide and permanent influence in England, Scotland, and New England From 1733 he was a pastor in Norwich, from 1757 a lecturer in the Warrington Academy [Israc Taylor and his family were of 'the Taylors of Ongar']

William Taylor, 'of Norwich' (1765–1836), 15 credited with having given a great impulse to the study of German literature in England, before his time hardly known save in connection with some dramas such as Kotzebue's, and some little read translations from Klopstock and Gessner did much to show his countrymen that German was a great literature, made the study of it incum bent on the learned, and so became the spiritual midwife of Scott and his contemporaries was the son of a Unitarian merchant, entered his father's counting-house in 1779, and sent next year to the Continent, mastered French, Italian, The French Revolution and German (1780-88) indoctrinated him with democratic ideas and began the rum of his father's business-completed by the American troubles and other disasters, and Taylor turned to literature. He introduced to English readers the poetry and drama of Germany, mainly through criticisms and translations in periodicals, collected in his Historic Survey of German Poetry The first fruits were his verse trans-(1828-30) lations of Bürger's Lenote, Lessing's Nathan, and Goethe's Iphigenia in Tauris, all written in 1790.

Pre had already translated Lenore m 1782, but this version was not published till 1795, and it was Taylor's translation, read by Mrs Barbauld in Edinburgh and repeated to him by a friend who had been present, that so stirred Scott-'made him a poet,' Scott said-and sent him too to Tales of York was another book of translations, mainly stories, and another outcome of this miscellaneous work was English Synonyms Discriminated (1813), where, for example, he draws between Fancy and Imagination the distinction Wordsworth adopted and worked out The mannerisms of his prose and his word-coinings led Mackintosh to speak of the 'Taylorian language.' He was advanced in politics, more advanced or even paradoxical in theology Borrow's Lavengro describes his philosophy, his scepticism, and his inveterate smoking

His correspondence vita Southey, Scott Machintosh Godwin and others is given in the Life of him by Robberds (1843), and see Georg Herzfeld, Taylor von Norwick, eine Studie (1897).

Vicesimus Knox (1752-1851) earned a title to commemoration in this v ork as compiler of the long-famous Elegant Extracts, his sermons, his essays, his treatises on Liberal Education and on The Lord's Supper, and his aggressive Wing Spirit of Despotism, 'dedicated to' and levelled at Castlereagh, are all equally forgotten. The son of a master in Merchant Taylors' School, afterwards headmaster of Tunbridge School, he was educated at Merchant Taylors' and St John's Oxford, and from 1778 to 1812 held the post at Tunbridge vacated by his father He was also rector of two small livings in Essex, but from 1812 lived mainly in London The first Elegant Extracts bore to be 'useful and entertaining passages in prose selected for the improvement of scholars at classical and other schools in the art of speaking, in reading, thinking, composing, and the conduct of life,' and appeared in a quarto in 1783, the poetical series appeared in 1789, and the Elegant Epistles, a 'selection of familiar and amusing letters,' followed in 1790 The three series were constantly reprinted, separately or jointly (often in six volumes, sometimes with a select series of sermons appended), on till about the middle of the nineteenth century In spite of the name, the selections constituted a valuable and most serviceable work. Even in their own day they must have been regarded as on the v hole more improving than amusing, one of the things that entertains a modern reader is the vay in which he finds, amidst extracts from Dr Johnson, Dr Parr, Mr Gibbon, &c., others described simpliciter as being by Moses, David, and Job-knors plan comprising passages from the authorised version of Scripture.

Francis Douce (1757-1834), an eccentric and learned antiquare, born in London, was some time keeper of the British Museum MSS, he deserves mention here mainly for his Illustrations of Statespeare (1807) and a book on The Dance of Deatl (1833) He bequeathed his splendid collection of books, MSS, prints, and coins to the Bodleran, his curiosities to Sir Samuel R. Meyrick, and his letters and commonplace books to the British Museum in a cliest not to be opened till 1900. When the seal on the latter was solemnly broken and the papers examined in May of 1900, the documents were found to contain no important mysteries and to have little interest or value of any kind.

William Sotheby (1757-1833), son of an officer of good family, was born in London and bred at Harrow and the Military Academy of When stationed with his regiment at Edinburgh he became Sir Walter Scott's friend, and when he retired from the army, welcomed Scott to his house in London, and made him known to many of his intimates, who included Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron, Rogers, Moore, and all the brilliant literary circles they repre Byron afterwards called Sotheby's works trash, and said he 'imitated everybody, and occasionally surpassed his models' Sotheby published Poems in 1790, secured the esteem of Wieland by a translation of Oberon (1798), and when his version of Virgil's Georgies appeared, vas acclaimed by Jeffrey and Christopher North as author of the best translation in the language. None of his dramas Oleron, Julian and Agues, or The Confession, Llewelyn the Great, and the rest (some nine in all, in blank verse), were succcssful, and his odes, epics, poetical epistles, &c, 'On the Battle of the Nile,' on 'Saul,' 'Constance of Castille' (in imitation of the Lady of the Lake), met with little public favour. His last considerable enterprise, a translation of the Iliad and the Odyssey in rhyming couplets, followed Popc's model, but was perhaps less Homeric.

Richard Sharp (1759-1835), commonly called 'Conversation Sharp,' was born in Newfoundland, and made a fortune in London as a West India nicrchant and hat manufacturer After mingling in the distinguished society of London, from the days of Johnson and Burke to those of Byron, Rogers, and Moore, in 1834 he published—at first anonymously—a volume of Letters and Essays in Press and Verse Rogers thought it hardly equal to Sharp's reputation, Maclintosh however, termed Sharp the best critic he had ever known Sharp was in Parliament off and on from 1806 to 1827, and left £250,000 realised in business. The Essays show I-nowledge of the world and cound sense, as may be seen from these maxims and reflections by finding valuable ores in his Cuthness territories, but, alas I it was found he had 'salted' the shafts with rich metal from Cornwall—thus doubtless giving Scott a hint for Dousterswivel. He was engaged in presumably more honest mining enterprises in the wild west of Donegal when fever carried him off in 1794.

He had known the veritable Freiherr Karl Friedrich Hieronymus von Munchhausen (1720-97), a veteran who had in the Russian service made several campaigns against the Turks, and at his castle of Bodenwerder, in Hanover, had entertained relays of friends with such marvellous tales of his single-handed provess that 'Munch hausiaden' became a name for exploits of a fabulous height of achievement. Some few actual reminiscences of Munchhausen's talk-for the swindling mineralogist had been the garrulous old gentleman's guest-Raspe mixed with old crusted facetiæ from time-honoured German jest-books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, tales of wholly impossible and frankly incredible feats of ingenuity, dexterity, valour, and eccentricity, and so produced a 'potboiler' of fifty small pages in 1785, which, like the second edition next year, contained but five (II-VI)—but by far the bestof the thirty-four chapters which appear in later editions—the rest, later added, being by quite other and English penmen unknown The original stories are pure extravaganza, without direct or intentional satire, and are written in English which has no distinction or charm, but is so good as to suggest a native reviser Of the additional chapters, those down to Chapter XX appeared in a third edition in 1786, these, with a later supplement and a sequel constituting a second volume (1793), are largely deliberate burlesque, and intro duce reminiscences of Lucian's Vera Historia, and saturical parodies or allusions to Bruce's Travels, Johnson's Tour in the Hebrides, Cook's Voyages, and numerous books of travel and adventure, with more or less facetious references to Mont golfier's and Lunardi's ballooning and other contemporary events of public notoriety successive additions Raspe seems to have had no part or responsibility

The book has passed through innumerable editions, and has been illustrated by Rowlandson, Crowquill, Cruikshank, Strang, and others fiftli edition had the honour of being done into German, with additions by no less a person than the author of Lenore, and for long Burger was supposed to be the original author assumption, long current, was that Raspe was the author, but had written the work at first in German A special German continuation in three volumes was published in 1800, there have also been French, Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, Danish, Russian, and Magyar translations Indeed, few books of its sort or of any sort have been more industriously circulated and made known flattering imitations of the manner have from time ! to time been produced in England and America, down to the days of Artemus Ward and Mark Twain

See the admirable edition with elaborate introduction by Mr Seccombe (1895) and for fuller details as to the origin of the original tales see Elissens (11th) German edition (1873 reprinted 1890) and Müller Fraureuth's Die Deutschen Lügendichtungen bis auf Münchhausen (1881)

Isaac D'Israeli, author of the Currosities of Literature and a long series of kindred works and compilations, was born at Enfield in May 1766, the only son of a Jewish merchant whose ancestors had been persecuted by the Inquisition out of Spain and had found a refuge in the Venetian republic. After some abortive poetical efforts, he in 1791 published the first volume of his Curiosities of Literature, a second was added in 1793, and a third in 1817 A second series in three volumes was published in 1823-34 During the progress of this magnum opus of the author, he issued essays on Anecdotes, on the Manners and Genius of the Literary Character, a volume of Miscellanies or Literary Recreations, and several volumes of novels and romances long since forgotten. ## Shenstone's 'School-Mistress'

The immitable 'School Mistress' of Shenstone is one of the feherties of genius, but the purpose of this poem has been entirely misconcerved. Johnson, neknowledge ing this charming effusion to be 'the most pleasing of Shenstone's productions,' observes, 'I know not what elaim it has to stand among the moral works' The truth is, that it was intended for quite a different class by the nuthor, and Dodsley, the editor of his works, must have strangely blundered in designating it 'a moral poem' It may be classed with a species of poeiry till recently rare in our language, and which we sometimes find among the Italians, in their rime piacevoli, or poesie burlesche, which do not always consist of low humour in a frectious style with jingling rhimes, to which we attach our idea of a burlesque poem. There is a refined species of ludierous poetry, which is comic yet tender, lusors jet elegant, and with such a blending of the serious and the facetious that the result of such a poem may often, among its other pleasures, produce a sort of ambiguity, so that we do not always know whether the writer is laughing at his subject, or whether he is to be laughed at Our admirable Whistlecraft me this fate! 'The School Mistre's' of Shenstone has been admired for its simplicity and tenderness, not for its exquisitely hidderons turn

This discovery I owe to the good fortune of possessing the original edition of "The School Mistress," which the author printed under his own directions, and to his own fines. To this piece of "ludicrous poetrs," as he call it, "lest it should be mistal en," he added a ludicrous index, purely to show fools that I am in jet! But the fool, his subsequent editor, thought proper to suppress this amusing "ludicrous index, and the consequence is, as the poet foresaw, that his num has been "nustaken"

The whole history of this poem, and this edition, may be traced in the printed correspondence of Shenstone Our poet had pleased hunself by ornamenting 'A six penny pamphlet' with certain seemly designs of his, and for which he came to town to direct the engraver, he appears also to have intended accompanying it with "The deformed portruit of my old school dame, Sarah I loyd ' The frontispiece to this first edition represents the 'Thitched house' of his old school mistress, and before it is the 'birch tree, with 'the sun setting and gilding the scene. He writes on thir, 'I have the first slicet to correct upon the table. I have laid uside the thoughts of frine a good deal in the unpromising scheme and fix them upon the Iralskip which is engrula, the red letter which I propose, and the fruit piece which you see being the most seemly ornaments of the fir t sypenny pumphlet that was ever so highly honoured I shall mear the same reflection with Obilly, of laving nothing good but my decorations. I expect that in your neighbourhood and in Warwickshire there should lx twenty of my poems sold. I print it myself. I nm pleased with Mynde's engravings

On the publication Shenstone has opened his idea on its poetical characteristic. "I dare say it must be very in correct, for I have added eight or ten stanzas within this fortnight. But inaccuracy is more excusable in ludicrois poetry than in any other. If it strikes any it must be mercly people of taste, for people of wit without taste which comprehends the larger part of the critical tribe, will unavoidably despise it. I have been it some pains to recover myself from A. Philips misfortune of mere childishness, "Little charm of placed mien," &c I have added a ludierous index purely to show (fools) that I am in jest, and my motto, "O, que sol habitabiles illustrat oras, maxime principium l' is calculated for the same purpose I on emnot concerne how large the number is of those that mistake burlesque for the very foolish ness it exposes, which observation I made once at the rcherrsal, at Tom Thumb, at Chrononhotonthologos, all which are pieces of elegant humour. I have some mind to pursue this caution further, and advertise it "The School Mistress, &c, a very children performance every body knows" (nevorum more) But if a person serioush calls this, or rather burlesque, a childish or low species of poetry, he says wrong. For the most regular and formal poetry may be called trifling, folly, and weakness in comparison of what is written with a more manly spirit in ridicule of it '

This first edition is now lying before me, with its splendid 'red letter,' its 'scemly designs,' and, what is more precious, its 'Index'

William Blake.

poet, painter, and mystic, was born at 28 Broad Street, Golden Square, London, on 28th November He was of Irish extraction Early in the eighteenth century a certain John O Neil married Ellen Blake, a shebeen-keeper at Rathmines, Dublin, and adopted her name, whereupon his son James (the offspring of a previous union) also took the name of Blake. James had married and settled as a hosier in London when William was born. He was an imaginative child, but his visionary bent escaped the schoolmaster, and he dreamed through his boyhood in a mystical rapture, screaming when 'God put His head to the window,' seeing angels in a tree at Peckham Rye, and being beaten by his mother for having encountered Ezekiel sitting under a green bough No poet or prophet ever saw the pageantry of subjective vision more objectively than Blake natural seer, his life was one luminous symbol from birth to death. To him nothing was real but the unreal, nothing unreal but the real 'Behind, the sea of time and space rours and follows He who keeps not right onward is lost.' From youth to age Blake heard the roar of that sea and kept right onward, a 'mental traveller' clothed with supernatural toil

At ten the impulse of utterince drove him to the study of drawing. He haunted print-shops and salerooms, instinctively preferring Raphael, Michelangelo, and Dürer to the elegant medi ocrities then admired In his twelfth year he began to grope after utterance in poetry as well as in painting, and thenceforward riged in him a fierce duel between the two arts. In his fourteenth year he was apprenticed to Basire, an engraver, at whose shop he caught a glimpse of Oliver Goldsmith Basire sent him to make drawings in Westminster Abbey, where Gothic art fed his hungering imagination with its 'living form' His apprenticeship ended in 1778, and for n while he studied at the Royal Academy, but soon rebelling against academic fetters, he began to earn his livelihood by engraving for book sellers, a pursuit which won for him the friend ship of Stothard and Flaaman

In 1782 he married Catherine Sophia Boucher, a comely brunette, then in her twenty first vear Of humble station, she was so illiterate that she could not sign the Parish Register, but she had rarer qualities which made her, in Mr Swinburne's phrase, 'about the most perfect wife on record' The young couple took lodgings at 23 Green Street, Leicester Fields About this time Flayman introduced Blake to Mrs Mathew, a bluestocking and patroness of youthful artists. At her house, 27 Rathbone Place, Blake found himself in a pinchbeck Philistia, but Mrs Mathew had some power of recognising genius, and persuaded her husband to join Flaxman in hearing the cost of privately printing the thin octavo volume, Poetical

Sketches, which was the first blast blown against the Jericho of eighteenth century materialism. In such lyrics as 'My silks in fine array' and the 'Mad Song' Blake recaptured the lost Elizabethan music. The lines 'To the Evening Star' fore shadowed the renascence of verbal glamour in twelve magical words

Speak silence with thy glimmering eves And wish the dusk with silver

In that great dramatic fragment, Edward the Third, Blake soared into prophecy, foretelling in majestic images the imperial destiny of England a hundred years before the imperial idea fired the popular imagination

The flowing waves

Of Time come rolling o er my breast, he said,

And my heart labours with futurity

Our sons shall rule the empire of the sea,

Their mighty wings shall stretch from east to west,

Their nest is in the sea, but they shall roam

Like eagles for their prey

Our sons shall rise from thrones in joy, each one Buckling his armour on, Morning shall be Prevented by the gleaming of their swords, And Livening hear their songs of victory Freedom shall stand upon the cliffs of Albion, Casting her blue eyes over the green ocean, Or, towering, stand upon the roaring waves, Stretching her mighty spear o'er distant lands, While with her eagle wings she covereth Fair Albion's shore and all her families

The book is dated 1783, but apparently was never published, the whole impression having been pre sented to Blake. What he did with it is a mystery That a copy found its way to Coloridge, Words worth, Cowper, or Burns seems improbable, but there is no doubt that Blake was 'the first that ever burst into that silent sea' on which our poetry has voyaged ever since. The Poetical Stetchis were all written between 1768 and 1777 Cowper's Poems were published in 1782 Burns issued his Poims in the Scottish Dialect in 1786 Words worth and Coleridge published the Lyrical Ballads in 1798, fifteen years after Blake's Poetical Sketches, nine years after his Songs of Imocence, and four verrs after his Songs of Experience It is possible that Coleridge and Wordsworth had seen the Songs of Innocence and Experience before they wrote the Lirical Ballads, for Blake was not unknown, and his poems were purchased and prized by literary and artistic connoisseurs 1784 Nollekens Smith heard Blake 'read and sing several of his poems' to airs composed by himself These tunes were sometimes 'most singularly beautiful,' and were 'noted down by musical professors' Charles Lamb may well have been the link that united Blake and Coleridge. Robinson, writing in 1825 to Miss Wordsworth, says 'Coleradge has visited Blake, and I am told talks finely about him? But Coloridge may have known the poetry long before he visited the poet.

Whatever may have been the precise moment of their meeting, there is no doubt that the three stars of the romantic renascence mingled their Blake's poems 'excited great interest in Wordsworth,' who finely said that they were 'undoubtedly the production of insane genius, but there is something in the madness of this man that interests me more than the sanity of Lord Byron and Walter Scott' When Crabb Rohinson in 1825 read to Blake Wordsworth's Intimations of Im mortality, the stanza ending with the lines,

> Whither is fled the visionary gleam? Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

'threw him almost into an hysterical rapture.' It is significant that in Wordsworth's Lycumg II alk and Descriptive Sketches (1793), and in Coleridge's Borderers (1795), there is no trace of the romantic wonder that revealed itself in the Lyrical Ballads Was it Blake's poetry that wrought the transfiguration? On the whole, it seems possible, although decisive evidence on the point is not available.

In 1784, his father having died, and his eldest brother having succeeded to the hosier's business at 28 Broad Street, Blake set up shop next door (No 27) as printseller and engraver, in partnership with James Parker, Blake's youngest brother, Robert, living with him as an apprentice. 1787 Robert died, the partnership was dissolved, and Blake went to lodge at 28 Poland Street While pondering over the problem of finding a publisher for his poems, his beloved brother appeared to him in a dream, and revealed a somewhat obvious solution of the difficulty. The process was a kind of relief etching. The poems and designs were outlined on copper with an impervious liquid The rest of the plate was then exten away with an acid, so that the out line was left in relief. After the impressions had been tinted, they were done up in boards by Mrs Blake Ilius with their own hands the poet and his wife made every part of that lyrical missal, the Songs of Innocence In the same year (1789) Blike engraved in like fashion The Bool of Thel, the first of his prophetic books. A year later he produced The Varriage of Heaven and Hell In 1791 the first book of The French Revolution was issued by Johnson the bookseller, at whose shop Blike forgathered with Godwin, Tom Paine, and Fuseli, his republican zeal leading him to flaunt the bonnet rouge in the streets

In 1793 he left Poland Street for 13 Hercules Buildings, Lambeth, where he passed seven busy years, designing, engraving, and issuing further prophetic books, The Gates of Paradise, Visions of the Daughters of Albion, and America time began his long friendship with Thomas Butts, for nearly thirty years a regular purchaser of his drawings, temperas, and 'frescoes' In 1794 he issued the Songs of Laperience and the prophetic books Furope and The Book of Urizen, followed next year by The Song of Los and The Book of Aliania In 1800 Flarman introduced Blake to Hayley, a popular poetaster who posed as 'the Hermit of Eartham' Hayley induced Blake to settle at Felpham while engraving the illustrations for his Life of Couper There he remained three years, but Hayley's vapid triviality vexed his ethercal spirit, and in 1804 he returned to London, taking a first floor at 17 South Molton Street, where he haed nearly seventeen years Here he produced the prophetic books Jerusalem and Millon, and fell into the unscrupulous hands of Cromek, who, after buying his designs for Blair's Grave, cheated him out of the copyright Cromek crowned this treachery by plagiarising Blake's design for the 'Canterbury Pilgrimage, which he persuaded Stothard to fore stall, thus bringing about a permanent estrange Blake vindicated ment between the two friends himself by opening an exhibition for which he wrote a brilliant Descriptive Catalogue, containing the famous study of Chaucer that delighted Lamb But the public remained deaf and blind, and the poet sank into laborious poverty, indomitably toiling over innumerable designs and scores of manuscripts, never resting, never taking a holi day, working valiantly whether ill or well 1813 he found a new friend and patron in John Linnell, who was the staff and stay of his declining years, and through whom he met others, It was for Varley that such as John Varley Blake drew the wonderful 'Spiritual Portruts,' or 'Visionary Heads,' the most celebrated of which are the grotesquely saturical 'Man who built the Pyramids' and the fantastically humorous 'Ghost of a Flea.' In 1813 Blake moved, for the last time, to 3 Fountain Court, Strand, where he engraved the most sublime of all his drawings, the 'Inventions to the Book of Job,' and the noble designs for Dante. On 12th August 1827 he died, his last hours being radiant with ecstatic visions and spiritual rapture

A divinely patient painter and a divinely impatient poet, his impatient poetry is rarer and finer in quality than his patient designs His revolt against form in poetry, which marched beside his loyalty to form in art, was partly due to his Ossianism and partly to his Swedenborgian mysticism These things choked his imagination with weedy symbolism and wild rhetoric. Although Blake was not quite sane, neither was he quite insane. He lived in that unexplored region which separates madness from sanity, and in which imagination is supreme. He was too sane to be called mad, and too mad to be called sane Wordsworth said the last word on this question The madness of Blake interests us more than the sanity of other men. His swift word flashes out of the clouds, leaping on us like lightning in brief miracles of lyrical beauty. He was the first child to be a poet, the first poet to be a child did not merely sing childhood rather childhood sang in him as it never sang before or since. He was the first evangelist of youth. His songs have influenced our social temper not less than our literature, for to them may be traced the beginnings of that modern reverence for childhood which has followed afar off the modern reverence for womanhood There are gleams of poetry in the chaotic symbolism of the prophetic books, such as the splendid line that breaks through the mists of Millon

Time is the mercy of eternity

But as a whole the prophetic books may be left to the high priests of dogmatic mysticism whose fantastic evegesis lies outside literature

Song

My silks and fine array,
My smiles and languished air,
By love are driven away,
And mournful lean Despair
Brings me yew to deck my grave
Such end true lovers have.

His face is fair as heaven
When springing buds unfold,
Oh, why to him was 't given
Whose heart is wintry cold?
His breast is love's all worshipped tomb,
Where all love's pilgrims come

Bring me an axe and spade,
Bring me a winding sheet,
When I my grave have made,
Let winds and tempests beat
Then down I'll he, as cold as clay
True lo e doth pass away

'Introduction' to 'Songs of Innocence'

Piping down the valleys wild,
Piping songs of pleasant glee,
On a cloud I saw a child,
And he laughing said to me

'Pipe a song about a lamb''
So I piped with merry cheer
'Piper, pipe that song again,'
So I piped he wept to hear

'Drop thy pipe, thy happy pipe, Sing thy songs of happy cheer'' So I sang the same again, While he wept with joy to hear

'Piper, sit thee down and write In a book, that all may read' So he vanished from my sight, And I plucked a hollow reed,

And I made a rural pen,
And I stained the water clear,
And I wrote my happy songs
Every child may joy to hear

The Chimney-Sweeper

A little black thing among the snov,
Crying, 'Weep' weep' in notes of woe
Where are thy father and mother, say?
'They are both gone up to the church to pray

Because I was happy upon the heath, And smiled among the winter's snow, They elothed me in the clothes of detth And taught me to sing the notes of woo

'And because I am happy and dance and sing,
They think they have done me no injury,
And are gone to praise God and His Priest and King
Who make up a heaven of our misery'

Infant Joy

'I have no name,
I am but two days old'
What shall I call thee?
'I happy am,
Joy is my name'
Sweet joy befall thee!
Pretty jov,
Sweet joy, but two days old,
Sweet joy I call thee,
Thou dost smile,
I sing the while,
Sweet joy befall thee!

Infant Sorrow

My mother groaned, my father wept, Into the dangerous world I leapt, Helpless, naked, piping loud, Like a fiend hid in a cloud Struggling in my father's hands, Striving against my swaddling hands, Pound and weary, I thought best

The Blossom.

To sulk upon my mother's breast

Merry, merry sparrow ' Under leaves so green A happy blossom Sees you, swift as arrow, Seek your cradle narrow
Near my bosom
Pretty, pretty robin '
Under leaves so green
A happy blossom
Hears you sobbing, sobbing,
Pretty, pretty robin,
Near my bosom

Holy Thursday

'Twis on a Holy Thursday, their innocent faces clean, Came children walking two and two, in red and blue and green

Grey headed beadles walked before, with wands as white as snow,

Till into the high dome of Paul's they like Thanics waters flow

O what a multitude they seemed, these flowers of London town,

Seated in companies they were, with radiance all their

The hum of multitudes was there, but multitudes of lumbs,

Thousands of little boys and girls raising their innocent hands

Now like a mighty wind they raise to heaven the voice of song,

Or like harmonious thunderings the seats of lieuven

Beneath them sit the aged men, wise guardians of the poor

Then cherish pity, lest you drive an angel from the door

Nurse's Song

When the voices of children are heard on the green, And laughing is heard on the hill, My heart is at nest within my breast, And everything else is still

'Then come home my children, the sun is gone down,
And the dews of night arise,
Come, come, leave off play, and let us awny,
Till the morning appears in the skies'

'No, no, let us play, for it is yet day,
And we cannot go to sleep,
Besides, in the sky the little birds fly
And the hills are all covered with sheep'

'Well, well, go and play till the light fades away, And then go home to bed' The little ones leaped and shouted and laughed And all the lills echocd

The Tiger

Tiger, tiger, burning bright In the forests of the night, What immortal hand or eye Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

In what distant deeps or skies, Burnt the fire of thine eyes? On what wings dare he aspire? What the hand dare seize thy fire? And what shoulder and what art Could twist the sinew of thy heart? And when thy heart began to beat, What dread hand framed thy dread feet?

What the humbler? what the chain? In what furnice was thy hrain? What the anvil? what dread gra p Dired thy deadly terrors clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears And vintered heaven with their tears, Did He smile His work to see? Did He who made the lamb make thee?

Figer, tiger, burning bright In the forests of the night, What immortal hand or eye Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

'Introduction' to 'Songs of Experience'

Hear the voice of the bard,
Who present, past, and future sees,
Whose cars have heard
The Holy Word
That walked among the ancient trees,

Calling the lapsed soul,
And weeping in the evening dew,
That might control
The starry pole
And fallen fallen light renew

O I arth, O Larth, return '
Arise from out the dewy grass
Night is worn,
And the morn

Rises from the slumbrous mass.

Turn away no more
Why will thou turn away?
The starry floor,
The watery shore,
Are given thee till the break of day

Ah! Sunflower!

Ah! Sunflower' weary of time,
Who countest the steps of the sun,
Seeking after that sweet, golden clime,
Where the traveller's journey is done,

Where the youth pined away with desire,
And the pale virgin shrouded in snow,
Arise from their graves and aspire
Where my sunflower wishes to go

A Cradle Song

Sleep, sleep, beauty bright, Dreaming in the joxs of night, Sleep, sleep, in thy sleep Little sorrows sit and weep

Sweet babe, in thy face Soft desires I can trace, Secret joys and secret smiles, Little pretty infant wiles

As thy softest limbs I feel, Smiles as of the morning steal O'er thy check, and o'er thy breast Where thy little heart doth rest Oh, the cunning wiles that creep In thy little heart asleep ' When the little heart doth wal e, Then the dreadful light shall break.

The standard Life of Blake is Gilchrist's (2nd ed 1850) with additions by D G Rossetti the best study is Mr Swinburne's Critical Estay (1860). His works including the mystical rhapsodies, were edited by Ellis and Yeats (1893). Mr W M Rossetti wrote a Life for the Aldine edition of the poems and there is another by Story (1893). Mr Sampson printed the poems verbatim from the poets MS for the first time in 1905

JAMES DOUGLAS

William Lisle Bowles (1762-1850), 'the restorer of natural poetry,' born at King's Sutton vicarage, Northamptonshire, was educated at Winchester and Trinity College, Oxford, and in 1804 became rector of Bremhill in Wiltshire and a prebendary of Salisbury (from 1828 a canon residentiary) His first publication was a little volume of Fourteen Sonnets published anonymously at Bath in 1789, to which additions were made from time to time, and which in 1805 had reached a ninth edition. Meanwhile he had not been idle, other poetical works were Coombe Ellen and St Michael's Mount (1798), The Battle of the Nile (1799), The Sorrows of Switzerland (1801), The Spirit of Discovery (1805), The Missionary of the Andes (1815), Days Departed (1828), St John in Patmos (1833), and The Village Verse Book (1837) None of these can be said to have been popular, though all contain passages of fine descriptive and meditative verse. The 1789 sonnets had the extraordinary distinction of doing Coleridge's 'heart more good than all the other books he ever read excepting the Bible, in serving the metaphysician -then only seventeen—as an authentic revelation of the poetic spirit, and deepening his aversion to the poetic theories and artificial didacticism of Pope's imitators and successors Coleridge in his sonnet to Bowles thanks him

For those soft strains Whose sadness soothes me lile the murmuring Of wild bees in the sunny showers of spring, and praises their 'mild and manliest melancholy' as having relieved the 'thought bewildered man' torn by the 'mightier throes of mind' It was fortunate for Bowles's fame-as it was for Crabbe'sthat he began to publish when there was in England a signal dearth of true poetry, and that his best work was before the world ere the great poetic revival found its greater exponents Now we find in the sonnets grace and tenderness, a gentle melancholy, a sweet and native simplicity sufficient to distinguish their author from his contemporaries, but not enough of power, passion, or magic to lead a movement or mark an epoch. But when in his edition of Pope (1806) lie criticised, severely and somewhat unjustly, his character, and attacked his claim to be ranked amongst the great poets-Pope was only at the head of the second rank he said -he initiated a long-continued and bitter controversy that had a profound historic significance and influence Boy les insisted that images for what is beautiful and sublime in nature are as such nobler and more expressive and more poetical than images derived from art. As usual in such controversies. each party vehemently affirmed facts that their opponents did not deny explicitly or implicitly Thus Campbell retorted on Bowles, what he did not really dispute, that an exquisite description of artificial objects and manners may be equally characteristic of genius with the disciple of external nature. He further protested against pre-Raphaelite elaboration of detail in description— 'every rock, every leaf, every diversity of hue in nature's variety'-which Bowles actually did demand Byron became the most fervid and thorough going defender of Pope, his stinging sarcasms at Bowles's expense - 'Stick to thy sonnets, Bowles-at least they pay '-were more effective than his serious arguments, and Bowles, an absent minded, eccentric, amiable, musicianly High Church divine, was no match in the arts of effective polemics for Byron But, contrary to what might have been expected from his poetry, Bowles was both vehement and fierce in the great controversy, defending his contention in a series of 'letters' or pamphlets-to Campbell, Byron, Roscoe, a 'Quarterly Reviewer,' and the public. Bowles was no mean antiquity, and wrote a parochial history, the annals of an abbey, and other historical and antiquarian researches, and besides a Life of Bishop Ken and some sermons, he published occasional pamphlets on education, the poor laws, and Church politics The first three specimens are from the Sonnels, which in the later editions were some of them a good deal altered in wording, the fourth is from the opening of the Missionary, the sixth from the Spirit of Discovery, the seventh from Childe Harold's last Pilgrimage, the seventh as well as the eighth being contained in the Miscellaneous Poems ultimately appended to the Sonnets

The Influence of Time on Grief.

O Time! who I now'st a lement hand to lay Softest on sorrow's wound, and slowly thence,
Lulling to sad repose the weary sense,
The faint pang stealest, unperceived, away,
On thee I rest my only hope at last,
And think when thou hast dried the bitter tear
That flows in vain o'er all my soul held dear,
I may look back on every sorrow past,
And meet life's peaceful evening with a smile
As some lone bird, at day's departing hour,
Sings in the sunbeam, of the transient shower Forgetful, though its wings are wet the while Yet, ah' how much must that poor heart endure
Which hopes from thee, and thee alone, a cure

Hope

As one who, long by wasting sickness worn,
Weart has watched the lingering night, and heard,
Heartles, the earol of the matin bird
Silute his lonely porch, now first at morn

Goes forth, leaving his melancholy bed,

He the green slope and level ineadow views,

Delightful bathed in slow ascending dews,

Or marks the clouds that o'er the mountain's head,

In varying forms fantastic wander white,

Or turns his ear to every random song

Heard the green river's winding marge along,

The whilst each sense is steeped in still delight

So o'er my breast young summer's breath I feel,

Sweet Hope! thy fragrance pure and healing incense steal

Bamborough Castle

Ye holy towers that shade the wave worn steep,
Long may ye rear your aged brows sublime,
Though hurrying silent by, relentless time
Assail you, and the winds of winter sweep
Round your dark battlements, for fur from halls
Of Pride, here Charity hath fixed her seat,
Oft listening tearful when the wild winds lieat
With hollow bodings round your ancient walls,
And Pity, at the dark and stormy hour
Of midnight, when the moon is hid on high,
Keeps her lone watch upon the topmost tower,
And turns her ear to each expiring cry,
Blest if her aid some fainting wretch may save,
And snatch him cold and speechless from the wave

In South America

Beneath aerial cliffs and glittering snows, The rush roof of an aged warrior rose, Chief of the mountain tribes, high overhead, The Andes, wild and desolate, were spread, Where cold Sierras shot their icy spires, And Chillan trailed its smoke and mouldering fires. A glen beneath-a lonely spot of rest-Hung, scarce discovered, like an eagle's nest. Summer was in its prime, the parrot flocks Darkened the passing sunshine on the rocks. The chrysomel and purple butterfly Amid the clear blue light are windering by, The humming bird along the myrtle bowers, With twinkling wing is spinning o'er the flowers. The woodpeeker is heard with busy bill, The mock bird sings-and all beside is still. And look! the cataract that bursts so high, As not to mar the deep tranquillity, The tumult of its dashing fall suspends, And, stealing drop by drop, in mist descends, Through whose illumined spray and sprinkling dews, Shine to the adverse sun the broken rainbow hues.

Chequering with partial shade the beams of noon, And arching the gray rock with wild festoon, Here, its gay network and fantastic twine. The purple cogul threads from pine to pine, And oft, as the fresh airs of morning breathe, Dips its long tendrils in the stream beneath. There, through the trunks with moss and lichens white, The sunshine darts its interrupted light, And 'mid the cedar's darksome bough, illumes, With instant touch, the lori's scarlet plumes.

Winter Evening at Home

Fair Moon' that at the chilly day's decline
Of sharp December, through my cottage pane
Dost lovely look, smiling, though in thy wane,
In thought, to scenes serene and still as thine,

Wanders my heart, whilst I by turns survey
Thee slowly wheeling on thy evening way,
And this my fire, whose dim, unequal light,
Just glimmering, bids each shadowy image fall
Sombrous and strange upon the darkening wall,
Ere the clear tapers chase the deepening night!
Yet thy still orb, seen through the freezing haze,
Shines calm and clear without, and whilst I gaze,
I think around me in this twilight gloom,
I but remark mortality's sad doom,
Whilst hope and joy, cloudless and soft, appear,
In the sweet beam that lights thy distant sphere.

The Andes

Andes sweeping the horizon's tract, Mightiest of mountains 1 whose eternal snows Feel not the nearer sun, whose umbrage chills The murmuring ocean, whose volcanic fires A thousand nations view, hung like the moon High in the middle waste of heaven

From 'Byron's Death.'

So ends Childe Harold his last pilgrimage!
Ends in the region, in that land renowned,
Whose mighty genius lives in Glory's page,
And in the Muses' consecrated ground,
His pale check fading where his brows were bound
With their unfading wreath! I will not call
The nymphs from Pindus' piny shades profound,
But strew some flowers upon thy sable pall,
And follow to the grave a Briton's funeral

Sun-dial in the Churchyard of Bremhill.

So passes silent o er the dead thy shade
Brief Time, and hour by hour, and day by day,
The pleasing pictures of the present fade,
And like a summer vapour steal away

And have not they, who here forgotten he (Say, hoary chronicler of ages past), Once marked thy shadow with delighted eye,
Nor thought it fled, how certain and how fast?

Since thou hast stood, and thus thy vigil kept,
Noting each hour, o'er mouldering stones beneath,
The pastor and his flock alike have slept,
And 'dust to dust' proclaimed the stride of death.

Another race succeeds, and counts the hour, Careless alike, the hour still seems to smile, As hope, and youth, and life were in our power, So smiling, and so perishing the while

I heard the village bells, with gladsome sound,
When to these scenes a stranger I drew near,
Proclaim the tidings of the village round,
While memory wept upon the good man's bier

Even so, when I am dead, shall the same bells Ring merrily when my brief days are gone, While still the lapse of time thy shadow tells, And strangers gaze upon thy humble stone!

Enough, if we may wait in calm content
The hour that bears us to the silent sod,
Blameless improve the time that Heaven has lent,
And leave the issue to thy will, O God

The good man of the fifth verse was Mr Bowless predecessor in the living at Brembill.

Samuel Rogers

was born at the suburban village of Stoke Newington, on the 30th of July 1763. His fither, a City banker, was a Whig and Dissenter, his mother was a great-granddaughter of Philip Henry careful private education, at sixteen or seventeen he entered the bank, in 1784 was admitted to partnership, and on his father's death in 1793 became head of the firm His taste for literature and for literary society awoke carly, once with a friend he went to call on Dr Johnson ın Bolt Court, but his courage failed him when his hand was already on the knocker In 1781 he contributed eight short essays to the Gentleman's Magazine, next year a comic opera (never acted), and in 1786, the year that witnessed the advent of Burns, an Ode to Suberstition, with some other Poems In 1792 he produced The Pleasures of Memory, in 1798 his Epistle to a Friend with other Poems, in 1812 the fragmentary Voyage of Columbus, and in 1814 Jacqueline, bound up with Byron's Lara

In 1819 appeared Human Life, and in 1822 the first part of Italy, a descriptive poem in blank verse. Rogers, a true poet if not a great one, had little originality or power or passion, but had exquisite taste and much sweetness, grace, and tenderness, all his work proves that he was a careful and fastidious writer In his Table-Talk, published by Dyce, he gives details 'I was en gaged on the Pleasures of Memory for nine years, on Human Life for nearly the same space of time, and Italy was not completed in less than sixteen years' Not unnaturally we find deeper feelings and greater wealth of experience in Human Life than in the earlier Pleasures of Memory, and Italy gives delightful glimpses of Italian life and scenery The Pleasures of Memory had and tradition passed through fifteen editions before 1806, Rogers had his vogue and was famous before the greater of his younger contemporaries made their mark, but though Byron regarded him as a pillar of good taste in contrast to the Lake poets, some of his late poems show that he too was touched with the new spirit. His collected poems were published in various forms-one of them brought out at a cost of £15,000 (2 vols 1830-34), with 114 vignette engravings by Stothard and Turner The wealthy banker was well able to cultivate his favourite tastes, to enrich his house at 22 St James's Place with some of the finest and rarest pictures, busts, books, gems, and other articles of virtu, and to entertain his friends with a generous though unostentatious hospitality His conversation overflowed shrewd observa tion, pungent criticism, and personal anecdote, rather too often spiced with sarcasm He soothed the last hours of Sheri dan, and his generosity was largely exerted on behalf of suffering or unfriended talent. 'Genius lan guishing for want of patronage,' recorded Dyce, 'was sure to find in Mr Rogers a generous patron His purse was ever open to the distressed of the prompt assistance which he rendered in the hour of need to various well known individuals there is ample record, but of his many acts of kindness and charity to the wholly obscure there is no memorial-at When more than ninety, and least on earth a close prisoner to his chair, he still delighted to watch the changing colours of the evening sky, to repeat passages of his favourite poets, or to dwell on the merits of the great painters whose works adorned his walls By slow decay, and without any suffering, he died in St James's Place, 18th December 1855' Five years before he had declined the laureateship His art collections fetched £50,000, and three of his pictures-a Titian, a Guido, and a Giorgione—he bequeathed to the National Gallery

It was as a man of taste and letters, as a patron of artists and authors, and as the friend of almost every illustrious man that graced our annals for half a century and more that Rogers chiefly At his celebrated engaged the public attention breakfast-parties persons of almost all classes and pursuits were found. He made the morning meal famous as a literary rallying-point, and during the London scason there was scarcely a day that did not see from four to six guests at the hospitable board in St James's Place Discussions as to books or pictures, anecdotes of the great of old, racy sayings of Sheridan, Erskine, or Horne Tooke, social traits of Fox, apt quotations or fine passages read aloud, incidents of foreign travel recounted, charmed the hours till midday Many of his own pointed sayings circulated in society and got into print. Some one said that Gally Knight was getting deaf 'It is from want of practice,' remarked Rogers, Mr Knight being a great speaker and bad listener Lord Dudley (Ward) had been free in his criticisms on Rogers, who retaliated with an epigrammatic couplet

Ward has no heart, they say, but I deny it, He has a heart—he gets his speeches by it

When he tried to extort a confession from his neighbour, Sir Philip Francis, that he was the author of Junius, Francis gave a surly rebuff, whereupon Rogers concluded that if he was not Junius, he was at least Brutus. The gifts of the gods to himself he thus enumerated

Nature denied him much,
But gave him at his birth what most he values
A passionate love for music, sculpture, puinting,
For poetry, the language of the gods,
For all things here, or grand or beautiful,
A setting sun, a lake amoung the mountains,
The light of an ingenuous countenance,
And, what transcends them all, a noble action

From 'The Pleasures of Memory'

Twilight's soft dews steal o'er the village green, With magic tints to harmonise the scene. Stilled is the hum that through the hamlet broke, When round the ruins of their ancient oak. The peasants flocked to hear the minstrel play, And games and carols closed the busy day. Her wheel at rest, the matron thrills no more. With treasured tales and legendary lore. All, all are fled, nor mirth nor music flows. To chase the dreams of imocent repose. All, all are fled, yet still I linger here! What secret charms this silent spot endear?

Mark von old mansion frowning through the trees, Whose hollow turret woos the whistling breeze. That casement, arched with 117's brownest shade, First to these eyes the light of heaven conveyed. The mouldering gateway strews the grass grown court, Once the calm scene of many a simple sport, When all things pleased, for life itself was new, And the heart promised what the fancy drew Childhood's loved group revisits every scene, The tangled wood walk and the tufted green.

Indulgent Memory wakes, and lo, they live! Clothed with far softer hues than light can give. Thou first, best friend that Heaven assigns below, To soothe and sweeten all the cares we know, Whose glad suggestions still each vain alarm, When Nature fades and life forgets to charm, Thee would the Muse invoke !- to thee belong The sage's precept and the poet's song What softened views thy magic glass reveals, When o'er the landscape Time's meek twilight steals ' As when in ocean sinks the orb of day, Long on the wave reflected lustres play, Thy tempered gleams of happiness resigned, Glance on the darkened mirror of the mind The school's lone porch, with reverend mosses gray, Just tells the pensive pilgrim where it lay Mute is the bell that rung at peep of dawn, Quickening my truant feet across the lawn Unheard the shout that rent the noontide air When the slow dial give a pause to care Up springs, at every step, to claim a tear, Some little friendship formed and cherished here, And not the lightest leaf but trembling teems With golden visions and romantic dreams

Down by you hazel copse, at evening, blazed The gipsy's lagot—there we stood and gazed, Gazed on her sunburnt face with silent awc, Her tattered mantle and her hood of straw, Her moving lips, her caldron brimming o er, The drowsy brood that on her back she bore, Imps in the barn with mousing owlets bred, From rifled roost at nightly revel fed, Whose dark eyes flashed through locks of blackest shade When in the breeze the distant watch dog bayed And heroes fled the sibyl's muttered call, Whose elfin prowess scaled the orehard wall As o'er my palm the silver piece she drew, And traced the line of life with searching view, How throbbed my fluttering pulse with hopes and fears, To learn the colour of my future years '

Ah, then, what honest triumph flushed my breast,
This truth once I nown—to bless is to be blest '
We led the bending beggar on his way—
Bare were his feet, his tresses silver gray—
Soothed the keen pangs his aged spirit felt,
And on his tale with mute attention dwelt
As in his scrip we dropt our little store,
And sighed to think that little was no more,
He breathed his prayer, 'Long may such goodness live!
'Twas all he gave—'twas all he had to give

The adventurous boy that asks his little share, And hies from home with many a gossip's praver, Turns on the neighbouring hill, once more to see The dear abode of peace and privacy, And as he turns, the thatch among the trees, The smoke's blue wreaths ascending with the hreeze, The village common spotted white with sheep, The churchyard yews round which his fathers sleep, All rouse Reflection's sadly pleasing train, And of the looks and weeps, and looks again

So, when the mild Tnpia dired explore
Arts yet untaught, and worlds unknown before,
And, with the sons of Science, wooed the gale
That, rising, swelled their strange expanse of sail,
So, when he breathed his firm yet fond adieu,
Borne from his leafy hut, his carved canoe,

And all his soul best Ioved—such tears he shed, While each soft scene of summer beauty fied. Long o'er the wave a wistful look he cast, Long watched the streaming signal from the mast, Till Twilight's dewy tints deceived his eye, And fairy forests fringed the evening sly

So Scotia's queen, as slov ly dawned the day, Rose on her couch, and gazed her soul away. Her eves had blessed the beacon's glimmering height, That faintly tipped the feathery surge with light. But now the morn with orient lines portrayed. Each castled cliff and brown monastie shade. All touched the talisman's resistless spring, And lo, v hat busy tribes vere instant on the wing l.

Thus kindred objects kindred thoughts inspire, As summer clouds flash forth electric fire. And house this spot gives back the joys of youth, Warm as the life, and with the mirror's truth. Hence liome felt pleasure prompts the patriot's sight, This makes him wish to live, and dare to die. For this young Foscari, whose hapless fate. Vonice should blush to hear the Muse relate, When exile wore his blooming years away, To sorrow's long soliloquies a prey, When reason, justice, vainly urged his cause, For this he roused her sanguinary laws, Glad to return, though hope could grant no more, And chains and torture halled him to the shore.

And hence the charm historic scenes impart, Hence Tiber awes, and Avon melts the heart Aerial forms in Tempe's classic vale Glance through the gloom and whisper in the gale, In vald Vaucluse with love and Laura dwell, And watch and weep in Cloisa's cell. Twis ever thus Young Ammon, when he sought Where Ilium stood, and where Pelides fought, Sat at the helm himself No meaner hand Steered through the waves, and when he struck the land, Such in his soul the ardour to explore, Pelides like, he leaped the first ashore Twas ever thus As not at Virgil's tomb We bless the shade, and bid the verdure bloom So Tully paused, amid the vircel's of Time, On the rude stone to trace the truth sublime, When at his feet in honoured dust disclosed, Archimedes The immortal sage of Syracuse reposed. And as he long in sweet delusion hung Where once a Plato taught, a Pindar sung, Who now but meets him musing, when he roves His ruined Tusculan's romantic groves? In Kome's great I orum, who but hears him roll

His moral thunders o er the subject soul?

Hail, Memory, hail in thy exhanstless mine.

From age to age unnumbered treasures sline.

Thought and her shadowy brood thy call obry,
And Place and Time are subject to thy sway!

Thy pleasures most we feel when most alone,
The only pleasures we can call our own.

I ighter than air, Hope's summer visions die,
If but a fleeting cloud obscure the sky,
If but a beam of solver Peason play,
Lo, I ance's fury frost work melts away!

But can the wiles of 'art, the grusp of Power,
Snatch the rich relic. of a well spent hour?

These, when the trembling spirit wings her flight
Pour round her path a stream of living light,

And gild tho e pure and perfect realms of re t, Where Virtue triumphs, and her sone are blest! Tufia, a Tahinan brought off by Capitain Cook in 1759

From 'Human Life'

The lark has sung his carol in the sky, The bees have hummed their noontide harmony, Still in the vale the village bells ring round, Still in Liewellin hall the jests resound, For now the caudle cup is circling there, Now, glad at heart, the gossips breathe their prayer, And, crowding, stop the cradle to admire The babe, the sleeping image of his sire A few short years, and then these sounds shall hail The day again, and gladness fill the vale, So soon the child a youth, the youth a man, Lager to run the race his fithers run Then the huge ox shall yield the broad sirloin, The ale, now brewed, in floods of amber shine, And hashing in the chimney's ample blaze, 'Mid many a tale told of his boyish days, The nurse shall ery, of all her ills beguiled,

"Twas on her knees he sat so oft and smiled"
And soon again shall music swell the breeze,
Soon, issuing forth, shall glitter through the trees
Vestures of nuptial white, and hymns be sung,
And violets scattered round, and old and young,
In every cottage porch vith garlands green,
Stand still to gaze, and, gazing, bless the scene,
While, her darl eves declining, by his side,
Moves in her virgin veil the gentle bride.

And once, alas' nor in a distant hour, Auother voice shall come from yonder tower, When in dim chambers long black weeds are seen, And weeping heard where only joy has been, When, by his children borne, and from his door, Slowly departing to return no more, He rests in holy earth with them that went before.

And such is human life; so gliding on,
It glimmers life; a meteor, and is gone!
Yet is the tale, brief though it be, as strange,
As full, methinks, of wild and vondrous change,
As any that the mandering tribes require,
Stretched in the desert round their evening fire,
As any sung of old, in hall or bower,
To ministrel harps at midnight's witching hour!

The day arrives the moment wished and feared, The child is born, by many a pang endeared, And now the mo her, ear has caught his cry, O grant the cherub to her asking eye! He comes—the clasps him. To her bo om pressed, He drinks the balm of his and drops to rest

Her by her smile how soon the stranger knows! How soon by his the glad discovery shews! As to her hips she lifts the locky boy, What answering looks of sympathy and joy! He walks, he speaks. In many a broken word His wants, his withe, and his griefs are heard and ever, ever to her lap he flies, When rosy Sleep comes on with sweet surprice Locked in her arm, his arms across for filing (That name most dear for ever on his tongae), As with soft accents rour libranced he chings, and, cheek to elick her falling song she sings, How blest to feel the live inty of his heart, Breathe his size or his the arm, it is for his art, it,

How many centuries did the sun go round From Mount Alburnus to the Tyrrhene sea, While, by some spell rendered invisible, Or, if approached, approached by him alone Who saw as though he saw not, they remained As in the darl ness of a sepulchre, Waiting the appointed time! All, all vithin Proclaims that nature had resumed her right, And taken to her-elf what man renounced, No comice, triglyph, or wom abacus, But with thick ivy hung, or branching fern, Their iron brown o'erspread with brightest verdure ! Joanna Baillie (1762-1851) was born in the mance of Bodhwell in Landrkshire, in 1776 her father became Professor of Divinity at Glasgow In this household, 'repression of all emotions, even the gentlest and those most honourable to human nature, seems to have been the constant lesson? Journ is eis er, Ignes, told Lucy Aikin that their fadier was an excellent parent. 'When she had once been butten by a dog thought to be mad, he had sucked the wound, at the hazard, as was supposed, of his own life, but he had never given her a liss Johnna spoke of her ventning to be She would sometimes raressed then a child centure to clasp her little arms about her mothers I nees, who would seem to chide her, but the child kner she liked it? In 1784 Joanna went to live in London, where her brother, Matthew Bailbe, had established himself as a physician, in 1806 she and Agnes took a house for themselves at Hampstead, and there she died, Agnes surviving her till 1861. No authoress ever enjoyed a larger share than the 'immortal Joanna' of the esteem and affection of her contemporaries. She was one of the friends whose society Sir Walter looked forward to as one of the chief pleasures a visit to London had in store for him, even America sent its votaries to her shrine at Hampstead Her greatest achievement lay in her Plays on the Passions (1798-1836), which, though ineffective as acting plays, contain much impressive poetry and often show true dramatic power In 1804 she produced a volume of miscellaneous dramas, and in 1810 The Family Legend, a tragedy founded on a Highland tradition, was successfully staged at Edinburgh with a prologue by Scott. Mentfort was brought out by Kemble shortly after its appearance, and was acted eleven nights It was revised in 1821, with Kean as De Montfort, Kenn admitted that, though a fine poem, it would never be an acting play. Scott, on the other hand, extra agantly eulogised 'Basil's love and Montfort's hate' as something like a renewal of Shakespeare's inspired strain, for Count Basil and De Montfort are much liker the works of Shirley or Massinger than anything of Shakespeare's

Miss Baillie's style is smooth and regular, but without distinction, her carefully constructed dramas have few commanding situations, andpartly from the restrictions imposed by her working theory—are deficient in variety and fullness of pission, the mainspring of human life and of dramatic action, the tragic scenes are too exclusively connected with the crime of murder, one of the ensiest resources of a tragedinn Scott said that fear was the most dramatic passion touched The plot is too often obvious almost from the first act-a defect fatal to success in repre-Some of the poems in her Fugitive Pu is were written when she was over eighty Of the songs, her versions of years of age 'Woo'd an' married an a'' and 'Saw ve Johnnie

Wanton droll, whose harmless play
Beguiles the rustic's closing day,
When, drawn the evening fire about,
Sit aged erone and thoughtless lout,
And child upon his three foot stool,
Waiting until his supper cool,
And maid, whose clicek outblooms the rose,
As bright the blazing fagot glows,
Who, bending to the friendly light,
Plies her task with busy sleight,
Come, show thy tricks and sportive graces,
Thus circled round with merry faces!

Backward coiled, and erouching low, With glaring eychalls watch thy foc, The housewife's spindle whirling round, Or thread or straw that on the ground Its shorlow throws, by urchin sly Held out to luce thy roving eye, Then stealing onward, fiercely spring Upon the tempting, faithless thing Now, wheeling round with bootless shill, Thy bo peep tail provokes thee still, As still beyond thy curving side Its jetty tip is seen to glide. Till from thy centre starting far, Thou sidelong veerst with rump in air Lrected stiff, and gait away, Like inadam in her tintrums high . Though ne er a madam of them all, Whose silken lirtle sweeps the hall, More varied trick and whim displays To catch the admiring stranger's gaze

The featest tumbler, stage bedight, To thee is but a clums; wight, Who every limb and sinew struns To do what costs thee little pains, For which, I trow, the gaping crowd Requite him oft with plaudits loud

But, stopped the while thy wanton play, Applauses too thy pains repay. For then, beneath some urchin's hand, With modest pride thou tak'st thy stand, While many a stroke of kindness glides. Along thy back and tabby sides. Dilated swells thy glossy fur, And loudly eroons thy busy pur, As, timing well the equal sound, Thy clutching feet bepat the ground, And all their harmless claws disclose. Like prickles of an early rose, While softly from thy whiskered cheek. Thy half closed eves peer, mild and meck-

But not alone by cottage fire Do rustics rude thy feats admire The learned sage, whose thoughts explore The widest range of human lore, Or with unfettered fines fly Through airy heights of poesy, Pausing smiles with altered air To see thee climb his elbow chair, Or, struggling on the mat below, Hold warfare with his slippered toe. The widowed dame or lonely maid, Who, in the still but cheerless shade Of home unsocial, spends her age, And rarely turns a lettered page, Upon her hearth for thee lets fall The rounded cork or paper ball, Nor chides thee on thy wicked watch, The ends of ravelled skein to catch, But lets thee have thy way ward will, Perplexing oft her better skill

E'en he, whose mind of gloomy bent, In lonely tower or prison pent, Reviews the coil of former days, And loathes the world and all its ways. What time the lamp's unsteady gleam Hath roused him from his moody dream, Feels, as thou gambol'st round his seat, His heart with pride less fiercely beat, And smiles, a link in thee to find, That joins it still to living kind.

From the Birthday 'Address' to her Sister Dear Agnes, gleamed with joy and dashed with tears, O'er us have glided almost sixty years Since we on Bothwell's bonny braes were seen, I'y those whose eyes long closed in death have been, Two tiny imps, who scarcely stooped to gather The slender harebell or the purple heather, No taller than the forglove's spiky stem, That der of morning studs with silvery gem Then every butterfly that crossed our view With joyful shout was greeted as it flew, And moth and lady bird and beetle bright In sheeny gold were each a wondrous sight. Then as we paddled harefoot, side by side, Among the sunny shallows of the Clyde, Minnows or spotted parr with twinkling fin, Swimming in mazy rings the pool within, A thull of gladnes through our bosom sent, Seen in the power of early wonderment

A long perspective to my mind appears, Looking behind me to that line of years, And yet through every stage I still can trace Thy visioned form, from childhood's morning grace To woman's early bloom, changing how soon! To the expressive glow of woman's noon, And now to what thou art, in comely age, Active and ardent Let what will engage Thy present moment, whether hopeful seeds In garden plat thou sow, or noxious needs From the fair flower remove, or ancient lore In chronicle or legend rare explore, Or on the parlour hearth with Litten play, Stroking its tabby sides, or take thy way To gain with hasty steps some cottage door, On helpful errand to the neighbouring poor, Active and ardent, to my fancy's eye Thou still art young in spite of time gone by Though oft of patience brief and temper keen, Well may it please me, in life's latter seene, To think what now thou art, and long to me hast been.

'Twas thou who woo'dst me first to look Upon the page of printed book,
That thing by me abhorred, and with address
Didst win me from my thoughtless idleness,
When all too old become with bootless haste
In fitful sports the precious time to waste
Thy love of tale and story was the stroke
At which my dormant fancy first awoke,
And ghosts and witches in my busy brain
Arose in sombre show, a motley train
This new found path attempting, proud was I, Lurking approval on thy face to spy,
Or hear thee say, as grew thy roused attention,
'What' is this story all thine own invention',

Then, as advancing through this mortal span, Our intercourse with the mixed world began. Thy fairer face and sprighther courtesy (A truth that from my youthful vanity Lay not concealed) did for the sisters twain, Where'er we went, the greater favour gain, While, but for thee, vexed with its tossing tide, I from the busy world had shrunk aside. And now in later years, with better grace Thon helpst me still to hold a veleome place With those, whom nearer neighbourhood has made The friendly cheerers of our evening shade.

The change of good and evil to abide, As partners linked, long have we side by side Our earthly journey held, and who can say How near the end of our united way? By nature's course not distant, sad and 'rest Will she remain,—the lonely pilgrim left. If thou be taken first, who can to me Like sister, friend, and home companion be? Or who, of wonted daily kindness shorn, Shall feel such loss, or mourn, as I shall mourn? And if I should be fated first to leave This earthly house, though gentle friends may grieve, And he above them all, so truly proved A friend und brother, long and justly loved, There is no living wight, of woman born, Who then shall mourn for me us thou wilt mourn.

Thou ardent, liberal spirit 'quickly feeling
The touch of sympathy and I indly dealing With sorrow or distress, for ever sharing.
The unhoarded mite, nor for to morrow caring,— Accept, dear Agnes, on thy natal day,
An unadorned but not a careless lay
Nor think this tribute to thy virtues paid
From tardy love proceeds, though long delayed
Words of affection, howsoe'er expressed,
The latest spoken still are deemed the best
Few are the measured rhymes I now may write,
These are, perhaps, the last I shall indite

The shadow of our trysting bush,
It wears so slowly round'

My sheep bell tinkles frac the west,
My lambs are bleating near,
But still the sound that I lo'e best,
Alack! I canno' hear
Oh no! sad and slow,
The shadow lingers still,
And like a lanely ghaist I stand
And croon upon the hill.

I hear below the water roar,
The mill wi' clacking din,
And Lucky scolding free her door,
To ca' the bairnies in
Oh no! sad and slow,
These are na' sounds for me,
The shadow of our trysting bush,

From 'De Montfort'

Is fixed like ony stane

De Montfort No more, my sister, urge me not again, My secret troubles cannot be revealed From all participation of its thoughts My heart recoils I pray thee be contented

Jane What! must I, like a distant humble friend, Observe thy restless eye and gait disturbed In timid silence, whilst with yearning heart I turn aside to weep? O no, De Montfort! A nobler task thy nobler mind will give, Thy true intrusted friend I still shall be.

De Mon Ah, Jane, forbear! I cannot e'en to thee Jane Then, fic upon it! fic upon it, Montfort! There was a time when e'en with murder stained, Had it been possible that such dire deed Could e'er have been the crime of one so piteous, Thou wouldst have told it me

De Mon So would I now—but ask of this no more. All other trouble but the one I feel
I had disclosed to thee I pray thee spare me
It is the secret weakness of my nature

Jane Then secret let it be , I nrge no further The eldest of our valuant father's hopes, So sadly orphaned, side by side we stood, Like two young trees, whose boughs in early strength Screen the weak saplings of the rising grove, And brave the storm together-I have so long, as if by nature's right, Thy bosom's inmate and adviser been, I thought through life I should have so remained, Nor ever known a change Forgive me, Montfort, A humbler station will I take by thee The close attendant of thy wandering steps, The cheerer of this home, with strangers sought, The soother of those griefs I must not know This is mine office now I ask no more

De Mon. O June, thou dost constrain me with thy love! Would I could tell it thee!

Jane Thou shalt not tell me. Nay, I'll stop mine cars. Nor from the yearnings of affection wring

What shrinks from utterance Let it pass, my brother I'll stay by thee, I'll cheer thee, comfort thee, Pursue with thee the study of some art, Or nobler science, that compels the mind To steady thought progressive, driving forth All florting, wild, unhappy fantasies, Till thou, with brow unclouded, smil'st again, Like one who, from dark visions of the night, When th' active soul within its hicless cell Holds its own world, with dreadful fancy pressed Of some dire, terrible, or murderous deed, Wakes to the dawning morn, and blesses Heaven De Mon. It will not pass away, 'twill haunt me still

De Mon It will not pass away, 'twill haunt me still Jane Ah' say not so, for I will haunt thee too, And be to it so close an adversary, That, though I wrestle darkling with the fiend, I shall o'croome it.

De Mon Thou most generous woman!
Why do I treat thee thus? It should not be—
And yet I cannot—O that cursed villain!

He will not let me be the man I would [these? Jane What say'st thou, brother? Oh' what words are They have awaked my soul to dreadful thoughts. I do beseech thee, speak! By the affection thou didst ever bear me, By the dear memory of our infant days, By kindred living ties, my, and by those Who sleep in the tomb, and caunot call to thee, I do conjure thee, speak!

Ah ' wilt thou not?

Then, if affection, most unwearied love,
Tried early, long, and never wanting found,
O'er generous man little more authority,
More rightful power than crown or sceptre give,
I do command thee!
De Montfort, do not thus resist my love.
Here I entreat thee on my bended knees
Alas, my brother!

De Mon [Raising her, and kneeling]
Thus let him kneel who should the abased be,
And at thine honoured feet confession make!
I'll tell thee nll—but, oh! thou wilt despise me
For in my breast a raging passion burns,
To which thy soul no sympathy will own—
A passion which hath made my nightly couch
A place of torment, and the light of day,
With the gay intercourse of social man,
Feel hke th' oppressive, airless pestilence
O Jane! thou wilt despise me.

Inv. Say not so

Jane Say not so
I never can despise thee, gentle brother
A lover's jealousy and hopeless pangs
No kindly heart contemns.

De Mon A lover, sayst thou?

No, it is hate! black, lasting, deadly hate!

Which thus has driven me forth from kindred peace,

From social pleasure, from my native home,

To be a sullen wanderer on the earth,

Avoiding all men, cursing and necursed!

Jane De Montfort, this is fiend like, frightful, terrible?
What being, by th' Almighty Father formed
Of flesh and blood, created even as thou,
Could in thy breast such horrid tempest wake,
Who art thyself his fellow?

Unknit thy brows, and spread those writh clenched hands. Some sprite accursed within thy bosom mates

Prince Edward in his Dungeon

Doth the bright sun from the high arch of heaven, In all his beauteous robes of fleckered clouds, And ruddy vapours, and deep-glowing flames, And softly varied shades, look gloriously? Do the green woods dance to the wind the lakes Cast up their sparkling waters to the light? Do the sweet harrlets in their bushy dells Send winding up to heaven their curling smoke On the soft morning air? Do the flocks bleat, and the wild creatures bound' In antic happiness? and mazy birds Wing the mid air in lightly skimming bands? Ay, all this is, all this men do behold The poorest man Even in this lonely vault, My dark and narrow world, oft do I hear The crowing of the cock so near my walls, And sadly think how small a space divides me From all this fair creation Page Madam, there is a lady in your hall Who begs to be admitted to your presence.

Lady Is it not one of our invited friends?

Page No, far unlike to them It is a stranger Lady How looks her countenance?

Page So queenly, so commanding, and so noble, I shrunk at first in awe, but when she smiled, For so she did to see me thus abashed, Methought I could have compassed sea and land To do her bidding

Lady Is she young or old?

Page Neither, if right I guess, but she is fair

For Time hath laid his hand so gently on her,

As he too had been awed

Lad; The foolish stripling!
She has bewritched thee Is she large in stature?
Pagz. So stately and so graceful is her form,
I thought at first her stature was gigantic,

But on a near approach I found, in truth, She scarcely does surpass the middle size.

Lad; What is her garb?

Page I cannot well describe the fashion of it She is not decked in any gallant trim. But seems to me clad in the usual weeds. Of high habitual state, for as she moves. Wide flows her robe in many a waving fold, As I have seen unfurled banners play. With the soft breeze.

Lady Thine eyes deceive thee, boy, It is an apparition thou hast seen.

Freberg [Starting up]. It is an apparition he has seen,
Or it is Jane de Montfort (From De Montfort)

The characterisation in the last extract was regarded as a picture of Mrs Siddons. Of the Plays on the Passions, four are comedies and one is a tragedy in prose. Of fourteen miscellaneous plays one is on Constantine Palæologus and one (in prose) on Withcraft, the Metrical Legends include poems on William Wallace, Columbus and Grizell Baillie. And in the collected one volume edition of her Dramatic and Poetical Works (1851), her other work, are distributed into Figitive Verses, Miscellaneous Poetry, and Verses on Sacred Subjects. For a word picture of her, see Miss Thackerays (Mrs Richmond Ritchie's) Book of Sibyls (1883)

Richard Lovell Edgeworth (1744-1817) was born at Bath, and came of a family that for a hundred and sixty years had been settled in Ireland, latterly at Edgeworthstown in County Longford. After nine years' schooling at Warwick, Drogheda, and Longford, and five months of dissipation at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1761 he was removed to Oxford, where, as a gentleman commoner of Corpus, he passed two 'delightful, profitable' years At Blackbourton, fourteen miles off, lived a friend of his father's, Paul Elers, a squire whose quiver was fuller than his purse with one of his daughters Edgeworth eloped to Scotland (1763) The voung couple spent a twelve month at Edgeworthstown, and finally settled at Hare Hatch near Reading, Edgeworth meanwhile keeping terms in the Temple, till his father's death (1769) allowed him to give up all thought of the As a boy of seven he had become 'irrecoverably a mechanic' through the sight of an electrical machine, and his whole life long he was always inventing something-a semaphore, a velocipede, a pedometer One of his inventions brought him across Dr Darwin, and at Lichfield, during the Christmas of 1770, he conceived a passion for His wife was away in lovely Honora Sneyd Berkshire ('she was not of a cheerful temper'), but Thomas Day was with him, and urged him to flight So with Day and his eldest boy, whom he was educating on Rousseau's system, he did fly to France, and at Lyons diverted himself and the course of the Rhone. Then his wife died, and four months afterwards he wedded Honora (1773), to lose her in 1780, and the same year marry her She too died of consumption sister Elizabeth (1797), but the next wife, Miss Beaufort (1798), survived him by many years In all he had nine 'I am not,' he observed, 'a man of teen children I have had four wives The second prejudices and third were sisters, and I was in love with the He advo second in the lifetime of the first.' cated parliamentary reform and Catholic emancipa tion, his house was spared by the rebels (1798), and in the last Irish Parliament (1798–99) lie spoke for the Union, but voted against it, as a measure 'forced down the throats of the Irish, though fivesixths of the nation were against it.' Masterful, versatile, brilliant, enlightened, he stands as a type of the Superior Being, 'cocksureness' his principal foible. He was the idol of his own womankind, the friend of Watt and Wedgwood and many more better and greater than himself The Memoirs of Richard Lovell Edgeworth (1820, 3rd ed 1844) are autobiographical up to 1782, the completion, less interesting, is by his daughter Maria.

A Penitent

The family at Black Bourton at this time consisted of Mrs Elers, her mother Mrs Hungerford, and four grown up young ladies, besides several children. The eldest son, an officer, was absent The young ladies, though far from being beauties, were handsome, and though destitute of accomplishments, they were notwithstanding agreeable, from an air of youth and simplicity, and from unaffected good nature and gasety. The person who struck me most at my introduction to this family group was Mrs Hungerford. She was near eighty, tall and majestic, with eyes that still retained uncommon lustre. She was not able to rise from her chair without the assistance of one of her granddaughters, but when she had risen, and stood leaning on her tortoise shell cane, she received my father, as the friend of the family, with so much politeness and with so much grace as to eclipse all the young people by whom she was sur rounded. Wrs Hungerford was a Blake, connected with the Norfolk family She had formerly been the wife of Sir Alexander Kennedy, whom Mr Hungerford killed in a duel in Blenheim Park Why she dropped her title in marrying Mr Hungerford I know not, nor can I tell how he persuaded the beautiful widow to marry him after he had killed her husband. Mr Hungerford brought her into the retirement of Black Bourton, the ancient seat of his family, an excellent but antiquated house, with casement windows, divided by stone frame work, the principal rooms wainscoted with oak, of which the antiquity might be guessed from the varnish it had In the large hall were hung spears, acquired from time and hunting tackle, and armour, and trophies of war and of the chase, and a portrait, not of exquisite painting, of the gallaut Sir Edward Hungerford This portrait had been removed hither from Farley Castle, the principal seat of the family In the history of Mrs Hungerford there was something mysterious, which was not, as I perceived, known to the younger part of the family made no enquines from Mrs Elers, but I observed that she was for a certain time in the day invisible. She had an apartment to herself above stairs, containing three or four rooms, when she was below stairs, we used to make a short way from one side of the house to the other, through her rooms, which occupied nearly one side of a quad rangle, of which the house consisted. One day, forget ting that she was in her room, and her door by accident not having been locked, I suddenly entered I saw her kneeling before a crucifix, which was placed upon her toilette, her beautiful eyes streaming with tears, and cast up to Heaven with the most fervent devotion, her silver locks flowing down her shoulders, the remains of exquisite beauty, grace, and dignity in her whole figure I had not, till I saw her at these her private devotions, known that she was a Catholic, nor had I, till I saw her tears of contrition, any reason to suppose that she thought herself a penitent The scene struck mc, young as I was, and more gay than young-her tears seemed to comfort, not to depress her-and for the first time since my childhood I was convinced that the consolations of religion are fully equal to its terrors. She was so much in earnest that she did not perceive me, and I fortunately had time to withdraw without having disturbed her devotions

Maria Edgeworth (1767-1849), daughter of the eccentric Richard Lovell Edgeworth, was born at Blackbourton on New-year's Day 1767, and in 1775 was sent to a school at Derby, in 1780 to a fashionable establishment in London When still a child she was famed for her story-telling powers, and at thirteen she wrote a tale on Generosity She accompanied her father to Ireland in 1782, and thenceforth till his death the two were never separate. For his sake mainly she sacrificed her one romance, refusing the hand of the Swedish Count Edelcrantz in 1802 at Paris, where, as again in 1820, and during frequent visits to London, she was greatly lionised. She was at Bowood (Lord Lansdowne's) in 1818, and at Abbotsford in 1823, Scott two years later returning the visit at Edge worthstown For the rest, her home life was busy and beneficent, if uneventful Her eyesight often troubled her, but, active to the last, at seventy she began to learn Spanish, and at eighty two could thoroughly enjoy Macaulay's History She died in her stepmother's arms

To the literary partnership between father and daughter we are directly indebted for Practical Education (2 vols 1798) and the Essay on Irish But most of her other works, Bulls (1802) though they do not bear the joint names, were inspired by her father, and gained or (it may be) lost by his revision Published between 1795 and 1847, they filled upwards of twenty volumes (1893 reprint in 10 vols) Besides the Moral Tales, the Popular Tales, and Tales from Fashionable Life (Ennin, The Dun, &c.), and Harrington (an apology for the Jews), there are her three Irish masterpieces, Casth Rackrent (1800), The Absence (1812), and Ormand

These, Scott says, 'have gone so far to make the English familiar with the character of their gay and kind-hearted neighbours of Ireland, that she may be truly said to have done more towards completing the Union than perhaps all the legislative enactments by which it has been followed up Without being so presumptuous as to hope to emulate the rich humour, pathetic tenderness, and admirable taste which pervade the works of my accomplished friend, I felt that something might be attempted for my own country of the same kind with that which she has so fortunately achieved for Ireland' The praise from Scott is extravagant, but Turgenief has put it on record that he 'was an unconscious disciple of Miss Edgeworth in setting out on his literary It is possible, may probable, that if Maria Edgeworth had not written about the poor Irish of County Longford and the squires and squireens, it would not have occurred to me to give a literary form to my impressions about the classes parallel to them in Russin' Her novels are doubtless too didactic, the plots may be poor, the dramatis persona sometimes wooden, but for wit and pathos, for lively dialogue and simple directness, for bright vivacity and healthy realism. and for their vivid presentation of their times and of that 'most distressful country' in which their best scenes are laid, they well deserve still to be read And her children's stories-'Lazy Laurence,' and 'Simple Susan,' and the other delightful old friends-are worth all the unchildish books about children which mawkish sentimentality has brought into recent vogue.

Irish Landlord and Scotch Agent

'I was quite angry,' says Lord Glenthorn, 'with Mr M'Leod, my agent, and considered him as a selfish, hard hearted miser, because he did not seem to sympathise with me, or to applaud my generosity. I was so much irritated by his cold silence that I could not forbear pressing him to say something "I doubt, then," said he, "since you desire me to speak my mind, my lord -I doubt whether the best way of encouraging the industrious is to give premiums to the idle " But, idle or not, these poor wretches are so miserable that I cannot refuse to give them something, and surely, when one can do it so easily, it is right to relieve misery, is it not? "Undoubtedly, my lord, but the difficulty is to relieve present misery without creating more in future Pity for one class of beings sometimes makes us cruel to others I am told that there are some Indian Brahmins so very compassionate that they hire beggars to let fleas feed upon them, I doubt whether it might not be better to let the fleas starve,"

'I did not in the least understand what Mr M'Leod meant, but I was soon made to comprehend it by erowds of eloquent beggars who soon surrounded me, many who had been resolutely struggling with their difficulties slackened their exertions, and left their labour for the easier trade of imposing upon my credulity. The money I had bestowed was wasted at the dram shop, or it became the subject of family quarrels, and those whom I had relieved returned to my honour with fresh and insatiable expectations. All this time my industrious tenants grumbled because no encouragement was given to them, and looking upon me as a weak, good natured fool, they combined in a resolution to ask me for long leases or a reduction of rent

'The rhetorie of my tenants succeeded in some instances, and again, I was mortified by Mr M'Leod's I was too proud to ask his opinion I ordered, and was obeyed A few leases for long terms were signed and sealed, and when I had thus my own way completely, I could not refrain from recurring to Mr M'Leod's opinion "I doubt, my lord," said he, "whether this measure may be as advantageous as you hope. These fellows, these middle men, will underset the land, and live in idleness, whilst they rack a parcel of wretched under tenants" But they said they would keep the land in their own hands and improve it, and that the reason why they could not afford to improve before was, that they liad not long leases "It may be doubted whether long leases alone will make improving tenants, for in the next county to us there are many farms of the Dowager lady Ormsby's land, let at ten shillings an acre, and her tenantry are beggars, and the land now at the end of the leases is worn out, and worse than at their commencement."

'I was weary of listening to this cold reasoning, and resolved to apply no more for explanations to Mr M'Leod, yet I did not long keep this resolution infirm of purpose, I wanted the support of his approbation, at the very time I was jealous of his interference

'At one time I had a mind to raise the wages of labout, but Mr M'Leod said "It might be doubted whether the people would not work less, when they could with less work have money enough to support them"

'I was puzzled, and then I had a mind to lower the wages of labour, to force them to work or starve. Still provoking, Mr M'Leod said "It might be doubted whether it would not be better to leave them alone."

'I gave marriage portions to the daughters of my tenants, and rewards to those who had children, for I had always heard that legislators should encourage population. Still Mr M'Leod hesitated to approve he observed "that my estate was so populous that the complaint in each family was that they had not land for the sons. It might be doubted whether, if a farm could support but ten people, it were wise to encourage the birth of twenty. It might be doubted whether it were not better for ten to live and be well fed, than for twenty to be born and to be half starved."

"To encourage manufactures in my town of Glenthorn, I proposed putting a clause in my leases compelling my tenants to buy stuffs and linens manufactured at Glenthorn, and nowhere else. Stubborn M'Lood, as usual, began with "I doubt whether that will not encourage the manufacturers at Glenthorn to make bad stuffs and bad linen, since they are sure of a sale, and without danger of competition."

'At all events I thought my tenants would grow rich and independent if they made everything at home that they winted, yet Mr M'Leod perplexed me by his "doubt whether it would not be better for a man to buy shoes, if he could buy them cheaper than he could make them" He added something about the division of labour and Smith's Wealth of Nations To which I could only answer, "Smith's a Scotchman." I cannot express how much I dreaded Mr M'Leod's I doubt and it may be doubted' (From Eurun.)

An Irish Postillion.

From the inn vard came a liackney chaise, in a most deplorably crazy state, the body mounted up to a prodigious height, on unbending springs, nodding forward, one door swinging open, three hlinds up, because they could not be let down, the perch tied in two places, the iron of the wheels half off, half loose, wooden pegs for linch-pins, and ropes for harness The horses were worthy of the harness, wretched little dog tired creatures, that looked as if they had been driven to the last gasp, and as if they had never been rubbed down in their lives, their bones starting through their skin, one lame, the other blind, one with a raw back, the other with a galled hreast, one with his neck poking down over his collar, and the other with his head dragged forward by a bit of a hroken bridle, held at arm's length by a man dressed like a mad beggar, in half a hat and half a wig, both awry in opposite directions, a long tattered coat, tied round his waist hy a hay-rope, the jagged rents in the skirts of this coat shewing his bare legs, marbled of many colours, while something like stockings hung loose about his ankles. The noises he made, by way of threatening or encouraging his steeds, I pretend not to describe. In an indignant voice I called to the landlord 'I hope these are not the horses—I hope this is not the chaise intended for my servants. The innkeeper, and the pauper who was preparing to officiate as postillion, both in the same instant exclaimed 'Sorrow better chaise in the county " "Sorrow " said I-" what do you mean by sorrow?' 'That there's no hetter, plase your honour, can be seen. We have two more, to be sure, but one has no top, and the other no bottom. Any way, there's no better can be seen than this same.' 'And these liorses " cried I 'why, this horse is so lame he can hardly stand' 'Oh, plase your honour, though he can t stand, he'll go fast enough. He has a great deal of the rogue in him, plase your honour He's always that way at first setting out' 'And that wretched animal with the galled breast '' 'He's all the better for it when once he warms, it's he that will go with the speed of light, plase your honour Sure, is not he knockecroghery? and didn't I give fifteen guineas for him, barring the luckpenny, at the fair of Knocke croghery, and be rising four year old at the same time?"

Then seizing his whip and reins in one hand, he clawed up his stockings with the other, so with one easy step he got into his place, and seated himself, coachman like, upon a well worn bar of wood, that served as a coach box. 'Throw me the loan of a trusty, Bartly, for a cushion,' said he. A frieze coat was thrown up over the horses' heads. Paddy caught it. 'Where are you, Hosey?' cried he to a lad in charge of the leaders. 'Sure I'm only rowling a wisp of straw on 'Throw me up,' added this my leg,' replied Hosev paragon of postillions, turning to one of the erowd of idle hy standers. 'Arrah, push me up, can't ye?' A man took hold of his knee, and threw him upon the horse. He was in his seat in a trice. Then clinging by the mane of his horse, he scrambled for the bridle, which was under the other horse's feet, reached it, and, well satisfied with bimself, looked round at Paddy, who looked back to the chaise door at my angry servants, 'secure in the last event of things'. In vain the Englishman, in monotonous anger, and the Frenchman in every note of the gamut, ahused Paddy Necessity and wit were on Paddy's side. He parried all that was said against his chaise, his horses, himself, and his country with invincible comic dexterity, till at last both his adversaries, dumfounded, clambered into the vehicle, where they were instantly shut up in straw and darkness. Paddy, in a triumphant tone, called to my postillions, hidding them 'get on, and not he stopping the way any longer' [One of the horses becomes restive.] 'Never fear,' reiterated Paddy 'I'll engage I'll be np wid him. Now for it, Knockecroghery' O the rogue, he thinks he has me at a nonplush, but I'll shew him the differ'

After this brag of war, Paddy whipped, Knocke croghery kicked, and Paddy, seemingly unconscious of danger, sat within reach of the kicking horse, twitching up first one of his legs, then the other, and shifting as the animal aimed his hoofs, escaping every time as it were hy miracle. With a mixture of temerity and pre sence of mind, which made us alternately look upon him as a madman and a hero, he gloried in the danger, secure of success, and of the sympathy of the spectators

'Ah' didn't I compass him cleverly then? O the villain, to be browbating me! I'm too 'cute for him vet See there, now, he's come to, and I'll be his bail he'!! go asy enough wid me. Ogh! he has a fine spirit of his own, but it's I that can match him 'Twould be a poor case if a man like me couldn't match a horse any way, let alone a mare, which this is, or it never would be so vicious' (From Ennum)

English Shyness, or 'Mauvaise Honte'

Lord William had excellent abilities, knowledge, and superior qualities of every sort, all depressed by exces sive timidity, to such a degree as to be almost useless to himself and to others Whenever he was, either for the business or pleasure of life, to meet or mix with numbers, the whole man was, as it were, snatched from himself He was subject to that nightmare of the soul who seats himself upon the human breast, oppresses the heart, palsies the will, and raises spectres of dismay which the sufferer combats in vain-that cruel enchantress who hurls her spell even upon childhood, and when she makes youth her victim, pronounces Henceforward you shall never appear in your natural character Inno cent, you shall look guilty, wise, you shall look silly, never shall you have the use of your natural faculties That which you wish to say, yon shall not say, that which you wish to do, you shall not do You shall appear reserved when you are enthusiastic-insensible, when your heart sinks into melting tenderness. In the presence of those whom you most wish to please, you shall be most awkward, and when approached by her you love, you shall become lifeless as a statue, and under the irresistible spell of 'mauvaise honte. Strange that France should give name to that malady of mind which she never knew, or of which she knows less than any other nation upon the surface of the civilised globe!

There is a Memoir of Miss Edgeworth (privatel) printed 3 vols 1867 edited by Aug J C. Hare 2 vols 1894) on which are founded the Life by Helen Zimmern (Eminent Women series 1883) and the exquisite sketch by Miss Thackeray [Mrs Richmond Ritchiel in her Book of Siörls (1883). See too the introductions by the latter to the excellent reprints of Castle Rackrent, The Absentee, and Ormond, issued in 1895 and the autohographical Memoir of Miss Edgeworth's father, completed by herself

Thomas Day (1748-89), the author of Sand ford and Merton, was born in London, and, when thirteen months old, by his father's death came into £900 a year From the Charterhouse he passed to Corpus College, Oxford, and presently struck up a close friendship with Richard Lovell Edgeworth In 1765 he entered the Middle Temple, in 1775 was called to the Bar, but he never practised A good, clever eccentric, a dis ciple of Rousseau, he brought up two girls, an orphan blonde and a foundling brunette, one of whom should become his wife That scheme miscarried, and, admitted to the Lichfield coterie, he proposed first to Honora Sneyd, and next to her sister Elizabeth She sent him to I rance to acquire the French graces, as acquired by him, they but moved her to laughter Finally in 1778 he married an appreciative heiress, and spent with her eleven happy years, farming on philanthropic and costly principles in Essex and Surrey, till in 1789 he was killed by a fall from a colt he was breaking in. His wife died broken hearted two years afterwards, and they both lie in Wargrave churchyard, near Henley Two only of Day's eleven works call for mention-The Dying Negro, partly by his friend James Bicknell, a barrister (1773), and the History of Saudford and Merton (3 vols 1783-89) The poem struck the keynote of the anti slavery movement, the child's book, like its author, is sometimes ridiculous but always excellent See Lives of Day by Keir (1791) and Blackman (1862), the Mentoirs of R L Edgeworth (1820), and Miss Thackerny's Book of Sibyls (1883)

Sir Nathanael William Wraxall (1751-1831), born at Bristol, was for three years in the East India Company's service, travelled over Europe (1772-79), and discharged various confidential and diplomatic missions. He published his Cursory Remarks made in a Tour in 1775, his Memoirs of the Valois Kings in 1777, entered Parliament in 1780 as a follower of Lord North, but went over to Pitt, and was made a baronet in 1813 His next books were the History of France from Henry III to Louis XIV (1795), Memoirs of the Courts of Berlin, Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna (1799), and the famous Historical Memoirs of my own Time, 1772-84, not published, however, till 1815 For a libel there made on Count Woronzov, Russian envoy to England, he was fined £500 and sentenced to six months' imprisonment Violent attacks on his veracity were made by the reviews, the Quarterly and the Edunburgh being, strange to say, equally denunciatory, Macaulay unkindly discovered and named a new scientific species 'Men dacium Wravillianum,' but Wrwall's Auswers were accounted sufficient to re establish his credit on the whole, though not perhaps to authenticate all his anecdotes A continuation of the Memoirs (1784-90) was published in 1836 See Wheatley's edition of the whole work (5 vols 1884)

Robert Hall (1764-1831), born at Arnsby near Leicester, was educated at a Baptist academy at Bristol and at Aberdeen, and was appointed assistant minister at Bristol and tutor in the academy Even at Bristol his eloquent preaching attracted overflowing audiences, and at Cambridge, whither he went in 1790, he rose to the highest rank of British pulpit orators Among his writings are an Apology for the Freedom of the Press (1793) and On Terms of Communion (1815) For twenty years he laboured in Laicester, but he returned in 1826 to Bristol His most famous sermon was that on the death of the Princess Charlotte in 1817 His works, with a Memoir by Dr O Gregory, were published in 1831-33 (11th ed 1853) It cannot be said that they give an adequate notion of the fuscination he produced on his audiences by his Dugald Stewart praised his fervid eloquence style as 'the English language in its perfection' There is a short Life of him by Paxton Hood (1881)

John Foster (1770-1843), 'the essavist,' was born in the parish of Halifax, Yorkshire, the elder son of a yeoman-weaver, and was trained for the ministry at Brierly Hall and the Baptist College in Bristol, but, after preaching for twenty-five years with indifferent success to various small congrega tions, lived by literature from 1817 on in a series of Letters (1805), were only four in number-the best-known that 'On Decision of Character' In 1819 appeared his Essay on the E-uls of Popular Ignorance, urging the necessity of national education. In 1806-39 he contributed one hundred and eighty-four articles to the Eclectic Review, some of which were republished in two volumes in 1844, and, in extracts, in Fosteriana. He died at Stapleton, Bristol, his home for twenty Mackintosh regarded him as 'one of the most profound and eloquent writers England had produced' His Life and Correspondence was edited by J E Ryland (1846, new ed 1852)

From the Essay 'On the Epithet Romantic'

If they chose, for their own and others' amusement, to dismiss a sound judgment awhile from its office, to stimu late their imagination to the wildest extravagances, and to depicture the fantastic career in writing, the book might be partly the same thing as if produced by a mind in which sound judgment had no place, it would exhibit imagination actually ascendant by the writer's voluntary indulgence, though not necessarily so by the constitution of his mind. It was a different case if a writer kept his judgment active amidst these very extravagances, with the intention of shaping and directing them to some particular end, of saure or sober truth But, however, the romances of the ages of chivalry and the preceding times were composed under neither of these intellectual They were not the productions either of conditions men who, possessing a sound judgment, chose formally to suspend its exercise, in order to riot awhile in scenes of extravagant fancy, only keeping that judgment so far awake as to retain a continual consciousness in what degree they vere extraviguat, or of men designing to give effect to truth or malice under the disguise of a fantastic exhibition. It is evident that the authors were under the real ascendency of imagination, so that, though they must at times have been conscious of committing great excesses, yet they were on the whole wonderfully little sensible of the enormous extravagance of their fictions. They could drive on their career through monstrous absurdities of description and narra tion, without, apparently, any check from a sense of inconsistency, improbability, or impossibility, and with an air as if they really reckoned on being taken for the ventable describers of something that could exist or happen within the mundane system. And the general state of intellect of the age in which they lived seems to have been well fitted to allow them the utmost license. The irrationality of the romancers, and of the age, provoked the observing and powerful mind of Cervantes to expose it by means of a parallel and still more extravagant representation of the prevalence of imagination over reason, drawn in a ludicrous form, by which he ren dered the folly palpable even to the sense of that age. From that time the delirium alated, the works which inspirited its ravings have been blown away beyond the knowledge and curiosity of any but bihliomaniaes, and the fabrication of such is gone among the lost branches of manufacturing art

Yet romance was in some form to be retained, as in dispensable to the craving of the human mind for some thing more vivid, more elated, more wonderful, than the plain realities of life, as a kind of mental balloon, for mounting into the air from the ground of ordinary ex perience To afford this extra rational kind of luxury, it was requisi e that the fictions should still partake, in a limited degree, of the quality of the earlier romance. The writers were not to be the dupes of wild fancy, they were not to feign marvels in such a manner us if they knew no better, they were not wholly to lose sight of the actual system of things, but to keep within some measures of relation and proportion to it, and yet they were required to disregard the strict laws of verisimili tude in shaping their inventions, and to magnify and diversify them with an indulgence of fancy very con siderably beyond the bounds of probability Without this their fictions would have lost what was regarded as the essential quality of romance

If, therefore, the epithet Romantic, as now employed for description and censure of character, sentiments, and schemes, is to be understood as expressive of the quality which is characteristic of that class of fictions, it imputes, in substance, a great excess of imagination in proportion to judgment, and it imputes, in particulars, such errors as naturally result from that excess

It is not strange that a faculty of v hich the exercise is so easy and beyrtching, and the scope infinite, should obtain a predominance over judgment, especially in young persons, and in such as may have been brought up, lil e Rasselas and his companions, in great seclusion from the Indeed, a consider sight and experience of the world able vigour of imagination, though it be at the expense of a frequent predominance over juvenile understanding, seems necessary, in early life, to cause a generous ex pansion of the passions, by giving the most lively aspect to the objects which must attract them in order to draw forth into activity the faculties of our nature. It may also contribute to prepare the mind for the exercise of that faith which converses with things unseen, but converses with them through the medium of those ideal forms in which imagination presents them, and in which only a strong imagination can present them impressively And I should deem it the indication of a character not destined to excel in the liberal, the energetic, or the devout qualities, if I observed in the youthful age a close confinement of thought to bare truth and minute accuracy, with an entire aversion to the splendours, amplifications, and excursions of fancy The opinion is warranted by instances of persons so distinguished in youth, who have become subsequently very intelligent indeed, in a cer tain way, but dry, cold, precise, devoted to detail, and incapable of being carried away one moment by any inspiration of the beautiful or the sublime. They seem to have only the bare intellectual mechanism of the human mind, without the addition of what is to give it life and sentiment. They give one an impression analogous to that of the leafless trees observed in winter, admirable for the distinct exhibition of their branches and minute ramifications so clearly defined on the sky, but destitute of all the green soft luxury of foliage which is requisite to make a perfect tree. And the affections which may exist in such minds seem to have a bleak abode, somewhat like those bare deserted nests which yon have often seen in such trees

If, indeed, the signs of this exclusive understanding in dicated also such an extraordinary vigour of the faculty as to promise a very great mathematician or meta physician, one would perhaps be content to forgo some of the properties which form a complete mind, for the sake of this pre eminence of one of its endowments, even though the person vec to be so defective in sentiment and fancy that, as the story goes of an eminent mathic matician, he could read through a most animated and splendid epic poem, and on being asked what he thought of it, grively reply, 'What does it prove?' But the want of imagination is never an evidence, and perhaps but rarely a concomitant, of superior understanding

Catherine Maria Fanshawe (1765–1834), the deformed and sickly daughter of a Surrey squire, was, like the two sisters with whom she lived in London, an accomplished draftswoman, and, though her poems were not printed till much later, was famous as a poetess towards the end of the eighteenth century best known poem is the fanious 'Riddle on the Letter H,' commonly credited to Lord Byron, of which the first line was altered-apparently by Horace Smith-to the form now current, "Twas whispered in heaven, 'twis muttered in hell,' though some of her serious poems are equally noteworthy The serio-comic Elegy on the Buthnight Ball is also famous, it begins

Now cease the exulting strain,
And bid the warbling live complain,
Heave the soft sigh and drop the tuncful tear,
And mingle notes far other than of mirth,
E'en with the song that greets the new born year,
Or hails the day that give a monarch birth

A Riddle on the Letter H.

'Twas in heaven pronounced—it was muttered in hell, And echo caught faintly the sound as it fell, On the confines of earth 'twas permitted to rest, And the depth of the ocean its presence confessed 'Twill be found in the sphere when 'tis riven asunder, Be seen in the lightning, and heard in the thunder 'Twas allotted to man with his earliest breath, Attends at his birth and awaits him in death Presides o'er his happiness, honour, and health, Is the prop of his house, and the end of his wealth In the heaps of the miser 'tis hoarded with care, But is sure to be lost on his prodigal heir It begins every hope, every wish it must bound, With the husbandman toils, and with monarchs is crowned Without it the soldier, the serman may roam, But woe to the wretch who expels it from home ! In the whispers of conscience its voice will be found, Nor e'en in the whirlwind of passion is drowned 'I'will not soften the heart, and tho' deaf be the ear, It will make it acutely and instantly hear Yet in shade let it rest like a delicate flower, Ah, breathe on it softly-it dies in an hour

James Beresford (1764-1820), born at Upham in Hampshire, was educated at the Charterhouse and at Merton College, Oxford, and died rector of Kibworth Beauchamp in Leices tershire. He wrote verse translations, religious works, and, in humorous dialogues, The Miseries of Human Life (1806-7), which scored a great success and found numerous imitators. It went through ninc editions in a twelvemonth-largely because it formed the subject of an amusing critique in the Edinburgh Review from the pen of Sir Walter Scott 'It is the English only,' Scott declared, 'who submit to the same tyranny, from all the incidental annoyances and petty vexations of the day, as from the serious calamities of life, 'and it is these petty miseries which in this work form the subject of dialogues between the imaginary interlocutors, Limothy Testy and Samuel Sensitive The jokes are frequently artificial, overstrained, and trifling, and the classical quotations far-fetched, but the author's aim was doubtless attained - the book give him éclat, and its readers laughed. These are two of the briefer 'groans'

After having left a company in which you have been galled by the raillery of some wag by profession, thinking at your leisure of a repartee which, if discharged at the proper moment, would have blown him to atoms

Rashly confessing that you have a slight cold in the hearing of certain elderly ladies 'of the faculty,' who instantly form themselves into a consultation upon your case, and assail you with a volley of nostrums, all of which, if you would have a moment's peace, you must solemnly promise to take off before night—though well satisfied that they would retaliate by 'taking you off' before morning

William Robert Spencer (1769–1834), a grandson of the third Duke of Marlborough, was educated at Harrow and Christ Church, Oxford, and from 1797 to 1826 was a commissioner of stamps. He wrote many vers de société, somewhat evaggerated in compliment and adulation, and wittily purodied in Rejected Addresses. Falling into pecuniary difficulties, he migrated in 1825 to Paris, and there he died. He was one of several

English authors (H J Pye, Taylor of Norwich, Sir Walter Scott amongst them) who about the same date translated Burger's Lenore Spencer's (1796) had many excellences, though the swift movement of Burger's varied measure is but imperfectly reproduced in monotonous verses of this kind

The fiend horse snorts, blue fiery snakes
Collected roll his nostrils round;
High reared his bristling mane he shakes,
And sinks beneath the rending ground
Demons the thundering clouds bestride, Ghosts yell the yawning tombs beneath,
Leonora's heart, its life blood dried,
Heaves heavy in the grisp of death

Of his original poems, 'Too late I stayed' his been often quoted, but by fir the best-known (based on the Welsh form of the widespread and greatly varying folk tale) was his ballad of

Beth Gelert, or the Grave of the Greyhound.

The spearmen heard the bugle sound, And cheerly smiled the morn, And many a brach and many a hound Obeyed Llewelyn's horn

And still he blew a louder blast,
And gave a lustier cheer
'Come, Gelert, come, west never last Llewelyn's horn to hear

'Oh, where does faithful Gelert roam, The flower of all his race, So true, so brave—a lamb at home, A lion in the chase?'

'Twas only at Llewelyn's board
The faithful Gêlert fed,
He watched, lie served, lie cheered his lord,
And sentincled his bed

In sooth he was a peerless hound,
The gift of royal John,
But now no Gêlert could be found,
And all the chace rode on

And now, as o'er the rocks and dells
The gallant chidings rise,
All Snowden's eraggy chaos yells
The many mingled cries!

That day Llewelyn little loved
The chace of hart and hare,
And scant and small the booty proved,
For Gêlert was not there

Unpleased, Llewelyn homeward hied, When, near the portal seat, His truant Gêlert he espied, Bounding his lord to greet

But when he gained his castle door,
Aghast the chiefinin stood,
The hound all o'er was smeared with gore,
His lips, his fungs, ran blood

Llewelyn gazed with fierce surprise,
Unused such looks to meet,
His favourite checked his joyful guise,
And crouched, and licked his feet

Onward, in haste, Llewelyn passed, And on went Gelert too, And still, where'er his eyes he cast, Fresh blood gouts shocked his view

O erturned his infant's bed he found, With blood stained covert rent, And all around, the walls and ground With recent blood besprent

He called his child—no voice replied— He searched with terror wild, Blood, blood he found on every side, But nowhere found his child.

'Hell hound 'my child's by thee devoured' The frantic father eried, And to the hilt his vengeful sword He plunged in Gelert's side

His suppliant looks, as prone lie fell, No pity could impart, But still his Gelert's dying yell Passed heavy o'er his heart.

Aroused ly Gelert's dying yell,
Some slumberer wal ened nigh
What words the parent's joy could tell
To hear his infant's cry'

Concealed beneath a tumbled heap His hurried search had missed, All glowing from his rosy sleep, The cherub boy he kissed.

Nor scathe had he, nor harm, nor dread, But, the same couch beneath, Lav a gaunt wolf, all torn and dead, Tremendous still in death

Ah, what was then Llewelyn's pain '
For now the truth was clear,
Itis gallant hound the wolf had slain
To save Llewelyn's heir

Vain, vain was all Llewelyn's woe,

'Best of thy kind, adieu'
The frantic blow which laid thee low
Flus heart shall ever rue'

And now a gallant tomb they raise, With cos ly sculpture decked, And marbles storied with his praise Poor Gélert's bones protect.

There, never could the spearman pass, Or forester unmoved, There, oft the tear-besprinkled grass Llewelyn's sorrow proved

And there he hung his horn and spear, And there, as evening fell, In fancy's ear he oft would hear Poor Gélert's dying yell

And, till great Snowden's rocks grow old, And cease the storm to brave, The consecrated spot shall hold The name of Gelert's Grave

The Visionary

When midnight o er the moonless skies Her pall of transient death has spread, When mortals sleep, when spectres rise, And nought is vakeful but the dead No bloodless shape my way pursues, 'No sheeted ghost my couch annoys, Visions more sad my fancy views, Visions of long departed joys!

The shade of vonthful hope is there,
That lingered long, and latest died,
Ambition all dissolved to air,
With phantom honours by his side.

What empty shadows glimmer nigh?
They once were Friendship, Truth, and Love!
Oh, die to thought, to memory die,
Since lifeless to my heart ye prove!

These last two verses Sir Walter Scott, who knew and esteemed Spencer, quotes in his diary as fine lines expressing his own feelings amidst the wreck of his fortunes at Abbotsford A Memoir of Spencer was prefixed to a volume of his poems reprinted in 1835

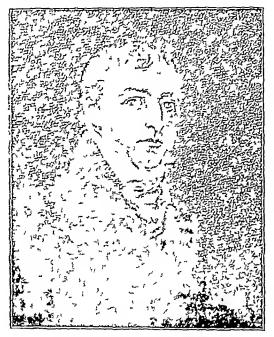

Francis Wrangham (1769–1842), son of a Yorkshire farmer, studied at Cambridge, and became an accomplished classic, English poet, and miscellaneous writer With Basil Montagu's assistance he took in pupils at his Surrey curacy, issuing an elaborate scheme of study which led Sir James Mackintosh to say 'A boy thus educated will be a walking encyclopædia,' he was ultimately Archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire and Prebendary of Chester The thirty six publications by him named in the Dictionary of Vational Biography comprise Latin poems, English poems, songs, translations from Aristophanes, Virgil, Horace, Petrarch, sermons, books on the evidences of Christianity, and the English version commonly printed of Milton's second Definsio

Sh John Malcolm (1769-1833) was born at Burnfoot near Langholm, and at thirteen entered the Madras army, distinguished himself at Seringapatam (1799) and in the wars with the Pindaris and Holkar, and besides holding minor political appointments in Mysore, the Deccan, &c., was thrice ambassador to Persia in 1800-10, and Governor of Bombay (1827-30) In 1812-17 and ngain in 1822-30 he was in England, being knighted in 1812, in due time he became GCB, and having entered Parliament in 1831, opposed the Reform Bill. Several of his works became standard authorities A History of Persia (1815), Memoir of Central India (1823), Political History of India, 1784-1823 (1826), Sketches in Persia (1827), and Life of Clive (1836) A Life of him was written by Knye (1856)

James Montgomery (1771-1854) was born at Irvine in Avrshire, the son of a Moravian pastor, who from Ireland went to Barbadoes in 1783, and there died. The boy had in 1777 been sent to the Moravian school at Fulneck near Leeds, and, after ten dreamy years there, was put apprentice to a grocer at Mirfield. In his sixteenth year, with 3s 6d in his pocket, he ran away from Mirfield, and, after some suffering, became a shop boy in the village of Wath. He next tried London, carrying with him a collection of his poems, but failed to obtain a publisher. In 1792 he was clerk in a newspaper office in Sheffield, four years later he became editor of the Sheffield Iris, a weekly journal, which he conducted on Liberal lines and in a kindly spirit till 1825 But his course did not always run smooth. In January 1795 he was tried for having struck off a broadsheet ballad by a Belfast clergyman on the demolition of the Bastille, it was really his predecessor who had printed it, but Montgomery was sentenced to three months' imprisonment in York Castle, and a fine of £20 In January 1796, tried for a paragraph in his paper on the conduct of a ningistrate in qualling a riot at Sheffield, he was again convicted, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine of £30

The Wanderer of Switzerland, and other Poems

JAMES MONTGOMERY
From an Engraving after Chantrey

(1806), dealing with the French occupation, was his first poem to catch the public ear, and speedily went through two editions, his publishers had just issued a third, when the Edinburgh Review of January 1807 'denounced the unfortunate volume in a style of such authoritative reprobation as no mortal verse could be expected to survive,' and prophesied immediate oblivion for the author and Nevertheless a score of editions of all his works what is admittedly a feeble poem appeared a lyric in it, 'The Grave,' has been always recognised as one of his best things, both Blackwood and Byron commended it. The West Indies (1809), written (in heroic couplets) in honour of the abolition of the since trade, is an eloquent, sincere, and tender expression of the kindlier sentiment of the time. Prison Amusements he had written during his nine months' confinement in York Castle. The World before the Flood, a more elaborate poem in ten cantos, describes with much energy and with frequent touches of real human interest the antediluvian patriarchs in their happy valley, the invasion of Eden by the descendants of Cain, the loves of Javan and Zillah, the translation of Enoch, and the final deliverance of the little band of patriarchal families from the giants Thoughts on IVheels (1817) was a verse denunciation of State lotteries, and The Climbing Boy's Soliloquies, also in verse, was levelled by him and others against the cruel practice of sending boys up Greenland (1819), a poem in five chimneys cantos, dealing with the Ancient Moravian Church, its revival in the eighteenth century, and its missions to Greenland, secured favour even outside devout circles both by descriptive power and narrative interest. Montgomery's only other long poem, The Pelican Island, in nine cantos of blank verse, was suggested by a passage in Captain Flinders's voyage to Terra Australis, describing the ancient haunts of the pelican on the small islands off the Australian coast.

He wrote also a number of short pieces pub lished in periodicals, short translations from Dinte and Petrarch, and many hymns which have found wide acceptance, such as 'Go to dark Gethsemane,' 'For ever with the Lord,' 'Songs of praise the angels sang, 'Hail to the Lord's anointed,' 'According to thy gracious word, and 'Pour out thy spirit from on high' Dr John Julian computes that about a hundred of his hymns are still in common use. His selection of hymns, with introduction and notes, called The Christian Psalmist (1825), has been said to have laid the foundation of scientific hymnology 1830 and 1831 he delivered a course of lectures at the Royal Institution on Poetry and General Literature, published in 1833 A pension of £,150, conferred at the instance of Sir Robert Peel in 1835, he enjoyed till his death, at eighty-three, in 1854. Montgomery was a warm-hearted, earnest, good man, a philanthropist universally esteemed, but was great neither as a thinker nor as a poet His later poems, just touched by Shelley's influence instead of Campbell's, are decidedly better The longer ones are too long, than his earlier and tediously didactic, though relieved here and there by admirable descriptive passages 'Conscience, the bosom-hell of guilty man,' 'Where justice reigns, 'tis freedom to obey,' and the like fragments quoted from him, are rather ethical maxims than poetical thoughts Many of his shorter pieces and lyrics are really fine, but his following was always mainly amongst those who sympathised most heartily with his theological views and prized his works for their religious tone and ethical teaching. He did not overestimate his own powers as a poet, and frankly anticipated that none of his poems would live—'except perhaps a few of my hymns? He was apparently a true prophet, save for the hymns and a few selections, he is even now hardly read or remembered

From 'Greenland.'

'Tis sunset, to the firmament serene The Atlantic wave reflects a gorgeous scene, Broad in the cloudles west, a bult of gold Girds the blue hemisphere, above unrolled The keen clear air grows palpable to sight, Embodied in a flush of crimson light, Through which the evening star, with milder gleam, Descends to meet her image in the stream Far in the cast, what spectacle unknown Allnres the eye to gaze on it alone? Amidst plack rocks, that lift on either hand Their coun less peaks, and mark receding land, Amidst a tortuous labyrinth of seas That shine around the Arctic Cyclades, Amilit a coast of dreames continent, In many a shap-less promontory rent O'er tocks, seas, islands promontories spread, The ice blink rears as undulated licad, On which the sun, beyon I the horizon shrined, Hath Lift his richest garniture behind Piled on a hundred arches, ridge by ridge, Oer fixed and fluid strides the alpine landge, Whose blocks of sapphire seem to mortal eye Hern from cerulean quarric, in the sky, W 'h graeier hattlements that crowd the spheres, The slow creation of six thousand years, Arnidst immensity it towers si blime, Wm er's eternal palace, built by Time Ali human structures by his touch are borne Do in to the dust mountains themselves are worn With his light footsteps, here for ever grow, imid the region of unnielting enous, A monument, where every flale that falls Gives adaman ine firinness to the walls The san beholds no mirror in his rice. That shed is a brighter image of his face, The stars, in their nocturnal vigils, rest like signal fire, on its illumined crest, The gliding moon around the ramparts wheels, And all its magic lights and shades reveals, Beneath, the tide with equal fury raves, To undermine it through a thousand caves, Rent from its roof, though thundering fragments oft Plunge to the gulf, immovable aloft, From age to age, in air, o er sea, on land, Its turrets heighten and its piers expand

Hark through the calm and silence of the scene, Slow, solemn, sweet, with many a pause between, Celestial music swells along the air I No ' 'tis the evening liymn of praise and prayer From yonder deck, where, on the stern retired, Three liumble voyagers, with looks inspired, And hearts enkindled with a holier slame Than ever lit to empire or to fame, Devoutly stand their choral accents rise On wings of harmony beyond the skies, And, 'midst the songs that seruph minstrels sing, Day without night, to their immortal king, These simple strains, which erst Bohemian hills Echoed to pathless woods and desert rills, Now heard from Shetland's azure bound-are known In heaven, and He who sits upon the throne In human form, with mediatorial power, Remembers Calvary, and hails the hour

When, by the Almighty Father's high decree, The utmost north to him shall bow the knee, And, won by love, an untamed rebel race kiss the victorions sceptre of his grace Then to his eye, v hose instant glance pervades Heaven's heights, earth's circle, hell's profoundest shades, Is there a group more lovely than those three Night watching pilgrims on the lonely sea? Or to his ear, that gathers in one sound The voices of adoring worlds around Comes there a breath of more delightful praise Than the faint notes his poor disciples raise, Er, on the treacherous main they sink to rest. Secure as leaning on their Master's breast? They sleep, but memory walles, and dreams array Night in a lively masquerade of day,

The land they seek, the land they leave behind, Meet on mid ocean in the plastic mind. One brings for aken home and friends so nigh, That tears in slumber swell the unconscious eye The other opens, with prophetic view, Penls which e'en their fathers never knew (Though schooled by suffering, long mured to toil, Outerst- and exiles from their natal soil), Strange scenes, strange men, untold, untried distress, Pain, hardships, famine, cold, and nul edness, Diseases, death in every hideous form, On shore at sea, by fire, by flood, by storm, Will beasts, and wilder men-unmoved with fear, Health, comfort, safety, life, they count not dear, May they but hope a Saviour's love to sher, And warn one spirit from eternal woe Nor will they faint, nor can they strive in vain, Since thus to live is Christ, to die is gain I is morn the bathing moon her lustre shrouds,

Tis morn—the bathing moon her lustre shrouds Wide o'er the east impends in irch of clouds. That spans the ocean, while the infant dawn Peeps through the portal o er the liquid lawn, That ruffled by an April gale appears, Between the gloom and splendour of the spheres, Dark purple as the moorland lieath, when rain Hings in low vapours over the autumnal plain. Till the full sun, resurgent from the flood, I ooks on the waves, and turns then into blood, but quickly kindling, as his beams aspire, The lambent billows play in forms of fire. Where is the vessel? shining through the light, Like the white sea fowl's horizontal flight, I onder she wings, and skims, and cleaves her way. Through refluent foam and indescent spray.

Night

Night is the time for rest,

How sweet, when labours close,
To gather round an aching breast

The curtain of repose,
Stretch the tired limbs, and lay the head
Upon our own delightful bed!

Night is the time for dreams,
The gry romance of life,
When trith that is, and truth that seems,
Blend in fantastic strife,
Ah! visions less beguiling far
Than waking dreams by daylight are!

Night is the time to weep,

To wet with unseen tears

Those graves of memory where sleep

The joys of other years,

Hopes that were angels in their birth,

But perished young like things on earth

Night is the time to think,

Then from the eye the soul
Takes flight, and on the utmost brink
Of yonder starry pole,
Discerns beyond the abass of night
The dawn of uncreated light

Night is the time to pray,
Our Saviour oft withdrew
To desert inountains far away,
So will his followers do,
Steal from the throng to haunts untrod,
And commune there alone with God

Night is the time for death,
When all around is peace,
Calmly to yield the wears breath,
From sin and suffering cease
Think of heaven's bliss, and give the sign
To parting friends—such death be mine!

From 'The Pelican Island,'

Light as a flake of foam upon the wind, keel upward from the deep emerged a shell, Shaped like the moon ere half her horn is filled, Truight with young life, it righted as it rose, And moved at will along the yielding water The native pilot of this little bark Put out a tier of oars on either side, Sprend to the wafting breeze a twofold sail, And mounted up and glided down the billow In happy freedom, pleased to feel the air, And wander in the luxury of light Worth all the dead creation, in that hour, To me appeared this lonely Nantilus, My fellow being, like myself alive Entranced in contemplation, vigue yet sweet, I watched its vigrant course and rippling wake, Fill I forgot the sun amidst the heavens

It closed, sunk, dwindled to a point, then nothing, While the last bubble crowned the dimpling eddy, Through which mine eye still giddily pursued it, A joyous creature vaulted through the air-The aspiring fish that fain would be a bird, On long, light wings, that flung a diamond shower Of dew drops round its evanescent form, Spring into light, and instantly descended Ere I could great the stranger as a friend, Or mourn his quick departure, on the surge A short of dolphins, tumbling in wild glee, Glowed with such orient tints, they might have been The runbow's offspring, when it met the ocean In that respleadent vision I had seen While yet in ecstasy I hung o'er these, With every motion pouring out fresh beauties, As though the conscious colours came and went At pleasure, glorying in their subtle changes Enormous o'er the flood, Leviathan Looked forth, and from his roaring nostrils sent Two fountains to the sky, then plunged amain In headlong pastime through the closing gulf

Aspirations of Youth.

Higher, higher, will we climb,
Up the mount of glory,
That our names may live through time
In our country s story
Happy, when her welfare calls,
He who conquers, he who falls '

Deeper, deeper, let us toil
In the mines of knowledge,
Nature's wealth and learning's spoil,
Win from school and college,
Delve we there for richer gems
Than the stars of diadems

Onward, onward, will we press
Through the path of duty,
Virtue is true happiness,
I reclience true beauty
Minds are of supernal birth,
Let us male a heaven of earth

Clo er, closer, then we knit Hearts and hands together,
Where our fireside comforts sit,
In the wildest weather
Oh they wander wide who roam,
For the joys of life, from home.

Nearer, dearer hands of love Draw our souls in union, To our l'ather's house above, To the saints' comminion, Thither every hope assend, There may all our labours end

The Common Lot

Once, in the flight of types past,

There had a man and who was he?

Mortal! howe or the lot be east,

That man resembled thee

Unknown the region of his birth,

The land in which he died inknown
His name has perished from the earth,
This truth survives alone

That joy, and grief, and hope, and fear,
Alternate triumphed in his breast.
His bliss and woe—a smile, a tear!
Oblivion hides the rest

The bounding pulse, the langual limb,
I he changing spirits' rise and fall,
We know that these were felt by lum,
For these are felt by all

He suffered—but his pange are o er, Enjoyed—but his delights are fled, Had friends—his friends are now no more, And foes—his foes are dead

He loved—but whom he loved the grave
Hath lost in its unconscious womb
Oh, she was fair! but nought could save
Her beauty from the tomb

He saw whatever thou hast seen,
Encountered all that troubles thee
He was—whatever thou hast been,
He is—what thou shalt be.

The rolling seasons, day and night,
Sun, moon, and stars, the earth and main,
Erewhile his portion, life, and light,
To him exist in vain

The clouds and sunbeams, o'er his eye
That once their shades and glory threw,
Have left in yonder silent sky
No vestige where they flev

The annals of the human race,
Their ruins, since the world began,
Of him afford no other trace
Than this—there lived a man'

Prayer

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire Uttered or unexpressed, The motion of a hidden fire That trembles in the breast.

Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear,
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near

Prayer is the simplest form of speech
That infant lip, can try,
Prayer the sublimest strains that reach
The Majesty on high

Prayer is the Christian's vital breath, The Christian's native air, His watchword at the gates of death He enters heaven by prayer

Prayer is the contrite sinner's voice Returning from his ways, While angels in their songs rejoice, And say, 'Behold, he prays'

The saints in prayer appear as one In word, and deed, and mind, When with the Father and his Son Their fellowship they find

Nor prayer is made on earth alone The Holy Spirit pleads, And Jesus, on the eternal throne, For sinners intercedes.

O Thou, by whom we come to God, The Life, the Truth, the Way, The path of prayer thyself hast trod Lord, teach us how to pray '

Home

There is a land, of every land the pride, Beloved by heaven o'er all the world beside, Where brighter suns dispense serener light, And milder moons emparadise the night, A land of beauty, virtue, valour, truth, Time tutored age, and love evalted vouth The wandering mariner, whose eve explores The wealthiest isles, the mot enchanting shores, views not a realm so bountiful and fair, Nor breathes the spirit of a purer air. In every clime the magnet of his soul, Touched by remembrance, trembles to that pole, For in this land of heaven' peculiar grace, The heritage of nature's noblest race,

There is a spot of earth supremely blest, A dearer, sweeter spot than all the rust, Where man, creation's tyrant, casts uside His sword and sceptre, pageantry and pride, While in his softened looks benignly blend The sire, the son, the husband, brother, friend. Here woman reigns, the mother, daughter, wife, Strew with fresh flowers the narrow way of life ' In the clear heaven of her delightful eye, An angel guard of loves and graces lie, Around her I nees domestic duties meet, And fireside pleasures gambol at her feet Where shall that land, that spot of earth be found? Art thou a man?-a patriot?-look around, Oh, thou shalt find, howe'er thy footsteps roam, That land the country, and that spot the home

Montgomery's works, in four volumes, were published in 18x1, and continued to be occasionally reprinted and portentous Memoirs were published by his friends Holland and Everett (7 vols. 1°54-50).

Thomas Hope (1770?-1831), the author of Anastasius, was one of three brothers, merchant princes of Amsterdam, whose Scottish ancestor settled in Holland in the seventeenth century When a young man he studied architecture as a profession, and spent some years sketching buildings in Egypt, Greece, Syria, Turkey, Sicily, and Spain On the French occupation of Holland, he settled in London, purchased a town house and a country mansion (Deepdene, near Dorking), which he decorated with magnificence, and in his splendid galleries he collected sculptures, vases, antiques, and pictures In 1807 he published a folio volume of drawings and descriptions of Household Furniture and Decorations The ambitious style, and the author's then quite eccentric devotion to the forms of chairs, sofas, couches, and tables, provoked a witty piece of ridicule in the Edinbin (1 Review, Byron jeered at him as a house furnisher But Hope had his revenge, through his efforts a change of taste observably gained ground. I wo other splendid publications, The Costume of the Ancients (1809) and Designs of Modern Costumes (1812) show wide knowledge and curious research In 1819 Hope dawned on society as a novelist of the first order. He had studied human nature as well as architecture and costume, and his travels had brought him into close contact with men of various creed and race. The result was Anastasius, or Memoirs of a Modern Greek, written at the close of the Lighteenth Century, in three volumes, anonymously published as a ventable history credited to Byron and others, and the idea of Hope's authorship was ridiculed till he expressly announced in Blackwood that it was his And then Hope, from being reputed a learned upholsterer or clever draftsman, was at once clevated into a rivaley with Byron as a painter of foreign scenery and manners, and with Le Sage and the other masters of the picaresque novel. The author, turning from fiction to philosophy, wrote next On the Origin erd Prospects of Man, and amidst his paradoxes, unorthodox conceits, and abstruce speculations are many original suggestions and eloquent disquis - tions He was author also of an Essay on Architecture, published in 1835, which went through several editions At his death probate was granted for £180,000 worth of personal property Parallels have been instituted between Hope and Anastasius and Beckford and Vathek

The hero of Hope's very original romance is, like Zeluco, a villain spoiled by early indulgence, he becomes a renegade to his faith, a mercenary, a robber, and an assassin, but the elements of his better nature show themselves at times To avoid the consequences of an amour with a consul's drughter, he runs off to sea in a Venetian vessel, which is captured by pirates The pirates are in turn taken by a Turkish frigate, and Anastasius, released, fights with the Turks in the war against the Arnaouts, and accompanies the Greek dragonian to Constantinople Disgrace and beggary reduce him to various shifts and adventures follows a Jew quack doctor selling nostrums, is thrown into the Bagnio, the state prison, embraces the Turkish faith, revisits Greece, proceeds to Egypt, ranges over Arabia, and visits Malta, Sicily, and Italy In the story of his innumerable intrigues, adventures, and disasters, every aspect of Greek and Turkish society is depicted, sarcasm, piquant allusion, pathos and passion, and descrip tions of scenery being strangely intermingled Epigram and rhetorical amplification occupy too much space, but the constantly shifting scene idds the variety of a book of travels to the fasci nation of a romance The story-teller, gifted with keen insight into human weakness, describes his idventures without hypocrisy or reserve. If the pictresque elements are the most sprightly and entertaining, the most powerful passages are perhips the pathetic-the scenes with Euphrosyne, whom Anastasius has basely dishonoured, his sensations on revisiting Greece and the tomb of Helena, his reflections on the dead Arnaout soldier whom he had slain, the horrors of the plague and famine, and the death of Alexis, in whom were centred the only remains of his love and hope.

Anastasius begins Life

My family came originally from Epirus, my father settled at Chios. His parentage was neither exalted nor yet low. In his own opinion he could boast of purer blood than any of the Palæologi, the Cantacusenes, or the Comneni of the present day. These mongrel de scendants, he used to observe, of Grecks, Venetians, and Genoese, had only picked up the fine names of former age, when the real owners dropped off he wore his own, and Signor Sotiri saw no reason why he should not, when he went forth into public, toos his head, swing his jubbee like a pendulum, from side to side, and shuffle along in his papooshes, with all the airs of quality

This worthy man combined in his single person the various characters of diplomatist, husbandman, merchant, mannfacturer, and master of a privateer. To be more explicit—he was drogueman to the French consul at Chios, in town he kept a silk loom at work, in the country lie liad a plantation of agricum, he exported his stuffs and fruits to the principal scaports in the Archi pelago, and, in the first Russian war, he employed all his spare money in fitting out a small vessel to cruise against the enemy-for so he chose to consider the Russians. in spite of all their amicable professions towards the Greeks As a loyal subject of the Porte, and an old servant of the French Government, he felt no sort of wish to be delivered from the yoke of the Turks, and he looked upon those burbarians of the north, who cared no more for the patriarch of Constantinople than for the Pope of Rome, as little better than rank heretics, not worthy of being treated even like his silk worms, which he got every year carefully evorcised before their spinning I however remember, when a child, some buzz in the family about my father's partner in the privateer-an Ipsariote reis-having one day made a mistake, in cap turing under the rocks of Jura a rich Turkish vessel, which he went and sold to the Russians themselves, then stationed at Paros Signor Sotin shook his head at this intelligence as if he did not approve of the transaction, and observed, 'The less that was said about it the better' -I suppose therefore it was out of sheer humanity that he preferred receiving his share of the prize money, to the sterile and barbarous satisfaction of hanging his associate

Much improved in his circumstances by this untoward accident, my father would now willingly have given np his interpretership. Besides rendering him more or less dependent, it was uncomfortable in as far as, heing very deaf, he never heard what it was his business to repeat. But my mother liked the title of droguemaness. She had never heard of the necessity of a drogueman reporting speeches as he received them, and she reminded her husband how essential the protection of the French mission might be to some of his Greek speculations.

My mother was a native of Naxos, and esteemed a great heiress in her country. Slie possessed an estate of three hundred phastres a year clear, managed by a relation of her own, Marco Pohti—very wealthy himself, primate of all the Greek villages of the island, and a very great rogue

My brothers and sisters—and there came, one by one, just three of each—all contrived to take precedence of me at their birth, and consequently throughout the whole of their subsequent lives. The punctilio of the thing I should not have minded, but, among my countrymen, a foolish family pride exhausts people's fortunes in their lifetime in portioning their daughters, the elder sons ran away with what remained, and poor Anastasius brought up the rear with but an indifferent prospect. My kind parents, however, determined to make up for leaving me destitute at their death, by spoiling me as much as possible during their lives.

After all the rest of the brood had taken wing, I re mained alone at home to solace my purents. Too fond of their favourite to damp my youthful spirits by fitting me for a profession, they kindly put off from day to day every species of instruction—probably till I should beg for it, which my discretion forbade. Unfortunately nature chose not, in the meantime, to be equally dilatory with my parents, and from an angel of an infant, I became by degrees a great lubberly boy, without any other accomplishment but that of flogging my top with the left hand, while with the right I despatched my sign of the cross—for in some things I understood the value of time. My parents, as may be supposed, were great sticklers for punctuality in every sort of devout practice, mass going, confession, Lent observance, &c. Of moral duties-less tangible in their nature-they had, poor souls! but a vague and confused notion, and the criminality of actions, in reference to one's neighbour, they taught me chiefly to estimate according to the greater or smaller risk connected with them of incurring the bastinado from the Turks As to manual correction at the hands of my own father, it seemed so desirable a circumstance, from the ample amends my mo her never failed to make her 'poor, dear, ill used boy' that my only regret on the subject arose from being able to ob'ain it so seldom.

These good people having contented themselves for a reasonable unmber of years with wistfully contemplating -the drogueman my active make and well set limbs, and the droguemaness my dark eyes, ruddy cheeks, and raven locks-they at last began to ponder how they might turn these gifts to the best advantage agreed that something should be done, but neither knew exactly what, and the one never proposed a profession which the other did not immediately object to,-till an old relation stepped in between, and recommended the church, as a never-failing resource to those who can think of no other My cousin had set the example by making his own son a little caloyer at thelve hibited by the Turks from the trade of a soldier, and by my parents from that of a sailor, I myself saw nothing better, and agreed to the proposal. It now became necessary to give me a smattering of learning, and I vas put under the tuition of a teacher of the Hellenie language, who assumed the title of Logiotatos, and only averred himself inferior to Demosthenes out of sheer My idleness got the better of my preceptor's learning and diligence. All the gold that flowed from the lips of his favourite St Chrysostom could not, to my taste, gild the bitter pill of his own tiresome comments, and even Homer, much as I lil ed fighting out of doors, found but an indifferent welcome in the study truth is, I had a dislike to reading in the abstract but when away from my books I affected a great admira tion for Achilles, called him in reference to Epirus, the land of my ancestors, 'my countryman,' and regretted that I was not born two thousand years ago, for no other purpose but to be his Patroclus In my fits of heroism I swore to treat the Turks as he had done the Trojans, and for a time dreamt of nothing but putting to the sword the whole Seraglio-dwarfs, eunuclis, and all. These dreams my parents highly admired, but advised me not to disclose in common 'Just rancour,' they said, 'gathers strength by being repressed '-Upon this principle they ennged to the ground to every Moslemin they met.

The inclinations of the little future papas for the church militant began, meantime, to appear more pro I had collected a troop of ragamuffins of m) own age, of whom I got myself dubbed captain, and, having purloined from my uncle, the painter, one of his most smirking Madounas for a banner, took the field under the auspices of the Panagia, and set about robbing orchards, and laving under contribution the villagers, with all the devotion imaginable. So great was the terror which our crusades inspired, that the sufferers durst not even complain, except in a body Whenever as chief of the band I became the marked object of animadversion, I kept out of the way till my father had paid the damage, and had moreover sued my pardon for his backwardness in doing so Once, indeed, when, tired of my prants, he swore I would be his ruin, I suggested to him an effectual mode of quicting his fears, by granting me an unlimited leave of absence. and pledged myself not to return till doomsday was too much for a dotting parent. Sooner than part with his Anastasius, Dimitri Sotiri would live bribed the peasants beforehand to suffer all my future depredations

Thus early disposed and trained to the business of tithing my father felt a little surprised when, on the eye of taking orders, I begged to be excused For the first time in his life Signor Sotiri insisted on implicit obedience, but that first time came too late. I made it the last, by swearing that if he forced me to take the mitre, I vould hide it under a turban. He yielded, and contented himself with quietly asking what I finally meant to "Nothing," vas the answer of my heart but the profession of doing nothing requires ample means. therefore pretended a wish to learn trade. assented, and forthwith wrote to a Smyrna merchant of his acquaintance to receive me into his counting house.

Meantime I found an employment for my leisure hours which put an end to all childish pastimes. Signor Sotiri, though, as before mentioned, a little hard of hearing, wanted not fluency of speech. His oratory had chiefly been exerted to render his patron dumb constantly represented to him how absolutely the dignity of his station forbade his having the least conversation with the natives, and how incumbent upon him it was, though born and bred in the Levant, to appear not to understand a single word of its idioms. By this device he kept all the speechifying to himself, and in truth, with the Turks in office, at all times more prone than strict politeness permits to compliment the representatives of Christian powers with the titles of 'infidel, vaoor, and Christian dog,' and at this particular juncture morethan usually out of humour in consequence of the Russian war, this was often the only way to save the consular pride from some little rubs, otherwise unavoidable in the necessary intercourse with the local government. Hence Mr de M--- not only never stirred from home without his interpreter by his side, but had him constantly at his elbow within doors, and made him the sole channel of his official transactions a circumstance which my father perfectly knew how to turn to the best advantage.

I too, in my capacity as the drogueman's chief assistant and messenger, was in daily attendance at the consular mansion, which proved useful to ine in one respect, as it gave me an opportunity of learning the Tiench language,-and that with the greater fluency, from the circumstance of no one offering expressly to teach me. The old consul had, between his dignity with the Greeks and his princtilio with the Turks, but little society, and I therefore soon became by the sprightliness of my repartees a very great favourite. Mr de M-- not only encouraged me to take a part in conversation but would even condescend to laugh most heartily both at my wittieisms and my practical jokes, whenever nei her him self, nor his servants, nor his relations, nor his friends, nor his proteges, were made to smart from their keenness, or involved in their consequences.

Matthew Gregory Lewis (1775-1818)-'Monk Lewis'-was born in London, his father being deputy-secretary in the War Office, and owner of large estates in Jamaica. Mat was educated at Westminster and Christ Church College, Oxford, and, at Weimar in 1792-93, was introduced to Goethe. As a child he had pored over Glanvill on Witchcraft and other books of diablerie, in Germany romance and the drama were his favourite studies, and whilst resident at the Hague he composed in ten weeks his novel of Ambrosio, or the Monk (1795), which makes extravagant use of supernatural machinery, and in many passages frankly panders to lubricity A prosecution was not unnaturally threatened on account of some of the luxurious scenes and more than risky descriptions, and to avert trouble Lewis pledged himself to recall the printed copies and recast the work-though how opposition could be silenced without stultifying the whole plot it is not easy to conceive. But throughout life he adhered to the same strain of marvellous and terrific composition-now clothing it in verse, now moulding it into a drama, and at other times contenting himself with the story form His Tales of Terror (1799), Tales of Wonder (1801)-to which Scott and Southey contributed -Romantic Tales (1808), The Bravo of Venice and Fendal Tyrants (both translated from the German), and the tragedies Alphonso (1801), Adelgitha (1807), &c., appeal to a temporary taste nurtured on Mrs Radcliffe. The Last Indian (1799) was a comedy, Timour the Tartar a melodrama, and One o'clock a 'musical romance,' Crazy Jane (1797), a once popular poem, was based on an encounter with an actual maniac, and The Captive, a Monodrama, exploited the ravings of a lunatic. In his first novel are found several of the poems, the loveditties, drinking-songs, or anecdotes in rhyme he had the knack of throwing off, and his ballads of 'Alonzo the Brave' and 'Durandarte' proved to his contemporaries as attractive as Ambrosio's own adventures He brings in weird tales 'from the Danish' of the Erl King or Oak King, of the Fire King, and the Water King, translating the latter in verse, and he refers familiarly to the old romances of Amadis, Perceforest, Palmerin of England, and the Loves of Tristan and Queen Iseult. Flushed with the brilliant success of his romance, and fond of prominence and distinguished society, Lewis in 1796 procured a seat in Parliament for the borough of Hindon, as Beckford had done before him, but he never attempted to address the House, and sat for only six years The theatres offered a more attractive arena for. his talents, and his play of The Castle Spectre, produced in 1797, was applauded as enthusiastically as his romance

While on a visit to Edinburgh in 1798 he met young Walter Scott, who had recently published his translations from Burger, and who thirty years afterwards told Allan Cunningham that he never felt such elation as when Lewis asked him to dine with him at his hotel! Lewis schooled the great poet on his incorrect verses, and proved himself, as Scott says, 'a martinet in the accuracy of rhymes and numbers' Furthermore, 'he had always dukes and duchesses in his mouth, and was pathetically fond of any one that had a title, you would have sworn he had been a parvenu of yesterday' Yet Scott, though like Byron he admitted Lewis was at length tiresome, recognised his good qualities 'He was one of the kindest and best creatures that ever lived. His father and Mr Lewis allowed his mother li ed separately son a handsome income, but reduced it by more than one-half when he found that he paid his mother a moiety of it. Mat restricted himself in all his expenses, and shared the diminished income with her as before. He did much good by stealth, and was a most generous creature.' The publication of his correspondence twenty vears after his death proved that much good sense, discretion, and kind feeling had been too completely hidden by the exaggerated romance of his writings, by his lax morals and frivolous The death of his father in 1812 made manners him a man of independent fortune ceeded to plantations in the West Indies, besides a large fortune in money, and to better the con dition of his slaves there, good-hearted, loquacious, clever little 'Mat' forsook the society of the Prince Regent and all his other great friends, and sailed for the West Indies in 1815 Of this and a sub sequent voyage he wrote a narrative, the Journal of a West Inaia Proprietor (1834), which Coleridge pronounced 'delightful,' it is valuable still if only for its wealth of negro folklore, and is, perhaps, his best work.

Lewis returned to England in 1816, but after a visit to Byron and Shelley at Geneva, went on to Naples, and in 1817 sailed again for Jamaica, where he found that his attorney had grossly mismanaged his property. Having adjusted his affairs, the 'Monk' embarked on his homeward voyage, but the climate had impaired his health, and he died of yellow fever while the ship was passing through the Gulf of Florida (1818)

The main plot of the Monk is taken from the tale of the Santon or dervish Barsisa in Steele's Guardian, as that came from the Turkisl Tales, translated from Petis de la Croix's version of Shaikh Zadah Ambrosio, the hero, is abbot of the Capuchins at Madrid, and called from his reputed sanctity and his eloquent preaching the Man of Holiness Severe in his saintly judgments, full of religious pride, he thinks himself proof against all temptation, but tempted to his fall by a young and beautiful she demon, he proceeds from crime to crime, his female Mephistopheles, Matilda, aiding him by her unexpected powers of sorcery, till, detected in a deed of murder, he is tried, tortured, and convicted by the Inquisition While trembling at the approach ing auto da ft, his evil genius brings him a my sterious book, by help of which he may summon Lucifer The Evil One appears with thunder and carthquake, and the wretched monk, having sold his hope of salvation to recover his liberty, is borne aloft and afar, only to be dashed to pieces on a rock. Lewis relieved a story which never shrinks from the supernatural machinery Mrs Radcliffe adopted only in semblance, by episodes and lovescenes, one of which—the Bleeding Nun—is told with exceptional narrative power, though it tends to embarrass the progress of the main tale a whole the story is ill put together, and shows neither skill in character-painting nor graces of style. Men and women alike melodrimatic, almost Byronic, are completely subject to their passions, temptation and opportunity justify any fall from virtue, it is difficult to remember which character is at any moment talking or acting. Incredible conjunctures and manifest impossibilities constantly occur even when supernatural aid has no, been invoked Convent life is represented from the point of view not of an ultra-Protestant but a Voltairean freethinker, a truly pious Spanish lady had carefully to expurgate the Bible before submitting it to a pure-minded girl's reading Vraisemblance is little regarded, and 'local colour' defied, the 'Monk' is no monk but a Franciscan frar, an abbot of Capuchins, and though the scene is Madrid, the characters address one another as 'signor' and 'signora,' and ejaculate scraps, not of Spanish, but of stage Italian famous scene at a robber's hut in a forest was evidently suggested by Smollett's Count Fathom Besides his copious use of magic, incantations, and spirits to carry on his story, and his wanton gloating over scenes of luxury and license (hideously complicated by matricide and unconscious incest), Lewis resorted to an even more revolting category of horrors-loathsome images of mortal corruption and decay the festering relics of death and the grave. But even when its startling aefects and blemishes are fully admitted, the Mank remains in every way a marvellous production for a boy of twenty The Bravo of Venice has enough and to spare of banditti, disguises, plots, and mysterious adventures, daggers and bowls, but nothing to match the best parts of the Monk, though the style is simpler In none of h s works does Lewis show any sense of humour

A Conjuration by the Wandering Jew

Raymond in the Monk is pursued by a spectre representing a Deeding nun, which appears at one o clock in the morning repeating a bleod-curdling chant, and pressing her lips to his I very succeeding visit inspires him with greate horror, and he becomes exces ively ill. His servant Theodore, meets with a stranger intimately ascertained to be the Wandering Jew who I-Ts him to hid his mas er with for him when the clock strikes one are Respaced tells what he fell when the summons was obesied.

He was a man of majes to presence, his counterance was strongly marked, and his eyes were large, black, and sparkling, yet there was a something in his look which, the moment that I saw him, inspired me with a secret awe, not to say horror He was dressed plainly, his hair was unpowdered, and a band of black velvet, which encircled his forehead, spread over his features an additional gloom. His countenance were the marks of profound melancholy, his step was slow, and his manner grave, stately, and solemn He saluted me with politeness, and having replied to the usual compli ments of autroduction, he motioned to Theodore to quit the chamber The page instantly withdrew 'I know your business,' said lie, without giving me time to speak "I have the power of releasing you from your nightly visitor, but this cannot be done before Sunday the hour when the Sabbath morning breaks, spiritsof darkness have least influence over mortals. After Saturday, the nun shall visit you no more.' 'Max I not inquire,' said I, 'by what means you are in posses sion of a secret a luch I have carefully concealed from the knowledge of every one?' 'How can I be ignorant of vour distresses, when their cause at this moment stands before you?' I started The stranger continued -'Though to you only visible for one hour in the twentyfour, neither day nor night does she ever quit you, nor will she ever quit you till you have granted her request ' ' And what is that request?' 'That she must herself explain, it lies not in my knowledge. Wait with prince for the night of Saturday, all shall be then cleared up ' I dared not press him further He soon after changed the conversation, and talked of various matters. He named people who had ceased to exist for many contunes, and yet with whom he appeared to have been personally acquainted. I could not mention a countri, however distant, which he had not visited, nor could I sufficiently admire the extent and variety of his informa-I remarked to him, that having travelled, seen, and known so much, must have given him infinite pleasure. He shook his head mournfully 'Do one,' he replied, is adequate to comprehending the miscry of my lot! Fate obliges me to be constautly in movement, I am not permitted to pass more than a fortnight in the same place. I have no friend in the world, and, from the restlessness of my destiny, I never can acquire one Fun would I lay down my miserable life, for I envy those who enjoy the quiet of the grave, but death eludes me, and flies from my embrace. In vain do I throw myself in the way of danger. I plunge into the ocean-the waves throw me back with abhorrence upon the shore, I rush into fire-the flames recoil at my approach, I oppose myself to the fury of bandittitheir swords become blunted, and break against nix breast. The hungry tiger shudders at my approach, and the alligator flies from a monster more horrible than itself God has set his seal upon me, and all his creatures respect this fatal mark. He put his hand to the velvet which was bound round his forehead. There was in his eves an expression of fury, despur, and malevolence, that struck horror to my very soul. An involuntary convulsion made me shudder. The stranger perceived 'Such is the curse imposed on me, he continued, 'I am doomed to inspire all who look on me with terror and detestation. You already feel the influence of the charm and with every succeeding moment vall I will not add to your suffering- hi my ful it more presence. Farewell till Saturday As soon as the clock stakes twelve, expect me at your chamber

Having said this, he departed, leaving me in aston ishment at the mysterious turn of his manner and conversation. His assurances that I should soon be relieved from the apparition's visits produced a good effect upon my constitution Theodore, whom I rather treated as an adopted child than a domestic, was sur prised, at his return, to observe the amendment in my looks 11e congratulated me on this symptom of return ing health and declared himself delighted at my having received so much benefit from my conference with the Great Mogul [so called, really the Wandering Jew]. Upon inquiry I found that the stranger had already passed eight days in Ratisbon According to his own account, therefore, he was only to remain there six days longer Saturday was still at a distance of three Oh, with what impitience did I expect its arrival l In the interim, the bleeding nun continued her noctifrial visits, but hoping soon to be released from them altogether, the effects which they produced on me became less violent than before

The wished for night arrived To avoid creating suspicion, I retired to bed at my usual hour, but as soon as my attendants had left me, I dressed myself again, and prepared for the stranger's reception. He entered my room upon the turn of midnight. A small chest was in his hand, which he placed near the stove He saluted me without speaking, I returned the com pliment, observing an equal silence. He then opened the cheet. The first thing which he produced was a small wooden crucifix, he sank upon his knees, gazed upon it mournfully, and east his eyes towards heaven He seemed to be praying devoutly. At length he bowed his head respectfully, kissed the crucifix thrice, and quitted his I neeling posture. He next drew from the chest a covered goblet with the liquor which it con tained, and which appeared to be blood, he sprinkled the floor and then dipping in it one end of the crueifix, he described a circle in the middle of the room. Round about this he placed various reliques, skulls, thigh bones, &c. I observed that he disposed them all in the form of crosses Lastly, he took out a large Bible, and beckoned me to follow him into the circle. I obeyed

Be cautious not to utter a syllable!' whispered the stranger 'step not out of the circle, and as you love yourself, dare not to look upon my face.' Holding the crucifix in one hand, the Bible in the other, he seemed to read with profound attention The clock struck one, as usual, I heard the spectre's steps upon the staircase, but I was not seized with the accustomed shivering. I waited her approach with confidence. She entered the room, drew near the circle, and stopped muttered some words, to me unintelligible. Then rais ing his head from the book, and extending the crucifix towards the ghost, he pronounced in a voice distinct and solemn 'Bentrice' Beatrice' 'What wouldst thou?' replied the apparation in a hollow falter ing tone 'What disturbs thy sleep? Why dost thou afflict and torture this youth? How can rest be restored to thy unquiet spirit?' 'I dare not tell, I must not tell Fain would I repose in my grave, but stern commands force me to prolong my punishment '' 'Knowest thou this blood? Knowest thou in whose veins it flowed? Beatrice ' Béatrice ' in his name I charge thee to answer me' 'I dare not disobey my taskers' 'Darest thoa disobev me?' He spoke in a commanding tone, and drew the sable band from his forehead. In spite of his injunction to the contrary, curiosity would not suffer me to keep my eyes off his face. I raised them, and beheld a burning cross impressed upon his brow horror with which this object inspired me I cannot account, but I never felt its equal. My senses left me for some moments, a mysterious dread overcame my courage, and had not the exorciser caught my hand, I should have fallen out of the circle. When I recovered myself, I perceived that the burning cross had produced an effect no less violent upon the spectre. Her counten ance expressed reverence and horror, and her visionary limbs were shaken by fear 'Yes,' she said at length,
'I tremble at that mark! I respect it! I obey you' Know, then, that my bones he still unburied-they rot in the obscurity of Lindenberg hole. None but this youth has the right of consigning them to the grave His own lips have made over to me his body and his soul, never will I give back his promise, never shall he know a night devoid of terror unless he engages to collect my mouldering bones, and deposit them in the family vault of his Andalusian castle. Then let thirty masses be said for the repose of my spirit, and I trouble this world no more. Now let me depart, those flames are scorching '

He let the hand drop slowly which held the crucifix, and which till then he had pointed towards her The apparation bowed her head, and her form melted into air

A Welcome from his Negroes

As soon as the carriage entered my gates, the uproar and confusion which ensued sets all description at de fiance. The works were instantly all abandoned, every thing that had life came flocking to the house from all quarters, and not only the men, and the women, and the children, but, 'by a bland assimilation,' the liogs, and the dogs, and the geese, and the fowls, and the turkeys, all came hurrying along by instinct, to see what could possibly be the matter, and seemed to be afraid of arriving too late. Whether the pleasure of the negroes was sincere may be donbted, but, certainly, it was the loadest that I ever witnessed, they all talked together, sang, danced, shonted, and, in the violence of their gesuculations, tumbled over each other, and rolled about upon the ground Tv enty voices at once inquired after zacles and aunts, and grandfathers and great grand mothers of mine, who had been buried long before I was m existence, and whom, I verily believe, most of them only knew by tradition. One woman held up her little maked black child to me, grinning from ear to ear-Look, massa, look here ' bim nice lilly neger for massa ' Another complained—'So long since none come sec we, massa, good massa come at last.' As for the old people, they were all in one and the same story now they had lived once to see massa, they were ready for dying to morrow-them no care.' The shouts, the guety, the wild laughter, their strange and sudden bursts of singing and dancing, and several old women, wrapped up in large cloaks, their heads bound round with different coloured handkerchiefs, leaning on a staff, and standing motionless in the middle of the hubbub, with their eves fixed upon the portico which I occupied, formed an exact counterpart of the festivity of the witches in Mac beth. Nothing could be more odd or more novel than the whole scene, and yet there was something in it by which I could not help being affected Perhaps it was the consciousness that all these human beings were my

'Oh' my cousin, Montesinos, By that friendship firm and dear Which from youth has lived between us, Now my last petition hear

'When my soul, these limbs forsaking, Eager seeks a purer air, From my breast the cold heart taking, Give it to Belerma's care

'Say, I of my lands possessor Named her with my dying breath, Say, my lips I oped to bless her, Ere they closed for aye in death Twice a week, too, how sincerely I adored her, cousin, say,
Twice a week, for one who dearly
Loved her, cousin, bid her pray

'Montesinos, now the honr Marl ed by fate is near at hand, Lo' my arm has lost its power, Lo' I drop my trusty brand

' Eyes, which forth beheld me going Homewords ne'er shall see me hie, Cousin, stop those tears o'erflowing, Let me on thy bosom die

'Thy kind hand my eyelids closing, let one favour I implore— Pray thou for my sonl's reposing, When my heart shall throb no more.

'So shall Jesus, still attending, Gracious to a Christian's vow, Pleased accept my ghost ascending, And a seat in heaven allow'

Thus spoke gallant Durandarte, Soon his brave heart broke in twun. Greatly joyed the Moorish party That the gallant knight was slain

Bitter weeping, Montesinos Took from him his helm and glaive, Bitter weeping, Montesinos Dug his gallant cousin's grave

To perform his promise made, he Cut the heart from out the breast, That Belerma, wretched lady 1 Might receive the last bequest.

Sad was Montesinos' heart, he Felt distress his bosom rend 'Oh' my cousin, Dirandarte, Woe is me to view thy end'

'Sweet in manners, fair in favour, Mild in temper, fierce in fight, Warnor nobler, gentler, braver, Never shall behold the light

'Cousin, lo' my tears bedew thee, How shall I thy loss survive? Durandarte, he who slew thee, Wherefore left be me alive?'

Matilda fascinates Ambrosio by singing this ballad to him, accompanying herself on the harp—that which follows is read, not without qualms of discomfort, in a lonely room at dead of night, out of an old bool of Spanish ballads—hy Antonia, another of Ambrosios victims whom Matilda, after he tired of her, obligingly put in his power hy sorcery

Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogene

A warrior so bold, and a virgin so bright,
Conversed as they sat on the green,
They gazed on each other with tender delight
Alonzo the brave was the name of the knight—
The maiden's, the Fair Imogene

'And, oh!' said the youth, 'since to-morrow I go To fight in a far-distant land,
Your tears for my absence soon ceasing to flow,
Some other will court you, and you will bestow
On a wealthier suitor your hand ''

'Oh! hush these suspicions,' I air Imogene and,
'Offensive to love and to me,
For, if you be living, or if you be dead,
I swear by the Virgin that none in your stead Shall husband of Imogene be

'If e'er 1, by hist or by wealth led aside,
I orget my Alonzo the Brave,
God grant that, to pinnish my falsehood and pride,
Your ghost at the marriage may sit by my side,
May tax me with perjury claim me as bride,
And bear me away to the grave "

To Palestine hastened the hero so bold,

His love she lamented him sore;
But scarce had a twelvemonth elapsed, when, behold?
A baron, all covered with jewels and gold,

Arrived at I air Imogene's door

His treasures, his presents, his spicious domain, Soon made her untrue to her vows, He dazzled her eyes, he bewildered her brain, He caught her affections, so light and so vain, And carried her home as his spouse.

And now had the marriage been blest by the priest. The revely now was begun,
The tables they grouned with the weight of the feast,
Nor yet had the laughter and merriment ceased,
When the bell at the castle told—one

Then first with amazement Fair Imagene found
A stranger was placed by her side
Ilis air was terrific, he attered no sound—
He spake not he moved not, he looked not around—
But earnestly gazed on the bride.

His vizor was closed, and gigantic his height,
His armour was sable to view,
All pleasure and laughter were hushed at his sight,
The dogs, as they eved him, drew back in affright
The lights in the chamber burned blue!

His presence all bosons appeared to dismit,

The guests sat in silence and fear

At length spake the bride, while she trembled 'I pray,

Sir knight, that your helmet aside you would lay,

And deign to partake of our cheer'

The lady is silent, the stranger complies—
His vizor lie slowly unclosed,
O God! what a sight met I air Imogene's cyes!
What words can express her dismay and surprise
When a skeleton's head was exposed!

All present then uttered a terrified shout,
All turned with disgust from the scene,
The worms they crept in, and the worms they crept out,
And sported his eyes and his temples about,
While the spectre addressed Imagene

'Behold me, thou false one, behold me'' he cried,

'Remember Alonzo the Brave'
God grants that, to punish thy falsehood and pride,
My ghost at thy marriage should sit by thy side,
Should tax thee with perjury, claim thee is bride,
And bear thee away to the grave''

Thus saying, his arms round the lady he wound,
While loudly she shricked in dismay,
Then sank with his prey through the wide yawning ground
Nor ever again was Fair Imogene found,
Or the spectre that bore her away

Not long lived the baron, and none, since that time,
To inhabit the castle premine.
I or chronicles tell that, by order sublime,
There Imagene suffers the pain of her crime,
And mourns her deplorable doom

At midnight, four times in each year, does her sprite,
When mortals in slumber are bound,
Arrayed in her bridal apparel of white,
Appear in the hall with the skeleton knight,
And shrick as he v hirls her around

While they drind out of skulls nearly torm from the grave, Dancing round them the spectres are seen. Their liquor is blood, and this horrible stave. They how! "To the health of Alonzo the Brave, And his consort, the I ar Imogene."

Charles Robert Haturin (1782-1824), born in Dublin of Huguenot ancestrs, at fifteen en tered Trimity College, and became curate first of Longhren and then of St Peter's, Dublin came forward in 1807 as an imitator of the blood curding and nightmansh style of novel-viring, of which 'Monk' Lewis was the modern master. The style, as Maturin afterwards confessed, was out of date when he was a boy, and he had not power The Fatal Revenge, or the Landy to revive it of Montorio (1807), his first effort, was soon in high favour in the circulating libraries, and seems to have been liked the better because imagination and elaborated diction were carried to the height of extravagance and bombast. To it succeeded Tre-Wild Irish Boy (1808), Inc Milesian Crief (1812), Women, or Pour et Contre (1818), and Melmota the Harderer (1820)—all romances in three or In Honer Maturin nimed at four volumes depicting real life and manners, and we have pictures of Calvinistic Methodists, an Irish Mer Merrilics, and an Irish hero, De Courcy, com pounded of contradictions and improbabilities Eva Wentworth and Zaira, a brilliant Italianwho afterwards turns out to be Evas mother-De Courcy is in are drawn with some skill love with both, and both are blighted by his in Eva, who is purity itself dies calmly constancy and tranquilly, elevated by religious hope, Zaira meditates suicide, but lives on, as if spell bound to the death place of her daughter and lover, and De Courcy very properly perishes of remorse. Maturin's tragedy, Bertram, had a success at Drury Lane in 1816, his next, Hannel and Fredolpho, Meln oth is the were both promptly damned most hyperbolical of Maturin's romances. hero, a compound of Faust, Mephistopheles, the Wandering Jew, and the Prisoner of Chillon. and loathsome, and suggest the last convulsive efforts and perversities of the 'Monk' Lewis school of romance. There are two real mysteries about Melmoth—one that it should have fascinated Balzac and Rossetti, the other that in 1892 it should have been deemed worthy of republication, with a memoir, a bibliography, and a 'Note on Maturin, whom the nameless editors seem to rank above Goethe, Byron, Calderon, Marlone, and Milton. In 1824—the year of his premature death by accidentally swallowing an embrocation - Maturin published The Albigenses, intended as one of a series of romances illustrative of Euro pean feelings and manners in ancient, mediaval, and modern times Laying the scene of his story in France, in the thirteenth century, the author connected it with the wars between the Catholics and the Albigenses, the latter being the earliest of the reformers of the faith. Such a time was well adapted for the purposes of romance, as has been proved both before and since Maturin pro duced lively but fanciful pictures of the Crusaders, and eloquent descriptions of the Albigenses in their lonely worship among rocks and mountains, but he had not the power of portraying or creating living characters, and his attempts at humour were dismal failures The following, from Melmoth, shows Maturin at his best or worst, according as one takes him

The Victim of the Inquisition

The rep iles, who filled the hole into which I had been thrust, gave me opportunity for a kind of constaut, miserable, ridiculous hostility My mat had been placed in the very seat of warfare, -I shifted it, -still thev pursued me, -I placed it against the wall, -the cold crawling of their bloated limbs often awoke me from my sleep, and still oftener made me shudder when awake. I struck at them, -I tried to terrify them by my voice, to arm myself against them by the help of m) mat, but, above all, my anxiety was ceaseless to defend my head from their loathsome incursions, and my pitcher of water from their dropping into it. I adopted a thousand precautions, trivial as they were melficacious, but still there was occupation I do assure you, Sir, I had more to do in my dungeon than in my all To be fighting with reptiles in the dark appears the most horrible struggle that can be assigned to mau, but what is it compared to his combat with those reptiles which his own heart hourly engenders in a cell, and of which, if his heart be the mother, solitude is the father? I had another employment,-I cannot call it occupation I had calculated with myself that sixty minutes made an hour, and sixty seconds a minute I began to think I could keep time as accurately as any clock in a convent, and measure the hours of my con finement or-my release. So I sat and counted sixty, a doubt always occurred to me that I was counting them faster than the clock Then I wished to be the clock, that I might have no feeling, no motre for hurry ing on the approach of time Then I reckoned slower Sleep sometimes overtook me in this exercise (perhaps I adopted it from that hope), but when I awoke, I applied to it again instantly Thus I oscillated, reckoned, and measured time on my mat, while time vithheld its delicious diary of rising and setting suns,—of the devs of dawn and of twilight,—of the glow of morning and the shades of the evening. When my reckoning was broken by my sleep (and I knew not whether I slept by day or by night), I tried to eke it out by my incessant repetition of minutes and seconds, and I succeeded, for I always consoled myself, that whatever hour it was, sixty minites must go to an hour. Had I led this life much longer, I might have been converted into the idiot who, as I have read, from the habit of watching a clock, imitated its mechanism so well that when it was dawn, he sounded the hour as faithfully as ear could desire. Such was my life

Thomas Bowdler (1754-1825) has, as editor of the 'Family Shakespeare,' been made to furnish the English language with a series of words with unjustly suspicious associations Born of wealthy parents at Ashley near Bath, he went at sixteen to St Andrews to study medicine, but graduated WD of Edinburgh in 1776 After some years of tra el in France, Germany, Italy, and Sicily (twice climbing Mount Etna), he settled in London, but did not practise his profession, devoting himself rather to charitable work in connection with prisons, penitentiaries, and Magdalen asylums, he became the continuator of John Howard's good work. He was a friend of Howard's, an intimate of the circle to which Mrs Montagu, Mrs Chapone, and Hannah More belonged, and remembered Dr Johnson vividly For ten years he lived at St Boniface in the Isle of Wight, and for the last fifteen years of his life at Rhyddings near Swansea. His Letters Written in Holland (1788) give an account of the revolutionary movement of the previous vehr, and in 1815 he published one or two minor biographical works But it was in 1818 that he produced 'The Family Shakespeare, in 10 vols, in which nothing is added to the original text, but those words and expressions are omitted which cannot with propriety be read aloud in a family ' The work had a large sale, ran through more than half-a dozen editions, and was long popular, spite of the ridicule it brought down upon the head of its editor last years of Bowdler's life were given to the task of preparing an expurgated edition of Gibbon's History, which was published in six volumes the year after his death, edited by his nephew, and described as being 'for the use of Families and Young Persons, reprinted from the original text, with the careful omissions of all passages of an irreligious or immoral tendency.' And the editor congratulated his uncle on 'the peculiar happiness' of having so purified Shakespeare and Gibbon that they could no longer 'raise a blush on the cheek of modest innocence, nor plant a pang in the heart of the devout Christian' It would be unfair to say that he also Bowdlerized the Old Testament, but he prepared for a Sunday school Society Select Chapters from the Old Testament, with Short Introductions, issued in 1822

The word Bowdlerese, first used apparently in 1836, has become common (usually as Borodlerise) since about 1870, with a whole train of derivatives -Bow dierism, Bowdierization, Bowdierizar, &c.and is rarely used save with sovereign contempt for the process, the theory, and the man, even by those who would unlicitatingly refuse to read floud every and any passage of Shakespeare to boys and girls just old enough to understand and appreciate the jests and allusions Boudler excised If the work was to be done, it is doubtful if it could have been done much more judiciously is one thing to Bowdlerize for a special purpose, quite another to Bowdlerize by omissions what is meant to be a standard text (as Dr Mitchell for the Scottish Text Society has Boudlerized in 1897 some of the Gude and Godlie Ballads), and a third thing to substitute as the author's considerable passages which the original writer never wrote or imagined Bowdler was by no means the first or most prudish preparer of expurgated editions, he was, indeed, considerably less precise than many more recent expurgators of Shake speare for schools Castrated editions of the classics are an old established institution, and the castration of Shirkespeare had long been i familiar art. Girrick Bowdlerized him remorse lessly, both on the stage and in print, all modern stage managers carefully cut most of the passages Bowdler excised, and it is something for the typical English Expurgator to have Mr Swinburne's strong support and hearty commendation 'More nauseous or foolish cant was never chattered than that which would dende the memory or depreciate the merits of Boudler No man ever did better service to Shakespeare than the man who made it possible to put him into the hands of intelligent and imaginative children' (Studies in Prose and Poetry, page 98) Bowdler himself defended his Shikespearean enterprise in a temperately argued pamphlet called A Letter to 'the British Critic,' which he said was occasioned by the censure pronounced in the work on 'Johnson, Pope, Bowdler, Warburton, Theobald, Steevens, Reed, Walone, et Hoc Genus Omne'

It is a really curious fact that, as has been pointed out in Vol I p 433, the name Bowdler was associated with Elizabethan dramatic literature as the cognomen of the very free spoken and 'amorous gallant' (of all things in the world!) in Heywood's Fair Maid of the Exchange

Sir John Barrow (1764-1848), born in a thatched cottage in the village of Drugley Beck in North Laneashire, learnt mathematics at Ulverston, was timekeeper in a foundry, and made a voyage in a Greenland whaler before he became mathematical teacher at Greenwich. Thence he was taken by Lord Macartney as his secretary to China and to the Cape. In South Africa (1797-1802) he was even more eminently serviceable than in China as explorer, map-maler, and administrator, he was sent on missions to recon cile Boers and Kaffirs, and explored many outlying pirts of the colony He had bought a house near I able Mount an, where he meant to settle as a South African country-gentleman, when the Peace of Amiens restored the Cape (tempo rarily) to the Dutch (1802), and Barro's came home to serve his country for forty years as secretary to the Admiralty under fourteen administrations. His zeid in promoting Arctic exploration is indicated by the way his name figures on the map of the Arctic regions - Barron Straits, Cape Barrow, &c He was all his life an indefatigable worker and an inexhaustible writer. Among his publications are to be counted some two hundred articles in the Quarterly Keniere and a series in the Encyclopadia Britainica, Lives of Lord Macarthes, Lord Howe, and Peter the Great accounts of his travels in Clina and in South Africa-long standard worls, books on romages to Cochin China and the Arctic regions, and a very interesting Autobiografly (1847). There is also a Memoir of him by Staunton (1852)

Robert Plumer Ward (1765-1846) was hore in London and bred at Oxford, vent to the Bar, and was successively a judge, Under Secretary for Loreign Minirs, a lord of admirality, and auditor of the civil list. He wrote a history of the law of nations, several books on the law of heligerents, contribund, and the like, and in 1825 he published anonymously a discursively metaphysical and religious romance, Trenaine, or the Man of Represent As the author illuded to his intimac, with English statesmen and political events and seemed to belong to the Evangelical party in the Church much speculation took place as to The prolivity of the authorship of the novel some of the dissertations and dialogues, where the story stood still for half a volume that the parties might converse and dispute, rendered Tremaine heavy and tedious, in spite of some But it was, as Black- eed thought, onguirlity 'extravagantly overrated,' and ran through four editions in one year . In De Vere, or the Man of In hependence (1827), the public dwelt with keen interest on a portraiture of Mr Canning whose career was then about to close in his premature death, and this desultory roman delef used to be cited as a kind of authority on Cannings views and manner of speech, the Wentworth of the story being a close study of the statesman De Clifford, or the Constant Man (1841), is also a tale of actual life, its hero is secretary to a Cabinet Minister, and the author revels in official details, social rivalines and political intrigue. Canning sarcastically said that Ward's law-books were as pleasant as novels and his novels is dull as lawbooks. Now it but rarely happens that a volume either of the one set or the other is disturbed out of its dust covered repose in old libraries

Henry Luttiell (c. 1765-1851) a man of wit and fashion, and a clever and graceful versifier, was author of Advice to Julia a Letter in Rhyme (1820), of Crockford House (1827), a satire against gambling, and of some elegiacs and shorter pieces He was a natural son of the Lord Carhampton who as Colonel Luttrell had been the defeated Government candidate in opposition to Wilkes, but had by Parliament been declared duly elected, he afterwards became notorious by his severities upon the Irish rebels of 1798 The son sat in the last Irish Parliament 1798-1800, and spent some years managing his father's West Indian plantations, but came back to London to be a society lion and a favourite in the circle of Holland House 'None of the talkers whom I meet in London society,' said Rogers, 'can slide in a brilliant thing with such readiness as he does' As with other brilliant conversationists, his printed works hardly justify his fame, though they have happy descriptive passages, frequent touches of bright social satire, and couplets of epigrammatic inevitableness Byron, Moore, and Christopher North were at one in praising his Advice to Julia, from which these are short extracts

London in Autumn

'Tis August. Rays of hercer heat Full on the scorching pavement heat As o'er it the faint breeze, by fits Alternate, blows and intermits For short lived green, a russet brown Stains every withering shrub in town. Darkening the air, in clouds arise Th' Egyptian plagues of dust and flies, At rest, in motion-forced to roam Abroad, or to remain at home, Nature proclaims one common lot For all conditions-'Be ve hot 1' Dry is mtolerable—Night As close and suffocating quite, And still the mercury mounts higher, Till London seems again on fire

November Fog

First, at the dawn of lingering day, It rises of an ashy gray, Then deepening with a sordid stain Of yellow, like a lion's mane. Vapour importunate and dense, It wars at once with every sense The cars escape not All around Returns a dull unwonted sound Loath to stand still, afraid to stir, The chilled and puzzled passenger, Oft blundering from the pavement, fails To feel his way along the rails, Or at the crossings in the roll Of every carriage dreads the pole. Scarce an eclipse, with pall so dun, Blots from the face of heaven the sun. But soon a thicker, darker cloak Wraps all the town, behold in smoke, Which steam compelling trade disgorges From all her furnaces and forges

In pitchy clouds, too dense to rise, Descends rejected from the skies. Till struggling day, extinguished quite, At noon gives place to candle light. O Chemistry, attractive maid, Descend, in pity, to our aid Come with thy all pervading gases, Thy crucibles, retorts, and glasses, Thy fearful energies and wonders, Thy dazzling lights and mimie thunders. Let Carbon in thy train be seen, Dark Azote and fair Oxygen, And Wollaston and Davy guide The car that bears thee, at the side If any power can, any how, Abate these nmsances, 'tis thou, And see, to aid thee, in the blow, The bill of Michael Angelo, Oh join-sneess a thing of course is-Thy heavenly to his mortal forces, Make all chimneys chew the cud Like hungry cows, as chimneys should ! And since 'tis only smoke we draw Within our lungs at common law, Into their thirsty tubes be sent Fresh air, by act of parliament.

John Hoole (1727-1803), born at Moorfields in London, was from 1744 to 1783 employed in the East India House, and earned the name of 'the translator' by his English versions of the Jerusalem Delivered (1763) and Rinaldo (1792) of Tasso, the dramas of Metastasio (1767), and the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto (1773-83) Scott describes the translator of the Ariosto as 'a noble transmuter of gold into lead.' His dramas Cyrus (1768), Timanthes (1770), and Cleonice (1775) were failures

William Herbert (1778-1847), honourable and reverend, was third son of the first Earl of Carnaryon, and studied at Eton and Clirist Church He sat in Pirliament from 1806 to 1812, took orders in 1814, and from 1840 was Dean of Manchester He had begun to publish poetry in the first year of the century, and became especially famous for his translations from Scandinavian and his own poems on Schildinhvian subjects, insomuch that Byron in English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, speaking of his 'rugged rhymes,' talks of him as 'wielding Thor's hammer' He translated also from German and from Portuguese, contributed to the Edinburgh Review, and wrote much on natural history His chief original poems were Helga (1815), Hedin, or the Spectre of the Tomb (1820), and Attila, or the Triumph of Christianity (1838)

Henry Francis Cary (1772-1844), translator of Dante, was born at Gibraltar, and educated at Rugby, Sutton Coldfield, Birmingham, and Christ Church, Oxford He took orders in 1795, became vicar of Abbot's Bromlev in Staffordshire and Kingsbury in Warwickshire, but from 1807 lived in London, being assistant-librarian at the British Museum from 1826 to 1837 He was buried in

Westminster Abbey Cary, who at sixteen pub lished poetry, was very widely read in Italian and French, as well as in the classics and In 1805 he published the English literature Inferno of Dante in blank verse, and an entire translation of the Diruna Commedia in the same measure in 1814 He afterwards translated the Bir is of Aristophanes and the Odes of Pindir, and wrote a scries of short memoirs in continuation of Johnson's Lives of the Poets, which, with I was of the only French poets, appeared anonymously in the London Magazine First brought into notice by Coleridge whom Cary had met on the sea shore at Littlehampton, the English Dante passed through four editions during the life of the trans lator, and it still ranks as one of the principal It has some of the mevitable defects translations of a foreign tongue and an alien measure, but has many merits, and is more Linglish and more easily read than the metrical translations that endeavour. by terza rima or otherwise, more closely to imitate the rhythm of the original

Francesca of Rimini

I began 'Bard' willingly I would address those two together coming, Which seem so light before the wind ' He thus "Note thou, when nearer they to us approach, Then by that love which carries them along, I ntreat, and they will come Soon as the wind Swaved them toward us, I thus framed my speech "O werried spirits" come and hold discourse With us, if by none else restrained ' As doves, By fond desire invited, on wide wings And firm, to their sweet nest returning home, Cleave the air, wafted by their will along, Thus issued, from that troop where Dido ranl s They, through the ill air speeding with such force My cry prevailed, by strong affection urged

O gracious creature, and benign! who goest Visiting, through this element obscure Us, who the world with bloody strin unbrued, If for a friend the King of all we owned, Our prayer to him should for thy peace arise, Since thou hast pity on our evil plight Of whatsoe'er to hear or to discourse It pleases thee, that will we hear, of that Freely with thee discourse, while e cr the wind, As now, is mute. The land that give me birth Is situate on the coast, where Po descends To rest in ocean with his sequent streams

I, in answer, thus 'Alas ' by what sweet thoughts, what fond desire, Must they at length to that all pass have reached !'

Then turning, I to them my speech addressed,

And thus began "Francesca! your sad fate, I ven to tears, my gricf and pity moves But tell me, in the time of your sweet sight, By what and how Love granted, that ye knew Your set uncertain wishes. She replied 'No greater grief than to remember days Of joy, when misery is at hand! ### Ugolino and his Sons

A small grate Within that mew, a high for my sale the name Of frinine bears, where others yet must pine Already through its opening several innons Had shown me, when I slept the evil sleep That from the future tore the curtain off This one, methought, as master of the sport Kole forth to chose the gaunt wolf and his whelps Unto the mountain which forbids the sight Of I ucea to the Pisans With lean brach, Inqui itive and I cen Infore him ranged Lanfranchi with Sismondi and Gualandi After short course the father and the sons Seemed tired and lagging and methought I sau The sharp tusks gore their sides. When I awoke, Before the dawn, amid their sleep I heard My cons—for they were with me—weep and ask I or bread Now had they wakened, and the hour drew near

When they were wont to bring us food, the mind Of each misgave him through his dream, and I Heard, at its outlet underneath, locked up The horrible tower whence, uttering not a word, I looked upon the visage of my sons I wept not so all stone I felt within They wept and one, my little Anselm, cried "Thou lookest so! father, what ails thee?" I et I shed no tear, nor answered all that day Nor the next night, until another sun Came out upon the world When a faint beam Had to our doleful prison made its way, And in four countenances I descried The ininge of my own, on either hand Through agony I bit, and they who thought I did it through desire of feeding, rose O' the sudden, and eried 'Tather, we should grieve Far less if thou wouldst eat of us thou gavest

These weeds of miserable flesh we wear, And do thou strip them off from us again' Then, not to make them sadder, I kept down My spirit in stillness That day and the next Ah, obdurate earth ! We were all silent Why open'dst not upon us? When ve came To the fourth day, then Gaddo at my feet Outstretched did fling him, crying, 'Hast no help For me, my father?' There he died, and e'en Plainly, as thou seest me, saw I the three Fall one by one 'twixt the fifth day and sixth Whence I betook me, now grown blind, to grope Over them all, and for three days aloud Called on them who were dead Then fasting got The mastery of gnef

The story is told by Ugolioo's ghost. During the contests between Grelp's and Ghbellines in 1289, Count Ugolioo della Gherardesca, with two sons and two grandsons, was shut up by Archbishop Ruggiero, and left to perish of starvation in what has unce been called the Tower of Hunger at Pisa. Ugolino who had repeatedly allied himself with the Guelfic cities, and had for a time suppressed the Ghbelline party in Pisa in the hope of becoming despot of the city was finally overthrown by his euemies headed by the arch bishop. Dante describes the count and the archbishop as being deservedly tormented together, 'pent in one bollow of the ice.

This is how Cary renders the passage of Dante that was in Gray's mind when he wrote the first stanza of his Elegy, and was imitated by Byron in the third canto of Don Juan

Now was the hour that wakens fond desire
In men at sea, and melts their thoughtful heart
Who in the morn have bid so eet friends farewell,
And pilgrim newly on his road with love
Thuils, if he hear the vesper bell from far,
That seems to mourn for the expiring day
There is a Life of Cary by his son (1847).

David Ricardo (1772-1823), author of several onginal treatises on economics, was bred to his own business by his father, a Jewish stockbroker originally from Holland, but through reading Smith's Wealth of Nations in 1799 was stirred to think and write on political economy His first works were on The High Price of Bullion (1810), Proposals for an Economical and Secure Currency (1816), and Principles of Political Economy and Taxation (1817) The last work, that on which his reputation rests, is remarkable for its close logical argument and its acumen rather than for any literary merit, it is indeed very hard reading But it was justly considered the most important treatise on that science, with the single exception of Smith's IVcalth of Nations As such it made an epoch in the science of political economy, and became the text-book of the classical or abstract economic school His special aim and achievement was to expound the theory of rent as the excess of the produce of the land over the cost of production of that land And from this thesis came new statements as to wages and value, and as to the incidence of taxation. Ricardo afterwards wrote pumphlets on the Funding System and on Protection to Agriculture. He had amassed breat wealth as a stockbroker, and, retiring from business, he entered Parliament as representative for the borough of Portarlington, but he seldom spoke in the House, and only on subjects connected with his favourite studies. He died at his seat of Gatcombe Park in Gloucestershire.

His works were edited with a Life by M'Culloch (1841) his letters to Multhus were edited by Bonar in 1887, and these to M Culloch by Hollander in 1892.

James Mill (1773-1836), born a shoemaker's son near Montrose, studied for the ministry at Edinburgh, but in 1802 settled in London as a literary man. He edited and wrote for various periodicals, and in 1806 commenced his History of British India (1817-18) In 1819 the directors of the East India Company made him (though a Radical) assistant-examiner with charge of the revenue department, and in 1832 head of the examiner's office, where he had the control of all the departments of Indian administration of his articles (on government, jurisprudence, colonies, &c) for the Encyclopaana Britannica were reprinted In 1821-22 he published his *Ele*ments of Political Economy, in 1829 an Analysis of the Human Mind, and in 1835 the Fragment on Macl ntosh He was no mere disciple of Bentham, but a man of profound and original thought, as well as of great reading. In psychology and ethics he carried the association principle further than it had yet been applied. In political economy he followed Ricardo His mind was eminently logical, he was a special enemy to all vagueness in thought and argument, to all looseness in statement. He was an unsparing critic, and Mackintosh's credit suffered from Mill's attack. His conversation gave a powerful stimulus to many young men like his own son and Grote. he ranked as one of the main moulders of philosophical radiculism, as his views and Grote's came to be called, and he took a leading part in founding University College, London Throughout life he cherished high ideals for himself and others, and he was a strenuous and unselfish reformer Clearness and precision are the main merits of his literary style. It was to Mill's disadvan tage that when he wrote he had no direct knowledge of India, its peoples and customs, he applied his own precise political principles as a standard for judging men dealing with a civilisation he imperfectly understood. But, as is generally admitted, his History of India remains a great work in spite of the technical blunders specialists have pointed out, and in spite of his somewhat pronounced prejudices The book dwelt perhaps overmuch on abuses, but it helped to bring about changes in administration, as might be expected Mill summed up strongly against Warren Hastings This is his account of

The Case of Nuncomar

A few days after this suspicious but ineffectival proceeding a new prosecution was instituted against Nuncomar. At the suit of a native, he was taken up on a charge of forgers, and committed to the

He was tried before the Supreme common grol Court, by a jury of Inglishmen, convicted, and No transaction, perhaps, of this whole administration more deeply trunted the reputation of Hastings than the tragedy of Nuncomar moment when he stood forth as the accuser of the Governor general, he was charged with a crime alleged to have been committed five years before, tried, and executed. a proceeding which could not ful to generate the suspicion of guilt, and of an inability to encounter the weight of his testimony, in the man who e power to have prevented, or to have stopped (If he did not cause), the proscention, it is not easy to deny Hastings, aware of the sinister interpretations to which the destruction of an accuser, in circumstance, so extra ordinary, would assuredly expose him, chose rather to sustrin the weight of those suspicions than to inect the charges by preventing or suspending the fate of the necuser, it is a fair inference, though mere resent ment and spite might hirry some men to as great an indiscretion that from the accusations he dreaded something worse than those suspicions. Mr I rancis, in his examination before the House of Commons on the 16th of April 1788, declared that the effect of this transaction upon the inquiries carried on by the Board into the accusations against the Governor was 'to defeat them that it impressed a general terror on the natives with respect to preferring accusations against men in great power, and that he and his conductors were unwilling to expose them to what appeared to him and these coadjutors, as well as thenselves a manifest danger '

The severest censure-were very generally pas ed upon this trial and execution, and it was afterwirds exhibited as matter of impeachment against both Mr Histings and the Judge who presided in the tribunal. The crime for which Nuncomar was made to suffer was not a capital offence by the laws of Hindustan either Moslem or Hindu, and it was represented as a procedure full of eruelty and injustice, to render a people amenable to the most gricious seventies of a law with which they were unacquainted, and from which, by their habits and associations, their minds were totally estranged It was affirmed that this atrocious condemnation and execution were upon an expost facto law, as the statute which created the Supreme Court and its powers was not published till 1774, and the date of the supposed forgery vas in 1770, that the law which rendered forger, capital did not extend to India, as no English statute included the colonies, unless where it was expressly stated in the law, that Nuncomar, as a native Indian, for a crime committed against another Indian, not an Englishman, or even a Luropean, was amenable to the native, not the English tribunals, that the evidence adduced was not sufficient to warrant con demnation, and that, although the situation in which the prisoner was placed with regard to a man of so much power as the Governor general should have suggested to the Judge peculiar circumspection and tenderness, there was every appearance of precipita tion, and of a predetermination to find him guilty and to cut him off In the defence which was set up by Sir Elijali Impey, the Chief Judge, in his answer at the bar of the House of Commons on the 12th of December 1787, lie admitted that a native in habitant of the provinces at large was not amenable to the Inglish laws or to the Luglish tobunals and it was not as uch, he affirmed, that Annomar's as ined. But he infinitelized that a native inhabitant of the Inglish town of Calcutta, which was Inglish property, which had long been coverned by Ingli morn and Institute I was, was amenable to the Inglish tribunals, and justly, because he made it his voluntar chace to live under their protection, and that it we is this expanity, namely, that of an inhabitant of Calcutte, that Nuncourar sufficient the penalties of the Lachish If the competence of the presiletion was admitted, the que tion of evidence, where ealence was complicated and contradictors, could not admit of any very elear and certain decision, and the Judge opposed the afternation of its insufficiency by that of the contrary He denied the doctrine that an English penal statute extended to the colonies only when that extension was expressed. The allegation of preciping tion and unfurne, , still further of corruption, in the treatment of the necusal, he not only defined with strong expression of abhorance, but he a specification of circumstance enleavoured to disprove cyclence it may failly be observed, that though the for ery was completely proved by the oalst of he withe ses to the procention, it was a completely disproved by the orths of the nitnesses to the defence that there was no such difference in the character  $\ell^{\tau}$ the parties or their wither er as to throw the balance greatly to either of the sides, and that the preponder ance, if his, we too went to support in act of so much importance and delicars as the condemnation of Nuncomar I can after the judgment the case cas not without a remedy the execution might have been tived till the pleasure of the King was Inone. and a paidon might have been obtained. This too the Court absolutely refused, and proceeded with unrelenting determination to the execution of Simeomar who, on the 5th of August, with a tranquillity and firmme's that never were surpassed, submitted to his fate not only until the tears and Immentations but the erres and direcks of an extraordinary assembline of his countrymen

Andrew Cherry (1762~1812), actor, dramatist, and author of 'The Bay of Biscar' was the son of a luncrick printer and bookseller seventeen abandoned his father's business for the stage, he attained some enumence as an actor at Drury Lane, and managed theatres in Swanser and Monmouth Of his nine or ten plays several were furly successful, but only The Soldier's Daughter can be said to 'hold the stage'. On the other hand, it least three of his songs bid fair to prove imperishable—'The Bay of Biscay,' 'The Green little Shamrock of Ireland,' and 'I om Moody, the Whipper-in ' There is probably no piece in English literature so familiar to everybody as 'The Bay of Biscar' whose author's name is so utterly inknown, not one in ten thousand who know the song by heart have any idea who wrote it (as is the case with not a few of our most popular songs), or ever heard of Andrew Cherry or his works. Nor is it always easy to see why some songs have attained and maintained their exceptional popularity, though doubtless it depends well-nigh as often on the music as on the words. In this case the composer, John Davy, is also little known 'Tom Moody' ends with the following characteristic stanza

Thus Tom spoke his friends ere he gave up his breath 'Since I see you're resolved to be in at the death, One favour bestow—its the last I shall crave—Give a rattling view hollow thrice over my grave, And unless at that warning I lift up my head, My boys, you may fairly conclude I am dead 'Honest Tom was obeyed, and the shout rent the sky, For every one joined in the tally ho cry,

Tally ho! Hark forward'
Tally ho! Tally ho'

Edward Lysaght (1763-1811), vit and songwriter, was the son of a proprietor at Brickhill in County Clare, graduated B 1 at Trinity College, Dublin, and MA at Oxford, studied law at the Middle Temple, and was called both to the Irish and to the English Bar Ultimately he practised m Dublin only, where he was a commissioner of banl ruptcy, was a successful political pamphleteer, and had a brilliant reputation in literary and social circles He died in poverty Among his songs are 'Our Ireland,' 'The man who led the van Of the Irish Volunteers,' and 'Kate of Garnavilla.' 'Kitty of Coleraine' has been claimed for a him on doubtful grounds, and 'The Sprig of Shillelah,' usually printed as his, appears to have been by another hand Some of his best verses were addressed to his godchild Lady Morgan (see page 780)

Theobald Wolfe Tone, born a coachmaker's son in Dublin, 20th June 1763, studied there at Trinity College and at the Middle Temple in London, and was called to the Irish Bar in 1789, but acted as secretary of the Catholic Committee, helped to organise the United Irishmen in 1791, and four years later had to flee to America and thence to France. He laboured there incessantly to induce the Directory to invade Ireland, and held a command in Hoche's expedition to Bantry Bry in 1796 In 1798 he again embarked in a small French squadron, which was captured after a fierce fight at the mouth of Lough Swilly was taken to Dublin, tried, and condemned to be hanged as a traitor, but cut his throat in prison, 19th No ember 1798 His fragmentary autobiography and journals describing the greater part of his career were edited by his son and published in America in 1826 Written with considerable spirit and vividness, their revelation of an adventurer and a character of reckless audacity has largely helped to male Tone the chief popular hero of rebellious Nationalism in Ireland reprinted in Barry O'Brien's Autobiograpy of Wolfe Tone (1893) Contrasted estimates of Tone may be found in Madden's United Irishmen (3rd series, 1846), and the Duke of Argyll's article in the Nineteenth Century for 1890

George Augent Reynolds (1770 >-1802), author of many songs ('Kathleen O'More' one of them), of a long epic, and of a musical dramatic piece on the French invasion of Ireland in 1796, was the son of a proprietor at Letterfyan in County Leitrim. His loyalty was suspected by the Government, so that he was removed from his magistracy, and he had come to England to study law a year before his death. He has had the misfortune to have credited to him a number of pieces demonstrably by other authors, thus from 1830 on his friends persistently asserted that Campbell's 'Exile of Erin' was his production

Thomas Dermody (1775~1802), who has been called 'the Irish Chatterton' rather from his sad fate than from the originality of his poctry, was the son of a schoolmaster at Ennis in County Clare He showed extraordinary aptitude for the classics and a precocious facility in writing English verses of all kinds, but having run away 10 Dublin, he lost the friends his abilities conciliated by irrepressible idleness and drunkenness, and threw away several chances of a good education. Having enlisted, he beliaved well during a spell of foreign service, but, back in England, he swiftly sank into ruinous dissipation, and died in misery. The two or three collections of poems published in his lifetime were after his death collected as The Harp of Erm (2 vols 1807) by J G Raymond, who also published his Life (2 vols 1806)

William Hone (1780-1842), famous as 'infidel' author, publisher, and Radical reformer, was born at Bath the son of strictly religious parents, at ten became a London lawyer's clerk, and at twenty started a book and print shop which soon failed Already a pronounced democrat, he struggled to make a living by writing for various papers, started The Fraviller (1815), and next The Reformist's Register (1817), and made himself notorious by a series of squibs and satires against the Government, some of which, such as The Political Litary, unmistakably contained parodies of the Catechism, the Athanasian Creed, and the He was accordingly prosecuted, but in December 1817 he was acquitted after three separate trials for publishing things calculated to injure public morals and bring the Prayer book Among his later satires, illustrated into contempt by George Cruikshank (long his most intimate friend), were The Political House that Jack built, The Queen's Matrimonial Ladder, The Man in the Moon, and The Political Showman Apocryphal New Testament (1820) was not designed to promote the reverent study of Scripture, and the Quarterly Review denounced him as 'a poor illiterate creature' and 'a wretch as con temptible as lie is wicked'-unjustly, as the sequel Ancient Mysterics dealt largely with showed the old miracle-plays, and showed some curious But his Miscellanies, The Every-day reading

Book (1826), The Table-book (1827-28), and The Year book (1829) were recommended by Southey to all interested in our national and local customs as having rendered good service in an important department of literature, they constitute a calendar of popular English amusements, sports, pastimes, ceremonies, manners, customs, and events incident especially to several days of the year Lamb was as commendatory—'I like you and your book, ingenuous Hone,' was the beginning of verses to him, the Lvery day Book was, in deed, dedicated to Lamb Scott and Christopher North were also hearty in praise of these miscellanics, filled with curious lore. Yet in the end Hone found himself in a debtor's prison, from which his friends extricated him to start him in a coffee house—also a predestined failure. In 1830 he edited Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, and he contributed to the Penny Magazine and the Patriot By this time he had become a generally popular personage, old grudges having been forgotten, in the later years of his life he became devout, and used, indeed, to preach for orthodox independent ministers. Among the sixty-four publications given under his name in the Dictionary of National Biography (most of them written, compiled, or edited by himself) are two autobio graphical works on his own early life and his conversion in later years

William Stewart Rose (1775-1843), the translator of Ariosto, was the second son of the Treasurer of the Navy Educated at Lton, he sat in Parliament 1796-1800, and then till 1824 was reading clerk of the House of Lords, but his tastes were wholly literary To gritify his father, he began A Naval History of the Late War (vol 1 1802), which he never completed Later works were verse translations from the French of the first part of Annadis de Gaul (1803) and of Le Grand's text of Partenopea de Blots (1807), Letters to Henry Hallam, Esq, from the North of Italy (2 vols 1819), and a free metrical version of Casti's Animali Parlanti (1819), to whose cantos he prefixed introductory addresses to his friends Ugo Foscolo, Hockham Frere, Sir Walter Scott, and others In 1823 he published a condensed translation of Bouardo's Orlando Innamorato, and commenced his famous version of the Orlando Furioso (vol viii 1831) not merely Rose's best work-it is still the best extant English translation of Ariosto, the only one which preserves much of the spirit of the original. It was finished at Sir Walter Scott's request Rose was also author of a poem on The Crusade of St Louis (1810), Rhymes (1837), of epistles to his friends, and of tales and sonnets, and he was an occasional contributor to the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews Ill health latterly compelled him to withdraw from society Hoole in his translation of Ariosto had adopted the heroic couplet, whereas the original ottava rima was reproduced | by Rose with some success, as may be seen from these stanzas

Let him make haste his feet to disengage, Nor lime his wings, whom Love has made a prize. For love, in fine, is nought but frenzied rage, By universal suffrage of the wise And albeit some may shew themselves more sage Than Roland, they but sin in other guise. For what proves folly more than on this shelf, Thus for another to destroy one's self? Various are love's effects, but from one so irce All I sue, though they lead a differen way He is, as 'twere, a forest where, perforce, Who enter its recesser go as ray, And here and there pursue their devious course In sum, to you I, for conclusion, say, He who groves old in love, besides all pain Which wait such passion, well deserves a chain.

Noel Thomas Carrington (1777-1830) was the son of a Ph mouth procer, who served in the nay, taught a school at Maidstone, and for ten years manifed successfully a private academy at Ph mouth Dock. From his youth he wrote poems, mainly in pruse of Devonshire, its scenery, customs, and traditions. His best known pieces were The Banks of Tamar (1820) and Dartweer (1826). His collected poems, with a Life, were published in 1830. The extract is on the disappearance from earth of the pixes.

They are flown, Beautiful fictions of our fathers, wove In Superstation's veb when Time was young, And fondly loved and cherished they are flown Before the wand of Science! Hills and vales, Mountains and moors of Devon, at line lot The enchantments, the delights, the visions all, The clfin visions that so blessed the right In the old days romantic. Nought is heard Now in the leafy world but earthly strains-Voices, vet sweet, of breeze, and bird, and brook, And water fall, the day is silent else, And night is strangely mate! the hymnings high-The immortal music men of ancient times Heard, ravished, oft, are flown! Oh ye have lost, Mountains, and moors, and meads, the radiant throngs That dwelt in your green solitudes, and filled The air, the fields, with beauty and with joy Intense, with a rich mystery that awed The mind, and flung around a thousand hearths Divinest tales, that through the enchanted year Found passionate listeners! The very streams Brightened with visitings of these so sweet Tthereal creatures! They were seen to rise From the charmed waters, which still brighter grew As the pomp passed to land, until the eye Scarce bore the unearthly glory Where they trod, Young flowers, but not of this world's growth, arose, And frigrance as of amaranthine bowers Florted upon the breeze. And mortal eyes Looked on their revels all the luseious night, And, unreproved, upon their ravishing forms Gazed wistfully, as in the dance they moved, Voluptuous to the thrilling touch of harp Elysian!

Thomas Brown (1778 - 1820), writer philosophy, was son of the minister of Kirkmabreck in Galloway, and was trained a physician He appeared as an author before his twentieth year, his first work being a review of Dr Darwin's Zoonomia On the establishment of the Edinburgh Review he became one of the contributors on philosophical subjects, and when Leslie's fitness for the Mathematical chair in the university was disputed by the orthodox because he had approved of Hume's theory of causation, Brown, who still practised medicine, warmly espoused Leslie's cause, and vindicated his opinions in an Inquiry into the Relation of Cause and Effict modifying Hume's doctrine in one or two points he sought to show that it does not necessarily lead to scepticism in theology In 1810 the philosophical physician was appointed colleague and successor to Dugald Stewart in the chair of Moral Philosophy, and he discharged the duties amidst universal respect till his death Part of his leisure was devoted to the cultivation of a taste for poetry, and he published The Paraaise of Coquettes (1814), The Wanderer of Norway (1815), and The Bower of Spring (1816) Though not without fine thoughts and images, his verse wanted force and passion, and is now utterly forgotten. In philosophy, his exposition was relieved by passages of old fashioned eloquence, he quoted largely from the poets, especially Akenside, and was too flowery in his illustrations His Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind were long popular as a textbook, but were never original nor profound, and are now antiquated He departed from Reid and Stewart and the Scottish school in the direction of the English associationism, under the influ ence of French sensationalism Mackintosh held that he had rendered an important service to mental science by his 'secondary laws of suggestion or association-circumstances which modify the action of the general law, and must be distinctly considered in order to explain its connection with the phenomena?

Sir Humphry Davy (1778–1829) was a great original investigator in chemistry and physics, a brilliant lecturer, and an author who expounded scientific verities in a wonderfully popular style He was born at Penzance, where his father was a wood carver Both at school there and at Truro he developed a taste for story-telling, poetry, and angling, and for experimental science, and in virtue of several rather pleasing poems was regarded as a poetical genius Apprenticed to a Penzance surgeon in 1795, lie made chemical experiments and entered on an encyclopedic course of study, and in 1797 seriously took up chemistry At Clifton, where in 1798 he became assistant to Dr Beddoes in his Pneumatic Institute, he met Coloridge and Southey, experimented on the respiration of gases (more than once nearly losing his life), and discovered the effect of laughing gas The account he gave of this in his Researches, Chimical and Philosophical (1799), led to his appointment as lecturer to the Royal Institution, where he delivered his first lecture in 1801, and his eloquence and the novelty of his experiments soon attracted brilliant audiences ln 1803 he began those researches in agriculture in connection with which were delivered his epoch making lectures, published as Elements of Agricultural Chemistry (1813) His fame chiefly rests on the views originated in his Bakerian lecture On Some Chemical Agencies of Electricity (1806), followed up by the grand discovery that the alkalies and earths are compound substances formed by oxygen united with metallic bases He first decomposed potrsh in 1807, when he saw the globules of the new metal, potassium, his delight was ecstatic He next decomposed soda, baryta, strontin, lime, and magnesia, discovered the new metals sodium, barium, strontium, calcium, and magnesium, and proved the earths proper to consist of metals united to oxygen In 1812 Davy was knighted, and married a lady of wealth, in 1813 he resigned the Chemical chair of the Royal Institution investigate his new theory of volcanic action he visited the Continent with Faraday, and was received with the greatest distinction by the French savans, though England and France were at war In 1815 he investigated fire damp and invented the safety lamp. He was created a baronet in 1818, and had succeeded Sir Joseph Banks as President of the Royal Society, when in 1820-23 his researches on electro-magnetism were communicated to the society After an apoplectic attack in 1826, he twice wintered in Italy, and he died at Geneva on his way homeward Among his writings were Elements of Chemical Philosophy (1812), a disquisition On the Safetylamp (1818), Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing (1828), an entertaining and popular volume modelled on Izaak Walton, but of considerable scientific interest-for Davy was not merely an enthusiastic angler but a patient student of the natural history problems suggested by the pastime. The interlocutors are Halieus, an accomplished angler, Ornither, a country gentleman interested in sports generally, Poietes, an enthusiast for nature, and Physicus, a naturalist-all mainly imaginary characters, though the substance of actual conversations is sometimes given, and notes from Davy's journal were systematically worked in In his Consolations in Travel (written at Rome in his last winter there, and posthumously published in 1830), we linve a series of speculations on moral and ethical questions, with descriptions of Italian scenery, mainly in conversations between Ambrosio, an enlightened Roman Catholic, Onuplino, an English patrician verging on scepticism, and a third interlocutor, Philalethes, who may generally be taken as representing Davy lumself, though sometimes his views are put in the mouth of 'The Unknown' Eubruhes, who occasionally appears, was Dr Wollaston Days, though a member of no communion but 'the Church of Christ' in the widest sense, was keenly interested in the defence of spiritual religion and the belief in immortality and God against materialism or the more radical forms of scepticism

Salmon and Sea Trout

Scrnr-Ioch Marce Tim -/uli

Poictes I begin to be tired. This is really a long day's journey, and these last ten miles through bogs, with no other view than that of mountains half hid in mists, and brown waters that can hardly be called lates, and with no other trees than a few stunted birelies, that look so hitle nlive that they might be supposed immediately descended from the bog wood, everywhere scattered beneath our feet. This is the most barren part of one of the most desolate countries. I have ever passed through in Lurope, and though the inn at Strathgarve is tolerable, that of Auchnasheen is certainly the worst. I have ever seen,—and I hope the worst I shall ever see. We ought to have good amusement at Pool Live, to compensate us for this uncomfortable day's journey.

Halieus I trust we shall have sport, as far as salmon and sea trout can furnish sport. Put the difficulties of our journey are almost over. See Loch Maice is stretched at our feet, and a good boat with four ours will carry us in four or five hours to our fishing ground and that time will not be inispent, for this lake is not devoid of beautiful and even grand seeners.

First The scenery begins to improve, and that cloud breasted mountain on the left is of the less character of Scotch mountains these woods, likewise, are respect able for this northern country. I think I see islands also in the distance and the quantity of cloud always gives effect to this kind of view, and perhaps, without such assistance to the imagination, there would be nothing even approaching to the sublime in these countries, but cloud and mist, by creating obscurity and offering a substitute for greatness and distance, give something of an Alpine and majestic character to this region

Ornther As we are now fixed in our places in the bont, you will surely put out a rod or two with a set of flies, or try the tail of the par for a large trout or salmon our fishing will not hinder our progress.

Hal In most other lakes I should do so, here I have often tried the experiment, but never with success. This hale is extremely deep, and there are very few fish which haunt it generally except char, and salmon seldom rest but in particular parts along the shore, which we shall not touch. Our voyage will be a pie turesque rather than an angling one. I see we shall have little occasion for the oats, for a strong breeze is rising, and blowing directly down the lake, we shall be in it in a minute. Hoist the sails! On we go!—we shall make our voyage in half the number of hours. I had calculated upon, and I hope to catch a salmon in time for dinner.

Point The scenery improves as we advance nearer the lower parts of the lake. The mountains become higher, and that small island or peninsula presents a hold eraggy ontline, and the birch wood below it, and the pines above, make a scene somewhat Alpine in character. But what is that large bird souring above the pointed rock, towards the end of the labe? Surely it is no engle?

Hal You are right, it is no caple, and of a care and peculiar species—the grey or salver eagle, a noble bird! I rom the size of the autoral, it into the finale and her very is in that high rock. I date say the male is not far off.

Phys. ris. I think I see another bird of a smaller size, perched on the roof below, which is similar in form

Hal You do it is the consort of that beautiful and powerful bird, and I have no doubt their young ones are not far off

Point Look at the bird. She dashes into the water falling hi e a rook, and rusing a column of sprace, she has fallen from a great height. And now she rises a sun into the air, what an extraordinary sight.

Hat She is pursing her prey and i one of our fraternity,—a catcher of fish. She has into all her quart this time, and has moved further down to varis the river, and falls again from a great height. There ' You've her ric with a fish in her talons.

Pore' She gives an interest vinch I hardly expected to have found to this scene. Play are there many of the elaminals in this country?

Hal Of this species, I have seen but these two, and I believe the young ones migrale as soon as they can pro ide for themselves, for this solitary bird requires a large spher to move and feed in, and doe no allow it offspring to partalle its reign, or to live norr t other species of the engle, there are some in different parts of the mountains, particularly of the Osprey and of the great fishing or brown eagle, and I once saw a very fine and interesting sigh in one of the Crags of Ben Weevis, near Strathgarve, as I was going on the 20th of August, in pursuit of black game Tro parent ergles were tending if oir offspring-two roun, bridsthe infinenties of flight. They began in rising from the top of a mountain in the eye of the sun (it was about midding, and bright for this climate). They at first made small circles, and the young birds initiated them, they proved on their wings, writing till they had made their first flight, and then took a second and larger gyration -alvays rising towards the sun and inlarging their eircle of flight so as to make a gradually ex ending The young ones still slowly followed, apparently flying better as they mounted and they continued this sublime I ind of exercise, always rising till they became mere points in the air, and the young ones were lost, and afterwards their parents, to our aching sight. But we have touched the shore, and the lale has terminatedyou are now on the ever I we

Red Are we to fish here? It is a broad clear stream, but I see no fish, and cannot think it a good angling river

Hal We are nearly a mile above our fishing station, and we must first see our quarters and provide for our lodging before we begin our fishing we must walk a little way before we find the inn.

Point Why, this inn is a second edition of Auchna sheen

Hal The interior is better than the exterior, thanks to the Laird of Brahan we shall find one tolerable room and bed, and we must put up our cots and provide our food What is our store, Mr Purveyor?

Phys I I now we have good bread, ten, and sugar

Then there is the quarter of roebuch we got at Gordon Castle, and Ormi'her has furnished us with a brace of wild ducks, three leash of snipes, and a brace of goldon plovers, by his mountain expedition of vesterday, and for fish we depend on you. Let our host says there are fresh herrings to be had, and small cod fish, and salmon and trout in any quantity, and the claret and the Ferm tosh are safe.

Hal Why, we shall fare sumptuously. As it is not time yet for shooting grouse, we must divide our spoil for the fev days we shall stay here. Let there are young snipes and plovers on the mountains above, and I have no doubt ve might obtain the Laird's permission to kill a reebuck in the woods or a hart in the mountains, but this is always an uncertain event, and I advise you, Ornither, to become a fisherman

Orn I shall wait till I see the results of your skill. At all events, in this country I can never want amute ment, and I dare say there are plenty of seals at the mouth of the river, and killing them is more useful to other fishermen than catching fish

Ma! Let there be a kettle of water with salt ready boiling in an hour, mine hot, for the fish we catch or how, and see that the posatoes are well dressed the servants will look to the rest of our fare. Now for our rods

The Future State

Ambrono Revelation has not disclosed to us the nature of this state but only fixed its certainty. We are sure from geological facts, as well as from sacred history, that man is a recent animal on the globe, and that this globe has undergone one considerable revolution, since the creation, by water, and we are taught that it is to undergo another, by fire, preparatory to a new and glorified state of existence of man, but this is all we are permitted to know, and as this state is to be entirely different from the present one of misery and probation, any knowledge respecting it would be useless, and indeed almost impossible.

Philalether My genius has placed the more exalted spiritual natures in cometary worlds, and this last fiery revolution may be produced by the appulse of a comet.

An b Human fancy may imagine a thousand ways in which it may be produced, but upon such notions it is absurd to dwell. I will not allow your genius the slightest approach to inspiration, and I can admit no verisimility in a reverse which is fixed on a foundation you now allow to be so weak. But see, the twilight is beginning to appear in the orient sky, and there are some dark clouds on the horizon opposite to the crater of Vesuvius, the lower edges of which transmit a bright light, shewing the sun is already risen in the country b reath them. I would say that they may serve as an image of the hopes of immortality derived from revela tion, for we are sure from the light reflected in those clouds that the lands below us are in the brightest sun shine, but we are entirely ignorant of the surface and the scenery, so, by revelation, the light of an imperish able and glorious world is disclosed to us, but it is in eternity, and its objects cannot be seen by mortal eye or imaged by mortal imagination

Pat I am not so vell read in the Scriptures as I hope I shall be at no very distant time, but I believe the pleasures of heaven are mentioned more distinctly than you allow in the sacred writings. I think I remember that the saints are said to be crowned with palms and amaranths, and that they are described as perpetually hymning and praising God

Amb This is evidently only metaphorical, music is the sensual pleasure which approaches nearest to an intellectual one, and probably may represent the delight resulting from the perception of the harmony of things and of truth seen in God. The palm as an evergreen tree, and the amaranth a perdurable flower, are emblems of immortality. If I am allowed to give a metaphorical allusion to the future state of the blessed, I should image it by the orange grove in that sheltered glen, on which the sun is now beginning to shine, and of which the trees are at the same time loaded with sweet golden fruit and balmy silver flowers. Such objects may well portray a state in which hope and fruition become one eternal feeling. (From the Cor solations.)

There was an edition of Davy's collected works (9 vols.) in 18,9-40 and his bro.he., Dr John Davy prepared his Viemoirs (e vol.). See also his Fragmentary Remains (1856) and the Lives by Dr Paris (1831) and Dr T. E. Thorpe (1895)

Dr Thomas M'Crie (1772-1835), Scottish historian, biographer, and divine, was born at Duns in Berwickshire, studied at Edinburgh, and was ordained in 1795 pastor of a Secession congregation there belonging to the section known as 'Anti burgher,' from their refusal to sanction the burgess's oath of allegiance to an uncovenanted Ling He also acted as professor of divinity works exhibit vast and minute research, and conscientious though they are, are almost inevitably biassed in favour of the high Presbyterian polity and its defenders and heroes. His best-known books are a scholarly Life of Knox (1812), which for the first time gave a substantially historical and not obviously partisan view of a great actor on the national stage, an equally original Life of Andrew Melville (1819), and histories of the 'progress and suppression' of the Reformation in Italy and in Spain (1827-29) In 1817 he published in three successive numbers of the Christian Instructor a trenchant review of The Tales of My Landlord, whose authorship was not yet revealed, as regards their treatment of the Covenanters and their per-His aim was to prove that the author showed gross partiality to the persecution of the Presbyterians by ignoring or glossing over the severities and cruelties they perpetrated, and by maling the oppressors, especially Claverhouse, secm admirable, contrary to historical truth, while he unfairly exaggerated the peculiarities of certain extreme Covenanters, and, in defiance of fact, represented the Covenanters generally as mere ignorant, foolish, and violent fanatics On these matters M'Crie was a much more accurate historian than Scott, and easily convicted him of many misapprehensions and misstatements in general and detail. By his own side he was held as having had a magnificent triumph over 'the Great Unknown.' Scott had at first pooh poohed M'Crie's strictures, and resolved not even to read them, but, as Lockhart said, he 'found the impression they were producing so strong that he soon changed his purpose and devoted a very large part of his article for the Quarterly Remew to in claborate defence of his own picture of the Covenanters'—that is, Scott as Scott defended in the Quarterly, in a review of his own unacknowledged works, his own historical representations there set forth. The following extracts are from the earlier part of M'Crie's famous review of The Iales

The same regard to the truth of history must be observed when fictitious personages are introduced prosided the reader is taught or induced to form a judgment from them of the parties to which they are represented a If it is permitted to unde embelli linears on the scene, with the view of giving greater interest to the piece, the utmost care ought to be taken that they do not violate the integrity of character and they must be in partially distributed, and equally extended to all parties, and to the virtues and views of each. This is a delicate task, but the undertaker imposes it upon himself, with all its responsibilities. Besides fid lity impartiality, and judgment, it requires an extensive, and minute, and accurate acquaintance with the history of the period selected, including the history of opinions and liabits as well as of events. And we do not hesitate to say that this is a species of intelligence which is not likely to be possessed by the person who holds in sovereign contempt the opinions which were then decined of the utmost moment, and turns with disgust from the very exterior manners of the men whose immost habits he affects to disclose. Nor will the multifarious reading of the dabbler in everything, from the highest affairs of church and state down to the economy of the latelien and the management of the stable, I cep him from blundering here at every step

The guides of public opinion cannot be too jealous in guarding against the eneroschments of the writers of fiction upon the province of true lustors, nor too futliful in pointing out every tran gression, however small it may appear, of the sacred fences he which it is pro-Such writers have it in their power to do much miselues, from the engaging form in which their conver their sentiments to a numerous and, in general, in suspecting class of readers. When the scene is laid in a remote and fabulous period, or when the merits and conduct of the men who are made to figure in it do not affect the great cause of truth and of public good, the writer may be allowed to exercise his ingenuity, and to amuse his readers, without our narrowly inquiring whether his representations are historically correct or But when he speaks of those men who were en gaged in the great struggle for national and individual rights, civil and religious, which took place in this country previous to the Revolution, and of all the cruelties of the oppressors, and all the sufferings of the oppressed, he is not to be tolerated in giving a false and distorted view of men and measures, whether this proceed from ignorance or from prejudice. Nor should his misrepresentations be allowed to pass without severe reprehension when their native tendency is to shade the atrocities of persecution, to diminish the horror with which the conduct of a tyrannical and unprincipled government has been so long and so justly regarded, and to traduce and valify the characters of those men nho, while they were made to feel all the weight of its severity, continued to resist, until they succeeded in emancipating themselves, and securing their posterity from the falling toke. On this supposition, it is not sufficient to atone for such faults that the work in which they are found displays great talents, that it contains scenes which are described with exquisite propriety and truth, that the leading facts in the listory of the e-times are brought forward, that the author has condemned the severitles of the government, that he is often in a mirthful and factious mood, and that some allowances must be made for a desire to annise his readers, and to impart preater interest to a story which, after all, is for the most part fictitious

One charge which he frequently brings against the strict Presbyterious is that of a morore and gloome lugotry, displayed by their censuring of all imiocent recreations. This he endeavours to impress on the imagination of his reader in the very first scene, by representing them as refusing, from such scruples, to attend the weaponschaus appointed by government 'The ingour of the strict Calvinists' says he, 'increa ed in proportion to the wishes of the government that it should be relaxed. A sup-realious condemnation of all manly pastimers and harmless recreations distinguished those who professed a more than ordinary source of The fact is, that from the Reformation down to the period in which the scene of this tile is laid such exercises and pastimes were quite common throughout Scotland, children were earefully trained to them then at school professors in universities attended and joined in them, as well as their students, and the Presisterian ministers, having practised them at school and at college instead of condenining them as unlawful, did not scruple to countenance them with their presence. There were some of these precise preachers for whom, we suspect, our author (with all his intimate knowledge of such sports) night no have been quite a nintch in shooting at the popinjay, and in playing with them at the rapier or small sword, or in wrestling a fall, we are afraid he might have come off as bally as Sergeant Bothwell did from the brawny arms of John Balfour of Builer

The second instance which goes to prove that the authors statements respecting the religious sentiments and customs of that period are not to be depended upon relates to the use of the bool of Common Praver 'The young nt arms,' says lie, 'were unable to avoid listening to the frayers red in the church's on these occarions, and thus, in the opinion of their repining parents, meddling with the accursed thing which is an abomination in the sight of the Lord' Now, though the author had not stood in ane of that 'dreadful name,' which all Christians are thught to venerate, nor been afrud of the threatening, 'The Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain,' we would have thought that he would have at least been careful to save himself from ridicule by ascertaining the truth of the fact which he assumes as the foundation of his irreverent How, then, does the fact stand? Privers were net read in the parish churches of Scotland at that time, any more than they were in the meeting houses of the indulged, or in the conventicles of the stricter Presby The author has taken it for granted that the Prayer Book was introduced into Scotland along with Episcopal government at the Restoration astonished that any one who professed to be acquainted with the history of that period, and especially one who undertakes to describe its religious manners, should take up this erroneous notion The English Book of Common Prayer was never introduced into Scotland, and, previous to 1637, v as used only in the Chapel Royal, and perhaps occasionally in one or two other places, to please the king The history of the short lived Scottish Prayer-Book is well known At the Restoration neither the one nor the other was imposed, but the public worship was left to be conducted as it had been practised in the Presbytenan Church. Charles II was not so fond of prayers, whether read or extempore, as to interest him self in that matter, his maxim was, that Presbyterianism was not fit for a gentleman, his dissipated and irre ligious courtiers were of the same opinion, and therefore Episcopacy was established As for the aspiring church men who farthered and pressed the change, they were satisfied with seating themselves in their rich bishopries Accordingly, the author will not find the Preslyterians 'repining' at this imposition, and had he examined their writings, as he ought to have done, he would have found them repeatedly admitting that they had no such For the sake of giving effect to a particular scene, the author does not hesitate to violate histone truth and probability, and even to contradict his own statements or admissions. Instances of this occur in some of his best descriptions, and they show that though he has the imagination and feeling of a poet, he is deficient in the judgment and discriminating taste of a historian

M Cries works fill four volumes (1855-57), and there is a Life by his son (1840).

Thomas Campbell

was born in Glasgow on the 27th July 1777 youngest of eleven, he came of a good Highland family, the Campbells of Kirnan in Argyllshire, who traced their origin to the first lord of Lochawe. The property, however, had passed from the old race, and the poet's father carried on business in Glasgow as a trader with Virginia American Revolution brought disaster, and in his latter days Alexander Campbell subsisted on a small income derived from a merchant's society, uded by his industrious wife, who took in young collegians as boarders Thomas passed in 1791 from the grammar-school to the University of Glasgow, and was particularly distinguished for his translations from the Greek, a translation of part of the Clouds of Aristophanes being specially commended. He had already gained a prize for an English poem, an Essay on the Origin of Evil, modelled on Pope. Other poetical pieces, written between his fourteenth and sixteenth year, show He became his delicate taste and care of diction tutor to a family in Mull, and about this time met with his 'Caroline of the West,' the daughter of a minister of Inveraray In 1794 he begged five shillings from his mother, and walked to Edinburgh to attend the trials of Muir and Gerald for sedition—for he was already a stout Reformer and admirer of the French Revolution The winter of 1795 saw him again at college work in Glasgow, and supporting himself by private tuition year he was again tutor in the Highlands, this time in Appin, thereafter he repaired to Edinburgh, hesitated between the Church and the law, but soon abandoning all hopes of either, employed himself in private teaching and work for the book-Poetry was not neglected, and in April 1799 appeared his Pleasures of Hope The copyright was sold for £60, but for some years the publishers gave the poet £50 on every new edition of two thousand copies, and allowed him, in 1803, to publish a quarto subscription copy, from which he realised about £1000 It was in a 'dusky lodging' in Alison Square, Edinburgh, that the Pleasures of Hope was composed, much of it was thought out in walks round Arthur's Sent, and the opening lines were suggested by the Firth of Forth as seen from the Calton Hill The poem went through four editions in a twelvemonth, having captivated all readers by its varied nielody, polished diction, generous sentiment, and touching episodes, and in picturing the horrors of war and the partition of Poland the poet warmed to noble rage

Oh, bloodiest picture in the book of Time ' Sarmatia fell, unwept, without a crime, Found not a generous friend, a pitying foe, Strength in her arms, nor mercy in her woe! Dropped from her nerveless grasp the shattered spear. Closed her bright eye, and curbed her high career Hope, for a season bade the v orld farewell, And Freedom slineked—as Kosciusko fell ! The sun went down, nor ceased the carrage there. Tumultuous Murder shook the midnight air-On Prague's proud arch the fires of ruin glow, His blood-dyed waters murmuring far below, The storm prevails, the rampart yields a way Bursts the wild cry of horror and dismay! Hark ' as the smouldering piles with thunder fall. A thousand shrieks for hopeless mercy call '

Earth shook, red meteors flashed along the sky, And conscious Nature shuddered at the cry 4

Defects were noted in the Pleasures of Hope—lack of connection between the parts, florid lines, and imperfect metaphors, but such a scries of genial pictures, of dignified and suggestive thoughts, in such terse and polished verse had rarely been found in a poem written at the age of twenty one. More than a hundred and fifty new lines were added after the first edition.

Shortly after its publication C impbell visited the Continent He sailed from Leith for Hamburg in June 1800, and proceeding thence to Ratisbon, witnessed the action which gave that city to the The poet stood with the monks of the Scottish college of St James on the ramparts near the monistery while the Austrian cavalry charged the French He saw no other battle-Hohen linden was fought some weeks after he had left Bayarra-but made many excursions and wis well received by Moreau and other French officers The progress of the war drove him north to If ini burg, where he settled for a winter, and here he wrote some of his minor poems, published in the Morning Chronick Ye Warmers of England was 'made in Germany,' The Battle of the Battle too was inspired by the arrival of the British fleet in the Sound In another vein were some poems in which he imitated Klopstock, whose acquaintance he liad made here. And the Eight of Eight was suggested by a meeting at Hamburg with an Irish rebel, Anthony MacCann 1 or this—so jealous was the British Government of that diy -Campbell was suspected of being a spy, and on his arrival in Fdinburgh was subjected to in examination by the sheriff, which ended happily in mirth and con-Shortly afterwards the poetical wanderer was received by Lord Minto as secretary and literary companion—a function Campbell's temper and democratic spirit rendered uncongenial and crclong intolerable. To the year 1802 belong Lochiel's Warning and Hohenlinden-the latter surely a remarkable battle piece, though it was rejected by the editor of the Greenock Advertiser, and was called by its author a 'mere drum and trumpet thing? In 1803 he settled in London, making literature his profession, and living with Telford the engineer, who continued his friendship throughout a long life For the Edinburgh Encyclopædia Campbell wrote biographics, an account of the drama, and other articles, he compiled three volumes of the Annals of Great Britain from the Accession of George III to the Peace of Amiens, a continuation of Smollett, and, like Goldsmith, often contrived to brighten mere hack-work with literary grace. In 1805, through Fox's influence, the Government granted him a pension of £200-a well merited tribute to the author of Ye Mariners of England and the Battle of the Baltic In 1809 was published his second great poem, Gertrude of Hyoming, a Pennsylvanian Tale, a pathetic story sweetly told in Spenserian stanzas, how 'the junction of European with Indian ums converted a terrestrial paradisc into a frightful wast." The best of his later pieces were contributed to the New Monthly Magazine, which he edited from 1820 to 1831 One of these minor poems, 'The last Man,' is one of his most notable creations. In 1814, with Mrs Siddons and John Kemble, Campbell visited Pans, and no keenly enjoyed the sculpture and other works of art in the Louvre that they seemed to give his mind a new sense of the humony of art. In 1818 he revisited Germany, and the year after his return published his Spice mens of the British Poets, with biographical and critical notices, in eccen volumes—a sound sen sible, and for the time enimently serviceable piece of work, though some of the criticism lins now in antiquited air, and the standard is not that of the present day In 1820 he lectured on poetry at the Surrey Institution, in 1824 he published Hiedric, an extravagant tale, pointpous and wooden, but containing one fine passage O Country's Child Sir Henry Taylor pronounced to be 'the very soul of song-tragic romantic, passionate -and held that some of the other minor poems, The Spectre Beat, Glenara, The Retter Bane and Lord Clin's Daugliter, have an almost equal charm. Though busy in establishing the London I niversity, he was in 1827 elected Lord Rector of the university of his native city-a compliment heightened by his re election the two following years, the last time Sir Walter Scott being the rejected. In 1834 he made a voyage to Algiers, of which he published an account, and in 1842 he appeared again as a poet in a slight narrative piece unworthy of his fame, The Pilgram of Glerce Among the literity engagements of his latter years were Lives of Mrs Siddons and of Petrarcli In the summer of 1843 he need his residence at Boulogne, but his health was now much impaired, he died the following summer, on the 15th of June 1844, and was buried in Westminster Abbey

Cimpbell's early favourities and models were Milton and Gray, Thomson and Goldsmith but especially Pope, whom he vehemently and, as Byron said, gloriously defended against Bowles and other critics. He shows the influence of these his masters, as well as of Akenside and Rogers and even Erasmus Darwin Spite of his long life of literary work, the whole of his poetry fills but a small volume, and his best a very small bulk 'What a pity it is,' said Sir Walter Scott, 'that Campbell does not write more and oftener and give full sweep to his genius l. He has wings that would bear him to the skies, and he does, now and then spread them grandly, but folds them up again, and resumes his perch, as if he was afraid to hunch away. What a grand idea is that,' said the kindly critic, 'about prophetic boding, or, in common parlance, second sight-

Coming events cast their shadows before!

The fact is 5cot added, Campbell is in a morrer, a bughear to himself. The brightness of his early success is a de arrent to all his further ! efforts. He is afraid of the shados that his h oun fame easts before him! Most of Campalls, Inger points are didactic and unitspred on a in brief passages, felicitous and mellilaous but monotrous. Only in his war sound the manning a cent, and though most of his other work is little ! tend there are of universal acceptance and im-t pershable. And he is secrete as a critic sud, i of in 'immortality of quotation'. Though 'I'd'c angel v site few and fir between, o enest quo ed vas horrowed by Campbell as all as by blair ! from Norres of Bemerton (page 259) some of his phrases lines and couplets are household vords "I sunharst in the storm of death ? There, sad spectatress of her country's vice!
The lovely Gertrude, save from present harm,
Had laid her check, and clasped her hands of snow
On Waldegrave's shoulder, half within his arm
Inclosed, that felt her heart, and hushed its wild alarm!

But short that contemplation—sad and short
The pause to bid each much loved scene adicu!
Beneath the very shadow of the fort,
Where friendly swords were drawn and banners flew,
Ah! who could deem that foot of Indian erew
Was near?—vet there, with lust of murderous deeds, Gleamed life a basibsk, from woods in view,
The ambushed formen's eye—his volley speeds,
And Albert Albert falls! the dear old father bleeds!

And tranced in gildy horror, Certrude swooned,
Yet, while she clasps him lifeless to her zone,
Say, but titley, borrowed from her fittler's wound.
These drops? Oh God! the life blood is her own!
And filtering, on her Waldegrave's bosom thrown—Weep not, O love! she cries, 'to see me bleed.
Thee, Gertrude's sad survivor, thee alone.
Herven's peace commissible for scarce. I heed.
These wounds yet thee to leave is death, is death indeed!

'Clasp me a little longer on the limil

And when this heart hath ecased to beat—oh! think,
And let it initigate thy woe's excess,
That thou hast been to me all tenderness
And friend to more than human friendship just

Ye Mariners of England.

Ye manners of England 1
That guard our native seas,
Whose flag has braved a thousand years
The battle and the braze 1
Your glorious standard launch again
To match another foe 1
And sweep through the deep,
While the stormy winds do blow,
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy winds do blow

The spirits of your fathers
Shall'start from every wave!
For the deck it was their field of fame,
And ocean was their grave,
Where Blake and mighty Melson fell,
Your manly hearts shall glow,
As ye sweep through the deep,
While the stormy winds do blow,
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy winds do blow

Britannia needs no bnlwarks,
No towers along the steep,
Her march is o'er the mountain waves,
Her home is on the deep
With thunders from her native oak,
She quells the floods below,
As they roar on the shore,
When the stormy winds do blow,
When the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy winds do blov

The meteor flag of England
Shall yet terrific burn,
Till danger's troubled night depart,
And the star of peace return
Then, then, ye ocean warnors'
Our song and feast shall flow
To the fame of your name,
When the storm has ceased to blow,
When the fiery fight is heard no more,
And the storm has ceased to blow'

When the poem was first published in the Naval Chronicle for 1801, the line about Blake and Nelson read 'Where Granvill (boast of freedom) fell 'but after Trafalgar the Georgian hero was substituted for the Elizabethan, Tennysons Sir Richard Grenville and Blake the Cromwellian was added—though Blake did not precisely 'fall, but died of scorbutic fever on board his ship as it entered Plymouth Sonnd.

The Battle of the Baltic.

Of Nelson and the North,
Sing the glorious day's renown,
When to battle fierce came forth
All the might of Denmark's crown,
And her arms along the deep proudly shone,
By each gun the lighted brand,
In a bold determined hand,
And the Prince of all the land Led them on

Like leviathans affoat,
Lay their bulwarks on the brine,
While the sign of battle flew
On the lofty British line
It was ten of April morn by the chime
As they drifted on their path,
There was silence deep as death
And the boldest held his breath
For a time.

But the might of England flushed
To anticipate the scene,
And her van the fleeter rushed O er the deadly space between 'Hearts of oak,' our captains cried, when each gun
From its adamantine lips
Spread a death shade round the ships,
Like the hurricane eclipse
Of the sun

Again 'again 'again'
And the havoc did not slack,
Till a feeble cheer the Danc
To our cheering sent us back
Their shots along the deep slowly boom,
Then ceased—and all is wail,
As they strike the shattered sail,
Or, in conflagration pale,
Light the gloom

Out spoke the victor then,
As he hailed them o'er the wave
'Ye are brothers' ye are men'
And we conquer but to save,
So peace instead of death let us bring;
But yield, proud foe, thy fleet,
With the crev's, at England's feet,
And make submission meet
To our king'

Then Denmark blessed our chief,
That he gave her wounds repose,
And the sounds of joy and grief
From her people wildly rose,
As death withdrev his shades from the day
While the sun looked smiling bright
O'er a wide and woful sight,
Where the fires of funeral light
Died away

Now joy, Old England, raise '
For the tidings of thy might,
By the festal cities' blaze,
Whilst the wine-cup shines in light,
And yet amidst that joy and uproar,
Let us think of them that sleep,
Full many a fathom deep,
By thy wild and stormy steep,
Elsinore!

Brave hearts 'to Britain's pride
Once so faithful and so true,
On the deck of fame that died,
With the gallant good Riou,
Soft sigh the winds of heaven o'er their grave '
While the billow mournful rolls
And the mermaid's song condoles,
Singing glory to the souls
Of the brave '

Captain Riou was praised by Lord Nelson as the gallant and the good. The first draft of this porm, sent to Scott in 180, consisted of thirty stanzas—all published in Beattir s Life of Campbell. The piece was greatly improved by condensation but the excision of these verses on English sailors was clearly a loss portrays with warmth and sympathy the domestic affections, and the charms of benevolence and virtue, but in Don Sebastian we have besides an interesting though melancholy plot and characters vividly sketched. Anna's sister, Jane, was later in developing her literary talent, but had a much greater gift, and her two romances, Thaddeus of Warsaw (1803) and The Scottish Chiefs (1810), were both exceptionally popular in their day. Thaddeus, high-flown and but imperfectly true to Polish character or historical setting, was translated into French and German, delighted Kosciuszko, and brought its authoress an honorary office from the King of Würtemberg The Chiefs is wonderfully untrue to real lustory and national manners, it is stilted, conventional, sentimental, and its Wallace is alternately a drawing-room hero and a stagey poseur, not the rough captain of a rougher nulitia Yet the story is animated and picturesque, was enormously popular in Scotland, was translated into French, German, and Russian, and had the honour of being proscribed by Napoleon to be credited (contrary to probability) with an even higher honour-that of having suggested to Scott the idea of the Waverley Novels Thaddens and the Chiefs are almost the only historical novels before Scott's time that can be said still to live. The Chiefs was more than a dozen times reprinted before the end of the nineteenth century, and Thaddens was at least twice reprinted in its last decade. Other novels were The Pastor's Fireside, Duke Christian of Lunehurg (the idea of which was suggested by George IV the materials supplied by Dr Clarkes, and The Ferty Feetsteps Two or three plays by her were blank fultires. Her last considerable enterprise was on a work given out as a record of real experience merely 'edited' by her Sir Edward Scaward's Shipwreck, as written in his own Diary (1831), although the authorship was long ascribed to her, was probably the vork of her eldest brother, Dr William Ogilvie Porter (1774–1850) Another brother, Sir Robert Ker Porter (1777–1842), battle-painter, travelled much, was consul in Venezuela, and wrote books of travel in Russia, Sweden, Spain, Portugal, Georgia, Persia, and Armenia.

Joanna Baillie borrows freely from June Porter's Wallace for her equally non authentic 'William Willace' in the Metrical Legends, and cites from the Scottish Chiefs this passage as one of 'terrific sublimity'

The Burning of the Barns of Ayr

When all was ready, Wallace, with the mights spirit of retribution nerving every limb, mounted to the roof, and tearing off part of the tiling, with a fluming brand in his hand, showed himself glittering in arms to the afrighted revellers beneath, and as he threw it blazing amongst them, he cried aloud, 'The blood of the murdered calls for vengeance, and it comes.' At that instant

The details in Jane Austen's vorks are not, as in Balzic, multiplied overmuch, they all aid in developing and discriminating her characters, v ho, if they do not throb and thrill with passion, ha c amining vitality and lifely eness, they are presented with extriordinary dramatic truth and effect, friery one says the right thing in the right place and in the right way! Of all his succes ors i she is the one who most nearly resembles Richardson in the power of impressing reality upon her characters? Wherever Miss Austen introduces us we soon find ourselves amongst frends and neighbours, more familiar to us in spite of their old fashioned dresses and old world phrises, than many of the people amongst home ne actually like. She is amazingly deft in delicate ridicule of womanly foibles and vanity and is great on mistakes in the education of gids—on family differences obstraves, and pride on the distinctions between the different classes of society, and the niver slindes of feeling and conduct as their ripen into love or friend-hip or subside into indifference or d slike. We do not find, we do not miss that morbid colouring of the stionier and darker passions which so many novelists of her time afforted. The clear daylight of nature as reflected in domestic life is her genial and irexhaustible element bet as every work of ar, every true story, has its a hight take, a nore pointed moral leron can hardly be convexed than in the disties of the Bertrin furly in Marsield Perk brough about by the wants and callonsn sof the two drughters who had been truent no hing be 'accomplishments'. ## A too kind Half-brother

Mrs John Dachwood now installed herself mistress of Norland, and her mother and sisters in law were de graded to the condition of visitors. As such, however, they were treated by her with quiet civility, and by her husband with as much I indness as he could feel towards anybody beyond himself, his wife, and their child. He really pressed them, with some earnestness, to consider Norland as their home, and, as no plan appeared so eligible to Mrs Dashwood as remaining there till she could accommodate herself with a house in the neigh bourhood, his invitation was accepted.

A continuance in a place where everything reminded her of former delight was exactly what suited her mind. In seasons of cheerfulness no temper could be more cheerful than hers or possess in a greater degree that sanguine expectation of happiness which is happiness itself. But in sorrow she must be equally carried away by her fancy, and as far beyond consolation as in pleasure she was beyond alloy.

Mrs Jo'in Dashwood did not at all approve of what her husband intended to do for his sisters. To take three thousand pounds from the fortune of their dear little boy would be impoverishing him to the most dreadful degree. She begged him to thind again on the subject. How could he answer it to himself to rob his child, and his only child too, of so large a sum? And what possible claim could the Mill Dashwoods, who were related to him only by half blood, which she con sidered as no relationship at all, have on his generosity to so large an amount? It was very vell known that no affection was e or supposed to exist between the children of any man by different marriages, and why was he to ruin himself and their poor little Harry by giving away all his money to his half sisters?

'It was my father's last request to me,' replied her husband, 'that I should assist his widow and daughters'

'He did not know what he was talking of, I dare say, ten to one but he was light headed at the time. Had he been in his right senses, he could not have thought of such a thing as begging you to give away half your for une from your own child'

'He did not stipulate for any particular sum, my dear Fanny, he only requested me, in general terms, to assist them, and make their situation more comfortable than it was in his power to do. Perhaps it would have been as vell if he had left it vholly to myself. He could hardly suppose I should neglect them. But as he required the promise, I could not do less than give it at least I thought so at the time. The promise, there fore, was given, and must be performed. Something mus be done for them whenever they leave Norland and settle in a new home.'

'Well, then, let some hing be done for them, but that something need not be three thousand pounds. Consider,' she added, 'that when the money is once parted with, it never can return. Your sisters will marry, and it will be gone for ever. If, indeed, it could ever be restored to our poor little boy'——

'Why, to be sure,' said her liusband, very gravely, 'that vould male a great difference. The time may come when Harry will regret that so large a sum was parted with If he should have a numerous family, for instance, it would be a very convenient addition'

'To be sure it would.'

'Perhaps, then, it would be better for all parties if the sum were diminished one half. Five hundred pounds would be a prodigious increase to their fortunes ''

'Oh' beyond anything great! What brother on earth would do half so much for his sisters, even if really his sisters? And as it is—only half blood! But you have such a generous spirit!'

'I would not wish to do anything mean,' he replied.
'One had rather, on such occasions, do too much than too little. No one, at least, can think I have not done enough for them, even themselves, they can hardly expect more.'

'There is no knowing what they may expect; said the lady, 'but we are not to think of their expectations the question is, what you can afford to do'

'Certainly, and I thin! I may afford to give them five hundred pounds apiece. As it is, without any addition of mine, they will each liave above three thousand pounds on their mother's death—a very comfortable fortune for any young woman'

'To be sure it is, and, indeed, it stril es me that they can want no addition at all. They will have ten thou sand pounds divided amongst them. If they marry, they will be sure of doing well, and if they do not, they may all live very comfortably together on the interest of ten thousand pounds.'

'That is very true, and therefore, I do not know whether, upon the whole, it would not be more advisable to do something for their mother while she lives, rather than for them—something of the annuity 1 ind, I mean M, sisters would feel the good effects of it as well as herself. A hundred a year would make them all perfectly comfortable.'

His wife hesitated a little, however, in giving her consent to this plan

'To be sure,' said she, 'it is better than paring with fifteen hundred pounds at once. But then, if Mrs Dashwood should live fifteen years, we shall be completely taken in'

'Fusicen years! my dear Fanny, her life cannot be worth half that purchase.'

'Certainly not, but if you observe, people always live for ever when there is any annuity to be paid them, and she is very stout and healthy, and hardly forty annuity is a very serious business, it comes over and over every year, and there is no getting rid of it. You are not aware of what you are doing I have known a great deal of the trouble of annuities, for my mother was elogged with the payment of three to old super annuated servants by my father's will, and it is amazing how disagreeable she found it. Twice every year these annuities were to be paid, and then there was the trouble of getting it to them, and then one of them was said to have died, and afterwards it turned out to be no such thing. My mother was quite sick of it. Her income was not her own, she said, with such perpetual claims on it, and it was the more unlind in my father, because otherwise the money would have been entirely at my mother's disposal, without any restriction what ever It has given me such an abhorrence of annuities that I am sure I would not pin myself down to the payment of one for all the world.'

'It is certainly in unpleasant thing,' replied Mr Dashwood, 'to have those kind of yearly drains on one's income. One's fortune, as your mother justly says, is not one's own. To he tied down to the regular payment.

went to that strange medley of pathos and humour-the Irish character' Her father, Robert Owenson (originally MacOwen), was an actor and manager, a favourite in the society of Dublin, and author of some popular Irish songs She was born in Dublin on the Christmas Day of 1780 or thereby-'cold, false, erroneous, chronological dates' she protests against—and in 1798 turned governess, to support the failing fortunes of her In 1801 she published a small volume of poetical verse, and afterwards The Lay of the Itish Harp and a selection of twelve Irish lyrics, with music-one of them 'Kate Kearney,' which bids fair to outlive all her other achievements Two rubbishy novels had preceded The Wild Irish Girl (1806), which became exceptionally popular This success introduced the authoress into some of the higher circles of Irish and English society, and she became attached to the household of the Marquis of Abercorn She had had 'somewhat mysterious relations' with at least one admirer, Sir Charles Ormsby, when in 1812 she was married off-hand to Thomas Charles Morgan, M.D. (1783-1843), whom the Lord-Lieutenant knighted for the For the next quarter of a century, excepting two long visits to the Continent, the pair made Dublin their home, but in 1837 Lord Melbourne gave her a pension of £300, and in 1839 they removed to London Ere this she had published The Missionary, an Indian Tale (1811), O'Donnel (1814), Florence Macarthy (1818, 4th ed. 1819), and The O'Briens and the O'Flaherty's (1827), in which, departing from the beaten track of sentimental novels, she ventured, like Miss Edgeworth, to portray national manners In Sir Walter Scott's opinion, O'Donnel, though deficient as a story, has 'some striking and beautiful passages of situa tion and description, and in the comic part is very rich and entertaining' But Lady Morgan's high toned society is disfigured with grossness and profligacy, and her subordinate characters are often caricatures The vivacity and variety of these presentations is unquestionable-if not always true, they are lively, 'whether it is a review of volunteers in the Phænix Park, or a party at the Castle, or a masquerade, a meeting of United Irishmen, a riot in Dublin, or a jug-day at Bog-moy-in every change of scene and situation our authoress wields the pen of a ready writer' Complaint was made against these Irish sketches that they were so personal romans a clef, it being plainly indicated that some of the portraits of personages at the vice regal court and in the 'best society' of Dublin represented actual and well-known ludies and gentlemen of the day Their conversation is often a sad jargon of prurient allusion, comments on dress, and superfluous scraps of French and Italian The humbler characters—even the rapparecs—are infinitely more entertaining than Lady Morgan's representatives of the aristocracy Her strength lay in describing the broad characteristics of her nation, their boundless mirth, their old customs, their love of frolic, and their wild grief under calamity or in bewailing the death of friends and neighbours. In this department she may fairly be compared with Lever and Banim and Carleton Other works were France (1817) and Italy (1821), with dissertations on the state of society, manners, literature, and government. Lord Byron bore testimony to the fidelity and excellence of Italy, but unluckily here also she was too 'ambitious of being always fine and striking,' and too anxious to display her curious reading and high company Lady Morgan wrote also The Princess (a tale founded on the revolution in Belgium), Luxima the Prophetess, an Indian tale, Dramatic Scenes from Real Life (very poor in matter and affected in style), The Life and Times of Salvator Rosa, The Book of the Boudor (autobiographical sketches and reminiscences), Woman and her Master (a philosophical history of woman down to the fall of the Roman empire), and in 1841, in conjunction with her husband (author of Sketches of the Philosophy of Life and Morals, &c.), two volumes entitled The Book without a Name, pieces collected from the writers' portfolios and from stray sketches which had appeared in periodicals Lady Morgan's silly but not unamusing Memoirs were edited by Hepworth Divon (2 vols 1862), and W J Fitzpatrick had already written a Life of her in 1860

The Irish Hedge Schoolmaster

A beyy of rough headed students, with books as ragged as their habiliments, rushed forth at the sound of the horse's feet, and with hands shading their un covered faces from the sun, stood gazing in earnest Last of this singular group, followed O'Leary himself in learned dishabille, his customary suit-an old great-coat, fastened with a wooden skewer at his breast, the sleeves hanging unoccupied, Spanish ruise, as he termed it, his wig laid aside, the shaven crown of his head resembling the clerical tonsure, a tattered Homer in one hand, and a slip of sallow in the other, with which he had been distributing some well earned pandies to his pupils, thus exhibit ing, in appearance and in the important expression of his countenance, an epitome of that order of persons once so numerous, and still far from extinct in Ireland, the hedge schoolmaster O'Leary was learned in the antiquities and genealogies of the great Irish families as an ancient Senachy, an order of which he believed himself to be the sole representative, credillous of her fables, and jealous of her ancient glory, ardent in his feelings, fixed in his prejudices, hating the Bodei Sassoni, or English churls, in proportion as he dis trusted them, living only in the past, contemptuous of the present, and hopeless of the future, all his national learning and national vanity were employed in his history of the Macarthies More, to whom he deemed himself hereditary Senachy, while all his early associations and affections were occupied with the litzadelm family, to an heir of which he had not only been foster father, but, by a singular chain of occurrences, tutor and host. Thus there existed an incongruity between his prejudices and his affections that added to the natural incoherence of his wild, unregulated, ideal character. He had as much Greek and Latin as generally falls to the lot of the inferior Irish priesthood, an order to which he had been originally destined, he spoke Irish as his native tongue with great fluency, and Lughish, with little variation, as it might have been spoken in the days of James or Philabeth, for Lughish was with him acquired by study at no early period of hic, and principally obtained from such bools as earne within the black letter plan of his antiquarian pursuits.

"Words that wise Bacon and grave Kaleigh spoke" were familiarly uttered by O'I cary, connect out of old Inglish tracts, chronicles, presidential instructions, copies of patents, memorials, discourses, and translated remonstrances from the Irish chiefs, of every date since the arrival of the English in the island, and a few French words, not unusually heard among the old Irish Catholies, the descendants of the faithful followers of the Stuarts, completed the stock of his philological riches

O Leary now advanced to meet his visitant, with a countenance radiant with the expression of complicency and satisfaction, not unningled with pride and importance, as he threw his eyes round on his numerous disciples. To one of these the Commodore gave his horse, and drawing his hat over his eyes, as if to shade them from the sun, he placed himself under the shadow of the Saxon arch, observing

'You see, Mr O Leary, I very eagerly avail mixelf of your invitation, but I fear I have interrupted your learned avocation'

'Not a taste, your honour, and am going to give my classes a holiday, in respect of the turf, sir - What does yez all crowd the gentleman for? Did never yez see a mal gentleman afore? I'd trouble yez to consider yourselves as temporary -There's great scholars among them ragged runngates, your honour, poor as they look, for though in these degendered times you won't get the childre, as formerly, to talk the dead languages afore they can spake, when, says Campion, they had Latin lile a vulgar tongue, conning in their schools of leach craft the aphorisms of Hippocrates, and the civil in stitutes of the faculties, jet there are as fine scholars and as good philosophers still, sir, to be found in my seminary as in Trinity College, Dublin .-- Now, step for ward here, you Homers "Ixeklute moi, Iroes, kai Dardanoi, ed' epikouroi "'

Henry Gally Knight (1786-1846), who wrote Eastern tales in the manner and measure of Byron, was an recomplished man of fortune, born at his fithers Yorlshire sent, educated at Eton and Cambridge, familiarised with foreign manners by trivels in southern Europe, Egypt, and Palestine. The first of these metrical stories, Ildering, c Syrian Tale (1816), was followed by Parasym, a Grecian Fali, and Alashtar, an Iradiar Tale knight also wrote a notable dramatic poem, Hannibal in Bitismic Though showing much tasic and truth to Oriental ways, these poems fuled to attract much notice, and their author obtained more distinction as an authority on architecture, writing (with expert assistance) An Architectural Tour in Normaray, The Normans in Swily, Saracenic and Norman Remains in Suily, The Leclesiastical Architecture of Italy He inherited the family property in 1808, and sat in Pirliament from 1824 till his death

William Knox (1789-1825), born at Lilliesleaf in Roxburglishire, was author of The Lonely Hearth, Songs of Israel, The Harp of Zron, and other poems. Sir Walter Scott in his draw gives this brief note of his life work. His father was a respectable yeoman, and he himself succeeding to good farms under the Duke of Buccleuch, became too soon his own master, and plunged into dissipation and ruin. His talent then shewed itself in a fine strain of pensive poetry. Knox, who from 1820 earned a precarious livelihood as journalist in Edinburgh, thus ended his Sorgs of Israel.

My song hath closed, the holy dream
That raised my thoughts o'er all below
Hath fided like the lunar beam,
And left me 'nud a night of woe—
To look and long, and sigh in vain
For friends I ne'er shall meet again.

And yet the earth is green and gay,
And yet the skies are pure and bright,
But, 'mid each gleam of pleasure gay,
Some cloud of sorrow dims my sight
For weak is now the tenderest tongue
That might my simple songs have sung

And like to Gilead's drops of balm,

They for a moment soothed my breast,
But earth hath not a power to calm

My spirit in forgetful rest,
Until I lay me side by side

With those that loved me, and have died.

They died—and this a world of woe,
Of anxious doubt and chilling fear,
I wander onward to the tomb,
With scarce a hope to linger here
But with a prospect to rejoin
The friends beloved, that once were mine.

Edward Fitzball (1792-1873), author of a prodigious number of dramas and melodramaswhich met with much success though they have no permanent value-and of many popular songs ("My pretty Jane' the best known), was the son of a farmer at Burwell near Vildenhall in Cambridge The farmer was called Ball, his wife's maiden name was Fitz, hence the nom de guerre, ultimately adopted as a regular surname, under which their son, bred a printer in Norwich, began about 1813 to publish poems His first melodrama dates from 1819, his Innheeper of Abbetulle was successfully played at Norwich in 1820 and in London in 1821 He dramatised novels like The Fortunes of Nigel, Peveril of the Peak, and Fenimore Cooper's Pilot, found plots in the stories of Joan of Arc and Andreas Hofer, 'the Tell of the Tyrol,' and worked up legends and ballads such as The Flying Dutchman and the Inch cape Rock. He wrote five librettos for Balfe, produced the English versions of La Favorita, Adelaide, and Maritana, and manufactured songs innumerable-patriotic, sentimental, and comic, good, bad, and indifferent. 'My pretty Jane' had the good fortune to be set to music by Bishop, 'Let me like a soldier fall' is inseparable from Vincent Wallace's melody Fitzball had been doing dramatic and miscellaneous literary work for forty years when in 1859 he published an autobiography, and ceased his indefatigable industry

The Marquis of Normanby (1797-1863), first of the name, wrote anonymously Matilda (1825), Yes and No, a Tale of the Day (1827), and several other novels, which were well received, as being vastly superior to the ordinary run of fashionable novels. Lord Normanby was the English ambassador at Paris in 1848, and in 1857 he published A Year of Revolution, from the journal he had kept at that stormy period. The work was poorly written, and by its indiscreet allusions to Louis Philippe and others raised unpleasant controversies

James Justinian Horier (1780-1849), author of Hajji Baba, was the son of Isaac Morier, a member of a refugee Huguenot house settled at Smyrna, who became a British subject and British consul-general at Constantinople. James, born like his father at Smyrna, was educated at Harrow, but by 1800 was back in the Levant. In 1809-16 he served in Persia as secretary of legation and envoy, and wrote a first and a second Journey through Persia, Arminia, and Asia Minor (1812-18) Subsequently, save for a diplomatic mission to Mexico, he lived a literary life His marvellously minute, varied, and ın London accurate knowledge of the East, and especially of Persia, he embodied in a series of novels-The Adventures of Hajji Baba, of Ispahan (1824, with its continuation, Hajn Baba in England, 1828), Zohrab, the Hostage (1832), Ayesha, the Maid of Kars (1834), and The Mirza (1841) The hero of Moner's great picaresque novel-his first and by far his most famous work-is an adventurer like Gil Blas, and is at least as much buffeted about in the world. The son of a barber of Ispahan, he is successively one of a band of raiding Turkomans, a menial servant, a pupil of the physician royal of Persia, an attendant on the chief executioner, a religious devotee, and a seller of tobacco pipes in Constantinople Having by stratagem espoused a rich Turkish widow, he becomes an official to the Shah, and on his further distinguishing himself for his knowledge of the Europeans, he is appointed secretary to the mission of Mirza Firouz, and accompanies the Persian ambassador to the court of England. In the course of his multiplied adventures, misfortunes, and escapes, the light hearted, unprincipled Hajji mixes with all ranks and conditions of mankind, in regions as various as Teheran, Kurdistan, Georgia, Bagdad, and Constantinople. The work at once secured a hearing 'The novelty of the style,' said Sir Walter Scott, 'which was at once perceived to be genuinely Oriental by such internal evidence as establishes the value of real old chma—the gay and glowing descriptions of Eastern state and pageantry—the character of the poetry occasionally introduced-secured a merited welcome for the Persian picaroon,' and in the Talisman he linked the authors of Anastastus and of Hajji Baba as having depicted Eastern manners with 'the fidelity and humour of Le Sage and the ludicrous power of Fielding himself' The most accomplished and experienced residents in Persia give as high commendation, and continue to repeat the traditional counsel to intending travellers in Persia an English saddle and a copy of Hajji Baba' Mr E G Browne in his edition says that 'considered as a faithful picture of the living East (as opposed to the purely imaginary and unreal East of Moore and Southey) it lias no rival Indeed, I may venture to assert that never has any writer of any nation succeeded in portraying, not merely the manners and forms of speech, but the character and modes of thought of an alien race, as Morier has portrayed the Persians in his immortal pages To appreciate his incomparable book as it deserves, one must be fairly intimate with both the Persians and their language, the greater the intimacy the greater the appreciation' Dr Wills, who has also edited the Hajji, repeats after nearly twenty years' residence in Persia the assurance actually given him when he went thither 'When you read this you will know more of Persia and the Persians than if you had lived there with your eyes open for twenty years' Lord Curzon, in his edition, adds his testimony, so does Sir Frederic Goldsmid the Persian experts admit themselves their difficulty in discovering more than three or four cases in which Morier seems to have made even a minor slip of any kind in his presentment of Persian life and character As Persia was in Morier's time, so is it now-there is next to no change, as it was in Morier's time, so was it in the days of the ancient Persian heroes Noldeke, the great Orientalist, finds much to learn from Hajji Baba for the better understanding of the Persian princes of the Sassanian dynasty

As delightful, if not so marvellous as its startling truth to fact and its vividness, is the ever-present rich humour and delicately pointed satire, the racy phrasing and dramatic brightness of a narrative which combines the charm and the power of the Arabian Nights and Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes, of Le Sage, of Sterne, and of Dickens, the book is a genus apart. Mr Browne with much probability regards as a mystification of Moners the story—treated as a fact in the first edition of this work (1843), and still accepted in the Dictionary of National Biography—of a letter received by the author from a Persian minister of state expressing the displeasure the king felt at the 'very foolish business of the book,' and so showing that the satirical descriptions and allusions had been felt at the court of Persia. Mr Browne also points out that though the characters are created by Morier and not caricatures of actual persons, very many of the incidents (none of which are improbable to those who know Persia) are drawn from Morier's own experiences, and not a few of them are actually described in his two volumes of travels Oriental scenes are doubtless the most novel and fascinating portions of the Hajji's experiences, yet his account in the sequel of the constant embarrassment and surprise of the Persians at English manners and customs is only a degree less vraisemblable and entertaining. The ceremonial of the English dinner-table, that seemed to them 'absolutely bristling with instruments of offence,' blades of all sizes and descriptions, sufficient to have ornamented the girdles of the Shah's household, could not but puzzle those who had been accustomed simply to take everything up in their fingers, the mail coach, the variety of our furniture and accommodation, and other demestic l observances, were equally astonishing, but it was the want of ceremonial among our statesmen and public officers that chiefly surprised the embassy

Zohrab is a historical novel, of the time of Aga Mohammed Shah, the Persian prince described by Sir John Malcolm as having taught the Russians to beat the French by making a desert before the line of the invader's march In Ayeshah Morier was also on familiar ground, as in the slighter Misselmah, a Persian Tale (1847) His other work is of less account-Abel Allnutt, a Novel (1837), The Banished, from the German of Hauff (1839), Tom Spicer, a poem (1840), St Roche, also a romance from the German (1847), and Martin Toutrond (1849), which, professedly translated from the French, is really a satire on English ways and prejudices, conveyed in the farcical adventures of a Frenchman whom he, with an obvious pun, calls Tout-rond—a name which in English books, even the most authoritative, is usually misspelt Tourtond, Tourtrond, Troutrond, and even Frontrond

In the following extracts from Hajp Baba, the liero is presented at the crisis of his fortunes. Having undergone some all but overwhelming changes of fortune in Constantinople, and being reduced to extremities, he resolves to appeal to the Persian ambassador, then just arrived on a mission to the Sublime Porte, against the Turk who was the cause of his misfortunes. When introduced to the presence of Mirza Firouz, the Hajii had been wearing the Turkish costume, which, like everything Turkish, true Persians detest

The Hajji makes a Friend.

When we had interchanged our greetings as true believers, he said to me, 'Are you an Irani?'

'Yes,' said I, 'so please you'

'Then why in looks an Osmanli?' said he 'Praise be to Allah that we have a king and a country of whom no one need be ashamed'

'Yes,' answered I, 'vour ordonnances are truth, and I am become less than a dog, since I have put on the airs of a Turk. My days have been passed in bitterness, and my liver has melted into water, since I have entangled myself by a connexion with this hated people, and my only refuge is in God and you'

'How is this?' said he 'spenk—Has a child of Ispahan (for such you are by your accent) been taken in by a Turk? This is wonderful indeed! We trivel all this way to make them feed upon our abomination, not to learn to eat theirs.'

I then related the whole of my adventures from the beginning to the end. As I proceeded he seemed wonderfully interested. When I got to my marriage he became much amused, and round with laughter at the settlements I had made on my wife. The account I give of the entertainment, the respect with which I was treated, my magnificence and grandeur, afforded him great delight, and the more I descanted upon the deception which I had practised upon the cows of Turks, as he called them, the more interest he took in my narrative, which he constantly interrupted by his exclamations, 'Ay, well done, oh Ispahami'—Oh! thou bankrupt'—By Allah! you did well!—If I had been there, I could no have done better' But when I informed him of the manner I had been served by my envious countrymen, of the finishing scene in my own house, of the screams of my women, of the speeches of my wife's relations,—and when I represented the very words, look, and attitude with which I made my exit, far from having produced the sympathy I expected, his mirth was excited to such a degree that I thought the veins in his forehead would have burst, and he actually rolled himself on his sofa in the convulsions of laughter

'But those Turks, those heavy buffaloes of Turks,' roared lie, still screaming with laughter, 'praise be to Allah! I can see them now with their long beards, their great caps, and their empty heads, believing all that the sharp-witted madman of Persia chose to tell them, and they would have gone on believing, had they not been undeceived by a similar species of madman. But what have I to do in the husiness?' said he to me. 'I am neither your father nor your uncle, to interfere and make it up with your wifes relations, nor am I a cadi, or a mufit, who can judge the case between you'

'No,' answered I, 'hut you are my refuge here, and the representative of God's vicegerent upon earth, and you can see justice done me, and not let a poor un finended stranger be oppressed'

The Hajji receives a Commission.

Now that I was thrown into the ambassador's society, my ideas took a new turn, and hearing matters discussed which had never even reached my understanding, I became more inquisitive. He seemed pleased to have found in me one who took interest in his views, and at length let me entirely into his confidence. One morn ing having received letters from his court, he called me to him, said that he wished for some private conversa tion, and accordingly ordered every one to depart from before him except myself. He made me sit, and then in a low voice said, 'Hajji, I have long wished to speak to you. Those who compose my snite, between you and I, do not possess the understanding I require. 'Tis true, they are Persians, and are endowed with more wit than all the world beside, but in affurs of the dowld (the state) they are nothing, and rather impede than forward the husiness upon which I have been sent. Now, praise be to Allah I I see that you are not one of them. You are much of a man, one who has seen the world and its business, and something may come from out of your You are a man who can make play under another's beard, and suck the marrow ont of an affair without touching its outside Such I am in want of, and if you will devote yourself to me, and to our Shah, the King of Kings, both my face as well as your own will be daily whitewashed and, by the blessings of our good destinies, both our heads will touch the skies '

'Whatever is of my strength,' replied I, 'is at your service. I am your slave and your servant, and I myself will place my own ear into your hand. Order and command me by my head and eyes, I am ready'

But a few months ago an ambassador from Enrope arrived at the Gate of Empire, Tehran, and said he was sent by a certain Boonapoort, calling himself Emperor of the French nation, to hring a letter and presents to the Shah. He exhibited full powers, by which his words were to be looked upon as his master's, and his actions as his actions, and he also affirmed that he had full instructions to make a treaty. He held himself very high indeed, and talked of all other nations of Franks as dirt under his feet, and not worth even a name promised to make the Russians restore their conquests in Georgia to us, to put the Shah in possession of Teflis, Baadkoo, Derbent, and of all which belonged to Persia in former times. He said that he would conquer India for us, and drive the English from it, and, in short, whatever we asked he promised to be ready to grant. Now, 'tis true, we had heard of the French before, and I new that they made good cloth and rich hrocades, but we never heard that they could do all this ambassador However, we were not very long in doubt, for when the English infidels who trade between India and Persia, some of whom reside at Abusheher, heard of the arrival of this ambassador, they immediately sent off messengers, letters, and an agent, to endeavour to impede the reception of this Trenchman, and made such extraordinary efforts to prevent his success that we soon discovered much was to be got between the rival "By my crown," exclaimed the Shah, "all this cometh from the ascendant of my good stars Here sit I npon my throne, whilst the curs of uncleanness come from the north and the south, from the east and west, hringing me vast presents for the liberty of fighting and quarrelling at the foot of it. In the name of the Prophet, let them approach 1" When I left the imperial gate, an ambassador from the English was expected, and the letters which I have just received are full of the cir cumstances of his proposed reception, and the negotia tions on foot concerning it,-but the Shah cannot well enter upon them before he hears from me, because, having been informed that specimens of all the different Enropean nations were to be seen at Constantinople, each of whom had an ambassador there, he in his wisdom, has judged it expedient to despatch me lither, to obtain all the information of which we are so much in want, to clear up every donht that exists in Persia about the French and English, and if possible to find out whether all they say of themselves he true or false. Now, Hajji,' said the ambassador, 'I am only one man, and this is a business, as I have found out, sufficient for fifty The Franks are composed of many, many nations fast as I hear of one hog, another begins to grunt, and then another and another, until I find that there is a whole herd of them. As I told you before, those who compose my suite are not men to help me in research, and I have cast my eyes npon you From your ever tions I expect much. You must become acquainted with some infidels, you understand the Turkish lan guage, and they will be able to inform you of much that we want to know '

The Hajji becomes an Authority on European Politics

As soon as the ambassador had furnished me with an extract of his vakajeh nameh, or his instructions, I walked out to an adjacent cemetery to read it over undisturbed I kept the paper carefully folded in the lining of my cap, and as it was my first initiation into public husiness, the principal contents of it have remained in my memory through life. The ambassador was, in the first place, enjoined to discover, in truth, what was the extent of that country called Frangistan, and if the Shah, known in Persia by the name of the Shahi Frank, or King of the Franks, actually existed, and which was his capital In the second place, he was ordered to discover how many Ils, or tribes of Franks, there were, whether they were divided into Shehernisheens and Sahranisheens, inhabitants of towns and dwellers in the desert, as in Persia, who were their khans, and how governed Thirdly, to inquire what was the extent of France, a hother it was a tribe of the Franks, or a separate king dom, and who was the infidel Boonapoort calling him self emperor of that country In the fourth place, his attention was to be turned particularly to what regarded the Ingliz, who had long been known in Persia, by means of their broadcloth, watches, and pen knives. He was to inquire what description of infidels they were, whether they lived in an island all the year round, without possessing any Lishlak (warm region) to migrate to in the summer, and whether most of them did not inhabit ships and ent fish, and if they did live there, how it happened that they had obtained possession of India, and he was to clear up that question so long agitated in Persia, how England and London were connected, whether England was part of London, or London part of England?

I astly, he was ordered to write a general history of the Franks, and to inquire what would be the easiest method of making them renounce pork and wine, and converting them to the true and holy faith-that is, to the religion of Islam Having well pondered over this paper, I considered that it would be easy to get it answered through the means of a katib, or scribe, attached to the then Reis Effendi, and with whom, during the short gleam of splendour and riches which had shone upon me, I had formed a great intimacy I knew the coffee house he frequented, and the hour when he was most likely to be found there, and although he was not much addicted to talking, yet I hoped, as he sipped his coffee and smoked his pipe (particularly if I treated him), his heart might expand, and I might obtain his real opinion Full of this idea, I immediately imparted it to the ambassador, who seemed so delighted that he at once did me the honour to take all the merit of it to I went to the coffee house at the proper time, and there found my friend I approached him with great demonstrations of friendship, and calling to the waiting man, ordered some best Yemen coffce, which was served up as we sat one opposite the other In the course of conversation he pulled out his watch, when I seized the opportunity of introducing my subject

'That is an European watch,' said I, 'is it not?'

'Yes, truly,' said he, 'there are none in the world beside.'

'Wonderful,' answered I,—'those Franks must be an extraordinary people'

'Yes,' said he, 'but they are Kafirs' (infidels)

'In the name of Allah,' taking my pipe from my niouth and putting it into his, 'tell me something re specting them. This Frangistan, is it a large country? Where does it, I ing reside?'

'What say vou, friend?' answered he, 'a large country, do you ask? A large country indeed it is, not governed by one king alone, but by many kings'

'But I have lieard,' said I, 'it is composed of many tribes, all having different names and different chiefs, still being, in fact, but one nation'

'You may call them one nation if you choose,' said he, 'and perhaps such is the case, for they all shave their clins, let their hair grow, and wear hats,—they all wear tight clothes,—they all drink wine, cat pork, and do not believe in the blessed Mahomed. But it is plain they are governed by many kings, see the numerous ambas sadors who flock here to rub their foreheads against the threshold of our Imperial Gate. So many of these dogs are here that it is necessary to put one's trust in the mercies of Allah, such is the pollution they create.'

'In the name of the Prophet speak on,' said I, 'and I will write—Praise be to Allah' you are a man of wisdom' Upon which, whilst I took out my inl stand from my girdle and composed myself to write, he stroked his beard and curled the tips of his mustachios, recollecting within himself which were the principal nations of I urope

He prefaced his information by saying, 'But why trouble yourself? They are all dogs alike, -all sprung from one danghill, and if there be truth in Heaven, and we believe our blessed Koran, all will burn hereafter in one common furnace But, stop,' said lie, counting his fingers 'in the first place, there is the Nemse Giaour, the Austrian infidel, our neighbours, a quiet, smoking rice, who send us cloth, steel, and glassware, and are governed by a Shah springing from the most ancient race of unbelievers he sends us a representative to be fed and clothed Then come those heretics of Musco vites, a most unclean and accursed generation country is so large that one extremity is said to be buried in cternal snows, whilst its other is raging with heat They are truly our enemy, and when we kill them, we cry Mashallah, praise be to God! Men and women govern there by turns, but they resemble us masmuch as they put their sovereigns to death almost as frequently as we do. Again, there is a Prussian infidel, who sends us an ambassador, Allah only knows why, for we are in no need of such vermin but you well I now that the Imperial Gate is open to the dog as well as the true believer, for the rain of Providence descends equally upon both. Whom shall I say next, in the name of the Prophet? Let us see there are two northern un believers, living at the extremity of all things,—the Danes and Swedes They are small tribes, scarcely to be accounted among men, although it is said the Shah of Denmark is the most despotie of the kings of Franks, not having even jamissaries to dispute his will, whilst the Swedes are famous for a madman, who once naged a desperate war in Europe, caring little in what country he fought, provided only that he did fight, and who, ia one of his acts of desperation, made his way into our borders, where, like a wild beast, lie was at length brought to bay and taken prisoner Owing to this cir cumstance we were introduced to the knowledge of lus nation, or otherwise, by the blessing of Allah, we should never have known that it even existed I will mention one more, called Flemengs, infidels, dull, heavy, and boorish, who are amongst the Franks what the Armenians are amongst us,-having no ideas beyond those of thrift, and no ambition beyond that of riches They used to send us a sleepy ambassador to negotiate the introduction of their cheeses, butter, and salt fish, but their government has been destroyed since the appearance of a certain Boona poort, who (let them and the patron of all unbelief have their due) is in truth a man, one whom we need not be asliamed to class with the Persian Nadir, and with our own Snleiman '

Here I stopped the Katib in his narrative, and catch ing at the name, I exclaimed, 'Boonapoort, Boonapoort, —that is the word I wanted! Say something concern ing him, for I have heard he is a rure and a daring infidel

'What can I say,' said my companion, 'except that he once was a man of nothing, a mere soldier, and now he is the Sultan of an immense nation, and gives the law to all the Franks? He did his best endeavours to molest us also, by taking Egypt, and sent innumerable armies to conquer it, but he had omitted to try the edge of a true believer's sword ere he set out, and was obliged to retreat, after having frightened a few Mamelules and driven the Bedouins into their deserts'

'But is there not a certain tribe of infidels called Ingliz?' said I, 'the most unaccountable people on earth, who live in an island, and make pen knives'

'Yes, truly,' said the Katib, 'they, amongst the Franks, are those who for centuries have most rubbed their heads against the imperial threshold, and who hase found most favour in the sight of our great and magnanimous Sultan. They are powerful in ships, and in watches and broadcloth unrivalled.'

'But what have you heard of their government?' said

1 'is it not composed of something besides a king?'

'Yes,' returned he, 'you have been rightly informed, but how can you and I understand the humours of such madmen? They have a Shah, 'tis true, but it is a farce to call him by that title. They feed, clothe, and lodge him, give him a searly income, surround him by all the state and form of a throne, and mock him with as fine vords and with as high sounding titles as we give our sovereigns, but a common Aga of the Janissaries lins more power than he, he does not dare even to give the bistinado to one of his own viziers, be his fault what it may, whereas the Agi, if expedient, would crop the ears of half the city, and still receive nothing but reward and encouragement Then they have certain houses full of madmen, who meet half the year round for the pur porcs of quarrelling. If one set says white, the other cries black, and they throw more words away in settling a common question than would suffice one of our multis during a whole reign. In short, nothing can be settled in the state, be it only whether a rebellious Agr is to have his head cut off and his property confiscated, or some such trifle, until these people have wrangled. Then what are we to believe? Allah, the Almighty and Allyise, to some nations giveth visdom, and to others folly! Let us bless Him and our Prophet that we are not born to eat the miseries of the poor English infidels, but can smole our pipes in quiet on the shores of our own peace nl Bosphorus 1'

After a pause, 'Now,' said I, 'have I learnt all, or are there more unbelievers? By vonr beard, tell me, for who would have thought that the world was so composed?'

He reflected for some time, and said, 'O yes, I forgot to mention two or three nations, but, in truth, they are not worthy of notice. There are Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian infidels, who eat their swine, and worship their image after their own manner, but who, in fact, are nothing even amongst the Franks.'

I returned to my ambissador full of the information I had acquired, and all joyons at the success which had attended my first essay in diplomatic life. He was delighted at the memoir I had drawn up from the materials furnished me by the Katib, and as long as we remained at Constantinople daily sent me in search of further particulars, until we both thought ourselves suffi ciently in force to be able to draw up a general History of Europe, which the Centre of the Universe in his in structions to the ambassador had ordered him to present on his return Most assiduously did I apply myself in composing this precious morsel of history I made a rough draft, which was submitted to the correction of my chief, and when he had seasoned its contents to the palate of the King of Kings, softening down those parts which might appear improbable, and adding to those not sufficiently strong, he delivered it over to a clerk, who in a fair hand transcribed the whole, until at length a very hand-ome volume was produced. It was duly bound, ornamented, and inserted in a silk and mislin bag, and then the ambassador conceived it might be fit to be placed in the hands of the Shah

There were new editions of Happi Baba in 1829, 1835–1856–1863 f.c. and between 1895, and 1897 there were no less than three admirable editions—one by Mr E G Browne (1895), one by Lord Curron (1895) and one by Dr C. J Wills (1897). Sir Robert Morier, so long British Ambassador at St Petersburg, was Morier's nephew

James Baillie Traser (1783-1856) also described the life and manners of the Persians by fictitious as well as true narratives. Born in Inverness shire, he travelled extensively in India, Persia, and Central Asia, and wrote a series of books of travel and stories of Oriental adventure and romance, The Kuzzilbash, a Tale of Khorasan (1828), and its sequel, The Persian Adventurer Neither in his travels nor in his tales did he show the marvellous insight and notable literary skill of Morier. Fraser wrote also a Scotch story, The Highland Smiggless.

Herbert Knowles (1798-1817) was humbly born at Gomersal near Leeds, and was sent to Richmond Grammar School by the kindness of In 1816, disappointed in his three clergymen. hopes of a Cambridge career, he sent to Southey his poem of 'The Three Tabernacles,' described as 'written in the churchyard of Richmond, Yorkshire, and suggested by Matt. xvii 4.' Southey, struck by the exceptional promise of this work by a boy of eighteen, secured patronage for him, and some of his other verses appeared in the magnitines of the time. But the voung poet died of consump tion just after his election to a Cambridge sizarship His one remembered poem has been praised by Dr Richard Garnett-extravagantly-for its solemn and tender pathos, exquisite diction and melody, and faultless finish, by the omission of the last verse and the transposition of the fifth and sixth, it would, he says, have made the impression of absolute perfection St Peter talked of building the three tabernacles 'not knowing what he said,' and Knowles was at least as hazy in his ideas when he debated the propriety of building tabernacles to Ambition, Beauty, and Pride in the Yorkshire The anapæstic measure is jerky churchyard (closely resembling 'The Butterfly's Ball and the Grasshopper's Feast'), and unsuitable to the solemn thoughts which, taken separately, are not far removed from commonplace, though, by reason of their subjects, impressive and otherwise well worded. Yet as a whole the poem has touching suggestions and a certain grave attraction—especially for those who have learnt the poem in youth from a school-book.

The Three Tabernacles

Methinks it is good to be here,
If thou wilt, let us build—but for whom?
Nor Elias nor Moses appear,
But the sliadows of eve that encompass with gloom
The abode of the dead and the place of the tomb

Shall we build to Ambition? Ah no 'Affrighted, he shrinketh away,

For see, they would pin him below In a small narrow cave, and, begirt with cold clay, To the meanest of reptiles a peer and a prey

To Beauty? Ah no! she forgets
The charms which she wielded before,
Nor knows the foul worm that he frets
The skin which but vesterday fools could adore,
For the smoothness it held or the tint which it wore

Shall we build to the purple of Pride,
The trappings which dizen the proud?
Alas, they are all laid aside,
And here's neither dress nor adornments allowed,
But the long winding sheet and the fringe of the shroud

To Riches? Alas! 'tis in vain, Who hid, in their turns have been hid, The treasures are squandered again, And here in the grave are all metals forbid But the tinsel that shines on the dark coffin hid

To the pleasures which Mirth can afford, The revel, the laugh, and the jeer? Ah' here is a plentiful hoard! But the guests are all mute as their pitiful cheer, And none but the worm is a reveller here

Shall we build to Affection and Love?
Ah no! they have withered and died,
Or fled with the spirit above
Friends, brothers, and sisters are laid side by side,
Yet none have saluted, and none have replied

Unto Sorrow?—the dead cannot grieve,
Not a sob, not a sigh meets mine ear
Which Compassion itself could relieve Ah, sweetly they slumber, nor love, hope, or fear, Peace! peace is the watchword, the only one here.

Unto Death, to whom monarchs must bow? Ah no! for his empire is known,

And here there are trophies enow!
Beneath the cold dead, and around the dark stone,
Are the signs of a sceptre that none may disown.

The first tabernacle to Hope we will build,
And look for the sleepers around us to rise!
The second to Faith, which insures it fulfilled,
And the third to the Lamb of the great sacrifice,
Who bequeathed us them both when He rose to the skies.

Charles Wolfe (1791-1823) was born at Dublin On the death of his father, a well born Kildare landholder, the family came to England, and the box got his chief education at Winchester In 1809 lie entered Trinity College, Dublin, gained a scholarship, and in 1814 took his BA In 1817 his 'Burial of Sir John Moore'-the one short poem that has secured him immortality-was suggested by Southey's impressive narrative in the Edinburgh Annual Register of 1808 'Sır John Moore had often said that if he was killed in battle, he wished to be buried where he fell was removed at midnight to the citadel of Corunna. A grave was dug for him on the rampart there by a body of the 9th Regiment, the aides de camp attending by turns No coffin could be procured, and the officers of his staff wrapped the body, dressed as it was, in a military cloak and blankets The interment was hastened, for about eight in the morning some firing was heard, and the officers feared that if a serious attack were made, they should be ordered away, and not suffered to pay him their last duty The officers of his family bore him to the grave, the funeral-service was read by the chaplain, and the corpse was covered with earth' When the ode was published anony mously in an Irish newspaper in 1817, and reprinted in the same year in Blackwood and other magazines, it was ascribed to Byron and others of the most notable authors of the day, Shelley considered it not unlike a first draft by Campbell Wolfe took orders, and was curate first of Ballyclog in Tyrone, and then rector of Donoughmore. Symptoms of consumption appearing, he tried in search of health England, the south of France, and finally the sheltered Cove of Cork, and there he

In 1841 an otherwise unknown Scottish schoolmaster sought to pluck the laurel from the young author's grave, claiming the 'Burial' as his pro duction But Wolfe's friends came forward, and established his right beyond controversy, and the new claimant was forced to confess his imposture A still more curious debate as to the authorship of the poem was started in Bentley's Miscellany for 1837 by the ingenious 'Father Prout,' who had produced a Latin original for Campbell's 'Hohenlinden,' and Latin and French originals for many of Tom Moore's best-known (and accordingly plagrarised') songs Prout-Mahony, that iscalmly alleged that 'The Burial of Sir John Moore' was but a clever version of French verses by an unknown author on the hurried burial of Colonel de Berumanoir, killed in the defence of Pondi cherry in 1790-91 against Sir Eyre Coote, and in evidence he produced the verses—surprisingly vraisemblable French verses like this

De minuit c'etait l'heure, et solitaire et sombre, La lune offrait à peine un debile rayon, La lanterne luisait péniblement dans l'ombre, Quand de la baionette on creusa la gizon

Obviously the one set of verses was a very close rendering of the other, and Mahony's witty mystification was accepted for a while by some sensible persons, and even now the mare's nest is from time to time rediscovered (as in a letter to the Spectator, 8th September 1900) by somebody who usually refrains from citing his authority Wolfe's other poems—apart from mere boyish rhymes, little over a dozen in number—confirm the impression that the author of the 'Burial' had in him poetic sensibilities and the gift of utterance.

The Burial of Sir John Moore

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note, As his corpse to the rampart we hurried, Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot O'er the grave where our hero we buried.

We buried him darkly at dead of night,
The sods with our bayonets turning,
By the struggling moonbeams' misty light,
And the lantern dunly burning

No useless coffin inclosed his breast,

Not in sheet nor in shroud we wound him,
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,

With his martial cloak around him.

Few and short were the prayers we said,
And we spoke not a word of sorrow,
But we steadfastly gazed on the face that was dead,
And we bitterly thought of the morrow

We thought, as we hollowed his narrow bed, And smoothed down his lonely pillow, That the foe and the stranger would tread o'er his head, And we far away on the billow!

Lightly they'll talk of the spirit that's gone,
And o er his cold ashes upbraid him—
But hitle he'll reck, if they let him sleep on In the grave where a Briton has laid him

But half of our heavy task was done,
When the clock struck the hour for retiring,
And we heard the distant and random gun
That the foe was sullenly firing

Slowly and sadly we lud him down,
From the field of his fame fresh and gory,
We carved not a line, and we raised not a stone—
But we left him alone with his glory!

To Mary

If I had thought thou couldst have died,
I might not weep for thee,
But I forgot, when by thy side,
That thou couldst mortal be
It never through my mind had passed
The time would e'er be o'er,
And I on thee should smile my last,
And thou shouldst smile no more.

And still upon that free I lool,
And think 'twill smile again,
And still the thought I will not brook,
That I must look in vain
But when I speak—thou dost not say What thou ne'er left'st unsaid,
And now I feel, as well I may,
Sweet Mary, thou art dead

If thou wouldst stay e'en as thou art, All cold and all serene, I still might press thy silent heart, And where thy smiles have been While c'en thy chill bleak corse I have Thou seemest still mine own, But there I lay thee in thy grave— And I am now alone

I do not think, where'er thou art,
Thou hast forgotten me,
And I, perhaps, may soothe this heart,
In thinking too of thee
Yet there was round thee such a dawn
Of light ne'er seen before,
As fancy never could have drawn,
And never can restore.

This touching lyrie, to the Irish nir Gramachree was composed by Wolfe, he tells us, after he had sung the air over and over again, till he burst into a flood of tears. Wolfe's literary Remains mainly sermons and poems were published with a Memoir in 1815 by Arch deacon Russell. The poems were edited by Latton Falkiner in 1904.

Thomas Pringle (1789-1834), the first nameworthy contributor to the colonial literature of British South Africa, was born at Bluklaw in Roxburghshire, studied at Edinburgh University, and in 1811 entered the Register House, the Scottish Record Office, as a transcriber of old documents He took early to writing, had a share (1817) in the beginnings of Blackwood's Magazine in its first (unsuccessful) stage, before Blackwood assumed the management himself, and was author of Scenes of Teviotdale, Ephemerides, and other poems, which show that he possessed something more than fine feeling and cultivated taste Although from lameness ill fitted for a life of hardship, Pringle, with his father and several brothers, emigrated to the Cape of Good Hope in 1820, and there established a little township or settlement named Glen Lynden He afterwards removed to Cape Town, where he became libraman, taught, and tried journalism zine and newspaper he projected and edited vere the first things of the kind published at the Cape. But he ventilated colonial grievances and frankly discussed the arbitrary proceedings of the Government, and having had both his papers suppressed by the Governor, and having refused to bind himself to abstain from commenting on governmental policy, he returned to England in 1826, and earned a livelihood by his pen. He was for some time editor of the annual, Friendship's Offering, and in the issue for 1834 published one of John Ruskin's very first poems-that on Salz His services were also engaged by the Anti-Slavery Society, and as its secretary he worked zealously until within a few months of his death His last work was the reissue of his poems on African subjects, the African Sketches (reprinted in 1902), together with the Narrative of a Residence 11 South Africa, a graphic record of his sojourn beneath the Southern Cross, already he foresaw in vision a 'British South African Empire' to which the equator might 'prove no ultimate limit.' Of the poem that follows, Coloridge, in an unusually enthusiastic mood, said it was 'among the two or three most perfect lync poems in our language."

No critic would now idmit such a culogistic judgment, though the poem has a distinctive note of its own, and it certainly helped to fundrinse. Pringle's generation of home leepers with South African words and ideas—viei, I loof, and karroo, kraal and commando, with Kiffir and Bechumi legends, and the sufterings of all three native races at the hands of the white man

Afar in the Desort

Afar in the Desert I love to ride, With the silent Bush boy alone by my side When the sorrows of life the soul o creast, And, sick of the present, I turn to the past. When the eye is suffused with regretful terrs, I rom the fond recollections of former years, And the shirdows of things that have long since fle l I lit over the brun hi c the ghosts of the dead Bright visions of flory -that vanished too soon, Day dreams-that departed ere manhood's noon Attachments-by fate or by filschool reft, Companions of early days - lo t or left, And my Native I and -who e magical name Thrills to my heart his electric flame, The home of my childhood-the limits of my prime, All the passions and scenes of that repturous time When the feelings were young and the world was new, I il e the fresh howers of I den unfolding to view! All-all now forsal en, forgotten, foregone ' And I, a lone extle remembered of none, My high runs abandoned, my gool acts undonc-Awerry of all that is under the sun, With that sadness of heart which no stranger may can I ily to the De cit after from man

Mar in the De ort I love to ride, With the silent Bush boy alone by my side When the wild turnfol of this wears ome life, With its scenes of oppression, corruption, and strife The proud man's frown, and the base man's tear And the scorner's laugh, and the sufferer's tear And malice and me time s, and fals hood and folls, Dispose me to musing and darl medurcholy, When my bo om is full, and my thoughts are high, Atid my soul is siel with the bondinan's sigh-Oh then, there is freedom, and joy, and pride, After in the Desert alone to ride ! There is rapture to vault on the champing steed, And to bound away with the engle's speed, With the death fraught brelock in my hand-The only law of the Desert land

Afar in the Desert I love to ride,
With the silent Bush boy alone by my side,
Away—away from the dwellings of men, by the wild deer's haunt by the buffilo's glen,
By valleys remote, where the orbit plays,
Where the gnu, the gizelle, and the hartebeest graze,
And the gemsbol and eland unhunted recline
By the skirts of gray forests o'erhung with wild vine,
And the elephant browses at peace in his wood,
And the mighty rhinoceros wallows at will
In the eley where the wild ass is drinking his fill.

After in the Desert I love to ride, With the silent Bush boy alone by my side South Africa. The first of the following passages describes his experience of the Boers after he had learnt Dutch enough to communicate with them and preach to the 'Colonial' Hottentots, the second was added just before the publication of the Narrative in 1834.

Boer Neighbours in 1820

I thus found myself all at once, and not a little to my own surprise, performing the novel and somewhat incon gruous functions of a sort of civil and military officer, of a medical practitioner, religious instructor, engineer, architect, gardener, plasterer, cabinet maker, and, I might add, tinker! In short, I was driven to do the best I could in the peculiar position in which circumstances had placed me, and when (as was frequently the case) my own knowledge and the experience of o hers failed me, I was obliged to trust to 'mother wit.'

About this period we were somewhat teased by Sunday visits from our Dutch African neighbours of the lower part of the Glen Lynden valley and the Tarka. Solieit ous to keep upon friendly terms with these people, I always made it a point to receive them courteously, and usually asked them to dine with me. But finding that they made a practice of visiting us on Sundays, either to gratify idle curiosity or with a view to commercial dealings, I fell upon a scheme which effectually relieved us from this annovance. I tool care to acquaint them that it was contrary to our principles to transact secular business on the Sunday, and when any of them came, I offered them a seat among my Hottentot audience, and invited them to read aloud the Sunday service them, I found, could read even the New Testament with out much stammering and spelling, and they considered it, moreover, a shocking degradation to sit down amidst a group of Hottentots. We were therefore speedily relieved altoge her from their Sunday visitations. other respects, we found them generally, however uncul tivated, by no means disagreeable neighbours were exceedingly shrewd at bargain making, it is true, and too sharp sometimes even for cautious Scotch rich, but they were also generally civil and good natured, and, according to the custom of the country, extremely hospitable. On the whole, their demeanour to us, whom they might be suppo ed naturally to regard with exceeding jealoust, if not dislike, was far more friendly and obliging than could, under all the circum stances, have been anticipated

Vision of a British South African Empire

Nay, more, howe er Utopian such 'visions' may appear to some people, I vall venture to predict that if some such sys em (I speak of the granciple, not of the details—which may perhaps require to be greatly altered from this rude outlinel shall be now adopted, and judiciously and per everingly carried into operation, we shall at no remo e period see the tribes beyond the frontier earnestly soliciting to be received under the protection of the colony, or to be embraced within its limits The native tribes, in short, are and purisdiction. ready to throw themselves into our arms Let us open our arms cordially to embrace them as men and as brothers. Let us enter upon a ne i and noller career Let us subdue savane Africa la justice, of conquest by Lindness by the talisman of Christian truth. God, gradually to extend the moral influence, ar l, if it be thought desirable, the territorial boundar, also of our colons, until it shall become an Empire, embracing Southern Africa from the Keisi and the Garcep to Mozambique and Cape Negro—and to a high, peradventure, in after days, even the equator shall prove no ultimate limit

There is a Life of Pringle, by I exch Ritchie, prefixed to the Poetical Works (1839).

Joseph Blanco White (1775-1841), a Spaniard by birth, has the glory of having written what was by Coloridge overpraised as 'the finest and most grandly conceived sonnet in our language'-save for a single unimportant He was born at exception, his one poem Seville, son of an Irish Catholic merchant settled in Spain who had translated his name of White to Blanco and become practically a Spaniard Ordained a priest in 1799, he acted for a while as chaplain and confessor, but having lost his faith, he came in 18to to London, added White to his name, and for four years edited a monthly Spanish paper, subsidised by the English Government and designed to stir up national feeling against the French, then in Spain. He received an English pension of £250, was tutor to I ord Holland's son (1815-16), and was admitted to Angliern orders Made a member of Oriel College, he became the intimate of Newman and Pusey, who learnt much from his knowledge of He was for a time totor in Catholic theology Whately's family at Dublin (1832-35), and became a Protestant champion, but fled to Liverpool when he found himself gradually driven to become Though he worked diligently at 1 Unitarian. stone's Gleanings The following (Academy, 12th September 1891) is his latest version of the 'Sonnet on Night'

Mysterious Night! when our first parent knew Thee from report divine, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this goodly frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
But through a curran of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame, Ilesperus with the host of heaven came
And lo! Creation broadened to man's view!
Who could have guessed such darkness by concealed Within thy beams, O Sun? or who divined,
When bud and flower and insect has revealed,
I hou to such countless worlds hadst made us blind?
Why should we then shun Death with anxious strife?
If I ight conceals so much, wherefore not 1 ife?

The Second Lord Thurlon (EDWARD) HOVELL THURLOW, 1781-1829), minor poet, was the son of the Bishop of Durham and nephew and successor (in the peerige) of the Lord Chancellor (see page 631) Born in London and educated at the Charterhouse and Magdalen College, Oxford, from 1810 onwards he pub hshed several collections of poems which, anid much affectation and some bad taste-sarcasti cally dealt with by Moore, Byron, and the critics-contain not a little real poetry. Charles Lamb said of his work 'A profusion of verbal drinties, with a disproportionate lack of matter and circumstance, is, I think one reason of the coldness with which the public has received the poetry of a nobleman now living, which, upon the score of exquisite diction alone, is entitled to something better than neglect. I will venture to copy one of his sonnets in this place [the London Magazine], which for quiet sweetness has serreely its parallel in our language.

To a Water-bird

O melancholy bird, a winter's day
Thou standest by the margin of the pool,
And, taught by God, dost thy whole being selicol
To patience, which all evil can allay
God has appointed thee the fish thy prey,
And given thyself a lesson to the fool
Unthrifty, to submit to moral rule,
And his unthinking course by thee to weigh
There need not schools, nor the professor's chair,
Though these be good, true wisdoin to impart
He who has not enough, for these, to spare
Of time, or gold, may yet amend his heart,
And teach his soul, by brooks and rivers fair Nature is always wise in every part

More frequently quoted, and at least equally characteristic, is the following

Song to May

May! queen of blossoms, And fulfilling flowers, With what pretty music Shall we charm the hours? Wilt thou have pipe and reed, Blown in the open mead? Or to the late give like I In the green boy era?

Thou hast no need of us,
Or pipe or wire,
Thou hast the polden bee
Espaned with fire
And many thou and more
Songsters, that thee alore,
I illing earth's grassy floor
With new desire

Thou hast the mighty herds,
Tane, and free livers.
Doubt not, thy music too
In the deep rivers,
And the whole plums dight,
Warbhup the day and night—
Up at the pates of light,
See, the lark quiver.

When with the jointh

Cov fountains are tressed,
And for the mournful bird

Greenwoods are dressed

That did for Tereus pine;
Then shall our son, be thine,
To whom our hearts incline

May, be thou blend

Robert Pollok (1798-1827), a young beentinte of the United Secession Church, sirvived only a few months the publication of his most notable work, The Course of Time, which speedily attained great popularity, especially among 'corious' people in Scotland Many who scarcely ever dipped into inodern poetry were tempted to read a work i liich set forth their theological tenets in this unwonted and impressive form, while for less devout readers the poem had force and originality enough to attract, in spite of its theme Course of Time is a long blank-verse poem in ten books, written in a style that sometimes innitates. Milton, and at other times resembles the work of Cowper, Blair, and Young In describing the spiritual life and destiny of man, the secryanes the religious speculations of an unhesitating Calvinist with episodical pictures and narratives poem is often harsh, turgid, and antipathetic, its worst fault-ill but inseparable from the subject and plan—is its tediousness, whole sections are like a dull sermon in blank verse. But those who welcomed it warmly were more in the right than the moderns who neplect it utterly, there are ninny suprisingly fine things in it 'The Course of Time,' said Professor Wilson, 'for so young a He has much to man is a vast achievement learn in composition Rut the soul of poetry is there, though often dimly developed, and many passages there are, and long ones too, that heave and hurry and flow along in a divine enthusiasm? The encouraging critic of this scriptural poem is, be it remembered, the Kit North who loved cockfighting, and dealt so severely with Coloridge, Wordsworth, and Keats

Pollok var born at the farm of North Moorhouse in the parish of Englesham in Renfres shire, and after some schooling at Mearns and Fennick, and a brief interlude of cabinet miding, was sent to the University of Glas, row While he was a student of divinity in the Hall of the United Scottssion Church, he wrote a series of proce Tales of the Covenanters, published anon mously The Course of Time was all viritien in the eighteen months between the end of 1824 and the middle of 1826, before his last term at the divinity half, and was published in the spring of 1827 by Blackwood on the advice of Professor Wilson and 'Delta' Moir, who both gave highly complimentary verdicts on the poem with the somewhat formidable Pollok was duly 'licensed to preach the gospel' in May, preached his first sermon after license in the church of Dr John Brown, father of the author of Rab and his Friends, and re ceived kindly courtesy and encouragement from the literary patriarch of a long past generation, Henry Mackenzie, the 'Man of Feeling,' now over eighty four years of age. The poet probationer was fast becoming famous but pulmonary disease land declared itself, and it was evident that he was doomed to an early grave. The anxiety and effort of composition had aggravated the malady, the milder air of Shirley Common near Southampton brought no improvement, and after lingering a fer weeks, the victim died on the 17th of September

This description of Lord Byron was one of the two passages first read by Wilcon that moved him to his unexpectedly friendly and favourable judgment of the Course of Tirue

Happiness

(Frontisks)

Whether in crowds or solitudes, in streets
Or shody groves dwelt Happine's, it seems
In vain to osle, her nature find exit vain,
Though poets uniel, and herinits, tall ed and sung
Of brooks and crystal founts, and weeping dew,
And myrtle bowers, and solitary vale,
And with the nymph made as ignations there,
And woold her with a love sich oaten reed
And sages too, although le's positive,
Advised their sons to court her in the shade?
Delitions babble all 1. Was happines,
Was self approving, God approving joy,
In drops of dew, however pure? in gales,
However sweet? in wells, however clear?
Or groves, however thick with verdant shade?

I rue, these were of themselves exceeding for, How fair at morn and even I worthy the walk Of loftiest mind, and gave when all within Was right, a feast of overflowing blass. But were the occasion, not the cause of joy. They walled the native fountains of the soul. Which slept before, and stirred the holy tides. Of feeling up, giving the heart to drinl. From its ovin treasures draughts of perfect sweet.

The Christian fath, which better I new the heart Of man, him thither sent for peace, and thus Declared. Who finds it, let him find it there, Who finds it not, for ever let him seek. In vain, 'tis God's most holy, changeless will

Frue Happiness had no localities,
No tones provincial, no peculiar garb
Where Duty went, she went, with Justice went,
And went with Meckness, Charity, and I ove
Where'er a tear was dried, a wounded heart
Bound up, a bruised spirit with the dew

SCOTTISH VERNACULAR WRITERS UNDER GEORGE III

In 1792 Burns wrote in his first letter to George Thomson 'Apropos, if you are for English verses, there is on my part an end of the matter Whether in the simplicity of the ballad or the pathos of the song, I can only hope to please myself in being allowed at least a sprinkling of our native tongue.' So that Burns, who fairly represented the practice of his older contempo raries, and who became the standard of all later writers of Scottish verse, followed Ramsav's nondescript and elastic linguistic principle, and with better taste and vastly greater command of his instrument wrote - at times indiscriminately almost pure English, nearly the broadest surviving vernacular, or a broken English, more or less largely 'sprinkled' with Scotch words times even the words vere not vernacular Scotch, but archaisms taken from Ramsay (who, as Lord Hailes proved, in ancient Scotch was sadly to seck), sometimes, as Dr Murray has pointed out, they were not Scotch words at all, but 'fancy Scotch' made by Scottifying ordinary English words on an assumed analogy As a rule Burns was most broadly Scotch when he was most jocular, most largely English when the matter vas most scrious. In the longer poems, as The Cotter's Saturday Night, some verses are pure English, some nearly pure vernacular, and some a curious arbitrary mixture. Only in some of the songs does the (largely Anglicised) Scotch of his Ayrshire neighbours form the warp and woof of the whole, with English words thrown in In some of the songs that are recloned quite Scotch the blend is still more curious-the diction is substantially English, or even the somewhat stilted 'poetic diction' of contemporary southern versewriters, with a few of the words translated into imitation Scotch 'My Nannie's ava'' is one of Burns's most popular 'Scotch' songs, but nothing is less like the language of Scottish shepherds of any date thun

Now in her green months blithe nature array, And listens the lambkins that bleat o er the bries

Braes is the onl, genuine Scots word here, 'nature arraying in a green mantle and listening lambkins bleating' being not ordinary but poetic English, such as was used in many of the songbool's current in Burns's time. Most of the phrases actually occur in the songs given in Cecilia (1784), for example. Dr Murray has said ""Scots wha hae" is fancy Scotch, that is, it is mercly the English "Scots who have" spelled as Scotch Barbour would have written "Scottis at hes," Dunbar or Douglas, "Scottis quhilkis hes " and even Henry Charteris, in the end of the sixteenth century, "Scottis quhn hes" who hae wi' Wallace blcd, 'although composed of Scotch words, is not vernacular Scotch any more than ' How you carry vou?" as a translation of "Comment yous portez yous," is vernacular English' 'Scots at hes,' it may be added, is still the current Scots form, as it was in Burns's time, 'wha hae' appears only as an imitation of Burns's imitation

North Germans sometimes use Low German words in High German stones, but the stones themselves do not thus become Platt Deutsch works. And though a southern Frenchmin in Paris gives his articles or verses a southern flavouring of words or phrases from his native Nimes or Avignon, he is not therefore ranked amongst Provençal authors Nor would Burns have been the greatest of unters in Scottish dirlect unless he had in many of his best poems closely followed the Scottish spoken vernacular of his time. But, as we have seen from his own explicit testimony, while refusing to write 'English verses' at all, Burns was content to write 'Scotch verses' in which there was inextly a 'sprinkling of his native tongue.' And this whether he was bowdlensing the old Scots songs for Thomson, making new ones to the old tunes and with the old refruns, or inditing his own most spontaneous and original strains. Most of his contemporaries, carlier and later, and almost all his successors have adopted a similarly fluctuating standard of mixed dialect, for many, Burns's very modest minimum of Scotticism has amply sufficed But when it is remembered that the actually spoken Scotch has long been itself a mired tongue, a patois rather than a dialect, their practice is not so strange as at first it might appear Scottish writers, accepting Beattie's dictum page 308) that 'to write in the vulgir broad Seach and yet write scriously had become impossible,? essayed at times to find or construct a dialect which was not sulgar and was not exactly broad Scotch scholar of great acquirements and thoroughly familiar with the vernicular. In the introduction to one of his own poems, Sir Alexander Boswell, one of Burns's most fervent admirers, and author of some of the most popular and 'broadest' Scotch songs since Burns's time, idmirably and authoritatively summed up the case is it stood in 1810 with regard to 'the mixed dialects of English and Scotch, which, though they afford so many facilities in measure and rhyme, are, I am told, not quite legitimate. I shall therefore [in this par ticular poem] endeavour to confine myself to that which, till the Gentle Shepherd once more make the Scottish reed scemed to be for ever the destined dialect of British Poess But while our later Baids have woold the Scottish muse- and even Robert Burns is subject to the criticismone half of what has been written, by a slight alteration of vowels and a few consonants added or subtracted, becomes plain Liphsh Jamieson will tell you it is not Scotch, but is is a pleasing melange, which carries to the soul the sweetest sentiments, and we care not how we come by them?

Sir Alexander's pronouncement holds good of l the score of Burns's contemporaries, earlier and later, from whom extracts are given below. Some of the ininor writers have left a few admirable f songs, but whether for songs or total achieve , ment, none of them stands near Burns, and none of them is worthy to be named beside him save Fergusson of those earlier in dite, and Tannahill and Lady Nairne amongst those who were born | soon after him. Meanwhile the principal writers of Scottish birth and blood were doing their best in book English. What they accomplished may be seen in the preceding pages, and may be recalled here by the names of Beattie, Bruce and Logan, Vacpherson and Mickle, the two Blairs, Dugald Stewart, Henry Mackenzie, Mackintosh, Bruce and Mungo Park, Grahame and Levden, Johnna Baillie and Thomas Campbell

Jean Elliot and Mrs Cockburn. - I wo songs, both by women, and both bearing the name of The Howers of the Forest, still divide the favour of lovers of Scottish song. The first be wailing the losses sustrined at Flodden, was written by Jean Elliot of Minto (1727-1805), daughter of Sir Gilbert Elliot, and sister of the author of the lyric, 'My slicep I neglected, I broke my sheep hook' (page 423) The second song (1765), which is usually taken to have been on the same subject, was in reality occasioned by the bank ruptcy of a number of gentlemen in Selkirkshire it was written by Alicia Cockburn (1713-95), the daughter of Robert Rutherford of Fernile, who in 1731 married Patrick Cockburn, advocate, and died in Edinburgh Most modern Scotsmen agree with Allan Cunningham in preferring Miss Elliot's song, but both have their ments, the second is most usually sung Sir Walter Scott praises the l shill shown by Miss Elliot in imitating the manner of the ancient imistrels

I 're se n the smiling
Of fortune beguling,
I 've felt all its favour, and found its deem,
Sweet was its bles ing
Kin I its cares ing,
But now its fled—fled for away

I've seen the forest,
Adorned the foremost
With flowers of the fairest most pleasant and gay,
She bonny was their blooming,
Their scent the air perfuming?
But now they are withered and weeded away

I we seen the morning
With gold the hills adorning,
And loud tempest storning before the mid day,
I've seen Tweed's silver streams,
Shining in the sunny beams,
Grow drainly and dark as he rowed on his way

Oh fielde Fortune,
Why this cruel sporting?
Oh, why still perplex us, poor sons of a day?
Ane mair your smiles can cheer me,
Nae mair your frowns can fear me,
I or the Flowers of the Forest are a' wede away

David Herd (1732-1810) did for Scottish song what Bishop Percy had done for the old English The son of a farmer in Kincardineshire, he became an accountant's clerk in Edinburgh, and devoted the scanty leisure and savings of a bachelor life to the acquisition of a valuable library and a sound knowledge of the popular lyric poetry of Scotland. Sir Walter Scott, who praises his 'shrewd manly common sense and antiquarian science,' made use of his rich manuscript collections for the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, and recent editors of Burns have been glad to draw illustrations from the same His Ancient Scottish Songs, Heroic Ballads, &c., appeared at first anonymously in a single volume in 1769, and afterwards, with his name, in two volumes, in 1776 (the best edition) and 1791 It was, as Scott described it, 'the first classical collection' of the kind, for the earliest Scottish song-books do not count for much as literature, and the Ancient Scottish Poems of Lord Hailes (1770) were not songs, but a more critical reprint of some of the contents of the Bunnatyne MS than Allan Ramsay had presented in his Evergreen (1724-27), called a collection of 'Scots poems wrote by the ingenious before 1600' Watson's Choice Collection of Scottish Poems (1706-11) con tained only a few songs, such as 'Old Long Syne,' 'Lady Anne Bothwell's Lament,' and the verses attributed to Montrose, and these are not Scotch in language at all. More notable in this regard is Allan Ramsay's Tea-Table Miscellany, the first volume of which appeared in 1724. Ramsay printed some of the older songs, and published many from the pens of contemporary verse-writers like Robert Clawford and the Hamiltons of Bangour and Gilbertfield (pages 309, 310) But not a few of these new songs were eighteenth-century English in language and sentiment, too many of the old ones were the spurious imitations pro duced by Durfey and his school, and nowhere is Ramsay's treatment of his texts to be trusted Quite as uncritical was the Orpheus Caledonius, a collection of songs (largely appropriated from the Tea-Table Miscellany, which, however, revenged itself by such reprisals as that of Lady Grizel Baillie's famous song) set to music and published by a certain William Thomson in 1725-33 Of the same order were the collection of Scottish melodies by James Oswald, Yair's Charmer (1749-51), and the selection entitled The Lark -the last a Scottish and English medley, blending 'Todlin Hame' and 'The Ewe Bughts,' 'Waly, waly' and 'The Blithesome Bridal,' with 'Chevy Chace,' first issued in London in 1746, and reprinted at Edinburgh in an edition which contained Mrs Cockburn's 'Flowers of the Forest,' and is known to have been possessed by Burns On such merely popular publications the critical collection of Herd was a great advance texts have always enjoyed the reputation of superior accuracy, and his choice of specimens is ample and judicious Ballads as well as songs were included in his work, and it is noteworthy that when one has made subtraction from it of 'Gil Morice' and 'Sir Patrick Spens' and their like, as well as of Anglicised verses like 'The Bush aboon Traquair' and the 'Broom o' the Cowdenknowes,' very little of what is now recognised as classical Scottish song remains The majority and assuredly the best of the genuine old Scottish songs printed by Herd are of the bacchanalian, comicamorous, and not always too decorous kind, evemplified by 'The Tailor,' 'The Bob o' Dumblane,' and 'Todlin Hame' Songs of passion and pathos, such as are now taken as typical of Scottish minstrelsy, are conspicuously few They make their appearance first from the master-hand of Burns in James Johnson's Scots Musical Museum (1787-1803) and George Thomson's Collection of Scottish Songs and Airs (1793-1841), which, by grace of the genius of their chief contributor rather than through any editorial scholarship, rank along with Herd's modest anthology as the great books of Scottish song Pinkerton's rather unreliable Select Scotish Ballads (1783, Pinkerton and some others made a point of spelling Scotisti) and Joseph Ritson's scholarly volume of Scottish Songs (1794) also deserve mention St Cicilia, or the Lady's and Gentleman's Harmonious Companion, also called IVilson's Musical Miscellany, published at Edinburgh 'for C Wilson' in 1779, was of the Lark type. It complained that all previous collections 'had one general fault-viz. that they abounded too much with obscene songs, that tend to suppress virtue, which proves that the editors thereof have had but a mean taste Particular care hath been taken in the selection of this collection, and nothing is inserted that can give the least offence to that delicacy of taste for which the present age is so remarkable,' and yet used considerable freedom in this very department collection, English and Scotch, contains many of the Scotch songs Burns commended and imitated, and was doubtless known to him The Chearful Companion (Perth, 1780, 3rd ed 1790) was one of several provincial song-books Herd's collection was reprinted in 1869, and re edited from the MS by Dr Hans Hecht in 1904

Robert Graham (c. 1735-97) of Gartmore inherited the family estate (part of it handed on from the last Earl of Menteith) on the death of his brother William in 1774. He as sumed the name of Cunninghame before Graham (Cunninghame-Graham) on succeeding to the estates of the Glencurn earldom at the death of his cousin, the fifteenth and last Earl of Glencurn (1796), through his mother, Lady Margaret Cunninghame, daughter of William, twelfth Earl Graham studied at Glasgow, was for some years Receiver-General of Jamaica, and from 1794 to 1796 was MP for Stirlingshire. An advanced Liberal, the friend of Charles James Fox, and an admirer of the French Revolution, he had in 1785 been elected Rector of Glisgow University in opposition to Burke. He gathered about him a Firge and valuable library and a rich collection of admirable printings, and when Sir Walter Scott was at Gartmore while writing Rob Roy, Graham lent him many documents and MSS, about the finily and the district. Grahim sincestor of Mr Cunningliame Graham a well known writer of a later day whose wife is also an authoress wrote songs and lyrics, of which by far the hert and the only one I nown is that printed by Scott in the first edition of the Border Minstriles as verses 'tal en s down from recitation and increed to be of the They have indeed much of the 1 and of Charles 1 romantic expression of passion common to poets of that period, whose rays still reflected the setting beams of chivalry. But in later editions he had a to add that he "was assured they were by the late 1 Mr Graham of Gartmore' He told I odd har he had believed them to be the work of a greater Graham-the famo is Marquis of Montrose him self (see Vol. 1 p 817)

Alexander Geddes (1737-1802), one of the most remarkable and curiously gifted Scotsmen of his time, was born in Ruthren parish, Banffshire, of Roman Catholic parentage, and was educated for the priesthood at the seminary of Scalan in Glenhvat and at Paris (1758-64), where he

Robertson, Reid, and Beattie, and in 1780 the author was made an LL D of Aberdeen On his being elected a corresponding member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, he addressed to the society a poetical epistle in 'geud ald Scottis' phrase, printed in the first volume of their Transactions, along with a dissertation on 'The Scoto Saxon Dialect' which represents truer views than were then current, and trans lations of an eclosue of Virgil and an idyl of Theocritus in Scots His Epistola Macaronica ad Fratrem (1790), on a great public dinner of the English Protestant Dissenters, is a clever and amusing performance, and Bardomachia, on a battle between two rival bards in a bookseller's shop (1800, when 'Peter Pindar' attacled Gifford in a shop in Piccadilly) was also macaronic, with an English version appended.

Linton, a Trueeddale Pastoral (1781), celebrated the birth of an heir to the house of Traquair, where Geddes had been tutor, the Carmen Seculare pro Gallica Gente (1790, followed by two others) praised the French Revolution were also A Norfolk Tale (1791), suggested by a journey to visit Lord Petre, L'Avocat du Diable, on a lawsuit against Peter Pindar, a doggerel parody of a Cambridge University sermon, a painfully literal verse translation of the first book of the Iliad, and a mock-heroic poem in nine cantos on an electioneering affair in which the Bishop of Bangor took a conspicu ous part, called The Battle of Bangor, or the Church's Trumph Another of his clever trans lations in lambics was Ver Vert, or the Parrot of Nevers, from the French of Gresset, a poem afterwards translated by Father Prout He used to be credited, on no sufficient grounds, with the authorship of the pathetic song Lewie Gordon, and of the broadly and vulgarly humorous IVee Wifukie, more probably the work of Alexander Watson, Lord Byron's Aberdeen tailor Gcddes was companionable and brilliant in conversation, full of anecdote, wit, and epigram, but he was apt to be trying to his friends by his indiscretions in speech and writing, and seemed too willing to startle people by the audacity of his paradoves

From the 'Dissertation on the Scoto-Saxon Dialect'

It is my opinion that those who, for almost a century past, have written in Scots, Allan Ramsay not excepted, have not duly discriminated the genuine Scottish idiom from its vulgarisms. They seem to have acted a similar part with certain pretended imitators of Spenser, Shake speare, and Milton, who fondly imagine that they are copying from those great models, when they only mimie their antique mode of spelling, their obsolete terms, and their irregular construction. Thus, to write Scottish poetry (for prose has been seldom attempted), nothing more was deemed necessary than to interlard the composition with a number of low words and trite proverbal phrases, in common use among the illiterate, and the imore anomalous and farther removed from polite usage.

those words and phrases were, so much the more apposite and eligible they vere accounted. It was enough that they were not found in an English lexicon to give them a preference in the Scottish glossary, nor was it ever once considered that all words truly Anglo Saxon vere as truly Scoto Saxon verds, and that every exotic term which the English have borrowed from other languages, the Scots had an equal right to appropriate

By the last sentence he claims an antihistoric liberty that allowed him to introduce in his own poems, as most of his contemporaries had done, along with indubitable Scotch words, as many English words and spellings as were found convenient—a practice which produces a highly artificial dialect, and like his contemporaries, too, Geddes permitted himself to manufacture Scotch words for English ones, obviously on crroneous analogies Thus because the English o is in Scots often (not always) a, because the English home is in Scotch hame, therefore roum is rame, the city of Rome, Rame, and moment, mament' The two translations from Virgil and Theocritus were printed in a curious phonetic system of his own, which makes them all but unintelligible even to those familiar with old Scotch thus, hame is hem, frae is fre, case is de, braid, brad, thou, that, praise, preis, wha, hua, while, huyl, vou, zhu, deem, dian, laughs, laklis, power, piùr, and the Aberdeenshire value of the Scotch u or ui is given by c (= ee in English), muses becoming meses

In the Epistle to the Antiquaries he laments the low estate of the Muse of vernacular Scots, surveys her achievements in the past, and pays a tribute to Burns, remarkable even in the year (1792 when it was printed in the Transactions, which could obviously not have formed any part of the epistle as sent to the society immediately on Geddes's election in 1785, before the Kilmarnock edition had appeared and before Burns had been heard of in Edinburgh

From Horace's Satires—I 4.
Chaucer and Shakespeare, Lydgate, Ben,
And other such old comic men,
Were wont, while poets yet had grace,
To laugh at Folly, to its face

Butler, tho' in a diff'rent pace,
Pursued the same inviting chase
Butler, a bord of matchless wit,
Had he in smoother numbers writ
How could he?—In an hour, he'd bring
Two hundred verses in a string—
Then pause—and, in another hour,
He'd bring two hundred verses more
Copious he flow'd, but wanted shill
Or patience to restrain his quill
Yet in his motley, muddy stream
Full many a pearl is seen to gleam

'Tis not the number, but the weight Of lines that we should estimate.

Crispinus challenges to rhime—
'Appoint a judge—1 place—1 time—
Give paper, ink—and let us try
Who writes most verses? You or 1?'

The Gods did vell, that form'd my mind Of the pacific, gentle kind,
And made me of a temp'rature
Such boist'rous boasting to endure
Be thou, Crispinus! and thy fellows,
The emblem of a blacksmith's bellows,
Which, the it make a constant din,
Has nought but noisy wind within!

Three liappy Bays! He twice a year Can charm ev'n mighty George's ear, And see each dark and dulsome line. In Boyce's deathless music shine. While—these of mine, scarce one in twenty Can bear—their palates are so dainty!

Stire, my friend ('twist me and you),
Can never please but very few
The reason if you ask—'Trs plain, sir!
The most of manl ind ment censure
Th' ambitious knave, the wealthy fool,
Corruption's tamperer and tool,
The slave of luxury and lust,
The virtuoso mad for rust,
The virtuoso mad for rust,
The trader, whose insatiate soul
Drives him like dust from pole to pole—
All these with one accord (you know it)
Dread poetry, and damn the poet

'Shun, shun (they ery) the dangerous man He 'Il kiek or euff you, if he can Let hun but have his darling joke, He cares not whom he may provoke. Ev'n sacred friendship vainly tries To scape his wanton railleries And, once your name is fairly down, You're made the sport of all the town.'

The charge is heavy—But agree To hear, at least, my counter plea. And, first, I solemnly disclaim A poet's venerable name For, sure, you cannot think that those, Who write in verse resembling prose, Are poets?—He who boldly soars Above the reach of vulgar pow'rs, Whose bosom, if the Muse inspire, Glows with a more than mortal fire,

And who, in ev'ry rapt'rous line,
Displays an energy divine,
Commands, not courts, our approbation—
He, he deserves that appellation!

And hence there are (perhaps you know 'em) Who deem ev'n comedy no poem, Because it wants that force and fire Which we in poetry require, And, but that numbers interpose, Is nothing more than naked prose.

It is a curious commentary on the brevity of Geddes's poetic fame that not one of his poems, save the translations from Horace and the things contained in the first volume of the Antiquarian Transactions, is to be found in any public library in Edinburgh. There is a Life of Geddes by Dr Mason Good (1803) a shorter Life in Lives of Scottish Poets (vol. ii. 1822), and one in Dr Robert Chambers & Emunat Scottmen

Susanna Blamure (1747-94), the 'Muse of Cumberland,' was, somewhat paradoxically, distinguished for her Scottish songs and poems She was born of good family in Cumberland, at Carden Hall near Carlisle, but was brought up by an aunt at Thackwood, endearing herself there to a circle of friends and acquaintance at many a 'merrie neet.' Her elder sister becoming in 1767 the wife of Colonel Graham of Gartmore, Susanna often visited them in Perthshire, where she acquired that taste for Scottish melody and music which prompted her lyrics, The Nabob, And ye shall walk in Silk Attire, The Siller Croun, and others She knew Allan Ramsay's works, but seems not to have seen anything of Burns's her Scotch songs, she wrote pieces in the Cumbrian dialect, a number of addresses to friends and occasional verses, and a descriptive poem of some length entitled Stoklewath, or the Cumbrian I illage The Scotch lyrics, much more numerous than the Cumbrian ones, are in a rather artificial Some are partly Cumbrian and partly Scotch, and with the Cumbrian words altered (like nobbet in Dinna think, bonnie lassie, I'm gaun to leave thee) appear regularly in Scotch Miss Blamire died unmarried at collections Carlisle in her forty-seventh year, and her name had almost faded from remembrance, when, in 1842, her poetical works were collected by Dr Lonsdale and published in a small volume, with a memoir and notes by Patrick Maxwell

My heart beat a' the way,
Ilk place I passed scemed yet to speak
O' some dear former day,
Those days that followed me afar,
Those happy days o' mine,
Whilk made me think the present joys
A' naetling to langsyne!

The ivied tower now met my eye,
Where minstrels used to blaw,
Nae friend stepped forth wi' open hand,
Nae weel kenned face I saw,
Till Donald tottered to the door,
Wham I left in his prime,
And grat to see the lad return
He bore about langsyne

I ran to ilka dear friend's room,
As if to find them there,
I knew where ilk ane used to sit,
And hang o er mony a chair,
Till soft remembrance threw a veil
Across these een o' mine,
I closed the door, and sobbed aloud,
To think on auld langsyne

Some pensy chiels, a new spring race,
Wad next their welcome pay,
Wha shuddered at my Gothic wa's,
And wished my groves away
'Cut, cut,' they cried, 'those aged clms, Lay low you mournfu' pine'
Na! na! our fathers' names grow there,
Memorials o langsyne

To wean me frae these waefn' thoughts,
They took me to the town,
But sair on ilka weel kenned face
I missed the youthfu' bloom
At balls they pointed to a nymph
Wham a' declared divine,
But sure her mother's blushing cheeks
Were fairer far langsyne!

In vain I sought in music's sound
To find that magic art,
Which oft in Scotland's ancient lays
Has thrilled through a' my heart.
The song had mony an artfu' turn,
My ear confessed 'twas fine,
But missed the simple melody
I listened to langsyne.

Ye sons to comrades o' my youth,
Forgie an auld man's spleen,
Wha 'midst your gayest scenes still mourns
The days he ance has seen
When time has passed and seasons fled,
Your hearts will feel like mine,
And are the sang will maist delight
That minds ye o' langsyne!

What Ails this Heart o' Mine?

What ails this heart o mine?
What ails this watery ce?
What girs me a' turn pale as death
When I take leave o' thee?
When thou art far awa',
Thou It dearer grow to me,
But change o' place and change o' folk
May gar thy fancy jec.

When I gae out at e'en,
Or walk at morning air,
Ilk rustling bush will seem to say
I used to meet thee there
Then I'll sit down and cry,
And live aneath the tree,
And when a leaf fa's i' my lap,
I'll ca t a word fracthee

I'll hie me to the bower
That thou wi' roses tied,
And where wi' mony a blushing bud
I strove myself to hide
I'll doat on ilka spot
Where I hae been wi' thee,
And ea' to mind some kindly word
By ilka burn and tree

Hector Machell (1746-1818), son of an old captain of the 42nd who turned farmer in Stirling shire, spent some years in the West Indies, in 1780-86 was assistant-secretary on an admiral's flagship, and after two visits to Jamaica settled in Edinburgh on an annuity given him by a friend He wrote several pamphlets, two novels, and some saturical poems denouncing modern changes, a legendary poem, The Harp (1789,, and a descriptive poem, The Carse of Forth, but his name is associated with Scotland's Skaith, or the History & Will and Jean telling how a husband reduces a happy family to beggary by drinking, and reco ers himself after a spell of soldiering and the loss of a leg. But far better known are Macneill's lyrics, several of which-'My boy famm,?' I lo'ed ne er a laddie bu ane' and 'Coine under my plaidic,' for example - ire still popular Scotch songs, and 'Mary of Castle Cary,' in spite of her 'soft rolling ee,' is constantly sung 'Mary' is appended, as also a verse of each of the two other songs, and part of Scotland's Stortl

I lo'ed ne'er a laddie but ane, He lo ed ne'er a las it but me He s willing to mak me his ain, And his ain I am villing to be He has coft me a rockly o' blue, And a pair o' mitters o' green. The price was a kiss o' ms mou. And I paid him the debt yestreen.

Saw ye my true love down on yon lea?
Crossed she the meadow yestreen at the gloaming,
Sought she the burne where flowers the haw tree?
Her hair it is lint white, her skin it is milk white,
Dark is the blue of her soft rolling ee,
Red, red are her ripe lips, and sweeter than roses—
Where could my wee thing wander frae me?'

'I saw nae your wee thing, I saw nae your ain thing, Nor saw I your true love down by yon lea,
But I met my honny thing late in the gloaming,
Down by the burnie where flowers the haw tree
Her hair it was lint white, her skin it was milk white,
Dark was the blue of her soft rolling ee,
Red were her ripe lips, and sweeter than roses—
Sweet were the kisses that she gave to me.'

'It was nae my wee thing, it was nae my ain thing, It was nae my true love ye met by the tree Proud is her leal heart, and modest her nature, She never loved ony till ance she lo ed me. Off went the bonnet, the lint white locks flee,
The belted plaid fa'ing, her white bosom shawing,
Fair stood the loved maid wi' the dark rolling ee

'Is it my wee thing, is it my ain thing, Is it my true love here that I see?'

'O Jamie, forgie me, your heart's constant to me, I'll never mair wander, dear laddie, frae thee.'

John Lowe (1750-98), son of the gardener at Kenmure Castle in Galloway, studied for the Presby terian ministry at Edinburgh. His one popular song, Mary's Dream, was written on the drowning of a ship's doctor named Miller, who was attached to a daughter of the house in which Lowe was tutor. Lowe afterwards emigrated to America, where he taught a while, then took orders as an Episcopal clergyman, but having made an unhappy marriage, became dissipated, and died in great misery near Fredericksburg in Virginia. Only fragments of his other poems have been printed

Mary s Dream

The moon had climbed the highest hill Which rises o'er the source of Dee, And from the eastern summit shed Her silver light on tower and tree, When Mary laid her down to sleep,
Her thoughts on Sandy far at sea,
When, soft and low, a voice was heard,
Saying 'Mary, weep no more for me!'

She from her pillow gently raised
Her head, to ask who there might be,
And saw young Sandy shivering stand,
With visage pale, and hollow ee.
'O Mary dear, cold is my clay,
It lies beneath a stormy sea
Far, far from thee I sleep in death,
So, Mary, weep no more for me!

'Three stormy nights and stormy days
We tossed upon the raging main,
And long we strove our bark to save,
But all our striving was in vain
Even then when horror chilled my blood,
My heart was filled with love for thee
The storm is past, and I at rest,
So, Mary, weep no more for me!

'O maiden dear, thyself prepare,
We soon shall meet upon that shore,
Where love is free from doubt and care,
And thou and I shall part no more!'
Loud crowed the cock, the shadow fled,
No more of Sandy could she see,
But soft the passing spirit said
'Sweet Mary, weep no more for me!'

Lady Anne Barnard (1750-1825) was the eldest daughter of James Lindsny, fifth Earl of Balcarres Her life was divided between Balcarres in East Fife and Edinburgh, till in 1793 she married Andrew Barnard, son of the Bishop of Limerick, and afterwards appointed by Dundas as Colonial Secretary, under Lord Macartney, at the Cape of Good Hope. On his death in 1807 she settled in London Her Auld Robin Gray, one of the most perfect, tender, and affecting of all our ballads of humble life, was written when she was a girl of twenty two, published anonymously, and assumed to be an ancient piece She revealed the secret of its authorship, which till then had been carefully kept, in a letter (8th July 1823) to Sir Walter Scott

Robin Gray, so called from its being the name of the old herd at Balcarres, was born soon after the close of the year 1771 My sister Margaret had married, and accompanied her husband to London I was melancholy, and endeavoured to amuse myself by attempting a few poetical trifles There was an English Scotch melody of which I was passionately fond Sophy Johnstone, who lived before your day, used to sing it to us at Balcarres. She did not object to its having improper words, though I longed to sing old Sophy's air to different words, and give its plaintive tones some little history of virtuous distress in humble life, such as might suit it. While attempting to effect this in my closet, I called to my little sister [Clizabeth], now Lady Hardwicke, who was the only person near me, 'I have been writing a ballad, my dear, I am oppressing my heroine with I have already sent her Jamie to many misfortines sea, and broken her father's arm, and made her mother fall sick, and given her Auld Robin Gray for a lover, but I wish to load her with a fifth sorrow within the four lines, poor thing! Help nie to one!' 'Steal the cow, sister Anne,' said the little I brabeth. The cow was immediately histed by me, and the song completed. At our fireside and amongst our neighbours 'Auld Robin Gray' was always called for I was pleased in secret with the approbation it met with, but such was my dread of being suspected of writing anything, perceiving the shyness it created in those who could write nothing, that I carefully lept my own secret

With this letter Lidy Anne sent two continua tions of the ballad, which, like most continuations, are greath inferior to the original. Scott published them, however, in his Auld Robin Gray a Ballad (Bannatyne Club, 1825), to which reference may be made, as also to Lord Crawford's Lives of the Lindsays (1849) Indy Anne was brought before the public as an authoress once more during the South African troubles in 1899-1902, when nine teen interesting letters written home by her from the Cape in 1797-1801 were published as South Africa a Century Ago (1901) In these admirable specimens of the eighteenth century style of letter writing 'a shrewd humorous, and widely expenenced gentlewoman gives with entire frankness and frequent flashes of wit a clear and instructive account of the state of South Africa when the British flag was first hoisted over Cape Fown,' and by no means omits the difficulties that beset attempts 'to conciliate the Dutch as much as possible, twenty years before her countryman Pringle recorded his experience of the settlers

Robert Fergusson.

Robert 1 ergusson was born, on 5th September 1750, in Cip-and-Leither Close, off the High Street of Edinburgh His fither was a poor clerk, but both father and mother were of pentle Aberdeenshire blood, ind a miternal uncle was a landed proprietor and factor in that county, his best higgripher, Dr. Grosart, assigns him two clene il great grandfathers. Pergus on vas sent to a private school at the age of six, and entered I dinburgh High School in 1758. He spent four vents there, and is reputed to have been quick at making up leaves lost by frequent absences due to native delicacy of constitution and to have been a decourer of books In 1761 hc procured a bursary which provided for smain tenince and education, at the Grammar School of Dundee and the University of St Andrews and after spending three verts at the School he matriculated at St. Andrews in 1765 The town life it St. Indrews was not refined swarmed with ale houses, and the bursais had a too liberal supply of ale in their otherwise So it is mainly not too generous commons the 'larks' of Fergusson's university career that contemporary gossip has preserved, a college servant described him as in tricky callant, but a fine laddic for it that that and careless biographers have stated virongly that he was expelled for participation in a 'row'. But he is reputed to have loved and known Virgil and Horace, he rend much good English and he had a close friend in Professor William Wilkie whom Charles lownshend pronounced the most singular combination of god and brute he had ever met (see page 441) Fergusson had rhymed in the vernacular from a very early period, and one of his extra academical performances was an elegy on the death of Professor Gregori, which showed that at fifteen he was on equal terms with Ramsay

Now mourn we college masters a '
And frac your een a tear let fa, Fam'd Gregory Death has then awa'
Without remerd
The skarth ye've met wi's nac that sma' hurtnot so Sin Gregory's dead

His university studies were broken off by the death of his father. He had intended to qualify for the Church, but he left St Andrews in 1768 A visit to the well to do uncle in the north, who might have helped him to a career, proved fruitless, ending indeed in a violent quarrel mother had to support herself by 'taking lodgers,' and want of means barred all the professions to him. He secured employment in the office of the Commissary Clerk in Edinburgh, and remained there, an industrious drudge, till shortly before his early death He was accustomed to eke out the scanty wage he got for his mechanical office work by copying other legal documents, and he did not discontinue his essays in verse. 'R. Fergusson' was announced as the author of the 'words' of 'three favourite Scots airs' incorporated in Arne's opera, Artaxerxes, as performed in the Theatre-Royal, Edinburgh, in 1769 At this period he was unaware that the vernacular to which he had been faithful in boyhood was the right medium for his poetic ideas The prose writers who had made Edinburgh a literary centre were laborious imitators of English models So when an oppor tunity of printing his manuscripts came to Fergusson, it was natural that he should emulate Pope and Gay rather than Ramsay or Hamilton Weekly Magazine in 1771 offered hospitality first to three pastorals of the conventional type, then to 'A Saturday's Expedition in mock heroics,' to another serious 'Pastoral Elegy,' and a burlesque, all in English. Immediately, however, Fergusson found his metier, and showed that he knew it by signing the pieces in the vernacular which he contributed to the Magazine in rapid succession throughout 1772 and 1773, taking his place between Ramsay and Burns in that long line of realist-painters of the humours of homely Scottish life, a line which included the authors of Peblis to the Play and Chrystis Kirk in the sixteenth century (see Vol I p 210), and the Sempills in the seventeenth (Vol. I pp 818, 819) The first of these vernacular pieces was 'The Daft Days' Then an 'Elegy on the Death of Scots Music' proved pretty conclusively that a poet had arrived who could use his mother-tongue skilfully, if unequally, to paint nature and express natural though as yet superficial feeling

Nac lasses now, on simmer days,
Will lilt at bleachin' o' their claes,
Nac herds on Yarrow's bonny braes,
Or banks of Tweed,
Delight to chant their hamely lays,
Sin Music's dead

By the end of 1773 his contributions to the Magazire had accumulated to such an extent that he felt warranted in publishing a selection of cleven of the best, and he cleared £50 by the volume. Then the poet's sun set suddenly Fergusson was eminently sociable, but he was also physically incapable of sparing 'slices of his constitution' to those who courted his society. The Magazine had at once profited by his contributions and brought him fame. He was both talker and singer, and clearly an attractive personality apart from his growing reputation as a poet. The Edinburgh of that day lived in taverns a drily life which was much too fast for a reakly lad engaged all day at a laborious and mechanical occupation

To Luckie Middlemist's loup in, jump
And sit fu' snug
O'er oysters and a dram o' gin,
Or haddock lug, was seemingly glorious to Fergusson as it was to nine out of ten men of his day. He was Sir Precentor of the Cape Club, and retained his St Andrews fondness for high jinks There is plenty of evidence to show that he never neglected his daily task, and that he was not more dissipated than the average of his contemporaries, much less so, indeed, than many who have escaped the I ish of the moralist that has fallen too lieavily on the shoulders of the 'poor poet.' He had a severe illness in the beginning of 1774 and gradually sanl into religious melancholia He had to be confined in a madhouse, and expired there on the 16th of October 1774, at the age of twenty four He was buried in the Canongate churchyard, where, fifteen years later, Burns, at his own expense, erected a memorial stone with a poetical inscription on it to his 'elder brother in the Muses'

It is neither possible nor desirable to dissociate the achievements of Robert Fergusson from the 'acute painful youth' of 'the poor, high soaring, deep falling, gifted and misguided man' he has been described by the most generous and accurate of his censors From first to last, from the St Andrews bursar's protest against 'rabbits hot and rabbits cold' to the 'half fed, half mad, halfsarket' law clerk's spirited protest against Samuel Johnson's representation of Scotland, this undergraduate in life and in literature was a realist and a humourist-a humourist because he was a realist. It is, therefore, at once impossible to say how much he might have done within the field which Nature had marked out for him, and easy to mark the bounds of that field 'His limitations' says Mr lithen, 'are evident enough He had no lyric vein, no high reach of imagination, and no large constructive skill? The observation is as true as it is succinct. He had no lyric vein because he lind had no lyric experiences. The battle of life was hard enough with him, and vent against him, but it was not sufficiently varied or long to allow him to escape from his dreary, if also picturesquely sordid, environments into the audacious satire of Dunbar, into the mystical yet profoundly humanitarian confidence of Burns that 'the universal plan will all direct,' or even into the sagacious and mildly sensual Horatianism of Allan Even if time and sanity had been allowed him, Fergusson could not have risen to the heights of the 'Dance of the Sevin Dridly Synnis' or the ultra Rabelais inism of the 'Tourna ment,' he could not have given 'the windering train' immortal glory and almost immortal justification in 'The Jolly Beggars,' or supplied a democracy

-of which he had but an imperfect conceptionwith such a marching song as 'A man's a man for a' that' It is even doubtful whether he could have written a second and truer Gentle Shepherd Although he knew every potato on 'Epigoniad,' Wilkie's farm in Tife, and every inch of ground within walking or ferrying distance of Edinburgh, the world of lads and lasses, of 'the cannie hour at e'en,' and of 'the rigs o' barley' was outside the range of his sympathy, and its adequate representation was 'abune his micht' But there is no reason to believe that he could not have written many companion sketches to 'Leith Races' and 'The Farmer's Ingle,' 'The Election' and 'The Daft Days,' 'Braid Clath' and 'Hallow-Pair' Nay, given time and a little judicious encourage ment on the part of the 'Embro' gentra,' this warm hearted lad, who could be sature but never bitter, would have done justice to that solid strenu ous, municipal Edinburgh which was springing up in his time, whose members had their faults of habit and demeanour, but yet, on the showing of the courteous and gently scanning Topliam, were not 'so intemperate as the Germans' even by the torso of his poetry, Pergusson must be accounted a man not of talent but of genius Much of his English verse-the bulk of what he has to say on Boreas and Phochus, Cynthia and Clarinda, Sol and Damon-is unreal enough but not a whit more unreal than that of the majority of his English contemporaries. When he was satirically in earnest he could write English that was sufficiently incisive, as in his metrical parody of Johnsonese or in verses like

Thanks to the gods who made me poor 'No lukewarm friends molest my door Who always show a busy care. In being legatee or heir. Of this stamp no one will ever follow, The youth that's favoured by Apollo, and

Virtue and vice in him alternate reign d, That fill'd his mind and this his pocket drun'd, Till in the contest they so stubborn grew, Death give the parting blow and both withdrew

Fergusson was above all things the poetical Ian Steen of the Old Fown of Edinburgh during its transition through 'jink and drink' from poverty to comfort, of the tipsy brotherhood and sinning sisterhood of its closes, of the coarse joys of its burghal life, of the often dismal grieties of its high feasts and festivals, of the 'wanwordy, crazy, dinsome' noise of its bells and its crowds—in a word, of the good nature and good fellowship of 'Auld Reekie,' where

Couthy chiefs at e'ening meet, sociable fellows
Their bizzin' craigs and mou's to weet, throats
And blythely gar auld Care gae bye, make Wi' blinkin' and wi' bleerin' eye

A humourist and realist above all things, Fergusson could be more happily reflective than Ramsay, as in the close of his 'Ode to the Bee'

The Muse
Souds our and hoursome o'er the dows, early
I n' vogue and fu' blyth to map eager-glait
The winsome flow'rs frae Nature's lap,
The wing har having condens there

Twining her living gardens there That leart Time can ne or impair

All the world knows what Burns once to his elder brother in misfortune—it was loudly and cordailly proclaimed from the house-tops by the debtor, and has been exhibited in innumerable 'parallels' e er since—for the conception and execution of 'The Cottar's Saturday Night,' The Twa Briss,' Hallowe'en,' and 'The Mouse' There are anticipations of Robert Louis Stevenson not only in the life of 'the poor white faced drunlen, vicious boy that raved himself to death in an Edinburgh mad house,' but in the dry crusticity of 'Braid Clath' and in such legitimate tours deforce of style is

Through his n inimum o' space
The bleer es d sun,
Wi' blinkin' light, on I stealin' pace
His race doth run

All unconsciously Fergusson prepared the way for Burns as the best pupil in the studio prepares the way and the work for the master. In the heart of Scotland he holds the place next to Burns, in all the range of such Scotlish verse is being based on reality is destined to immortality there is only Dunbur between him and Burns.

To Hamilton of Bangour-from 'Hame Content A Satire'

O Bangour! now the hills and dales
Note man gie back the tender tales!
The birds on Yarrow now deplore
Thy mournful muse has left the shore
Near what bright burn or crystal spring.
Did you your winsome whistle bird?
The muse shall there, we wai'ry e'e,
Gie the dunk sward a test for thee.
And Yarrow's penius, do by dame,
Shall there forget her blade stain'd stream,
On the sad grace to seek repose.
Who mourn diber fate, condol'd her yoes.

Ode to Horror-posthumous

Who is he that with imploring eye Salutes the roly dawning sky?
The cock proclaims the morn in vain, His spirit to drive to its domain,
I or morning light can but return
To lad the wretched wail and mourn
Not the bright dawning a purple eye.
Can cause the frightful rapours fly,
Not sultry Sol a meridian throne.
Can bid surrounding fears begone,
The gloom of night will still preside.
While angry conscience stares on either side.

WILLIAM WALLACL

John Dunlop (1755-1820) was the son of a Lord Provost of Glasgow, and, himself a successful merchant, attained that same dignity in 1796. It his death he was a collector of customs at Port Glasgow. Of his songs and poems, the best known are 'Dinna ask me gan I loc we' and 'Here's to the year that's awa'? His son, John Colin Dunlop, was the author of the History of Fiction (1814)

Elizabeth Hamilton (1758-1816) was author of one excellent little moral tale, The Cottagers of Glenburnie, which was perhaps as effective in promoting domestic improvements among Scottish villagers as Johnson's Journe, to the Hebrides was in encouraging the planting of trees by the landed proprietors. Both these critics of Scottish scenery and manners exaggerated weak points, but the pictures were too provokingly true and justly sarcastic of what was a national reproach to be laughed away or denied. Elizabeth Hamilton was born in Belfast Her father, of Scottish family, was a merchant, and died early, leaving a widow and three children. The children were brought up by relatives, Elizabeth, the youngest, being sent to Mr Marshall, a farmer in Stirlingshire, married to her father's sister Her brother obtained a cadetship in the East India Company's service. and an elder sister remained in Ireland. Elizabeth, adopted by the Marshalls, was educated with the utmost care. 'No child,' she says, 'ever spent so happy a life, nor have I ever met with anything at all resembling our way of living, except the description given by Rousseau of Wolmar's farm and vintage.' The child soon showed a taste for literature Wallace was her first hero, but meeting with Ogilby's translation of the Iliad, she adored Achilles and dreamed of Hector She visited Edinburgh and Glasgow, carried on a learned correspondence with a philosophical lecturer, and wrote many verses Her first appearance in print was the record of a pleasure party to the Highlands, surreptitiously sent by a friend to a provincial magazine. Her brother's letters and, when he returned on furlough, conversations on Indian affairs stored her mind with the materials for her Letters of a Hindoo Rajah (1796), a work remarkable for good sense and sprightliness. In 1800 she published Memoirs of Modern Philosophers, a novel in defence of virtue and religion against the dangerous elements in Godwin's Political Justice, and between that and 1806 she gave to the world Letters on Education, Memoirs of Agrippina, and Letlers to the Daughter of a Nobleman In 1808 appeared her most popular, original, and useful work, The Cottagers of Glenburnie, and she subsequently published Popular Essays on the Human Mind, and Hints to the Directors of Public Schools, based on Pestalozzi From 1788 she lived mainly in London or elsewhere in England, till 1804, when 'Mrs Hamilton,' as she now liked to be called, settled in Edinburgh She died at Harrogate.

The Cottagers of Glenburme is a tale of humble life in a poor Scottish hamlet, and the heroine, a retired English governess, middle aged and lame, has come to stay as a lodger with her only surviving relative, a cousin married to a small farmer in Glenburnie. On her way she has called at Gowanbrae, the house of the factor or landsteward, who, with his daughter and boys, walks with Mrs Mason to Glenburnie. The house is dirty and uncomfortable, the farmer is a good easy man, but his wife is obstinate and prejudiced, and the children self willed and rebellious Mrs Mason finds the family quite incorrigible, but she effects a wonderful change among their neighbours gets a school established on her own plan, and boys and girls exert themselves to effect a refor mation in the cottages of their parents sturdy sticklers for the old ways at length see the good points of the new system, and the village undergoes a complete transformation Sir Walter called the Cottagers 'a picture of the rural liabits of Scotland, of striking and impressive fidelity' Viss Hamilton was an accomplished kailyard novelist long before the word was invented, and was perhaps the first entitled to the name, her Cottagers appeared twelve years before Galt's Ayrshire Legatees was published by Blackwood

Glenburnie

They had not proceeded many paces until they were struck with admiration at the uncommon wildness of the scene which now opened to their view which seemed to guard the entrance of the glen were abrupt and savage, and approached so near each other that one could suppose them to have been riven asunder to give a passage to the clear stream which flowed between them. As they advanced, the hills receded on either side, making room for meadows and corn fields, through which the rapid burn pursued its way in many a fantastie maze. The road, which winded along the foot of the hills, on the north side of the glen, owed as little to art as any country road in the kingdom. It was very narrow, and much encumbered by loose stones, brought down from the hills above by the winter torrents

Mrs Mason and Mary were so enchanted by the change of scenery which was incessantly unfolding to their view that they made no complaints of the slowness of their progress, nor did they much regret being obliged to stop a few mmutes at a time, where they found so much to amuse and to delight them. But Mr Stewart had no patience at meeting with obstructions which, with a little pains, could have been so easily obviated, and as he walked by the side of the car, expatiated upon the indolence of the people of the glen, who, though they had no other road to the market, could contentedly go on from year to year without making an effort to repair 'How little trouble would it cost,' said he, 'to throw the smaller of these loose stones into these holes and ruts, and to remove the larger ones to the side, where they would form a fence between the road and the hill! There are enough of idle boys in the glen to effect all this, by working at it for one hour a week during the summer But then their fathers must unite in setting them to work, and there is not one in the glen who would not sooner have his horses lamed, and his carts torn to pieces, than have his son employed in a work that would benefit his neighbours as much as himself'

As he was speaking they passed the door of one of these small farmers, and immediately turning a sharp corner, began to descend a steep, which appeared so nusafe that Mr Stewart made his boys alight, which they could do without inconvenience, and going to the head of the horse, took his guidance upon himself At the foot of this short precipice the road again made a sudden turn, and discovered to them a misfor tune which threatened to put a stop to their proceeding any further for the present evening. It was no other than the overturn of a cart of hav, occasioned by the breaking down of the bridge along which it had been passing Happily for the poor horse that drew this ill fated load, the harness by which he was attached to it was of so frail a nature as to make little re sistance, so that he and his rider escaped unhurt from the full, notwithstanding its being one of considerable depth.

At first, indeed, neither boy nor horse was seen, but as Mr Stewart indianced to examine whether, by removing the hay, which partly covered the bridge and partly hung suspended on the bushes, the road might still be passable, he heard a child's voice in the hollow exclaiming, 'Come on, ye muckle brite' ye had as weel come on! I'll gar ye! I'll gar ye! That a gude beast now Come awa' That s it ' Ay, ye re a gude beast now! As the last words were uttered, a little fellow of about ten years of age was seen issuing from the hollow, and pulling after him, with all his inight, a great long backed claims, animal of the horse species, though apparently of a very mulish temper 'You have met with a sad recident,' said Mr Stewart 'liow did all this happen?' 'You may see how it happened plain enough, returned the boy, 'the brig bral, and the cart coupet ' 'And did you and the horse coup likewise?' said Mr Stewart 'O at, we'a coupet thegether, for I was ridin' on his back' 'And where is your father and all the rest of the folk?' 'Whair sud they be but in the hay field? Dinna ye ken that we're takin' in our hay? John Tunson's and Junic Forster's was in a weel syne, but we're we alint the lave '

All the parts were greatly amused by the componite which the young peasant evanced under his misfortune, as well as by the shrewdness of his answers, and having learned from him that the hay field was at no great distance, gave him some halfpenee to histen his speed, and promised to take care of his horse till he should return with assistance. He soon appeared, followed by his father and two other men, who came on stepping at their usual pace 'Why, farmer,' said Mr Stewart, 'you have trusted rather too long to this rotten plank, I think' (pointing to where it had given way), 'if you remember the last time I passed this road, which was several months since, I then told you that the bridge was in danger, and shewed you how easily it might be repaired' 'It is a' true,' said the firmer, moving his bonnet, 'but I thought it would do weel enough I spoke to Jamie Forster and John Tamson about it, but they said they wadna fish themselves to mend a brig that was to serve a' the folk in the glen' But you must now mend it for your own sake,' said Mr Stewart, 'even though a' the folk in the glen should be the better for it ' 'Ay, sir,' said one of the men, 'that's spoken like yoursel' 1 Would everybody follow your example, there would be nothing in the world but peace and good neighbourhood.'

One somewhat diductic Scottish song, 'My un Fireside,' by Miss Hamilton, attuined great popularity, and is still often sung. The first verse is as follows

I hae seen great anes, and sat in great ha's,
'Mang lords and fine ladies a' covered wi' braws,
At feasts made for princes wi' princes I've been,
When the grand shine o' splendour has dazzled my een,
But a sight sae delightfu' I trow I ne'er spied
As the bonny blithe blink o' my ain fireside
My ain fireside, my ain fireside,
O cheery's the blink o' my ain fireside,

My am fireside, my am fireside, O there's nonght to compare wi' ane's am fireside

Mrs Hamilton's Memoirs, with letters and papers, were published in 1815 by Miss Benger

Minor Scotch Song-Writers.

Among the minor Scotch song-writers of the eighteenth century, many of vhom are not thoroughly identified, the following deserve men tion Ceorge Haitest (died 1756), a drunken Aber deenshire schoolingster, who published in 1727 a worthless volume of 'Occasional Poems,' is credited with the authorship of Logic o' Buchan, and of the spirited Jacobite song, Whirry Whigs Area? Other Jacobite rhymicsters were the Rev Unreform 11 Lennan (1701-83), minister of Cratine, v ho described the Race of Sheriffmur in the spirited balled bearing the refrain 'We ran and they rin,' and Adam Skirsing (1719-1803), a Lentlemin farmer of Haddingtonshire who witnessed the battle of Prestonpans and celebrated it in Tranert Mur and Her Johnne Cofe Isobel Pagan (died 1821), an eccentric spinster who sold unlicensed whish near Muirbirb, is said to have been the authoress of the well I nown pastoral song, Ca Ile Loves to the Know s, which Burns polished up for George Thomson in 1794 A collection of her songs and poems appeared at Glasgow about 1805 -I rom the mouth of Jean Clover (1758-1801), an Avrshire tramp, street singer, and thief, Burns took down the words of her song. Over the Mun among the Heather Another odditi vas Hought Cratiani (1724-79), the hunchback bellman of Glasgow, who in his earlier vears had peddled in Stirlingshire, and accompanied the Jacobite army fas a camp follower, doubtless rather than a combatant) to Derby and Culloden His Account of the Rebellion (1746) though mere doggered has some yorth as an historic document, and Sir Walter Scott thought of editing it for the Bannatine Club. Graham was the author of many popular chapbooks, including John Cheap the Chapmar and The History of Harerel II wes and some of his verses-those notably on the Turnin spike describing the Highlanders notion of the roads of General Wadeare not licking in rude vigour. His works were published in a limited edition in 1883. A vers different figure from these was Dr tdam tastin a fashionable Edinburgh physician, who solaced his grief by writing The Lack of Gold when Miss Jean Drummond of Megginch pited him for the Duke of Uhole in 1749 For Mrs Elizabeth Grant author of Rey s II ist, see above at page 596, and for Jean Adam and There's nae Luck about the House, see page 523

John Marrie (1759-1836), born in Dumfries, died in London proprietor and joint editor of The Star newspaper. He was brought up as a printer, and whilst apprentice in the Dumfries Journal office in 1777, in his eighteenth year, he published the germ of his Siller Gun in a quarto page of twelve stanzas, and this he continued to enlarge and improve up to the time of his death. The twelve stanzas expanded in two years to two cantos, in 1780, enlarged to three cantos, the poem was published in Ruddimai's Magazine, and in 1808 it was published in London in four Of this edition Sir Walter Scott said (in a note to the Lady of the Lake) 'that it surpassed the efforts of Fergusson and came near to those of Burns? An edition in five cantos was published in 1836 Mayne was author of a short poem on 'Hallowe'en,' printed in Ruddiman's Magazine in 1780, v hich had a direct influence on Burns's treatment of the same subject, and in 1781 he published his fine billad of Logan Bracs, two lines of which Burns copied into his Logan Water Many have thought Mayne's the better poem of His version of Helen of Kirkconnel is often quoted. For five years (1782-87) he was employed in the office of the brothers Foulis in His poem on 'Glasgow,' published in the Glasgow Magazine in 1783, was separately issued in 1803, and is a description of Glasgow and its ways, in the verse specially favoured by Burns, and a laudation of the energy and accomplishments of its citizens The Siller Gun is humorous and descriptive. The subject of the poem is an ancient custom in Dumfries, called 'Shooting for the Siller Gun, the gun being a small silver tube presented by James VI to the incorporated trades as a prize to the best marksman. It is after the manner of Peblis to the Play and cognate rhymes down to Fergusson and Burns

Logan Braes

By Logan's streams that rin sae deep, Fu' aft wi' glee I've herded sheep, Herded sheep and gathered slaes, Wi' my dear lad on Logan braes But wae's my heart, that days are gane, And I wi' grief may herd alane, While my dear lad maun face his facs, Far, far frae me and Logan braes.

Nae mair at Logan kirk will he

At e en, when hope amai t is gane
I dander dowie and f rlane

I dander down and I riane Or ait beneath the trysting the Where first he spak o love to me Reverted by friends and far fare faces We dilive in this on Logan brank Helen of Kirkconnel

I wish I were where Helen lies,
For, night and day, on me she cries
And, like an angel, to the skies
Still seems to beckon me!
For me she lived, for me she sighed,
For me she wished to be a bride
I or me in life's sweet morn she died
On fair Kirl connel Lee!

Where Kirtle waters gently wind,
As Helen on my arm reclined,
A rival with a ruthless mind,
Tool deadly aim at me
My love, to disappoint the foe,
Rushed in between me and the blow,
And now her corse is lying lov
On fair Kirl connel Lee!

Though Heaven forbids my wrath to swell, I curse the hand by which she fell—
The fiend who made my heaven a hell,

And tore my love from me '
For if, where all the graces shine—
Oh ' if on earth there 's night divine,
My Helen ' all these charms were thine—
They centred all in thee '

Ah, what avails it that, amain, I clove the assassin's head in twain, No peace of mind, my Helen slain,

No resting place for me
I see her spirit in the air—
I hear the shrick of wild despair,
When Murder laid her bosom bare,
On fair Kirkconnel I ee'

Oh! when I'm sleeping in my grave,
And o'er my head the rank weeds wave,
May He who life and spirit gave Unite my love and me!
Then from this world of doubts and sighs,
My soul on wings of peace shall rise,

My soul on wings of peace shall rise,
And, joining Helen in the slies, Forget Kirkconnel Let!
The story of Helen Irving (or Bell) daughter of the Laird of kirkenned in Annandale slain by the bullet aimed by a rejected suitor at his favoured rival her betrothed seems to date from the sixteenth century, and is embrined in a fine old ballad. There are modern versions by Pinkerton and Jamesen—net to speak of Wordsworth's Eller Irain—hesides Mayres. Many of the verses of the old ballat are incomparably more poetic such as the last.

I wish I were where Helm lies! Night and day on moshe cries, And I am weary of the skies For her sake that died for me.

In October 1804 he set out on his first excursion, it d wrote Tr: Intestas, a In 1806 he was employed on the American edition of Res's Cirlof that He soon p evilled upon the publisher to undertake a new venturea work illustrating by his own drawings and with full descriptions, all the birds of America and in 1808-10 he brought out the first two volumes of In 1811 he made a the Intrain On it elegaemocyopye down the Ohio, and travelled overland through the Mississippi Valley from Nashville to New Orleans. He continued 'collecting birds and subscribers, writing and publishing, triversing swamps and forests in quest of rare birds, and undergoing the greatest privations and fatigues, till he had assued a seventh volume Philadelphia he sank under his severe labours, and there he was buried. In his Oriethelogy he showed he possessed descriptive powers, artistic sensibilities, and a varied and ornate style quite exceptional even in a Paisley poet.

The Bald Eagle

The celebrated cataract of Niagara is a noted place of resort for the bald eagle, as well on account of the fish procured there, as for the numerous carcases of squirrels, deer, bears, and various other animals that, in their attempts to cross the river above the falls, have been dragged into the current, and precipitated down that tremendous gulf, where, among the rocks that bound the rapids below, they furnish a rich repast for the vulture, the raven, and the bald eagle, the subject of the present account. This bird has been long known to naturalists, being common to both continents, and occasionally met with from a very high northern latitude to the borders of the torrid zone, but chiefly in the vicinity of the sea, and along the shores and cliffs of our lakes and large rivers. Formed by nature for braving the severest cold, feeding equally on the produce of the sea and of the land, possessing powers of flight capable of outstripping even the tempests themselves, unawed by anything but man, and, from the ethereal heights to which he soars, look ing abroad at one glance on an immeasurable expanse of forests, fields, lakes, and ocean deep below fum, he appears indifferent to [localities or] change of seasons, as in a few minutes he can pass from summer to winter, from the lower to the higher regions of the atmosphere, the abode of eternal cold, and from thence descend at will to the tornd or the arctic regions of the earth.

In procuring fish he displays, in a very singular manner, the genius and energy of his character, which is fierce, contemplative, daring, and tyrannical-attributes no exerted but on particular occasions, but when put forth, overpowering all opposition. Elevated on the high dead limb of some gigantic tree that commands a vide view of the neighbouring shore and ocean, he seems calmly to contemplate the motions of the various feathered tribes that pursue their busy avocations below, the snow white gulls slowly winnowing the air, the busy tringæ coursing along the sands, trains of ducks streaming over the surface, silent and watchful cranes intent and wading, clamorons crows, and nll the vinged multitudes that subsist by the bounty of this vast liquid magazine of nature. High over all these hovers one whose action instantly arrests his whole attention his vide curvature of wing and sudden suspension in air, he knows him to be the fish hawk, settling over some devoted victim of the deep. His eve kindles at the sight, and balancing himself with half opened wings on the branch, he watches the result Down, rapid as an arrow from heaven, descends the distant object of his attention, the roar of its wings reaching the car as it dis appears in the deep, making the surges foam around. At this moment the eager looks of the eagle are all nrdonr, and, levelling his neck for flight, he sees the fish hawk ouce more emerge, straggling with his prey, and mounting in the nir with screams of exultation These are the signal for our hero, who, launching into the air, instantly gives chase, and soon gains on the fish hawk, each exerts his utmost to mount above the other, displaying in these rencontres the most elegant and sublime acrial evolutions. The unencumbered eagle rapidly advances, and is just on the point of reaching his opponent, when, with a sudden scream, probably of despair and honest execration, the latter drops his fish the eagle, poising himself for a moment, as if to take a more certain aim, descends like a whirlwind, snatches it in his grasp ere it reaches the water, and bears hisill gotten booty silently away to the woods

Robert Burns.

Robert Burns was born on the 25th of January 1759, in a two roomed clay cottage built by his father in the village of Allowity, which, cirefully preserved, still stands--although there is some obstinate local scepticism on this point-about two miles from the town of Ayr. He came, on the one side, of a kineardineshire yeoman family which, he believed, had suffered for the Stewarts, and on the other, of undoubted Avrshire Cove naming stock. In his brief autobiography, vritten in the form of a letter to Dr John Moore, the novelist, in 1787, he says "My forefathers rented lands of the famous noble Keiths of Maishal, and had the honour to share their fate. He told his friend, Rumsay of Ochtertyre that his paternal grandfuher 'had been plundered and driven out in the year 1715, when gardener to Larl Marischal' and that his majorn il great grandfither wis 'shot at Aird's Moss,' when Rich and Cameron was taken prisoner William Burnes, a gardener, nurseryman, and farmer—who was thirty eight years of age when ! his cldest son Robert was born, and is described as of 'thin sinewy figure about five feet eight or nine inches in height somewhat bent with toil, his haffet locks thin and hare, with a dark swarthy complexion'—was a man of notable character and individuality. He wrote for his children a Manual of Religious Belief, induced his neighbours to hire a competent teacher, John Murdach, for the village, and showed his boys-he had seven children in all -both by precent and by practice, how to bise conduct on reason. Agnes Brown the poet's mother, and cleven years her husband's junior, was in excellent housewife, with no pretensions to education, but it was probably from her that he inherited the lytical gift. According to her drughter, Mrs Begg she had 'a well in ide sonsy figure of about the ordinary height with a beautiful red and white complexion, a skin the most transparent I ever saw, red har dark eves and eyebrows, with a fine square forchead' Life was hard with the Burneses Robert had two and a half years' schooling in Alloway Then his father, with a view to keeping his children about him, ventured to take the farm of Mount Oliphant, a couple of miles distant from the seven acre croft he had hitherto cultivated, undertaling to pry forty or forty-five pounds r year for seventy acres of poor land which he had to stock with £100 borrowed from his employer From the age of nine the boy had none but intermittent schoolteaching, but his education was steadily carried on by his father, who taught his boys, in addition to the three 'R's,' geography and the rudiments both of ancient and of natural history, and, as Gilbert, the second son, testified, 'conversed familiarly on all subjects with us as if we had

But he fell in love in his fifteenth year and crose his first son, vents leter he seat for a section to a school of a smu, gling coast. Kirkoswald, and learned to fake his glass. So when in 1777 William Burnes removed to the firm of Lochler-130 reces-in Larbohon parish Robert at mneteen was well read, 'constantly the victim of some for encliver' and could rhyme. At I ochler the esteums ances of the Burns became a 1 recorason, family were caster started a deligting club in Tarbolton, developed the conversational powers which were to impress Edinburgh society, thirsted for distinction, dressed with cric, and acquired some notoriety as a champion of herenea' as opposed to 'Old Light' op mons (or ultra Calvinism) in the churchyard colloquies in which he had learned as a mere boy to practise the reasoning ficulty so carefully culmated by his father. He thought of marriage, and despairing of making a living by firming spent a season in Irvine to learn flax dressing. The experiment however, was not successful. His partner was, he averred, a swindler. Their shop was burned to the ground, and he was 'left like a true poet, not worth a supence.

'After three years' tossing and whirling in the vortex of litigation,' William Burnes died of consumption in 1784, and rescuing some small remains from his embarrissed estate, Robert and Gilbert took the farm of Mossgiel, in the adjoining parish of Mauchline. The poet's life continued to be, on his brother's testimony, frugal and temperate, it must have been so, for he had not more than seven pounds a year in cash

But before leaving Lochlea he had for the first time deviated from propriety in his relations with women, and Elizabeth Paton, his mother's maid-servant, bore him a daughter. The first genuine determination of his mind towards literary effort, the first appreciation of its usual aims and results, appears in certain entries in hıs Commonplace Book, which are undated, but may, though not without some hesitation, be ascribed to 1784. There he expressed a strong wish that he might be able to celebrate in verse the scenes his native county, the locus of many of the actions of the 'Glorious Wallace, the Saviour of his Country, as 'the excellent Ramsay' and 'the still more excel lent Fergusson' celebrated had the scenes with which they were familiar So he made poetry at once the exposition and the sedative of his passions, wrote a welcome to his illegitimate child, and versified epistles to local brother poets, such as David Sillar and John Lapraik. He threw his whole soul into the task. He fell in love with Jean Armour, daughter of a master-mason in Vauchline He took sides with the New Lights or Liberal clergy against the Old Lights or Highflyers, of whom his own minister in Mauchline, the Rev William Auld, was one, wrote skits in verse for the cause-'The Twa Herds,' the 'Epistle to John Goldie,' 'Holy Willie's Prayer' -and was encouraged by the countenance and friendship of clergymen and lawyers who appre ciated his cleverness. His poems circulated in manuscript, and as by 1785 Mossgiel, which 'lies very high and mostly on a cold wet bottom, promised to be no more profitable than Lochlea, he had doubtless come to contemplate publishing

Burns was never more productive than at this time, it is safe to set down as the output of the later autumn and early winter these poems 'To a Mouse,' 'Halloween,' 'Man was Made to Mourn,' 'The Cotter's Saturday Night,' 'Address to the Deil,' 'The Jolly Beggars,' 'To James Smith,' 'The Vision,' 'The Author's Earnest Cra and Prayer,' 'The Twa Dogs,' 'The Ordination,' and 'Scotch Drink'—the works which formed the foundation of his future fame. was precipitated by the discovery tliat Jean Armour was soon become mother Burns gave her a writing acknowledging her as his wife under certain conditions. but Armour disapproved of the proposal made, and induced his daughter to destroy the document The poet, rendered w ell nigh desperate, resolved to enugrate to Jamuica as book leeper on the estate of an Ayr family of the name of Douglas Partly to raise money for his passage, lie now brought out his first volume, the famous Kilmarnock edition -Poems chiefly in the Scottish Dialect—a copy of which was sold in 1898 for five hundred and forty five guiners Meantime there seems to have occurred the 'Highland Mary' According to the best hypothesis episode. founded on the few facts that have been ascertained, almost immediately after the breach with the Armour family, Jean having been despatched to Paisley, the poet plighted his troth to Mars Campbell, a Highland maid servant residing in the neighbourhood, who went home to Dunoon to prepare for marriage, and straightway died, to be apparently forgotten for the moment by Burns (who had never ceased to love Jean), but to live for ever in 'To Mary in Heaven' and other poems.

The success of the Kilmarnocl edition of the poems (July 1786) changed the current of the poet's life. He was induced to abandon the Jamaica scheme, and to proceed to Edinburgh with a view to the publication of a new edition. He arrived on 28th November 1786. By this time fairly well accustomed to 'the tables of the great,' owing to his popularity in Ayrshire, he discovered no shy ness or aukwardness in his intercourse with the literate to whom he was introduced through the mediation of an Ayrshire hard, and he was at home among the companions of a 'lower rank' who obtained access to him through John Rich mond, clerl, an old Mauchline friend whose bed he shared. Conscious of his power, he met as an equal and was treated as an equal by Durald Stevart, William Robertson, Hugh Blur, Henry I rsline, hesides aristocrats like the Lark of takin cairn. His appearance and manners—he was about five feet ten mehes in height although a stoop made him look shorter), of muscular figure with dark hair that curled round his forchead, and such a glowing eye as Sir Walter Scott never can in any other human head—and his frank, vigorous yet modest conversation, fascinated the Duchess of Gordon and other 'Lalies of fashion'. William Creech, the best I nown of the Ldinburgh Issol sellers of the time, undertool to produce a new edition for him, and the gentlemen of the Cale donian Hunt were large subscribers. The bool brought him four hundred or five hundred pounds but Creech delayed in making a business settle So, after hanging on in I dinburgh for i little, taking stock of his new friends and of the durability of their friendship, delighting the Crochallan Concibles a convival club, vith rich [ and amusing verses he in ide a tour of the southern countres. In the first flush of success he had t thought of striking into a new line of life. Adam. Smith suggested that he might get a salt officer slip, and he did not repudiate the hint of Mrs. Dunlop of Dunlop, in Ayrshire lide who was henceforth his most constant correspondent that he had contemplated buying a commission in the army Very quickly, however he determined to live the life to which he had been bred and on this Border tour he visited Dalswinton, near Duin fries-Mr Miller, the proprietor, having offered On his 'eclatant return,' as he called it, to Manchime, he was cordially received by Jean Armour, who had borne him twins the previous September, and their relations were restored to the old footing. After a brief stay at Mossgotl. he returned to Edinburgh, only to start on a three weeks' tour in the Highlands, in the course of which he was entertained by the Dukes of Athole and Gordon, and visited his Kincardineshire rela-Back in Edinburgh, he had to resume the task of badgering Creech for his money, but he would have given up the attempt in December had he not met with a carriage accident which laid lum on his back Simultaneously he fell into a correspondence with a sentimental grass vidow of literary tastes-Mrs Maclehose, the correspondence, carried on in romantic style between

"Schender" and "Chrinda," ripened into an airdent friendship, and had he been free he much leave married her. However, when he at fast pot a sculement with Creech, he returned to Mo gul in I chruity of 1768, married Jean Armo r, who had been turned out of her father's house just before her second acroache next—she bare to ins agam, but they died immediately ifice birth went through a course of instruction in the dutes of ar Excise ofneer, having obtained in I disburgh, a promise of a post in the ecrete lould forming ful him no un and took from Miller the furn of Ellisland, on the Dalssinton ee de Having built his hours on the banks of the Null the poet tool his rife thither, and see himself seriously to male conduct! his neet and while no forgetting his designs to find a sangar least for Sen land or fime. He refused also to think of the newly founded clear of Agriculture is I dinb righ Umrarsia, for which Mrs Dunlop at d Mr Graham of Lintry, one of the Commissionerof Pacisa, would have pressed his claim. It was in the rutumn of 1700 that he composed 41 rm o Shanter? which by many critics is regarded as his masterpiece. In the same vear Borns committed a breach of conjugal fidelity -the only one of which there is authentic record -his fellow sinner being Ann Pail, servant in a Dumfries into but his rife nursed the child of this connection along with one of her own

In November 1701 the poet quitted furning in disgust, sold his stock, and became an excisenian pure and simple. He was appointed to a division in Dumfries at a salary of seventy pounds a year, with perquisites, and within a year this was increased by twenty pounds. He had a good friend in Mr Grillani, and soon acquired another in Mr Corbet one of the Supervisors-General, whom Mrs Dunlop interested in him. His prospects of advancement in his profession were excellent, but his politics now developed into active sympathy with the French Revolutionists however, went well with him on the whole. He kept on writing songs for Johnson, and more diligently and enthusiastically for George Thomson's Melodies, struck up a friendship with Mrs Maria Riddel, sister-in-law of his friend the Captain, and was on friendly terms with both the county gentry and the townsfolk. He did not, on his own confession, eschew the tavern, but according to the emphatic testimony of his wife, his official superior, Supervisor Findlater, and his immediate neighbour Gray, a teacher in the local Academy, he never became habitually intemperate. There is abundant evidence that he was attentive to his official duties, it goes without saving that he was the most careful and affectionate of fathers he did not take pains in word or act to conceal his sympathy with French Revolutionists or British Reformers Although Graham of Fintry remained his steadfast friend, his outspokenness led to a delay in his promotion and to his being 'cut' by a section of Dumfries 'society,' and a somewhat mysterious quarrel with Mrs Riddel gave him much pain and cost him some friend-Yet when 'Haughty Gaul' threatened invasion, his patriotic songs rang through the country and brought back any popularity he had lost, and the difference with Mrs Riddel did not last a year A supervisorship was in sight, and not without reason he looked forward to obtaining, through political influence, a collectorship, which meant 'a life of literary leisure with a decent competence,' but an attack of rheumatic fever in the winter of 1795-96, following the loss of a daughter, proved too much for his constitution He deliberately prepared for death and met it calmly-misunderstandings due to delirium deserve no serious consideration—on 21st July 1796

The world of criticism, following the sure-footed judgment of the Scottish people, has given up the attempt to separate Burns the man from Burns the lyrist, humourist, and thinker there could he no hetter evidence that he was to all intents and purposes a poet sui generis The events of his life, the details of his moral and intellectual experience, as realistically reproduced, idealised, or reflected upon in letters and poems, have the unity of a continuous self-revela-In extent and intensity, that revelation is prohably unique There are mysteries in the life of Burns, such as the episode of the 'Highland Mary' of immortality, the Mary Campbell of tradition, which will prohably never be cleared up, he dwelt so far apart from such of his contemporaries as he came in contact with, that, notwithstanding his emphatic preference of the 'social' to the self-contained man, he must have kept 'something to himsel' he wadna tell to ony' Yet, like Goethe, he declined to join that almost universal 'conspiracy of silence' which regards the incidents of self development as things to be ashamed of and consigned to a decent oblivion Like Goethe also, he regarded his own character and life as so much grist for his artistic mill, and as he had imperious natural impulses which 'raged like demons,' and 'well nigh the finest brain conceivable,' that grist was not inconsiderable. Though, as he anticipated in his fragment of autobiography, 'Whim and Fancy, keen sensibility and riotous passions, made him zigzag in his path of life,' and although his poetic career may be accounted a 'faithful failure' in the sense that he died before he had scaled

The wished for height, Where, Man and Nature fairer in her sight, His Muse could imp her wing for some sublimer flight, his genius, his absolute command of the technique of his art, and his remorseless sincerity, made of these zigzags the Wilhelm Meister's Pilgrimage of Humanity The wild abandonment of reckless joy, the anguish of an uphraiding conscience, the whole struggle of the soul with itself, reverence for the mysterious Power on which all things depend, scorn of cant and falsehood, contempt of folly, mirthful appreciation of the oddities of life and man, indignation at baseness and tyranny, delight in friendship, resentment against intrusive pride, pity for the suffering of all that feels, aspiration after a juster and happier structure of society, wise and sober contemplation of life and duty, the raptures of the hopeful, the anxieties of the despairing, the heart-breaking disappointment of the rejected or deserted lover, the hilarities of welcome, the sadness of farewell -these intensities of everyday life he reproduced as they never were reproduced before and may never he reproduced again. Hence it is that the 'universal plan' of Burns can never be grasped either in its reality or in its breadth, until the complete output of his life and art be carefully considered. Burns must be compared with Burns Burns in despair must be read with Burns on the topmost wave of hope, Burns humorous must be interpreted by Burns serious, Burns resentful hy Burns cheerfully acquiescent, Burns the Jaco bite by Burns the Democrat. 'Scotch Drink' and the 'Peck o' Maut' must he collated with 'The Beadsman of Nithside,' any seeming condonation of license must be read in the light of the 'Epistle to a Young Friend' or a 'Bard's Epitaph,' the Burns who had the courage to say that his marriage, like that of every other man, was a venture in the lottery of life, must not he quoted to the prejudice of the Burns who, according to his widow, found 'the true pathos and sublime of human life' as the affectionate husband of Jean Armour and the devoted father of Jean Armour's children, the Burns who fiercely proclaimed his right to be 'independent in his sinning' in 'The Kirk an' State may gang to Hell, but I'll gang to my Anna,' must not he reprohated, and the Burns who hrooded over his lapse from his own ideal in a silence which paralysed poetic effort and only found vent in agonised letters, absolutely ignored

A consideration of Burns in all his aspects and triumphs leads to the conclusion that an instinct for thoroughness is the 'miraculous' or mexplicable element in him which has made him at once a ready-reckoner in mundane ethics and a joy for ever in the case of at least a moiety of the Anglo Saxon race He was equally thorough as 'a victim of fair enslavers,' as a preacher of self control, as a student of his own nature, as a devotee of the thymer's art, as a practitioner of his cardinal doctrine that while impulse must select subjects for poetic treatment, infinite patience and labour can alone make the treatment successful. Only by bringing together a few of his sentences and verses can the 'harmony not understood' of his artistic performance be effectually illustrated

I pored over it [a selection of English poems] driving my cart or walking to labour song by song, verse by verse, carefully noting the tender or sublime from I engaged several of my schoolfellows to keep up a literary correspondence with me

The rough material of fine writing is certainly the gift of genius, but I as firmly believe that the workmanship is the united effort of pains, attention, and repeated trial think that composing a Scotch song is a trifling business -let them try it. I had rather be the author of five well written songs than of ten otherwise I rhyme The heart of the man and the fancy of the poet are the two grand considerations for which I hve.

'The rank of Burns is the very first of his art' is the verdict of Byron, who also in advance effectively answered criticisms directed against his predecessor's courageously Teniersish treatment of certain features and phases of life by saying, 'A man may be coarse and yet not vulgar, and the fidelity it utters,' has been rightly recognised by reverse. Burns is often course but never vulgar'

This verdict is now universally accepted being a poet sur generas, he cannot profitable be compared with any of his predecessors or successors in English literature who may be accounted his equals in natural faculty Goethe pronounced him the first of lyrists, and that in virtue of the two hundred and fifty songs which he wrote or improved in the intervals of work as a firmer and gauger, and vhile he was, not without reason, looking forward to a decent competence and 'literary leisure' The author of 'The Jolly Beggars,' 'Tam o' Shanter,' and 'Holy Willie's Prayer,' of 'The Bard's Epitaph,' 'The Epistle to a Young Friend,' and 'A man's a man for a' that,' holds an assured place among 'mevitable' humourists and moralists Of Scottish poets he is the first, the second being Dunbar, whom he scarcely if at all surpasses in biting trenchancy of sarcasm, but whom he greatly surpasses in the riot of good-humour and in sympathy with Humanity in general. His relation to Ramsay, and reverence for Fergusson and the others of the 'vernacular' or Scottish Renaissance school of poetry, is very much that of a master to pupils who have been preparing work in the studio for him. They give him rhymes, including his favourite 'Mouse' stanza, and in the case of Ramsav and Fergusson, subjects for treatment, points of view, even phrases and What he supplemented them with was verses original genius of the first order, consummate art, and the power of rising from Scotland into a conception of the world as a whole. It is a familiar saying that Burns von his greatest tnumphs in and with the vernicular. That saying need not be gainsaid. It must, however, be remembered that he was the superior of his predecessors in English as well as in Scottish verse. 'Thou Lingering Star,' one of his greatest achievements in the impressioned as distinguished from the passionate, is in English So also are 'Man was made to mourn,' the impassioned stanzas on the wounded hare, the 'Ode to the Memory of Mrs Oswald' (which Carlyle terms a piece that might have been chanted by the Furies of Æschylus), the best half of the 'Mountain Drisy,' the finest reflective and descrip tive passages in 'Tam o' Shanter,' practically the whole of the superb 'Macpherson's Farei cll,' 'Afton Water,' the 'Song of Death,' 'The Gloomy Night is Gathering Fast,' the best of 'Scots who hac," 'Go fetch to me a pint of wine," 'Had we never loved so kindly,' and the most elevated passages in 'The Vision' and 'The Cotter's Saturday Night' Whenever, in fact, he soared from the particular to the universal in sentiment, in humour, and in reflection, he glided from Thus it is that Burns's Scottish into English mission and achievemen'-his pre-eminence as a Scottish, his excellence as an English poet -mean the triumphan assertion by Scolland of its rights of inheritance in British and general literature.

Writien in 1750 for Grose's Antiquities of Scotland, so at least Captain Grose claimed. Alloway is Burns's birthplace, and the ruin remains. Tam o Shanter has been identified with one Douglas Graham, who was a farmer at Shanter in Carrick, Souter Johnie with John Davidson, a shormaker in Kirkoswild. The two were boon companions in Ayr change-houses. Mrs. Burns is alleged to have tesufied that the poem was written in a single day. Burns, in a letter to Mrs. Dunlop of April 1791 described it half jocularly as his "standard performance in the po-tical line, and is howing a force of genius and a finishing polish that I despair of ever excelling.

Is there a whim inspired fool,

Owre first for thought, owre hot for rule,

Owre blate to seek, owre proud to snool — modestecringe

Let him draw near,

And owre this grassy heap sing dool, woe

Is there a Pard of rustic song,
Who, noteless, steals the crowds among,
That weekly this area throng?—
O, pass not ln!
But with a frater feeling strong,
Here, heave a sigh

And drap a tear

Is there a man, whose judgment clear Can others teach the course to steer, Let runs, hunself, life's mad career Wild as the wave?—

Here pause—and, thro' the starting ter

Here pause—and, thro' the starting tear, Survey this grave

Was quick to learn and wise to know,
And keenly felt the friendly glov
And woster fame
But thoughtless fallies laid him low,
And stain'd his name!

Thou Lingering Star

Thou ling'ring star, with less ming ray,
That lovest to gree! the early more Again thou usher string the day
My Mary from my soil was forn
O Mary, dear departed Shade!
Where is thy place of blissful rest?
See'st thou thy Lover lowly laid?
Hear's thou the groads that rend his breast?

That sacred hour can I forget
Can I forget the hallow'd grove,
Where, by the winding Arr we rie
To live one day of porting love.
Eternity can not effice
Those records dear of train ports past,
Thy image at our hollowing trains our holy little thought we 'twas our holy, gurgling, killed he pebtied also e

Described by Burns in a letter of 8th November 1789 as 'made the other day, and commonly believed to have been addressed to the 'dear, departed shade of Mary Campbell on the anniversary of her death, which occurred in October 1786.

Ode, Sacred to the Memory of Mrs Oswald of Auchencruive

Dweller in yon dungeon dark, Hangman of creation, mark! Who in widow weeds appears, Laden with unhonoured years, Noosing with care a bursting purse, Baited with many a deadly enrse?

Strophe

View the wither'd beldam's free—
Can thy keen inspection trace
Aught of Humanity's sweet, melting grace?
Note that eye, 'tis rheum o'erflows—
Pity's flood there never rose.
See those hands, ne'er stretch'd to save,
Hands that took, but never gave Keeper of Mammon's iron chest,
Lo, there she goes, unpitted and unblest
She goes, but not to realms of everlasting rest!

Antistrophe

Plunderer of Armies! lift thine eyes
(A while forbear, ye torturing fiends), Seest thou whose step, unwilling, hither bends?
No fallen angel, hurl'd from upper skies!
'Tis thy trusty, quondam Mate,
Doom'd to share thy fiery fate—
She, tardy, hell ward plies

Epode

And are they of no more avail,

Ten thousand glittering pounds a year?

In other worlds can Mammon fail,

Omnipotent as he is here?

O, bitter mockery of the pompous bier!

While down the wretched vital part is driv'n,

The cave lodg'd beggar, with a conscience clear,

Expires in rags, unknown, and goes to Heav'n

Written one night in January 1789, when the poet was driven out of a comfortable inn at Sanquhar into a night of 'bitter frost, howling hills and icy cataracts by the funeral train of Mrs Oswald, daughter of a rich Jamaica merchant and widow of Richard Oswald in Cauthness man who made a fortune as a London merchant and as an army contractor ('plunderer of armies') in the Seven Years War, but who carned a better character than Burns gave him by the services he rendered in arranging on behalf of the Shelburne Ministry, the treaty which recognised the independence of the American Colonies.

Poor Mailie's dead l

It's no the loss o' warl's gear, vorldly property
That could see bitter draw the tear,
Or mak our Bardie, dowie, wear
The mourning weed garb
He's lost a friend an' neebor dear,
In Mulie dead

Thro' a' the toun she trotted by him,
A lang half mile she could desery him,
Wi' kindly bleat, when she did spy him,
She ran wi' speed

A friend mair faithfu' ne'er eam nigh him, Than Mailie dead

I wat she was a sheep o' sense,

An' could behave hersel wi' mense,

I'll say t, she never brak a fence,

Thro' thievish greed
Our Bardie, lanely, keeps the spence inner room
Sin' Mailie's dead

Or, if he winders up the howe,
Her hvin image in her yowe
Comes bleatin till him, owre the knowe,
For bits o' bread,

An' down the briny pearls rowe

For Mailie dead

She was nae get o moorlan ttps,
Wi' tawted ket, an' hairi hips,
For her forbears were brought in ships,
Fric vont the Tweed
A bonier fleesh inc'er cross'd the clips
Than Mulle's, dead

Wre worth that man wha first did shape
That vile, wanchancie thing—a rape ' It maks guid fellows girn an' gape,
Wi' chokin dread,

And not avenged be

Now farewell, light, thou sunshine bright, And all beneath the sky 1 May coward shame disdain his name, The wretch that dares not die 1

Written for Johnson's Musical Museum, and published 1788. The verses were designed as an improvement on some attributed to a freebooter, half Celt half gipsy, named M Pherson, who was hanged at Banff in November 1700. Burns believed that Inverness was the scene.

The Banks o' Doon.

Ye banks and braces o' bonic Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair?
How can ye chant, ye little hirds,
And I sae weary fu' o' care?
Thou'll break my heart, thon warbling bird
That wantons thro' the flowering thorn'
Thou minds me o' departed joys,
Departed, never to return

Aft hae I rov'd by bonie Doon,

To see the rose and woodbine twine,

And ilka bird sang o' its luve,

And foadly sae did I o' mine,

Wi' lightsome lieart I pu'd a rose,

Fin' sweet npon its thorny tree!

And my fause luver staw my rose—false lover stole

But ah' he left the thorn wi' me

Writen for the Musical Museum, and published in vol 1v, 1792. It is the best of four sets of verses on the river Doon

A Man's a Man for a' that.

Is there for honest Poverty
That hings his head, an' a' that?
The coward slave, we pass him by,
We dare be poor for a' that'
For a' that, and a' that,
Our toils obscare, and a' that,
The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
The Man's the gowd for a' that!

What though on hamely fare we dine,

Wear hoddin grey, and a' that, coarse wooffen
Gie fools their silks and knaves their wine,

A Man's a Man for a' that

For a' that, and a' that,

Their tinsel show, and a' that,

The honest man, tho' e'er so poor,

Is king o' men for a' that!

Ye see yon birkie ca'd a lord,
Wha struts, and stares, and a' that?
Though hundreds worship at his word,
He's but a cuif for a' that
For a' that, and a' that,
His ribband, star, and a' that,
The man of independent mind,
He looks and laughs at a' that

A prince can mak a belted knight,
A marquis, duke, and a' that,
But an honest man's aboon his might— abov Guid faith, he mauna fa' that! must not—claim
For a' that, and a' that,
Their dignities, and a' that,
The pith o' sense and pride o' worth
Are higher rank than a' that

Then let us pray that come it may,—
As come it will for a' that—
That Sense and Worth, o'er a' the earth,
Shall bear the gree, and a' that 1 have first place
For a' that, and a' that,
It's comin' yet for a' that,
That Man to Man, the world o'er,
Shall brithers be for a' that 1

TUNE-Soldier's Toy

I am a son of Mars who have been in many wars,
And show my cuts and scars wherever I come
This here was for a wench, and that other in a trench,
When welcoming the French at the sound of the drum,
Lal de daudle, &c.

My prenticeship I past where my leader breath'd his last, When the bloody die was east on the heights of Abram And I served out my trade when the gallant game was play d,

And the Moro low was Ind at the sound of the drum

I lastly was with Curtis among the floating batt'rics,
And there I left for witness an arm and a limb,
Act let my country need me, with I hott to head me,
I'd clatter on my stumps at the sound of a drum

And now the' I must beg, with a wooden arm and leg, And many a triter'd rag hanging over my hum, I'm as happy with wallet, my hottle and my callet, trait As when I used in scarlet to follow a druin

What the, with hours locks, I must stand the winter shocks, Beneath the woods and rocks, oftentimes for a home, When the tother bag I sell, and the tother bottle tell, I could meet a troop of hell, at the sound of a drum,

RECITATIVO

He ended, and the kebars sheak
Aboon the chorus roar,
While frighted rations backward leak,
An' seek the benmost bore
A fairy fiddler frie the neul,
He skirl'd ont, encore ' threked
But up arose the martial chuel,
An' laid the loud uproar

۱IR

Tune—Jolly Mortals, fill your Glasses
See the smoking bowl before us!

Work our jovial, ragged ring!

Round and round take up the chorus,

And in raptures let us sing —

Chorus—A fig for those by Inw protected!

Liberty's a glorious feast!

Courts for cowards were erected,

Churches built to please the priest!

What is title, what is treasure, What is reputation s care? If we lead a life of pleasure, 'Tis no matter how or where

With the ready trick and fable
Round we wander all the day,
And at night, in barn or stable,
Hug our doxies on the hay

Does the train attended carriage
Thro' the country lighter rove?
Does the sober bed of marriage
Witness brighter scenes of love?

Life is all a variorum,
We regard not how it goes,
Let them prate about decorum
Who have character to lose

Here's to budgets, bags and wallets!
Here's to all the wandering train!
Here's our rigged brats and callets!
One and all, cry out, Amen!

'This puissant and splendid production, as Matthew Arnold called it, is believed to have been inspired by a visit of the post to a lodging house for beggars kept in Mauchline by Pooste Nan ie, otherwise Agnes P hall, wife of George Gibson, previously consisted by the kink remain of resetting so on goods. It was visited during the Mossgiel period but was no published during Burns's lifetime.

The Rigs o' Burley

Chorus—Corn rip", an' barley rigs, aniges
An' corn rigs are bonic
I'll ne or forget that happy night,
Amang the rigs we Annic

It was upon a Lammas night,

When com rigs are bonic,

Beneath the moon's unclouded light,

I held cwa' to Annie,

The time flew by, wi' tentle scheel,

Fill, tween the late and carly,

Wi'sma' persua ion she agree!

To see me thro' the barley

The sts was blue, the wind was still,
The moon was shirting clearly.
I set her down wit right good will,
Among the righof barby
I ken't her heart vias a' my ain,
I loved her most sincerely.
I kiss'd her owre and owre again,
Among the right of barbs.

I lock'd her in my fond embrace,
Her heart vias heating farely
My bles ings on that happy place,
Among the rigs of barles?
Put by the moon and stars so bright,
That should that hour so clearly?
She as shall bless that happy night
Among the rigs of barley.

I had been blythe wi' committee dear Lappy
I had been merry drinking,
I had been joyfu' gath'rin gear; making
I had been happy thinking
But a' the pleasures e'er I saw,
Tho' threa times doubl d fairly—
That happy night was worth them a,

This song was declared by Burns to have been composed before his twenty third year

Mary Morison.

O Mary at thy window be!

It Is the wish d, the trysted hour
Those smiles and glances let me see,
That makes the nuser's treasure poor,
How blythely wad I bide the stoure,
A weary slave free sun to sun,
Could I the rich reward secure
The lovely Mary Morison

I estreen, when to the trembling string
The dance gred thro' the lighted ha', went—hall
To thee my fanes took its wing,
I sat, but neither heard nor saw
Tho this was fur and that was braw,
And you the toast of a the town,
I sigh'd, and said among them a',
'Ye are no Mary Morison''

At least be pity to me shown,
A thought ungentle canna be
The thought o' Mary Morison

Described by the poet in a letter to Thomson of March 1793 as one of my juvenile works. Local tradition identifies the heroine with a veritable Mauchline Mary Morrison, but it is niore commonly believed that 'Mary Morrison was only a euphonious rendering of 'Elicon Begbie, the object of Burns 8 first serious passion

Ae Fond Kiss.

Ae fond kiss, and then we sever!

Ae farewell, and then for ever!

Deep in heart wrung tears I'll pledge thee,
Warring sighs and groans I'll wage thee.
Who shall say that Fortune grieves him,
While the star of hope she leaves him?

Me, nae cheerfu' twinkle lights me
Dark despair around benights me

I'll ne'er blame my partial fancy Naething could resist my Nancy! But to see her was to love her, Love but her, and love for ever Had we never lov'd sae kindly, Had we never lov'd sae blindly, Never met—or never parted, We had ne er been brol en hearted

Fare thee weel, thou first and fairest!
Fare thee weel, thou best and dearest!
Thine be ilka joy and treasure,
Peace, Enjoyment, Love and Pleasure!
Ae fond kiss, and then we sever!
Ae farewell, Alas, for ever!
Deep in heart wrung tears I'll pledge thee,
Warring sighs and groans I'll wage thee.

Editions, biographies and estimates of Burns are innumerable. The most notable editions of the poems alone are the Kilmarnock (1780). Edinburgh (1787), London (1787). Edinburgh and London (1793). Centenary Edition by W. E. Henley and T. F. Henderson in 1866. The chief editions with Life and Letters are those of Currie (1800). Allan Cunningham (1834). W. Scott Douglas (1882). and Robert Chambers (1851), revised by present writer in 1856). The best Biography pure and simple is that of Lockhart (1828). The most famous Fessays are those of John Wilson (collected works 1858), I homas Carlyle (1831) and R. Louis Stevenson (1882).

WILLIAM WALLACE

Richard Gall (1776-1801) was born near Dunbar, and whilst employed as a printer in Edinburgh, threw off some Scottish songs that became favourites. A 'Farewell to Ayrshire' and one or two more were printed as by Burns, the best known, 'My only jo and dearie,' is rather in Tannahill's manner. One verse runs

The birdie sings upon the thom
Its sang o' joy, fu' cheerie O,
Rejoicing in the summer morn,
Nac care to mal it cerie O
But little kens the sangster sweet
Aught o' the carea I had to meet,
That gar my restless bosom beat,
My only jo and dearie O

Lady Nairne (1766-1845), though she lived to near the middle of the nineteenth century, was born but seven years after Burns, and was writing verses in 1792 Carolina Oliphant, born at the 'auld house' of Gask in Perthshire, was the third daughter of its Jacobite laird she married her second cousin, Major William Murray Nairne (1757-1830), who in 1824, on the restoration of the attainted Scottish peerages, be came the sixth Lord Nairne, to him she bore onc son, William (1808-37) They settled near Edinburgh, and after her husband's death the Baroness Nairne lived for three years in Ireland, then for nine on the Continent, returning at last to the new house of Gask-the old one had been pulled do vn Her eighty-seven songs appeared first under the pseudonym 'Mrs Bogan of Bogan' or 'B B' in The Scottish Minstell (1821-24), and posthumously under her own name as Lays from Her songs show, in the poetic re-Strathearn miniscence stage, the family Jacobitism, but no Jacobite in his own day ever concealed his colours with more jealous care and elaborate pains than all her life long Lady Nairne did her authorship Not a few of her songs are substantially recastings and adaptations of old popular favourites in the tone of which there was something to disapprove But some of them-including a few incorporating old fragments-are pure inspirations, true and all but perfect lyrics, in poetic worth coming nearest to Burns's best, as many as eight or ten of them live in the hearts of the Scottish people with the airs to which they are wedded-the exquisite 'Land o' the Leal' (c. 1798) and 'Caller Herrin',' 'The Laird o' Cockpen,' 'The Auld House,' 'The Rowan Tree, 'The Hundred Pipers,' 'He's owre the hills that I lo'e weel,' 'Will ye no come back again' and 'Charlie is my Darling'-a list v luch indicates the variety of the notes she struck. last two, though there were older songs with the same title and to the same general purpose, have completely superseded the other versions 'Farewell, Edinburgh,' is also well known in Scotland, and 'Would you be young again' re veals the characteristic temper of Indy Nairne's liter years Her Jacobitism, like Lurns's, Scott's, Hogg's, and that of the writers of almost all the best known Jacobite songs, was historical, senti mental, poetical, and entirely consistent with the most perfect loyalty to the reigning House, Queen Victoria had no more faithful subject than this champion of a beloved and idealised Prince Charlie's claims on romantic devotion, who took a lively interest in Christian missions, in church extension, and in all philanthropic schemes. It should be added that in the songs the words often convey quite obviously the thoughts of a lady born, not of colliers or fishwives, and the Scotch is the Scotch of one bred to speak and write English habitually Angels do not laken in Scotch drell and rell rhome conveniendy in 'The Laird o' Cocl pen,' but should be d' till and weel, throughout Scotland willows are always saughs, and billows is a word wholly alien to the dialect of Newhaven

The Land o' the Leal.

I'm wearin' awa, John,
Like snaw wreaths in thaw, John,
I'm wearin' awa'
To the land o' the leal
There's nae sorrow there, John,
There's neither cauld nor eare, John,
The day's aye fair
In the land o' the leal

Our bonny bairn's there, John,
She was baith gude and fair, John,
And, oh! we grudged her sair
To the land o' the leal
But sorrow s sel' wears past, John—
And joy's a comin' fast, John—
The joy that s aye to last
In the land o' the leal.

Sae dear's that joy was bought, John,
Sae free the battle fought, John,
That sinfu' man e'er brought
To the land o' the leal
Oh, dry your glistening ee, John I
My saul langs to be free, John '
And angels beckon me
To the land o' the leal

Oh, haud ye leal and true, John!
Your day it's wearin' through, John,
And I'll welcome you
To the land o' the leal.
Now, fare ye weel, my ain John,
This warld's cares are vain, John,
We'll meet, and we'll be fain,
In the land o' the leal

Leal, another form of legal and loyal, means in Middle English and Scotch loyal, faithful, honest, true, lawful, just, fair, and noble, and lives on in the dialects of the north of England and Scotland in this particular case the 'land of the true hearted is obviously meant for the home of the faithful, heaven.

The Laird o' Cockpen.

The Laird o' Cockpen he's proud and he's great, His mind is ta'en up with the things o' the state, He wanted a wife his braw house to keep, But favonr wi' wooin' was fashious to seek troublesome

Down by the dyke side a lady did dwell, At his table head he thought she'd look well, M'Clish's ac daughter o' Claverse ha' Lee, A penniless lass wi' a lang pedigree

His wig was weel pouthered, and as gude as new,
His waisteoat was white, his coat it was blue,
He put on a ring, a sword, and cocked hat,
And wha could refuse the Laird wi' a' that?

He took the gray mare, and rade cannile,
And rapped at the yett o' Claverse ha' Lec
'Gac tell Mistress Jean to come speedily ben,
She's wanted to speak wi' the Laird o' Cockpen'

Mistress Jean she was makin' the elder flower wine 'And what brings the Laird at sie a like time?'

She put aff her apron, and on her silk gown, Her mutch wi' red ribbons, and gaed awa' down. caj

And when she cam ben, he bowed fu' low, And what was his errand he soon let her know, Amazed was the Laird when the lady said 'Na,' And wi' a laigh curtsey she turned awa'

Dumfoundered he was, but nae sigh did he gie, He mounted his mare—he rade cannilie, And aften he thought, as he gaed through the glen, She's daft to refuse the Laird o' Cockpen.

[And now that the Laird his exit had made, Mistress Jean she reflected on what she had said, 'Oh I for ane I'll get better, it's want I'll get ten—I was dast to refuse the Laird o' Coekpen.'

Next time that the Laird and the lady were seen, They were gaun arm in arm to the kirk on the green, Now she sits in the ha' like a weel tappit hen— But as yet there's nac chickens appeared at Cockpen ]

The last two verses were added by Miss Ferrier, authoress of Marriage, and are now always printed as part of the song

Caller Herrin'

Wha'll buy my caller herrin'? fresh, new-caught
They're bonny fish and halesome farin',
Wha'll buy my caller herrin',
New drawn frae the Forth?

When ye were sleepin' on your pillows, Dreamed ye aught o' our puir fellows, Darkling as they faced the billows, A' to fill the woven willows?

Wha'll buy my caller herrin'? &c.

Wha'll buy my caller herrin'?
They re no brought here without brave darin'
Buy my caller herrin',
Hauled through wind and rain,
Wha'll buy my caller herrin'? &c.

Wha'll buy my caller herrin'?
Oh, ye may ca' them vulgar farin',
Wives and mithers maist despairin'
Ca' them lives o' men.

Wha'll buy my caller herrin'? &c.

When the creel o' herrn' passes, Ladies, clad in silks and laces, Gather in their braw pelisses, Cast their heads and serew their faces. Wha'll buy my caller herrn'? &c.

Caller herrin''s no got lightly,
Ye can trip the spring fu' tightly,
Spite o' tauntin', flanntin', flingin',
Gow has set you a' a singin'
Wha'll buy my caller herrin'? &c.

Neebour wives, now tent my tellin'
When the bonny fish ye're sellin',
At ae word be in your dealin',
Truth will stand when a' thing's failin'
Wha'll buy my caller herrin'? &c.

Neil Gow (1727-1807) was a violinist and composer, famous for strathspeys and reels, so was his sou Nathaniel, for whom this song was written and by whom the tune was composed Dr Charles Rogers wrote the Life and Songs of Lady Natrie (1869) and there is a small work on her by the Rev Geo Henderson (1800) see also kington Ohphant's Jacobite Lairds of Gask (1870).

Robert Tannahill (1774-1810), a Isrical poet, some of whose songs rival all but the best of Burns's in popularity, was born in Paisley, and, early sent to the loom, continued to follow the staple trade of his native town until his twenty-sixth year, when, with one of his vounger brothers, he removed to Lancashire. There he continued two years, till, hearing of his father's ill health, he returned in time to receive his dving blessing. Soon after he wrote to a friend 'My brother Hugh and I are all that now remain at home with our old mother, bending under age and frailty, and but seven years back nine of us used to sit at dinner to gether'. In The Filial Vow he inscribed this monument to her memory

Twas hers to guide me through life's early day, To point out virtue's paths, and lead the way Now, while her powers in frigid languor sleep, 'Tis mine to hand her down life's rugged steep, With all her little weal nesses to bear, Attentive, kind, to soothe her every care. 'Tis nature bids, and truest pleasure flows From lessening an aged parent's woes

The lines indicate the writer's filial piety, but their inferiority to his Scottish songs shows how little at home he was in English poetry Tannahill, an enthusiastic student of Ramsay, Fergusson, and Burns, composed verses from a very early age, it was not till after this time that he passed mediocrity Encouraged by R A Smith, a musician and composer, he applied himself sedulously to song-writing, and when Smith had set some of his songs to original airs, he in 1807 ventured on the publication of a volume of poems and songs, of which the first impression, consisting of nine hundred copies, was sold in a few weeks. He afterwards contributed songs to George Thomson's Meanwhile he himself, always Select Melodies reserved, shy, and of slight and feeble physique, fell into a state of morbid despondency, aggravated by bodily weakness and a phthisical He had prepared a new edition of his poems for the press, but when Constable the publisher returned the copy because he already had on hand more new works than he could undertake that season, the disappointment preved on the spirits of the sensitive poet, he burnt the manuscripts of a hundred new songs, and sank into a state of profound melaneholia. One night in May 1810 he left his bedroom unperceived, and next day his body was found in the canal The longer poems of this modest, ill-starred weaverpoet are greatly inferior to his songs, and are commonplace and artificial, but some of the lyrics are original, sincere, and touching, though often over-sentimental, and disfigured (e.g. the 'Flower o' Dumblane') by appallingly prosaic phrases He is mainly remembered for about halfa dozen songs, including, besides those given below, 'Loudon's Bonnie Woods and Braes' and 'The Bonnie Wood o' Craigielea' Semple in his edition of the Poems (with Life, 1876) has 'restored' the Scots words to his idea of propriety and regularity

The Braes o' Balquhither

Let us go, lassie, go,
To the braes o' Balquhither,
Where the blae berries grow
'Mang the bonny Highland heather,
Where the deer and the rae,
Lightly bounding together,
Sport the lang summer day
On the braes o' Balquhither

I will twine thee a bower
By the clear siller fountain,
And I'll cover it o'er
Wi' the flowers of the mountain,
I will range through the wilds,
And the deep glens sae dreame,
And return wi' their spoils
To the bower o' my deame.

When the rude wintry win'
Idly rives round our dwelling,
And the rour of the linn
On the night breeze is swelling,
So merrily we'll sing,
As the storm rattles o'er us,
Till the dear shieling ring
Wi' the light lilting chorus

Now the simmer's in prime Wi' the flowers richly blooming,
And the wild mountain thyme
A' the moorlands perfuming,
To our dear native scenes
Let us journey together,
Where glad innocence reigns
'Mang the brass o' Balquhither

The Braes o' Gleniffer

Keen blaws the wind o'er the braes o' Glenisser,
The auld eastle turrets are covered wi'snaw,
How changed frae the time when I met wi'my lover
Amang the broom busies by Stanley green shaw!
The wild slowers o'simmer were spread a'sae bonnie,
The mavis sang sweet frae the green birken tree,
But far to the camp they hae marched my dear Johnie,
And now it is winter wi'nature and me.

Then ilk thing around is was blythesome and cheerie,
Then ilk thing around us was bonny and braw,
Now naething is heard but the wind whistling dreame,
And meething is seen but the wide spreading snaw
The trees are a' bare, and the birds mute and dowie, sad
They shake the cauld drift frae their wings as they flee,
And chirp out their plaints, seeming wae for my Johnie,
'Tis winter wi' them, and 'tis winter wi' me.

You can'd sleety cloud shiffs along the bleak mountain,
And shakes the dark firs on the steep rocky brae, While down the deep glen brawls the snaw flooded fountain,

That murmured sae sweet to my laddie and me.

It's no its loud roar on the wintry wind swellin',

It's no the cauld blast brings the tear to my ee,

For oh! gin I saw but my bonny Scots callan,

The dark days o' winter were simmer to me.

The Flower o' Dumblane

The sun has gane down o'er the lofty Ben Lomond,
And left the red clouds to preside o'er the scene,
While lanely I stray in the calm simmer gloamin,
To muse on sweet Jessie, the flower o' Dumblane
How sweet is the brier, wi' its saft fauldin' blossom!
And sweet is the birk, wi' its mantle o' green,
Yet sweeter and furer, and dear to this bosom,
Is lovely young Jessie, the flower o' Dumblane,

She's modest as ony, and blithe as she's bonny,
For guileless simplicity marks her its ain
And far be the villain, divested of feeling,
Wha'd blight in its bloom the sweet flower o' Dumblane.
Sing on, thou sweet mavis, thy hymn to the e'ening, Thou'rt dear to the echoes of Calderwood glen Sae dear to this bosom, sae artless and winning,
Is charming young Jessie, the flower o' Dumblane.

How lost were my days till I met wi' my Jessie'
The sports o' the city seemed foolish and vain,
I ne'er saw a nymph I would ca' my dear lassie,
Till charmed wi' sweet Jessie, the flower o' Dumblane
Though mine were the station o' loftiest grandeur, Amidst its profusion I'd languish in pain,
And reckon as naething the height o' its splendour,
If wanting sweet Jessie, the flower o' Dumblane

Gloomy Winter's now Awa'

Gloomy winter's now awa', Saft the westlin breezes blaw,
'Mang the birks o' Stanley shaw
The mavis sings fu' cheerie O
Sweet the craw flower's early bell
Decks Gleniffer's dewy dell,
Blooming like thy bonny sel',
My young, my artless dearie O
Come, my lassie, let us stray
O'er Glenkilloch's sunny brae,
Blithely spend the gowden day
Midst joys that never weare O

Towering o'er the Newton woods,
Laverocks fan the snaw white clouds,
Siller saughs, wi' downie biids,
Adorn the banks sae brierie O
Round the sylvin fairy nooks, Feathery breekans fringe the rocks,
'Neath the brae the burnie jouks,
And ilka thing is cheerie O
Trees may bud, and birds may sing,
Flowers may bloom, and verdure spring,
Joy to me they canna bring,
Unless wi' thee, my dearie O

Sir Alexander Boswell (1775–1822), of Auchinleck in Ayrshire, eldest son of Johnson's biographer, was a man of many accomplishments, but is now remembered for his tragic fate and for his songs, such as 'Auld Gudeman, ye're a Drucken Carle,' 'Jenny's Bawbee,' and 'Jenny dang the Weaver,' rough but characteristic genre pictures rich in a kind of comic humour, the less rude 'Good-night and Jov be wi' ye a'' is also still popular Educated at Westminster and Oxford, in 1803 he printed a volume of Songs chiefly in the Scottish Dialect In 1810 he published a somewhat overdrawn Scottish dialogue, in the style of Fergusson, called Edinburgh, or the Ancient Royalty, a Sketch of Manners, by Simon Gray Other poems were Clan Alpin's Vow (1811), a tragic Highland tale, based on the record in the Register of the Privy Council of Scotland for 1589, and Sir Albyn, a burlesque, Skeldon Hanghs was a rhymed version of an old Ayrshire legend Some of his best songs were among the twelve he contributed to Thomson's Select Collection (1817) His unfinished and not very brilliant anticipation of Byron, An Epistle to the Edinburgh Reviewers (1803), contains some smart couplets

All are not dunned you happen to dislike,
All turn not marble whom your glances strike
When the fierce tiger rages o'er the land,
Then to the chase, ye hunters, in a band!
But where's the honour, where's the mighty feat,
To seize a victim that can only bleat?
Why tinge with red the unassuming cheek,
Or tear a linnet with a vulture's beak?
Is he a hon who can gorge a rit?
Is he Gohath who can erush a gnat?

Boswell did much to stimulate his countrymen to honour Burns's memory, securing the erection of the monument on the Doon, and for two or three years sat in Parliament for Plympton in Devon-Sir Alexander, created a baronet in 1821 for a (poor but) loval song, 'Long live George the Fourth,' was an ardent lover of our early literature, and at his private printing-press at Auchinleck House reprinted a series of rare works, both English and Scottish, some of the earlier ones with his own When politics ran high he wrote some personal pasquinades, for one of which he received a challenge from Mr Stuart of Dunearn, and the parties met at Auchtertool in Fiseshire. Stuart's shot took effect and the Tory baronet fell, dying from the wound on the following day, the 27th of March 1822 He was a hearty, high-spirited man, tall and of imposing presence, fond of field sports, and in almost every way (even in his literary gifts and interests) very unlike his father. His brother, James Boswell (1778–1822), an accomplished scholar and student, edited Malone's edition of Shakespeare (21 vols 8vo, 1821) From James's funeral Sir Alexander returned straight to his fatal encounter with Mr Stuart

Jenny dang the Weaver

At Willie's wedding on the green, The lasses, bonny witches!
Were a' dressed out in aprons clean, And braw white Sunday mutches Auld Maggie bade the lads tak' tent, But Jock would not believe her, But soon the fool his folly kent, For Jenny dang the weaver And Jenny dang, Jenny dang, Jenny dang the weaver, But soon the fool his folly kent,

For Jenny dang the weaver defeated, balked, Jilted At ilka country dance or reel,

Wi' her he would be bobbing,

When she sat down, he sat down,

And to her would be gabbing,

Where'er she gaed, baith but and ben,

The coof would never leave her,

Aye I cekling like a clocking hen,

But Ienny dang the weaver

Jenny dang, &c.

Quo' he 'My lass, to speak my mind,
In troth I needna swither, hesitate
Yon've bonny een, and if yon're kind,
I'll never seek anither'
He hummed and hawed, the lass cried, 'Peugh I'
And bade the coof no deave her
Syne snapt her fingers, lap and leugh,
And dang the silly weaver
And Jenny dang, Jenny dang,
Jenny dang the weaver,
Syne snapt her fingers, hap and leugh, laughed
And dang the silly weaver

Jenny's Bawbee

I met four chaps von birks amang,
Wi' hingin' lugs, and faces lang,
I speered at neebour Bauldy Strang, Wha's that I see?

Quo' he Ilk cream faced, pawky chiel Thought himsel cunnin' as the deil, And here they cam, awa' to steal Jenny's bawbee m money, fortune

The first, a captain till his trade,
Wi' skull ill lined, and back weel clad,
Marched round the barn, and by the shed,
And pappit on his knee.

Quo' he 'My goddess, nymph, and queen, Your beauty's dazzled batth my een,' But deil a beauty he had seen But—Jenny's buwbee

A lawyer neist, wi' bletherm' gab, Wha speeches wove like ony wab, In ilk ane's corn age took a dab, And a' for a fee

Accounts he had through a' the town,
And tradesmen's tongues nae mair could drown, Haith now he thought to clout his gown
Wi' Jenny's baw bee.

A norland laird neist trotted up,
Wi' bawsent naig and siller whup,
Wite Cried 'There's my beast, lad, hand the grup
Or tie't till a tree

'What's gowd to me?—I've walth o' lan', Bestow on ane o' worth your han','
He thought to pay what he was awn
Wi' Jenny's bawbee.

A' spruce frae ban'hoxes and tubs,
A Thing cam neist—but life has rubs—
Foul were the roads, and fou the dubs, Ah! wae's me!

puddles

A' clatty, squintin' through a glass, He girned, 'I' faith, a bonny lass!' He thought to win, wi' front o' brass, Jenny's bawbee.

She bade the laird gang comb his wig, The sodger no to strut sae big, The lawyer no to be a prig, The fool cried 'Tehee,

'I kent that I could never fail!'
She preened the dish clout till his tail,
And cooled him wi a water pail,
And kept her bawbee

The High Street of Edinburgh.

Tier upon tier I see the mansions rise, Whose azure summits mingle with the skies, There, from the earth the labouring porters bear The elements of fire and water high in air, There, as you scale the steps with toilsome tread, The dripping barrel madelies your head, Thence, as adown the giddy round you wheel, A rising porter greets you with his creel! Here, in these chambers, ever dull and dark, The lady gay received her gayer spark, Who, elad in silken coat, with cautious tread, Trembled at opening casements overhead, But when in safety at her porch he trod, He seized the ring, and rasped the twisted rod No idlers then, I trow, were seen to meet, Linked, six a row, six hours in Princes Street, But, one by one, they panted up the hill, And picked their steps with most uncommon skill, Then, at the Cross, each joined the motley mob-'How are ye, Tam?' and, 'How's a' wi'ye, Bob?' Next to a neighbouring tavern all retired. And draughts of wine their various thoughts inspired. O'er draughts of wine the beau would moan his love, O'er draughts of wine the cit his bargain drove, O'er draughts of wine the writer penned the will, And legal wisdom counselled o'er a gill Yes! mark the street, for youth the great resort, Its spacious width the theatre of sport There, midst the crowd, the jingling hoop is driven, Full many a leg is hit, and curse is given There, on the pavement, mystic forms are chalked, Defaced, renewed, delayed-but never balked, There romping Miss the rounded slate may drop, And kick it out with persevering hop There, in the dirty current of the strand, Boys drop the rival corks with ready hand, And, wading through the puddle with slow pace, Watch in solicitude the doubtful race! And there, an active band, with frequent boast, Vault in succession o'er each wooden post Or a bold stripling, noted for his might, Heads the array, and rules the mimie fight From hand and sling now fly the whizzing stones, Unheeded broken heads and broken bones The rival hosts in close engagement mix, Drive and are driven by the dint of sticks. The bicker rages, till some mother's fears Ring a sad story in a bailie's ears Her prayer is heard, the order quick is sped, And, from that corps which hapless Porteous led,

A brave detachment, probably of two, Rush, like two kites, upon the warlike erew, Who, struggling, like the fabled frogs and mice, Are pounced upon, and carried in a trice But mark that motley group, in various garb-There vice begins to form her rankling barb, The germ of gambling sprouts in pitch and toss, And brawl, successive, tells disputed loss From hand to hand the whirling halfpence pass, And, every copper gone, they fly to brass Those polished rounds which decorate the coat, And brilliant shine upon some youth of note, Offspring of Birmingham's creative art, Now from the faithful button holes depart To sudden twitch the rending stitches yield, And Enterprise again essays the field So, when a few fleet years of his short span Have ripened this dire passion in the man, When thousand after thousand takes its flight In the short circuit of one wretched night, Next shall the honours of the forest fall, And ruin desolate the chieftain's hall, Hill after hill some cunning clerk shall gain, Then in a mendicant behold a thane 1

The fourth line in Campbell's Pleasures of Hope runs
'Whose sun bright summit mingles with the sky
And in Telford's forgotten poem ou Eskdale is a couplet
'Here lofty hills in varied prospect rise,
Whose airy summits mingle with the skies

To the Memory of Burns

Ah! who shall breathe upon the oaten reed
That pour'd its melody on winding Ayr,
And who shall claim thy mantle as his meed,
Gift of wild poesy, which thou did'st wear?
For rude and earthhorn wight how little meet
So rich a mantle, and a note so sweet!

Thee, Bard of Coila, all her echoes mourn,
Hid in thy silent cave and tuncless grove,
No more the [music] on the breeze is borne,
Mirth's jocund carol, or the plaints of love
Dark Lugar's stream unheeded laves its bed,
And all that liv'd to thee seems dull and dead.

But when soft memory of other days
Steals on the faney with delusive glow,
And while deep rapt we ponder on thy lays,
With music not their own the waters flow,
Thy spirit hov'ring seems to rule the spell,
And our eyes glisten while our bosoms swell.

Good-night, and Joy be wi' ye a'

Good night, and joy be wi'ye a',
Your harmless mirth has charmed my heart,
May life's fell blasts out ower ye blaw'
In sorrow may ye never part!
My spirit lives, but strength is gone,
The mountain fires now blaze in vain
Remember, sons, the deeds I've done,
And in your deeds I'll live again'

When on you muir our gallant clan Frae boasting foes their banners tore,
Wha shewed himsel a better man,
Or fiercer waved the red claymore?
But when in peace—then mark me there—
When through the glen the wanderer came,
I gave him of our lordly fare,
I gave him here a welcome hame

The auld will speak, the young maun hear,
Be cantie, but be good and leal,
Your ain ills age hae heart to bear,
Anither's age hae heart to feel
So, ere I set, I'll see you shine,
I'll see you triumph ere I fa',
My parting breath shall boast you mine—
Good night, and joy be wi'ye a'

The song is supposed to be said or sung by an aged Highland chieftain to his clansmen, and like Clan Alpin's Vow, bears witness to the Celtic Renaissance characteristic of the period Boswell's views on the Scotch of contemporary poetry have been quoted above at page 796. His poems and songs were republished with a Memoir by R. H. Smith in 1873. Prefixed is a list by Mr. Maidment of the publications and reprints of the Auchinleck press—the Disputation between Kiiov and the Abbot of Crossraguel the poems of Barnfield, works by Whetstone, Churchyard, T. Lodge, as well as a number of anonymous pieces and fragments, come of them from the Auchinleck library
